START

Microfilmed By:

NORTHEAST DOCUMENT CONSERVATION CENTER
Andover, MA 01810

JANUARY 1994

Camera Operator:
Kathy Wilder

MASTER NEGATIVE NUMBER: BSO-56-010

MICROFILMED
August 1993 - April 1994

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOK MICROFILMING PROJECT

Funded in part by

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES

Grant No. PS-20709-93

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MICROFILMING PROJECT

A Cooperative Project Between the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives and the Boston Public Library (August 1993 - April 1994)

The Microfilming Project incorporates two collections of scrapbooks housed in two separate repositories. The first set of scrapbooks (80 volumes) resides within the Allen A. Brown Collection of the Boston Public Library (BPL) Music Department. Their call number is M.125.5. The second set of scrapbooks (132 volumes) resides within the Press Clippings collection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) Archives. They have the designation Pres 56.

The BPL scrapbooks begin with the founding of the BSO in 1881 and continue, through 79 seasons, to 1960. Articles consist mainly of reviews and feature stories from Boston and New York newspapers. Occasionally, magazine articles and press releases are also included. The scrapbooks cover most aspects of the BSO.

The BSO scrapbooks run from 1889, the Orchestra's 9th season, to 1973. In addition to local reviews and features, the volumes contain articles culled from national and international publications. The scrapbooks document, in detail, all aspects of the BSO: The Symphony Orchestra (including subscription concerts, tours, and trips), the Boston Pops, the Tanglewood Festival, the Tanglewood Music Center, and Symphony Hall.

The two sets of scrapbooks have been filmed as two separate entities. Researchers wanting to look at specific seasons or subjects must examine both sets of films to ensure full coverage.

The scrapbooks do not represent the complete holdings of either location on the subject of the BSO.

Requests for positive microfilm copies of individual rolls, or of film sets, should be directed to the respective repository:

Music Department
Boston Public Library
Post Office Box 286
Boston, MA 02117

Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives
Symphony Hall
Boston, MA 02115

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOKS

1889 - 1973

132 VOLUMES

Source: Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives

FINDING AID

Boston Symphony Orchestra Scrapbooks (Series 56, Sub-Series 1)

Source: Press Office (Office of the Public Relations Director)

The BSO scrapbooks comprise part of one series in the BSO Archives. Series 56, Press Clippings, is divided by format into 3 sub-series: 1) Scrapbooks, 1889-1973 (132 volumes); 2) Loose Clippings, 1931-1991 (9 record cartons); and 3) Oversize Newspapers and Journals, 1919-1979 (1 oversize box). Each sub-series is arranged chronologically.

The scrapbooks contain concert notices and reviews, record reviews, and feature articles. Early scrapbooks may also contain programs, tickets, and subscription orders. Materials are organized by concert season into the following categories: BSO (including tours); Kneisel Quartet (and later Boston Symphony Chamber Players); Boston Pops (referred to in early years as Promenade concerts); and Tanglewood (including the Tanglewood Music Center, the Tanglewood Festival, Tanglewood-on-Parade, and the Fromm Festival of Contemporary Music).

Reviews and articles cover a wide range of subjects: Founder H.L. Higginson; BSO conductors, players, trustees, and other personnel; guest artists and composers; BSO and Pops performances and recordings; U.S. and overseas tours; BSO/Cecilia Society joint performances; open rehearsals; and special events connected to anniversary celebrations and fundraising.

Feature stories document changes in the size, composition, and location of the orchestra. Topics include the hiring of women and minorities; the unionization of players; controversies (such as the internment of conductor Karl Muck during World War II); the sale of the old Music Hall; and the construction of Symphony Hall and other structures (such as the Koussevitsky Music Shed at Tanglewood).

Reproductions of the materials in the collection may not be made without permission from the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives.

GUIDE TO CONTENTS

Institution: BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Series Name: PRESS CLIPPINGS
Series Number: 56
Series Dates: 1889-1991

Sub-series Name: SCRAPBOOKS
Sub-series Number: 1
Sub-series Dates: 1889-1973

VOLUME LISTING

VOL	TITLE	DATES
1	BSO	1889-1890
2	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1890-1891
3	BSO	1891-1892
4	Promenade (Pops)	1892
5	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1892-1893
6	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1893-1894
7	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1894-1895
8	BSO	1895-1896
9	Promenade (Pops)	1895-1896
10	BSO	1896-1897
11	BSO	1897-1898
12	Promenade (Pops)	1897-1898
13	BSO	1898-1899
14	BSO	1899-1900
15	Pops	1899-1900
16	BSO	1900-1901
17	BSO	1901-1902
18	Pops	1901-1903
19	BSO	1902-1903
20	BSO	1903-1904
21	BSO	1904-1905
22	Pops	1904-1905
23	BSO	1905-1906
24	BSO	1906-1907
25	BSO	1907-1908
26	BSO	1908-1909
27	BSO Pops	1909-1910
28	BSO Pops	1910-1911
29	BSO Advertisements	1910-1911
30	BSO Pops	1911-1912
31	BSO Pops	1912-1913
32	BSO Pops	1913-1914
33	BSO Pops	1914-1915
34	BSO Pops	1915-1916
35	BSO Pops	1916-1917
36	BSO Pops	1917-1918
37	Karl Muck	1918
38	BSO Pops	1918-1919
39	BSO Pops	1919-1920
40	BSO Advertisements	1919-1920
41	BSO Pops	1920-1921
42	BSO Pops	1921-1922
43	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1922-1923
44	BSO Pops	1922-1924
45	BSO Pops	1924
46	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1924-1926
47	BSO Pops	1925-1926
48	BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1926-1927
49	BSO Pops	1926-1928
50	BSO	1928
51	BSO Pops	1928-1929
52	BSO Pops U.S. Tour	1929-1930
53	BSO	1930-1931
54	BSO Pops	1931-1932
55	BSO Pops	1932-1933
56	BSO	1933-1934
57	BSO	1934-1935
58	BSO	1935-1936
59	BSO	1936-1937

VOL	TITLE	DATES
60	Pops Tanglewood	1936-1937
61	BSO	1937
62	BSO	1937-1938
63	Pops Tanglewood	1938
64	BSO	1938-1939
65	Pops Tanglewood	1939
66	BSO	1939-1940
67	Tanglewood	1939-1941
68	BSO Pops	1940
69	BSO	1940-1941
70	Tanglewood	1940-1944
71	BSO	1941-1942
72	BSO	1942-1943
73	BSO	1943-1944
74	BSO Pops Tanglewood	1944-1945
75	BSO Pops Tanglewood	1945-1946
76	BSO Pops Tanglewood	1946-1947
77	Tanglewood	1947-1948
78	BSO	1947-1949
79	Tanglewood	1949-1950
80	BSO	1949-1951
81	Tanglewood	1950-1951
82	BSO Pops	1951-1952
83	BSO Pops	1952-1953
84	Tanglewood	1952-1953
85	BSO	1953-1955
86	Tanglewood	1953-1954
87	Tanglewood	1954-1955
88	BSO Pops	1955-1956
89	Tanglewood	1955-1956
90	Tanglewood	1955-1956
91	European Tour	1956
92	European Tour	1956-1957
93	BSO Pops	1956-1957
94	Tanglewood	1957
95	BSO	1957-1958
96	BSO Pops	1958-1959
97	BSO	1958-1959
98	Tanglewood	1958-1959
99	Tanglewood	1959
100	BSO Pops	1959-1960
101	Tanglewood	1959-1960
102	Far Eastern Tour	1959-1960
103	BSO Pops	1960-1961
104	Tanglewood	1961
105	BSO Pops	1961-1962
106	Tanglewood	1962
107	BSO Pops	1962-1963
108	Tanglewood	1963
109	BSO Pops	1963-1964
110	Tanglewood	1963-1964
111	BSO Pops	1964-1966
112	Tanglewood	1965
113	BSO 85th Anniversary	1965
114	BSO Pops	1965-1966
115	Tanglewood	1966
116	BSO Pops	1966-1967
117	Tanglewood	1967
118	BSO Pops	1967-1968
119	Tanglewood	1968-1969
120	BSO Pops	1968-1969
121	Tanglewood	1969
122	BSO Pops	1969-1970
123	Tanglewood	1970
124	BSO Pops	1970-1971
125	Tanglewood	1971
126	BSO Pops	1971-1972
127	European Tour	1970-1971
128	European Tour	1971
129	Tanglewood	1972
130	BSO Pops	1972-1973
131	Tanglewood	1973
132	BSO Pops	1973-1974

MATERIALS NOT FILMED

SUB-SERIES NUMBER	SUB-SERIES NAME	SUB-SERIES DATES
2	Loose Clippings	1931-1991
3	Oversize Newspapers and Journals	1919-1979

COPYRIGHT STATEMENT

The copyright law of the Unites States - Title 17, United States Code - concerns the making of photocopies or other reproductions of copyrighted material.

Under certain conditions specified in the law, libraries and archives are authorized to furnish a photocopy or other reproduction. One of these specified conditions is that the photocopy or other reproduction is not to be "used for any purpose other than private study, scholarship, or research." If a user makes a request for, or later uses, a photocopy or reproduction for purposes in excess of "fair use," that user may be liable for copyright infringement.

This institution reserves the right to refuse to accept a copy order if, in its judgment, fulfillment of the order would involve violation of the copyright law.

TECHNICAL DATA

IMAGE PLACEMENT: (IA) IB IIA IIB

REDUCTION RATION: 12X

FILM STOCK:

REEL 10

Volume 20-22

BSO
1903-1904
to Pops
1904-1905

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A4

A5

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

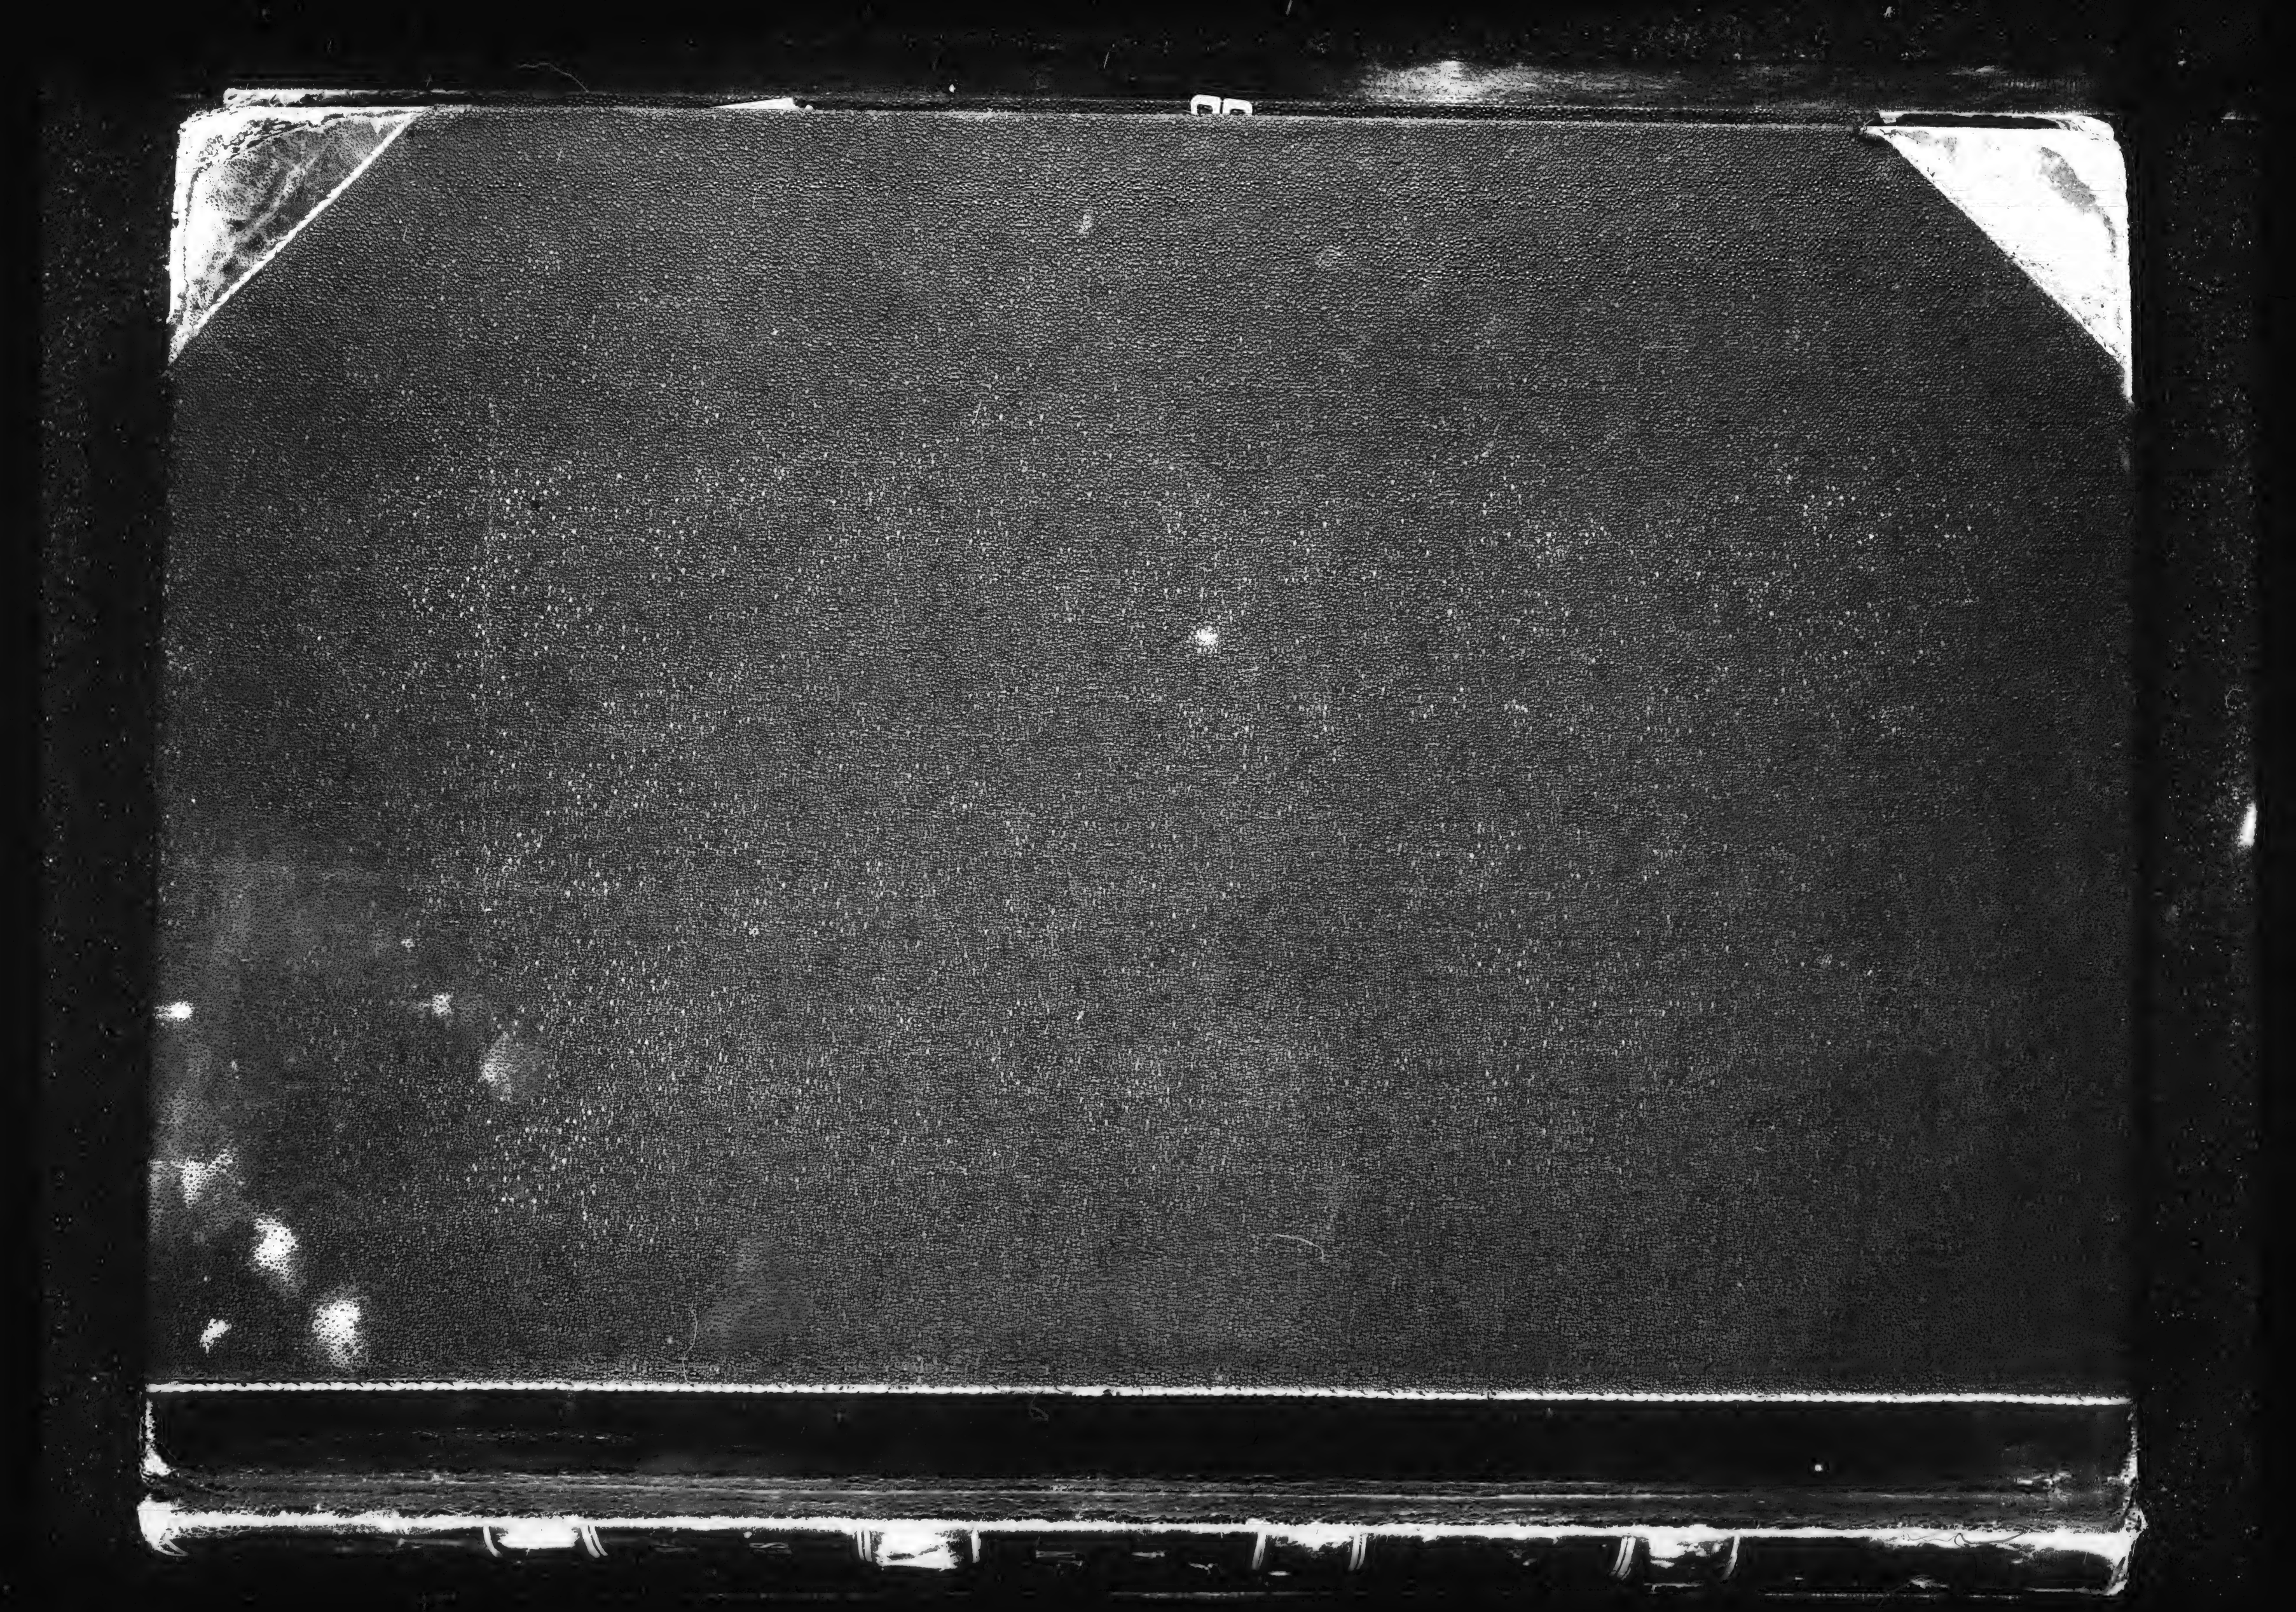
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

MULTIPLE EXPOSURES DUE TO COLOR VARIATIONS AND OVERLAPPING MATERIAL

VOLUME 20

BSO

1903 - 1904



SHIPMAN'S
Invoice & Scrap BOOK

HILL SMITH & CO.
STATIONERS
180 DEVONSHIRE ST.
BOSTON

SYMPHONY HALL

Huntington and Massachusetts Avenues

TWENTY-THIRD SEASON, 1903-1904

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

. . . 94 PERFORMERS . . .

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR

24 CONCERTS

On Consecutive Saturday Evenings, from Oct. 17, 1903, to April 30, 1904, Omitting Nov. 7, Dec. 12, 1903, Jan. 16, Feb. 20, and March 19, 1904, and

24 PUBLIC REHEARSALS

ON CONSECUTIVE FRIDAY AFTERNOONS, from Oct. 16, 1903, to April 29, 1904, Omitting Nov. 6, Dec. 11, 1903, Jan. 15 Feb. 19, and March 18, 1904

Soloists: Mme. MELBA, Mme. GADSKI, Mme. SCHUMANN-HEINK, Mr. GILIBERT, Miss AUS DER OHE, Mme. HOPEKIRK, Miss MAUD MacCARTHY, Miss OLIVE MEAD.

Mr. BUSONI, Mr. HAROLD BAUER, Mr. RAFAEL JOSEFFY, Mr. GEORGE PROCTOR, Mr. M. FERNANDEZ ARBOS, Mr. T. ADAMOWSKI, Mr. RUDOLPH KRASSELT and others

TICKETS for the series of Concerts and for the Series of Rehearsals 12.00 and 7.50 according to location

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Symphony Hall, Monday, September 28, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Symphony Hall, Tuesday, September 29, at 10 A. M.
Tho $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Symphony Hall on Thursday, October 1, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on Friday, October 2, at 10 A. M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets Will Be Delivered in the Hall, and Must Be Paid for as Soon as Bought, or They Will Be Immediately Resold

---

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Auction Sales Season Tickets

REHEARSALS SEPT. 28 AND SEPT. 29

CONCERTS OCTOBER 1 AND OCTOBER 2

Boston Symphony Orchestra

AUCTION SALE OF $12.00 SEATS FOR THE FRIDAY AFTERNOON PUBLIC REHEARSALS at SYMPHONY HALL THIS (MONDAY) MORNING, at 10 O'CLOCK, CONTINUING THROUGH THE DAY.

Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals Tomorrow (TUESDAY). Auction Sale of $12 Seats for Concerts THURSDAY, Oct. 1. Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Concerts FRIDAY, Oct. 2.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

AUCTION SALE OF $7.50 SEATS FOR THE FRIDAY AFTERNOON PUBLIC REHEARSALS AT SYMPHONY HALL THIS (TUESDAY) MORNING, AT 10 O'CLOCK.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for Concerts THURSDAY, Oct. 1. Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Concerts FRIDAY, Oct. 2.

SYMPHONY HALL

Huntington and Massachusetts Avenues

TWENTY-THIRD SEASON 1903-1904

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

94 PERFORMERS

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor

TWENTY-FOUR CONCERTS

On Consecutive SATURDAY EVENINGS from October 17, 1903, to April 30, 1904, omitting November 7, December 12, 1903, January 16, February 20, and March 19, 1904, and

TWENTY-FOUR PUBLIC REHEARSALS

On Consecutive FRIDAY AFTERNOONS from October 16, 1903, to April 29, 1904, omitting November 6, December 11, 1903, January 15, February 19, and March 18, 1904.

SOLOISTS:

Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mr. Gilibert, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Mme. Hopekirk, Miss Maud Mac Carthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Busoni, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. George Proctor, Mr. M. Fernandez Arbos, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Rudolph Krasselt, and others.

TICKETS for the series of CONCERTS and for the series of REHEARSALS, $12.00 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction at Symphony Hall MONDAY, September 28, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction at Symphony Hall TUESDAY, September 29, at 10 A. M.

The $12 seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction at Symphony Hall on THURSDAY, October 1, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on FRIDAY, October 2, at 10 A. M.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be immediately resold.

(A)

SYMPHONY HALL

Friday Afternoon, Oct. 16, at 2:30.
Saturday Evening, Oct. 17, at 8.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, Conductor.
Soloist, Mr. Harold Bauer.

Programme: Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber; Concerto for Pianoforte No. 1, Tschaikowski—Entr'acte from "Messidor" (first time), Bruneau—Symphony No. 2, Brahms.

A limited number of tickets for both performances now on sale at box office.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Soloists: Mme. MELBA, Mme. GADSKI, Mme. SCHUMANN-HEINK, Mr. GILIBERT, Miss AUS DER OHE, Mme. HOPEKIRK, Miss MAUD MacCARTHY, Miss OLIVE MEAD, Mr. BUSONI, Mr. HAROLD BAUER, Mr. RAFAEL JOSEFFY, Mr. GEORGE PROCTOR, Mr. M. FERNANDEZ ARBOS, Mr. T. ADAMOWSKI, Mr. RUDOLPH KRASSELT, and others.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for the Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals at SYMPHONY HALL Huntington and Massachusetts Avenues

Next Monday, Beginning at 10 o'Clock

Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Rehearsals,		Tuesday, Sept. 29, at 10 A. M.
Auction Sale of 12.00 Seats for Concerts,		Thursday, Oct. 1, at 10 A. M.
Auction Sale of 7.50 Seats for Concerts,		Friday, Oct. 2, at 10 A. M.

[2]

BLANK PAGE

CARNEGIE HALL

TWENTY-THIRD SEASON, 1903–1904

The

Boston Symphony Orchestra

94 PERFORMERS

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR

FIVE CONCERTS

THURSDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 5
THURSDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 10
THURSDAY EVENING, JANUARY 14
THURSDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 18
THURSDAY EVENING, MARCH 17

AT 8.15

FIVE MATINEES

SATURDAY AFTERNOON, NOVEMBER 7
SATURDAY AFTERNOON, DECEMBER 12
SATURDAY AFTERNOON, JANUARY 16
SATURDAY AFTERNOON, FEBRUARY 20
SATURDAY AFTERNOON, MARCH 19

EMINENT SOLOISTS TO BE ANNOUNCED

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

 * * * PERSONNEL. * * * * *

Twenty-second Season, 1902-03.

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

FIRST VIOLINS.

Kneisel, Fr., Concertmeister.

Loeffler, C. M.
Adamowski, T.
Roth, O.
Kuntz, D.
Moldauer, A.
Ondricek, K.
Krafft, W.
Hoffmann, J.
Strube, G.
Mahn, F.
Eichheim, H.
Fiedler, E.
Rissland, K.
Theodorowicz, J.
Back, A.

SECOND VIOLINS.

Belinski, A. V.
Akeroyd, J.
Fiumara, P.
Swornsbourne, W. W.
Schuchman, F. E.
~~Kneisel, Jos.~~
Tischer-Zeitz, H.
Marble, E. B.
Kurth, R.
Goldstein, S.
Berger, H.
Eichler, J. Edw.
Kuntz, A.
Fiedler, B.
Sprunt, C.

VIOLAS.

Svecenski, L.
Zach, M.
Heindl, H.
Sauer, G. F.
Kolster, A.
Zahn, F.
Hoyer, H.
Kluge, M.
Krauss, O. H.
Traupe, W.

VIOLONCELLOS.

Schroeder, A.
Keller, J.
Adamowski, J.
Loeffler, E.
Nagel, R.
Heberlein, H.
Barth, C.
Belinski, M.
Heindl, A.

BASSES.

Keller, K.
Kunze, M.
Bareither, G.
Seydel, T.
Barth, C.
Gerhardt, G.
Schurig, R.
Elkind, S.

FLUTES.

Maquarre, A.
Fox, Paul.
Brooke, A.
North, C. K.

OBOE.

Longy, G.
Sautet, A.
Lenom, C.

ENGL. HORN.

Muller, F.

CLARINETS.

Lebailly, V.
Metzger, P.
Vannini, A.

BASS CLARINET.

Fritzsche, O.

BASSOONS.

Debuchy, A.
Helleberg, J.
Regestein, E.

CONTRA BASSOON.

Gunzel, F. H.

HORNS.

Hackebarth, A.
Hein, Fr.
Lorbeer, H.
Schumann, C.

TRUMPETS.

Kloepfel, L.
Brenton, H. E.
Mann, J. F.
Merrill, C.

TROMBONES.

Hampe, C.
Mausebach, A.
Kenfield, L. S.

HARP.

Schuecker, H.

TUBA.

Dworak, J. F.

TYMPANI.

Rettberg, A.

DRUMS.

Ludwig, C. R.

CYMBALS, TRIANGLE, ETC.

Burkhardt, H.

TAMBOUR.

Senia, T.

CASTANETS.

Flockton, J. M.

LIBRARIAN.

Sauerquell, J.

CARNEGIE HALL

TWENTY-THIRD SEASON, 1903–1904

The

Boston Symphony Orchestra

94 PERFORMERS

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR

FIVE CONCERTS

THURSDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 5
THURSDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 10
THURSDAY EVENING, JANUARY 14
THURSDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 18
THURSDAY EVENING, MARCH 17

AT 8.15

FIVE MATINEES

SATURDAY AFTERNOON, NOVEMBER 7
SATURDAY AFTERNOON, DECEMBER 12
SATURDAY AFTERNOON, JANUARY 16
SATURDAY AFTERNOON, FEBRUARY 20
SATURDAY AFTERNOON, MARCH 19

EMINENT SOLOISTS TO BE ANNOUNCED

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

 * * * PERSONNEL. * * * * *

Twenty-second Season, 1902-03.

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

FIRST VIOLINS.

Kneisel, Fr., Concertmeister.

Loeffler, C. M.
Adamowski, T.
Roth, O.
Kuntz, D.
Moldauer, A.
Ondricek, K.
Krafft, W.
Hoffmann, J.
Strube, G.
Mahn, F.
Eichheim, H.
Fiedler, E.
Rissland, K.
Theodorowicz, J.
Back, A.

SECOND VIOLINS.

Belinski, A. V.
Akeroyd, J.
Fiumara, P.
Swornsbourne, W. W.
Schuchman, F. E.
~~Kneisel, Jos.~~
Tischer-Zeitz, H.
Marble, E. B.
Kurth, R.
Goldstein, S.
Berger, H.
Eichler, J. Edw.
Kuntz, A.
Fiedler, B.
Sprunt, C.

VIOLAS.

Svecenski, L.
Zach, M.
Heindl, H.
Sauer, G. F.
Kolster, A.
Zahn, F.
Hoyer, H.
Kluge, M.
Krauss, O. H.
Traupe, W.

VIOLONCELLOS.

Schroeder, A.
Keller, J.
Adamowski, J.
Loeffler, E.
Nagel, R.
Heberlein, H.
Barth, C.
Belinski, M.
Heindl, A.

BASSES.

Keller, K.
Kunze, M.
Bareither, G.
Seydel, T.
Barth, C.
Gerhardt, G.
Schurig, R.
Elkind, S.

FLUTES.

Maquarre, A.
Fox, Paul.
Brooke, A.
North, C. K.

OBOE.

Longy, G.
Sautet, A.
Lenom, C.

ENGL. HORN.

Muller, F.

CLARINETS.

Lebailly, V.
Metzger, P.
Vannini, A.

BASS CLARINET.

Fritzsche, O.

BASSOONS.

Debuchy, A.
Helleberg, J.
Regestein, E.

CONTRA BASSOON.

Gunzel, F. H.

HORNS.

Hackebarth, A.
Hein, Fr.
Lorbeer, H.
Schumann, C.

TRUMPETS.

Kloepfel, L.
Brenton, H. E.
Mann, J. F.
Merrill, C.

TROMBONES.

Hampe, C.
Mausebach, A.
Kenfield, L. S.

HARP.

Schuecker, H.

TUBA.

Dworak, J. F.

TYMPANI.

Rettberg, A.

DRUMS.

Ludwig, C. R.

CYMBALS, TRIANGLE, ETC.

Burkhardt, H.

TAMBOUR.

Senia, T.

CASTANETS.

Flockton, J. M.

LIBRARIAN.

Sauerquell, J.

BLANK PAGE

THE BOSTON HERALD—
TUESDAY, AUGUST 11, 1903.

SYMPHONY SUCCESSORS OF KNEISEL AND SCHROEDER.

They Are to Be Arbos, a Violinist, and Rudolph Krasselt, 'Cello, the Former from London and the Latter a Leipsic Conservatory Graduate.

The places in the Boston Symphony orchestra made vacant by the resignation last season of Franz Kneisel and Alwin Schroeder are to be filled by Mr. Arbos, violin, and Rudolph Krasselt, violoncello. Mr. Gericke, conductor, and Mr. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, engaged the musicians after a long and laborious search, which took them among the musical capitals of Europe. Mr. Arbos comes from London, where, although he has not been prominently identified with orchestral work, he has been a popular teacher and salon player. He is a Spaniard by birth, and studied under Joachim. He holds a position in the Royal College of Music. Herr Krasselt, the violoncellist, is a young man of 25, and has studied under Kiengel at the Leipsic Conservatory. He has made an excellent record in Berlin.

It is said that efforts were made to engage Wessely, a well known concert master of London, and also Marteau. Willie, a 'cellist of Dresden, was also spoken of, but he had just received an appointment at the Dresden Conservatory with the title of professor, a position much prized by German musicians.

THE SPRINGFIELD SUNDAY REPUBLICAN: AUGUST 23, 1903.

It has been well known that the Boston symphony orchestra managers have been actively engaged during the summer in finding successors for the members of the Kneisel quartet who have retired, and so many eminent names have been mentioned in this connection that it is a little surprising to find that the players actually engaged are so little known to the public at large. Mr Arbos, who is to fill Mr Kneisel's place as concert master, is a Spaniard who studied with Joachim, and is now a teacher in the Royal college of music in London. Of late he has been heard of in this country as the instructor of the talented young Irish violinist, Miss Maud McCarthy, who played in this city last year with the Boston symphony orchestra. The 'cellist, Krasselt, who takes Mr Schroeder's place, is a pupil of Julius Klengel, the Leipsic virtuoso, and has been successful as a player in Berlin. He is about 25 years old. The very fact of their selection is a sufficient guaranty of their quality, and if they are not well known in this country, neither was Franz Kneisel when he came from Vienna at the age of 20. As the chief solo players of the Boston symphony orchestra, they will soon have a chance to display their powers.

BOSTON SUNDAY JOURNAL—
SEPTEMBER 13, 1903.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Twenty-two years of existence with 2084 performances, 1089 of which were in this city, only four conductors in all this time, beginning with a membership of sixty, which has been increased to ninety-four, nineteen years in Music Hall and three in the new Symphony Hall, fair-sized audiences at the start, and now every seat in the house sold for the season for both series of concerts for the past three years, these are a few details which suggest themselves at the approach of the twenty-third season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Henschel began with three years, followed by Mr. Gericke for five years, then Mr. Nikisch for four years, after him Mr. Paur for five years, and now Mr. Gericke enters upon the sixth year of his second regime. The musical public of Boston may feel quite sure there will be the usual high standard of performances the coming season, with as attractive a list of soloists as has even been presented. There will be as heretofore twenty-four Friday afternoon public rehearsals, and twenty-four Saturday evening concerts. The auction sales of season tickets will begin at Symphony Hall at 10 A. M. on Monday, Sept. 28, when the $12 seats for the Friday rehearsals will be sold. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Tuesday, Sept. 29. After a rest of one day the auction sales will be renewed on Thursday, Oct. 1, when the $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold. Friday, Oct. 2, will be the last day of the sales, when the $7.50 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold.

THE BOSTON GLOBE—
TUESDAY, AUGUST 11, 1903.

New Symphony Men.

From New York comes the information that Mr Higginson has engaged two musicians in Europe to take the places in the Boston Symphony orchestra made vacant by the resignation at the end of the last season of the principal, Franz Kneisel, and the first cello, Alwin Schroeder. The new men are Mr Arbos violin, and Rudolph Krasselt cello. Mr Arbos is a Spaniard, who studied with Joachim, and has for several years been a popular teacher and salon player in the English metropolis, where he is now in a position in the Royal college of music. Herr Krasselt, the cellist, is a man of about 25 years, who studied with Kiengel at the Leipsic conservatory, and has made an excellent record in Berlin.

August 22
1903

The Beacon

—The vacancies in the Symphony Orchestra caused by the resignations of Franz Kneisel and Alwin Schroeder have been filled by the engagement of Arbos, violinist, and Rudolph Krasselt, cellist. Mr. Arbos comes from London, where, although he has not been prominently identified with orchestral work, he has been a popular teacher and salon player. He is a Spaniard by birth, and studied under Joachim. He holds a position in the Royal College of Music. Herr Krasselt, the violoncellist, is a young man of twenty-five, and has studied under Kiengel at the Leipsic Conservatory. He has made an excellent record in Berlin. It is said that efforts were made to engage Wessely, a well-known concert master of London, and also Marteau. Willie, a cellist of Dresden, was also spoken of, but he had just received an appointment at the Dresden Conservatory with the title of professor, a position much prized by German musicians.

THE SUNDAY HERALD—
BOSTON, SEPTEMBER 13, 1903.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

For the 23d consecutive season, the announcement of the 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals, and the 24 Saturday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Symphony Hall, sets the musical pace for the year. Ninety-four players, directed by a conductor whose term of 10 years' service is proof and evidence of his ability, will render good music in the best way, and thus fulfil the initial motive and the always cherished purpose of the founder of this unsurpassed organization. Every assurance is given that the season beginning on Oct. 16 will equal, if not surpass, its predecessors, with as attractive a list of soloists as has ever been presented. The auction sales of season tickets will begin at Symphony Hall at 10 A. M. on Monday, Sept. 28, when the $12 seats for the Friday rehearsals will be sold. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Tuesday, Sept. 29. After a rest of one day the auction sales will be renewed on Thursday, Oct. 1, when the $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold. Friday, Oct. 2, will be the last day of the sales, when the $7.50 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT.
TUESDAY, AUGUST 11 190[3]

It is said that the places in the Boston Symphony Orchestra made vacant by the resignation last season of Franz Kneisel and Alwin Schroeder are to be filled by Mr. Arbos, violin, and Rudolph Krasselt, violoncello. Mr. Gericke, conductor, and Mr. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, engaged the musicians after a long and laborious search, which took them among the musical capitals of Europe. Mr. Arbos comes from London, where, although he has not been prominently identified with orchestral work, he has been a popular teacher and salon player. He is a Spaniard by birth, and studied under Joachim. He holds a position in the Royal College of Music. Herr Krasselt, the violoncellist, is a young man of twenty-five, and has studied under Kiengel at the Leipsic Conservatory. He has made an excellent record in Berlin. It is said that efforts were made to engage Wessely, a well-known concert master of London, and Marteau. Willie, a 'cellist of Dresden, was also spoken of, but he had just received an appointment at the Dresden Conservatory with the title of professor, a position much prized by German musicians.

BOSTON POST,
THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 3, 1903

NEW MUSICIANS FOR SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Fernandez Arbos to Succeed Kneisel; Rudolph Krasselt as Cellist

All but unknown to the musical world of this country, Fernandez Arbos of London as concert master to succeed Franz Kneisel, and Rudolph Krasselt of Berlin as solo 'cellist, have been engaged by Major Henry L. Higginson for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Arbos is well known in London as a violinist.

Mr. Arbos, a young man, is Spanish by birth. He has held a position at the London Royal College of Music for some years. He is said to be a successful teacher, among his pupils being Maud McCarthy, who was heard here last season. His orchestral experience, however, is somewhat limited. He is said to have the fiery temperament of the Latin races, the exact opposite of Mr. Kneisel.

Rudolph Krasselt, who takes the position filled by Alwin Schroeder, is only 25 years of age. He has been for two years with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—
SEPTEMBER 13, 1903.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Twenty-two years of existence with 2084 performers, 1089 of which were in this city, only four conductors in all this time, beginning with a membership of 60, which has been increased to 94, 19 years in Music hall, and three in the new Symphony hall, fair sized audiences at the start, and now every seat in the house sold for the season for both series of concerts for the past three years, these are a few details which suggest themselves at the approach of the 23d season of the Boston symphony orchestra. Mr Henschel began with three years, followed by Mr Gericke for five years, then Mr Nikisch for four years, after him Mr Paur for five years, and now Mr Gericke enters upon the sixth year of his second regime.

The musical public of Boston may feel quite sure there will be the usual high standard of performance the coming season, with as attractive a list of soloists as has ever been presented. There will be as heretofore 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals and 24 Saturday evening concerts.

The auction sales of season tickets will begin at Symphony hall at 10 am Monday, Sept 28, when the $12 seats for the Friday rehearsals will be sold. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Tuesday, Sept 29. The auction sales will be renewed Thursday, Oct 1, when the $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold. Friday, Oct 2, will be the last day of the sales, when the $7.50 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD,
TUESDAY, AUGUST 11, 1903

NEW PLAYERS FOR THE SYMPHONY

The vacancies in the Symphony Orchestra caused by the resignations of Franz Kneisel and Alwin Schroeder have been filled by the engagement of Arbos, violinist, and Rudolph Krasselt, cellist.

Mr. Arbos comes from London, where, although he has not been prominently identified with orchestral work, he has been a popular teacher and salon player. He is a Spaniard by birth, and studied under Joachim. He holds a position in the Royal College of Music.

Herr Krasselt, the violoncellist, is a young man of 25, and has studied under Kiengel at the Leipsic Conservatory. He has made an excellent record in Berlin.

It is said that efforts were made to engage Wessely, a well-known concert master of London, and also Marteau. Willie, a cellist of Dresden, was also spoken of, but he had just received an appointment at the Dresden Conservatory with the title of professor, a position much prized by German musicians.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST,
SEPTEMBER 13, 1903

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Twenty-two years of existence, with 2084 performances, 1089 of which were in this city; only four conductors in all this time; beginning with a membership of 90, which has been increased to 94; 19 years in Music Hall and three in the new Symphony Hall; fair-sized audiences at the start, and now every seat in the house sold for the season for both series of concerts for the past three years—these are a few details which suggest themselves at the approach of the 23d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Henschel began with three years, followed by Mr. Gericke for five years, then Mr. Nikisch for four years, after him Mr. Paur for five years, and now Mr. Gericke enters upon the sixth year of his second regime.

The musical public of Boston may feel quite sure there will be the usual high standard of performances the coming season, with as attractive a list of soloists as has ever been presented. There will be as heretofore 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals and 24 Saturday evening concerts.

The auction sales of season tickets will begin at Symphony Hall at 10 a. m. on Monday, Sept. 28, and the $12 seats for the Friday rehearsals will be sold. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Tuesday, Sept. 29. After a rest of one day the auction sales will be renewed on Thursday, Oct. 1, when the $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold. Friday, Oct. 2, will be the last day of the sales, when the $7.50 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold.

SATURDAY EVENING GAZETTE, BOSTON, AUGUST 22, 1903.

—The vacancies in the Symphony Orchestra caused by the resignations of Franz Kneisel and Alwin Schroeder have been filled by the engagement of Arbos, violinist, and Rudolph Krasselt, cellist. Mr. Arbos comes from London, where, although he has not been prominently identified with orchestral work, he has been a popular teacher and salon player. He is a Spaniard by birth, and studied under Joachim. He holds a position in the Royal College of Music. Herr Krasselt, the violoncellist, is a young man of twenty-five, and has studied under Kiengel at the Leipsic Conservatory. He has made an excellent record in Berlin. It is said that efforts were made to engage Wessely, a well-known concert master of London, and also Marteau. Willie, a cellist of Dresden, was also spoken of, but he had just received an appointment at the Dresden Conservatory with the title of professor, a position much prized by German musicians.

[6]

THE BOSTON HERALD—
—TUESDAY, AUGUST 11, 1903

SYMPHONY SUCCESSORS OF KNEISEL AND SCHROEDER.

They Are to Be Arbos, a Violinist, and Rudolph Krasselt, 'Cello, the Former from London and the Latter a Leipsic Conservatory Graduate.

The places in the Boston Symphony orchestra made vacant by the resignation last season of Franz Kneisel and Alwin Schroeder are to be filled by Mr. Arbos, violin, and Rudolph Krasselt, violoncello. Mr. Gericke, conductor, and Mr. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, engaged the musicians after a long and laborious search, which took them among the musical capitals of Europe. Mr. Arbos comes from London, where, although he has not been prominently identified with orchestral work, he has been a popular teacher and salon player. He is a Spaniard by birth, and studied under Joachim. He holds a position in the Royal College of Music. Herr Krasselt, the violoncellist, is a young man of 25, and has studied under Kiengel at the Leipsic Conservatory. He has made an excellent record in Berlin.

It is said that efforts were made to engage Wessely, a well known concert master of London, and also Marteau. Willie, a 'cellist of Dresden, was also spoken of, but he had just received an appointment at the Dresden Conservatory with the title of professor, a position much prized by German musicians.

THE BOSTON GLOBE—
—TUESDAY, AUGUST 11, 1903.

New Symphony Men.

From New York comes the information that Mr Higginson has engaged two musicians in Europe to take the places in the Boston Symphony orchestra made vacant by the resignation at the end of the last season of the principal, Franz Kneisel, and the first cello, Alwin Schroeder. The new men are Mr Arbos violin, and Rudolph Krasselt cello. Mr Arbos is a Spaniard, who studied with Joachim, and has for several years been a popular teacher and salon player in the English metropolis, where he is now in a position in the Royal college of music. Herr Krasselt, the cellist, is a man of about 25 years, who studied with Kiengel at the Leipsic conservatory, and has made an excellent record in Berlin.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT,
TUESDAY, AUGUST 11 1903

It is said that the places in the Boston Symphony Orchestra made vacant by the resignation last season of Franz Kneisel and Alwin Schroeder are to be filled by Mr. Arbos, violin, and Rudolph Krasselt, violoncello. Mr. Gericke, conductor, and Mr. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, engaged the musicians after a long and laborious search, which took them among the musical capitals of Europe. Mr. Arbos comes from London, where, although he has not been prominently identified with orchestral work, he has been a popular teacher and salon player. He is a Spaniard by birth, and studied under Joachim. He holds a position in the Royal College of Music. Herr Krasselt, the violoncellist, is a young man of twenty-five, and has studied under Kiengel at the Leipsic Conservatory. He has made an excellent record in Berlin. It is said that efforts were made to engage Wessely, a well-known concert master of London, and Marteau. Willie, a 'cellist of Dresden, was also spoken of, but he had just received an appointment at the Dresden Conservatory with the title of professor, a position much prized by German musicians.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD,
TUESDAY, AUGUST 11, 1903

NEW PLAYERS FOR THE SYMPHONY

The vacancies in the Symphony Orchestra caused by the resignations of Franz Kneisel and Alwin Schroeder have been filled by the engagement of Arbos, violinist, and Rudolph Krasselt, cellist.

Mr. Arbos comes from London, where, although he has not been prominently identified with orchestral work, he has been a popular teacher and salon player. He is a Spaniard by birth, and studied under Joachim. He holds a position in the Royal College of Music.

Herr Krasselt, the violoncellist, is a young man of 25, and has studied under Kiengel at the Leipsic Conservatory. He has made an excellent record in Berlin.

It is said that efforts were made to engage Wessely, a well-known concert master of London, and also Marteau. Willie, a cellist of Dresden, was also spoken of, but he had just received an appointment at the Dresden Conservatory with the title of professor, a position much prized by German musicians.

SATURDAY EVENING GAZETTE, BOSTON, AUGUST 22, 1903.

—The vacancies in the Symphony Orchestra caused by the resignations of Franz Kneisel and Alwin Schroeder have been filled by the engagement of Arbos, violinist, and Rudolph Krasselt, cellist. Mr. Arbos comes from London, where, although he has not been prominently identified with orchestral work, he has been a popular teacher and salon player. He is a Spaniard by birth, and studied under Joachim. He holds a position in the Royal College of Music. Herr Krasselt, the violoncellist, is a young man of twenty-five, and has studied under Kiengel at the Leipsic Conservatory. He has made an excellent record in Berlin. It is said that efforts were made to engage Wessely, a well-known concert master of London, and also Marteau. Willie, a cellist of Dresden, was also spoken of, but he had just received an appointment at the Dresden Conservatory with the title of professor, a position much prized by German musicians.

THE SPRINGFIELD SUNDAY REPUBLICAN: AUGUST 23, 1903.

It has been well known that the Boston symphony orchestra managers have been actively engaged during the summer in finding successors for the members of the Kneisel quartet who have retired, and so many eminent names have been mentioned in this connection that it is a little surprising to find that the players actually engaged are so little known to the public at large. Mr Arbos, who is to fill Mr Kneisel's place as concert master, is a Spaniard who studied with Joachim, and is now a teacher in the Royal college of music in London. Of late he has been heard of in this country as the instructor of the talented young Irish violinist, Miss Maud McCarthy, who played in this city last year with the Boston symphony orchestra. The 'cellist, Krasselt, who takes Mr Schroeder's place, is a pupil of Julius Klengel, the Leipsic virtuoso, and has been successful as a player in Berlin. He is about 25 years old. The very fact of their selection is a sufficient guaranty of their quality, and if they are not well known in this country, neither was Franz Kneisel when he came from Vienna at the age of 20. As the chief solo players of the Boston symphony orchestra, they will soon have a chance to display their powers.

August 22
1903

The Beacon

—The vacancies in the Symphony Orchestra caused by the resignations of Franz Kneisel and Alwin Schroeder have been filled by the engagement of Arbos, violinist, and Rudolph Krasselt, cellist. Mr. Arbos comes from London, where, although he has not been prominently identified with orchestral work, he has been a popular teacher and salon player. He is a Spaniard by birth, and studied under Joachim. He holds a position in the Royal College of Music. Herr Krasselt, the violoncellist, is a young man of twenty-five, and has studied under Kiengel at the Leipsic Conservatory. He has made an excellent record in Berlin. It is said that efforts were made to engage Wessely, a well-known concert master of London, and also Marteau. Willie, a cellist of Dresden, was also spoken of, but he had just received an appointment at the Dresden Conservatory with the title of professor, a position much prized by German musicians.

BOSTON POST,
THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 3, 1903

NEW MUSICIANS FOR SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Fernandez Arbos to Succeed Kneisel; Rudolph Krasselt as Cellist

All but unknown to the musical world of this country, Fernandez Arbos of London as concert master to succeed Franz Kneisel, and Rudolph Krasselt of Berlin as solo 'cellist, have been engaged by Major Henry L. Higginson for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Arbos is well known in London as a violinist.

Mr. Arbos, a young man, is Spanish by birth. He has held a position at the London Royal College of Music for some years. He is said to be a successful teacher, among his pupils being Maud McCarthy, who was heard here last season. His orchestral experience, however, is somewhat limited. He is said to have the fiery temperament of the Latin races, the exact opposite of Mr. Kneisel.

Rudolph Krasselt, who takes the position filled by Alwin Schroeder, is only 25 years of age. He has been for two years with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST,
SEPTEMBER 13, 1903

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Twenty-two years of existence, with 2084 performances, 1089 of which were in this city; only four conductors in all this time; beginning with a membership of 60, which has been increased to 94; 19 years in Music Hall and three in the new Symphony Hall; fair-sized audiences at the start, and now every seat in the house sold for the season for both series of concerts for the past three years—these are a few details which suggest themselves at the approach of the 23d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Henschel began with three years, followed by Mr. Gericke for five years, then Mr. Nikisch for four years, after him Mr. Paur for five years, and now Mr. Gericke enters upon the sixth year of his second regime.

The musical public of Boston may feel quite sure there will be the usual high standard of performances the coming season, with as attractive a list of soloists as has ever been presented. There will be as heretofore 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals and 24 Saturday evening concerts.

The auction sales of season tickets will begin at Symphony Hall at 10 a. m. on Monday, Sept. 28, and the $12 seats for the Friday rehearsals will be sold. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Tuesday, Sept. 29. After a rest of one day the auction sales will be renewed on Thursday, Oct. 1, when the $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold. Friday, Oct. 2, will be the last day of the sales, when the $7.50 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold.

BOSTON SUNDAY JOURNAL—
—SEPTEMBER 13, 1903.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Twenty-two years of existence with 2084 performances, 1089 of which were in this city, only four conductors in all this time, beginning with a membership of sixty, which has been increased to ninety-four, nineteen years in Music Hall and three in the new Symphony Hall, fair-sized audiences at the start, and now every seat in the house sold for the season for both series of concerts for the past three years, these are a few details which suggest themselves at the approach of the twenty-third season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Henschel began with three years, followed by Mr. Gericke for five years, then Mr. Nikisch for four years, after him Mr. Paur for five years, and now Mr. Gericke enters upon the sixth year of his second regime. The musical public of Boston may feel quite sure there will be the usual high standard of performances the coming season, with as attractive a list of soloists as has even been presented. There will be as heretofore twenty-four Friday afternoon public rehearsals, and twenty-four Saturday evening concerts. The auction sales of season tickets will begin at Symphony Hall at 10 A. M. on Monday, Sept. 28, when the $12 seats for the Friday rehearsals will be sold. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Tuesday, Sept. 29. After a rest of one day the auction sales will be renewed on Thursday, Oct. 1, when the $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold. Friday, Oct. 2, will be the last day of the sales, when the $7.50 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold.

THE SUNDAY HERALD—
—BOSTON, SEPTEMBER 13, 1903.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

For the 23d consecutive season, the announcement of the 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals, and the 24 Saturday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Symphony Hall, sets the musical pace for the year. Ninety-four players, directed by a conductor whose term of 10 years' service is proof and evidence of his ability, will render good music in the best way, and thus fulfil the initial motive and the always cherished purpose of the founder of this unsurpassed organization. Every assurance is given that the season beginning on Oct. 16 will equal, if not surpass, its predecessors, with as attractive a list of soloists as has ever been presented. The auction sales of season tickets will begin at Symphony Hall at 10 A. M. on Monday, Sept. 28, when the $12 seats for the Friday rehearsals will be sold. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Tuesday, Sept. 29. After a rest of one day the auction sales will be renewed on Thursday, Oct. 1, when the $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold. Friday, Oct. 2, will be the last day of the sales, when the $7.50 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—
—SEPTEMBER 13, 1903.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Twenty-two years of existence with 2084 performers, 1089 of which were in this city, only four conductors in all this time, beginning with a membership of 60, which has been increased to 94, 19 years in Music hall, and three in the new Symphony hall, fair sized audiences at the start, and now every seat in the house sold for the season for both series of concerts for the past three years, these are a few details which suggest themselves at the approach of the 23d season of the Boston symphony orchestra. Mr Henschel began with three years, followed by Mr Gericke for five years, then Mr Nikisch for four years, after him Mr Paur for five years, and now Mr Gericke enters upon the sixth year of his second regime.

The musical public of Boston may feel quite sure there will be the usual high standard of performance the coming season, with as attractive a list of soloists as has ever been presented. There will be as heretofore 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals and 24 Saturday evening concerts.

The auction sales of season tickets will begin at Symphony hall at 10 am Monday, Sept 28, when the $12 seats for the Friday rehearsals will be sold. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Tuesday, Sept 29. The auction sales will be renewed Thursday, Oct 1, when the $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold. Friday, Oct 2, will be the last day of the sales, when the $7.50 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold.

[6]

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 19, 1903

(Entered at the Post Office, Boston, Mass., as Second Class Mail Matter)

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

Twenty-two years with always one high ideal is a flattering record for any organization, and another record of every seat in the house sold for the season for both series of concerts at a premium at the annual auction sales ever since the occupancy of the new Symphony Hall, three years ago, is the most satisfactory evidence of the public appreciation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A generous founder and patron with the courage of his convictions, a conductor with ten years of service in two terms of five years each, ninety-four performers selected from the best in this country and Europe, a long list of the most distinguished assisting artists available and an unsurpassed audience room unselfishly given by some five hundred public spirited enthusiasts, are the chief factors which are combined in the most unique musical ensemble in the world.

The twenty-third season, which begins with the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening performances on Oct. 16 and 17, will in every way equal, and if possible, surpass its predecessors. To assure its patrons that the orchestra will afford the same degree of pleasure and enjoyment as in the past would be sufficient, for it seems safe to assert that a single season which has been a disappointment is yet to be recorded.

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke will again be welcomed as the conductor for the eleventh season, a record which speaks for itself and in a most convincing way. As a matter of interest to the many patrons who regularly attended the concerts from the beginning, Mr. Henschel conducted for the first three years, Mr. Gericke for the next five years, then Mr. Nikisch for four years, Mr. Paur following with five years, and last season was the fifth year of Mr. Gericke's second regime.

The list of soloists is as usual a notable one and includes Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mr. Gilibert, Miss Aus der Ohe, Mme. Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Busoni, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. George Proctor, Mr. M. Fernandez Arbos, the new first violin and concert master; Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Rudolph Krassait, the new first violoncello, and others. Madame Melba returns after an absence of two years, and four seasons have passed since Mme. Gadski appeared with the orchestra in Boston. Mme. Schumann-Heink has just secured her release by Kaiser Wilhelm from the Royal Opera Company in Berlin, which enables her to fill her concert engagements in this country. Mr. Gilibert will be most pleasantly remembered from last season, as will also Miss Maud MacCarthy and Miss Olive Mead, who made such a favorable impression two seasons ago. Mr. Busoni returns to America after an absence of nine years, during which time he has made a splendid reputation in Europe. The recent triumphs of Mr. Harold Bauer afford the best possible reason for his reengagement. Mr. Joseffy has a host of friends and admirers who will always welcome his appearances and who regret that he has not favored Boston for five years. Mr. Proctor's rapid advancement in his profession lends an interest and attractiveness to all his performances, and Mr. Adamowski is an artist too well established with Symphony patrons to need extensive exploiting. Of the newcomers in the ranks of the orchestra, Mr. M. Fernandez, the first violin and concert master, and Mr. Rudolph Krassalt, the first violoncello, notice will be given during the coming weeks.

There will be the usual two series of twenty-four Friday afternoon public rehearsals and twenty-four Saturday evening concerts. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Symphony Hall, Monday, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold by auction, at Symphony Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 29, at 10 A. M. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold by auction, at Symphony Hall on Thursday, Oct. 1, at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on Friday, Oct. 2, at 10 A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and not more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold. Admission first come first served, to the second balcony on Friday afternoons only at twenty-five cents, will be given according to the plan adopted two years ago and which has met with universal satisfaction.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST,

SEPTEMBER 20, 1903

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

With the preliminary announcement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its 23d year, the musical season may be considered as opened. A second and even third generation, if one recalls the patrons of the early days, are now enjoying these concerts, remarkable for their even excellence and high standard. And the good opinion of the musical public obtains not alone at home, but in all the cities visited by the orchestra on its monthly tournees.

Wilhelm Gericke will again occupy the position of conductor, and ample evidence of both his popularity and fitness is afforded in his record of 10 years in this capacity, five of which were during his first term, beginning in 1884, while the coming season will be the sixth of his second regime.

The list of soloists is as usual a notable one, and includes Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mr. Gilibert, Miss Aus der Ohe, Mme. Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Busoni, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. George Proctor, Mr. M. Fernandez Arbos (the new first violin and concert-master), Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Rudolph Krasselt (the new first violoncello) and others. Mme. Melba returns after an absence of two years, and four seasons have passed since Mme. Gadski appeared with the orchestra in Boston. Mme. Schumann-Heink has just secured her release by Kaiser Wilhelm from the Royal Opera Company in Berlin, which enables her to fill her concert engagements in this country. Mr. Gilibert will be most pleasantly remembered from last season, as will also Miss Maud MacCarthy and Miss Olive Mead, who made such a favorable impression two seasons ago. Mr. Busoni returns to America after an absence of nine years, during which time he has made a splendid reputation in Europe. The recent triumphs of Mr. Harold Bauer afford the best possible reason for his re-engagement. Mr. Joseffy has a host of friends and admirers who will always welcome his appearance, and who regret that he has not favored Boston for five years. Mr. Proctor's rapid advancement in his profession lends an interest and attractiveness to all his performances, and Mr. Adamowski is an artist too well established with Symphony patrons to need extended exploiting. Of the newcomers in the ranks of the orchestra, Mr. M. Fernandez Arbos will be the first violin and concert-master, and Mr. Rudolph Krasselt the first violoncello.

There will be the usual two series of 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals and 24 Saturday evening concerts. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Symphony Hall, Monday, Sept. 28, at 10 a. m. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Symphony Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 29, at 10 a. m. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction at Symphony Hall on Thursday, Oct. 1, at 10 a. m. The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on Friday, Oct. 2, at 10 a. m.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and not more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

Admission, first come first served, to the second balcony, on Friday afternoons only, at 25 cents, will be given according to the plan adopted two years ago and which has met with universal satisfaction.

(Copyright by Aimee Dupont, published with permission.)
THE SOLOISTS WHO WILL BE HEARD AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS THIS SEASON.

SATURDAY EVENING GAZETTE,

BOSTON, SEPTEMBER 19, 1903.

The announcement for the twenty-third season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra promises a veritable feast for the lover of good music. The orchestra will consist of ninety-four performers, with Mr. Wilhelm Gericke again as conductor, and the soloists will include such famous singers and instrumentalists as Madame Melba, Madame Gadski, Madame Schumann-Heink, Mr. Gilibert, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Madame Hopekirk, Miss Maud Mac Carthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Busoni, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. George Proctor, Mr. M. Fernandez Arbos, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Rudolph Krasselt and others. The auction sale of rehearsal tickets takes place at Symphony Hall on Sept. 28 and 29, and the sale of concert tickets on Oct. 1 and 2. The popularity of these entertainments is so great that the premiums for choice seats are sure to be very high, so that those who are anxious to secure good seats should govern themselves accordingly, and be on hand early.

BOSTON COURIER

SEPTEMBER 19 1903

The Symphony Concerts.

For nearly a quarter of a century—this is the twenty-third season—the Symphony Orchestra has made Boston famous. For years in old Music Hall, and now in the handsome and worthy Symphony Hall, the twenty-four yearly concerts and rehearsals are given to audiences gathered from far and near.

In fact the auction sale of the seats for these performances is as much a function to be attended—is as de riguer—as the horse show, or the Myopia Hunt Club ball.

For the coming season which begins Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 16 and 17, a large list of notable soloists is announced under the leadership of Wilhelm Gericke. Among these artists are named: Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mr. Gilibert, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Mme. Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Busoni, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. George Proctor, Mr. M. Fernandez Arbos, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Rudolph Krasselt, and others.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Symphony Hall, Monday, September 28. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold Tuesday, September 29. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold Thursday, October 1, and the $7.50 seats for the concert Friday, October 2, all sales to begin at 10 A. M.

Mr Wilhelm Gericke will again be welcomed as the conductor for the 11th season, a record which speaks for itself and in a most convincing way. As a matter of interest to the many patrons who regularly attended the concerts from the beginning, Mr Henschel conducted for the first three years, Mr Gericke for the next five years, then Mr Nikisch for four years, Mr Paur following with five years, and last season was the fifth year of Mr Gericke's second regime.

The list of soloists is as usual a notable one and includes Mme Melba, Mme Gadski, Mme Schumann-Heink, Mr Gilibert, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Mme Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr Busoni, Mr Harold Bauer, Mr Rafael Joseffy, Mr George Proctor, Mr M. Fernandez Arbos, the new first violin and concert master; Mr T. Adamowski, Mr Rudolph Krasselt, the new first violoncello, and others.

Mme Melba returns after an absence of two years, and four seasons have passed since Mme Gadski appeared with the orchestra in Boston. Mme Schumann-Heink has just secured her release by Kaiser Wilhelm from the Royal opera company in Berlin, which enables her to fill her concert engagements in this country. Mr Gilibert will be most pleasantly remembered from last season, as will also Miss Maud MacCarthy and Miss Olive Mead, who made such a favorable impression two seasons ago.

Mr Busoni returns to America after an absence of nine years, during which time he has made a splendid reputation in Europe. The recent triumphs of Mr Harold Bauer afford the best possible reason for his reengagement. Mr Joseffy has a host of friends and admirers who will always welcome his appearances and who regret that he has not favored Boston for five years. Mr Proctor's rapid advancement in his profession lends an interest and attractiveness to all his performances, and Mr Adamowski is an artist too well established with Symphony patrons to need extensive exploiting. Of the newcomers in the ranks of the orchestra, Mr M. Fernandez Arbos, the first violin and concert master, and Mr Rudolph Krasselt, the first violoncello, notice will be given during the coming weeks.

There will be the usual two series of 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals and 24 Saturday evening concerts. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Symphony hall Monday, Sept 28, at 10 a m. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction Tuesday, Sept 29, at 10 a m. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction Thursday, Oct 1, at 10 a m. The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place Friday, Oct 2, at 10 a m.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and not more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be immediately resold.

Admission, first come first served, to the second balcony, on Friday afternoons only, at 25 cents, will be given according to the plan adopted two years ago and which has met with satisfaction.

BOSTON TIMES

SEPTEMBER 19, 1903.

The sale of seats for the symphony concerts will take place Sept. 28 and 29, and Oct. 1 and 2.

September 19
1903

The Beacon

The announcement for the twenty-third season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra promises a veritable feast for the lover of good music. The orchestra will consist of ninety-four performers, with Mr. Wilhelm Gericke again as conductor, and the soloists will include such famous singers and instrumentalists as Madame Melba, Madame Gadski, Madame Schumann-Heink, Mr. Gilibert, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Madame Hopekirk, Miss Maud Mac Carthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Busoni, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. George Proctor, Mr. M. Fernandez Arbos, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Rudolph Krasselt and others. The auction sale of rehearsal tickets takes place at Symphony Hall on Sept. 28 and 29, and the sale of concert tickets on Oct. 1 and 2. The popularity of these entertainments is so great that the premiums for choice seats are sure to be very high, so that those who are anxious to secure good seats should govern themselves accordingly, and be on hand early.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, SEPT 20, 1903.

For 22 years the Boston symphony orchestra has been a musical organization so unique as to command both the attention and respect not only of America, but of the world. Founded and maintained by a single individual who has never swerved from his original ideal, there has always been an underlying tendency to advance and to improve, with a resulting standard of performance approaching very close to perfection.

The 23d season, which begins with the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening performances, Oct 16 and 17, will in every way equal, and if possible surpass its predecessors. To assure its patrons that the orchestra will afford the same degree of pleasure and enjoyment as in the past would be sufficient, for it seems safe to assert that a single season which has been a disappointment is yet to be recorded.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 19, 1903

(Entered at the Post Office, Boston, Mass., as Second Class Mail Matter)

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

Twenty-two years with always one high ideal is a flattering record for any organization, and another record of every seat in the house sold for the season for both series of concerts at a premium at the annual auction sales ever since the occupancy of the new Symphony Hall, three years ago, is the most satisfactory evidence of the public appreciation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A generous founder and patron with the courage of his convictions, a conductor with ten years of service in two terms of five years each, ninety-four performers selected from the best in this country and Europe, a long list of the most distinguished assisting artists available and an unsurpassed audience room unselfishly given by some five hundred public spirited enthusiasts, are the chief factors which are combined in the most unique musical ensemble in the world.

The twenty-third season, which begins with the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening performances on Oct. 16 and 17, will in every way equal, and if possible, surpass its predecessors. To assure its patrons that the orchestra will afford the same degree of pleasure and enjoyment as in the past would be sufficient, for it seems safe to assert that a single season which has been a disappointment is yet to be recorded.

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke will again be welcomed as the conductor for the eleventh season, a record which speaks for itself and in a most convincing way. As a matter of interest to the many patrons who regularly attended the concerts from the beginning, Mr. Henschel conducted for the first three years, Mr. Gericke for the next five years, then Mr. Nikisch for four years, Mr. Paur following with five years, and last season was the fifth year of Mr. Gericke's second régime.

The list of soloists is as usual a notable one and includes Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mr. Gilibert, Miss aus der Ohe, Mme. Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Busoni, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. George Proctor, Mr. M. Fernandez Arbos, the new first violin and concert master; Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Rudolph Krassalt, the new first violoncello, and others. Madame Melba returns after an absence of two years, and four seasons have passed since Mme. Gadski appeared with the orchestra in Boston. Mme. Schumann-Heink has just secured her release by Kaiser Wilhelm from the Royal Opera Company in Berlin, which enables her to fill her concert engagements in this country. Mr. Gilibert will be most pleasantly remembered from last season, as will also Miss Maud MacCarthy and Miss Olive Mead, who made such a favorable impression two seasons ago. Mr. Busoni returns to America after an absence of nine years, during which time he has made a splendid reputation in Europe. The recent triumphs of Mr. Harold Bauer afford the best possible reason for his reëngagement. Mr. Joseffy has a host of friends and admirers who will always welcome his appearances and who regret that he has not favored Boston for five years. Mr. Proctor's rapid advancement in his profession lends an interest and attractiveness to all his performances, and Mr. Adamowski is an artist too well established with Symphony patrons to need extensive exploiting. Of the newcomers in the ranks of the orchestra, Mr. M. Fernandez, the first violin and concert master, and Mr. Rudolph Krassalt, the first violoncello, notice will be given during the coming weeks.

There will be the usual two series of twenty-four Friday afternoon public rehearsals and twenty-four Saturday evening concerts. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Symphony Hall, Monday, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold by auction, at Symphony Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 29, at 10 A. M. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold by auction, at Symphony Hall on Thursday, Oct. 1, at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on Friday, Oct. 2, at 10 A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and not more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold. Admission first come first served, to the second balcony on Friday afternoons only at twenty-five cents, will be given according to the plan adopted two years ago and which has met with universal satisfaction.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST,

SEPTEMBER 20, 1903

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

With the preliminary announcement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its 23d year, the musical season may be considered as opened. A second and even third generation, if one recalls the patrons of the early days, are now enjoying these concerts, remarkable for their even excellence and high standard. And the good opinion of the musical public obtains not alone at home, but in all the cities visited by the orchestra on its monthly tournees.

Wilhelm Gericke will again occupy the position of conductor, and ample evidence of both his popularity and fitness is afforded in his record of 10 years in this capacity, five of which were during his first term, beginning in 1884, while the coming season will be the sixth of his second regime.

The list of soloists is as usual a notable one, and includes Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mr. Gilibert, Miss Aus der Ohe, Mme. Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Busoni, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. George Proctor, Mr. M. Fernandez Arbos (the new first violin and concert-master), Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Rudolph Krasselt (the new first violoncello) and others. Mme. Melba returns after an absence of two years, and four seasons have passed since Mme. Gadski appeared with the orchestra in Boston. Mme. Schumann-Heink has just secured her release by Kaiser Wilhelm from the Royal Opera Company in Berlin, which enables her to fill her concert engagements in this country. Mr. Gilibert will be most pleasantly remembered from last season, as will also Miss Maud MacCarthy and Miss Olive Mead, who made such a favorable impression two seasons ago. Mr. Busoni returns to America after an absence of nine years, during which time he has made a splendid reputation in Europe. The recent triumphs of Mr. Harold Bauer afford the best possible reason for his re-engagement. Mr. Joseffy has a host of friends and admirers who will always welcome his appearance, and who regret that he has not favored Boston for five years. Mr. Proctor's rapid advancement in his profession lends an interest and attractiveness to all his performances, and Mr. Adamowski is an artist too well established with Symphony patrons to need extended exploiting. Of the newcomers in the ranks of the orchestra, Mr. M. Fernandez Arbos will be the first violin and concert-master, and Mr. Rudolph Krasselt the first violoncello.

There will be the usual two series of 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals and 24 Saturday evening concerts. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Symphony Hall, Monday, Sept. 28, at 10 a. m. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Symphony Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 29, at 10 a. m. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction at Symphony Hall on Thursday, Oct. 1, at 10 a. m. The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on Friday, Oct. 2, at 10 a. m.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and not more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

Admission, first come first served, to the second balcony, on Friday afternoons only, at 25 cents, will be given according to the plan adopted two years ago and which has met with universal satisfaction.

(Copyright by Aimee Dupont, published with permission.)
THE SOLOISTS WHO WILL BE HEARD AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS THIS SEASON.

SATURDAY EVENING GAZETTE,

BOSTON, SEPTEMBER 19, 1903.

The announcement for the twenty-third season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra promises a veritable feast for the lover of good music. The orchestra will consist of ninety-four performers, with Mr. Wilhelm Gericke again as conductor, and the soloists will include such famous singers and instrumentalists as Madame Me ba, Madame Gadski, Madame Schumann-Heink, Mr. Gilibert, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Madame Hopekirk, Miss Maud Mac Carthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Busoni, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. George Proctor, Mr. M. Fernandez Arbos, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Rudolph Krasselt and others. The auction sale of rehearsal tickets takes place at Symphony Hall on Sept. 28 and 29, and the sale of concert tickets on Oct. 1 and 2. The popularity of these entertainments is so great that the premiums for choice seats are sure to be very high, so that those who are anxious to secure good seats should govern themselves accordingly, and be on hand early.

BOSTON COURIER

SEPTEMBER 19 1903

The Symphony Concerts.

For nearly a quarter of a century—this is the twenty-third season—the Symphony Orchestra has made Boston famous. For years in old Music Hall, and now in the handsome and worthy Symphony Hall, the twenty-four yearly concerts and rehearsals are given to audiences gathered from far and near.

In fact the auction sale of the seats for these performances is as much a function to be attended—is as de riguer—as the horse show, or the Myopia Hunt Club ball.

For the coming season which begins Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 16 and 17, a large list of notable soloists is announced under the leadership of Wilhelm Gericke. Among these artists are named: Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mr. Gilibert, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Mme. Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Busoni, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. George Proctor, Mr. M. Fernandez Arbos, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Rudolph Krasselt, and others.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Symphony Hall, Monday, September 28. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold Tuesday, September 29. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold Thursday, October 1, and the $7.50 seats for the concert Friday, October 2, all sales to begin at 10 A. M.

Mr Wilhelm Gericke will again be welcomed as the conductor for the 11th season, a record which speaks for itself and in a most convincing way. As a matter of interest to the many patrons who regularly attended the concerts from the beginning, Mr Henschel conducted for the first three years, Mr Gericke for the next five years, then Mr Nikisch for four years, Mr Paur following with five years, and last season was the fifth year of Mr Gericke's second regime.

The list of soloists is as usual a notable one and includes Mme Melba, Mme Gadski, Mme Schumann-Heink, Mr Gilibert, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Mme Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr Busoni, Mr Harold Bauer, Mr Rafael Joseffy, Mr George Proctor, Mr M. Fernandez Arbos, the new first violin and concert master; Mr T. Adamowski, Mr Rudolph Krasselt, the new first violoncello, and others.

Mme Melba returns after an absence of two years, and four seasons have passed since Mme Gadski appeared with the orchestra in Boston. Mme Schumann-Heink has just secured her release by Kaiser Wilhelm from the Royal opera company in Berlin, which enables her to fill her concert engagements in this country. Mr Gilbert will be most pleasantly remembered from last season, as will also Miss Maud MacCarthy and Miss Olive Mead, who made such a favorable impression two seasons ago.

Mr Busoni returns to America after an absence of nine years, during which time he has made a splendid reputation in Europe. The recent triumphs of Mr Harold Bauer afford the best possible reason for his reengagement. Mr Joseffy has a host of friends and admirers who will always welcome has appearances and who regret that he has not favored Boston for five years. Mr Proctor's rapid advancement in his profession lends an interest and attractiveness to all his performances, and Mr Adamowski is an artist too well established with Symphony patrons to need extensive exploiting. Of the newcomers in the ranks of the orchestra, Mr M. Fernandez Arbos, the first violin and concert master, and Mr Rudolph Krasselt, the first violoncello, notice will be given during the coming weeks.

There will be the usual two series of 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals and 24 Saturday evening concerts. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Symphony hall Monday, Sept 28, at 10 a m. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction Tuesday, Sept 29, at 10 a m. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction Thursday, Oct 1, at 10 a m. The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place Friday, Oct 2, at 10 a m.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and not more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be immediately resold.

Admission, first come first served, to the second balcony, on Friday afternoons only, at 25 cents, will be given according to the plan adopted two years ago and which has met with satisfaction.

BOSTON TIMES

SEPTEMBER 19, 1903.

The sale of seats for the symphony concerts will take place Sept. 28 and 29, and Oct. 1 and 2.

September 19
1903

The Beacon

The announcement for the twenty-third season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra promises a veritable feast for the lover of good music. The orchestra will consist of ninety-four performers, with Mr. Wilhelm Gericke again as conductor, and the soloists will include such famous singers and instrumentalists as Madame Me ba, Madame Gadski, Madame Schumann-Heink, Mr. Gilibert, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Madame Hopekirk, Miss Maud Mac Carthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Busoni, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. George Proctor, Mr. M. Fernandez Arbos, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Rudolph Krasselt and others. The auction sale of rehearsal tickets takes place at Symphony Hall on Sept. 28 and 29, and the sale of concert tickets on Oct. 1 and 2. The popularity of these entertainments is so great that the premiums for choice seats are sure to be very high, so that those who are anxious to secure good seats should govern themselves accordingly, and be on hand early.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, SEPT 20, 1903.

For 22 years the Boston symphony orchestra has been a musical organization so unique as to command both the attention and respect not only of America, but of the world. Founded and maintained by a single individual who has never swerved from his original ideal, there has always been an underlying tendency to advance and to improve, with a resulting standard of performance approaching very close to perfection.

The 23d season, which begins with the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening performances, Oct 16 and 17, will in every way equal, and if possible surpass its predecessors. To assure its patrons that the orchestra will afford the same degree of pleasure and enjoyment as in the past would be sufficient, for it seems safe to assert that a single season which has been a disappointment is yet to be recorded.

NEW AND OLD FACES OF THE SYMPHONY

With the preliminary announcement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its twenty-third year, the musical season may be considered as opened. A second and even third generation, if one recalls the patrons of the early days, are now enjoying these concerts, remarkable for their even excellence and high standard. And the good opinion of the musical public obtains not alone at home, but in all the cities visited by the orchestra on its monthly tournees.

Among a score of flattering comments last season we quote from the New York Tribune that "the visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has left a feeling of admiration and gratitude keener, more tender, and more fragrant than ever before," while the New York Herald stated that "this virtuoso organization spread a noble feast." The Times, speaking of the orchestra, said: "It affords a pleasure distinct in degree and kind," and the Sun honestly says: "To speak frankly New York has found the Boston concerts a safe vehicle for admiration." The Philadelphia Press says of the performances of the orchestra in its two series of concerts in that city: "There is something more than mere virtuosity in its noble interpretation," while the Baltimore Sun pays a marked compliment by affirming that "this company of great artists gives a distinction to whatever it undertakes."

Gericke Again Conducts.

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke will again occupy the position of conductor, and ample evidence of both his popularity and fitness is afforded in his record of ten years in this capacity, five of which were during his first term, beginning in 1884, while the coming season will be the sixth of his second regime.

The list of soloists is as usual a notable one, and includes Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mr. Gilibert, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Mme. Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Busoni, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. George Proctor, Mr. M. Fernandez Arbos, the new first violin and concert master; Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Rudolph Krasselt, the new first violoncello, and others. Madame Melba returns, after an absence of two years, and four seasons have passed since Mme. Gadski appeared with the orchestra in Boston. Mme. Schumann-Heink has just secured her release by Kaiser Wilhelm from the Royal Opera Company in Berlin, which enables her to fill her concert engagements in this country.

Mr. Gilibert will be most pleasantly remembered from last season, as will also Miss Maud MacCarthy and Miss Olive Mead, who made such a favorable impression two seasons ago. Mr. Busoni returns to America after an absence of nine years, during which time he has made a splendid reputation in Europe. The recent triumphs of Mr. Harold Bauer afford the best possible reason for his re-engagement. Mr. Joseffy has a host of friends and admirers who will always welcome his appearance and who regret that he has not favored Boston for five years. Mr. Proctor's rapid advancement in his profession lends an interest and attractiveness to all his performances, and Mr. Adamowski is an artist too well established with symphony patrons to need extended exploiting. Of the new comers in the ranks of the orchestra, Mr. M. Fernandez Arbos, the first violin and concert master, and Mr. Rudolph Krasselt, the first violoncello, notice will be given during the coming weeks.

Concerts as Usual.

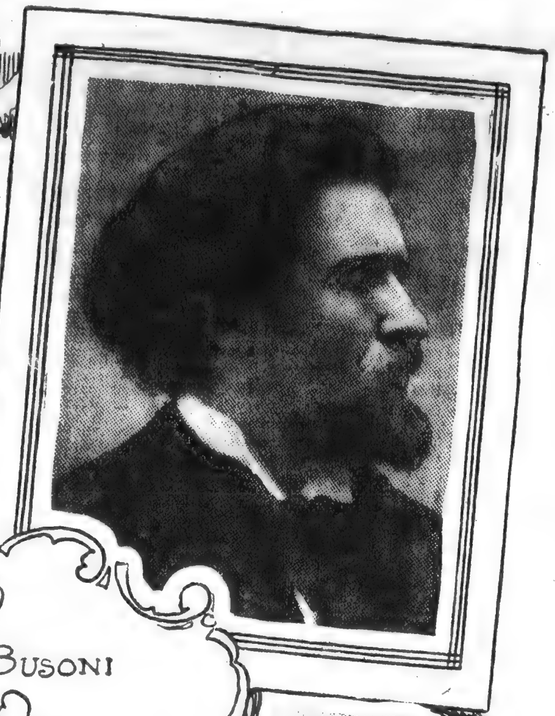
There will be the usual two series of twenty-four Friday afternoon public rehearsals and twenty-four Saturday evening concerts. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Symphony Hall, Monday, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Symphony Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 29, at 10 A. M. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction at Symphony Hall on Thursday, Oct. 1, at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on Friday, Oct. 2, at 10 A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and not more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

Admission, first come, first served, to the second balcony on Friday afternoons only, at 25 cents will be given according to the plan adopted two years ago and which has met with universal satisfaction.

MAUD MACCARTHY



BUSONI

GILIBERT

OLIVE MEAD

ADAMOWSKI

AUS DER OHE

BOSTON SUNDAY JOURNAL

SEPTEMBER 20, 1903.

The Symphony Concert.

With the announcement of the Symphony Concert ticket sale comes the feeling that the serious business of the season is about to begin. This year there should be more than usual interest manifested, and yet——. Engaging for a Symphony season has always been a little like buying a pig in a poke because so few early particulars can be had about its prospects, beyond the naming of some special soloists. Yet one's bargain always turns out a good one, and this winter cannot be expected to make an exception. There will be curiosity now to learn something about the artists who are to succeed the Kneisel quartet and Mr. Loeffler, who have withdrawn, and about such other new comers as there may be, as also with regard to whatever works Mr. Gericke may have chosen for introduction. The sale will take place according to usual conditions during the last days of the month. The long list of soloists, some of whose faces will be found happily grouped on another page, names no stranger, although Mr. Busoni has been long absent.

CONCERT HALLS AND ETIQUETTE.
THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MME. GADSKI. M CHAS. GILIBERT. MR BUSONI. ADELE AUS DER OHE. MME. SCHUMANN-HEINK. MME. MELBA.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

For 22 years the Boston Symphony orchestra has been a musical organization so unique as to command, both the attention and respect not only of America, but of the world. Founded and maintained by a single individual, who has never swerved from his original ideal, there has always been an underlying tendency to advance and to improve, with a resulting standard of performance approaching very close to perfection.

The 23d season, which begins with the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening performances on Oct. 16 and 17, will in every way equal, and, if possible, surpass its predecessors. Mr. Wilhelm Gericke will again be welcomed as the conductor of his 11th season, a record which speaks for itself and in a most assuring way. The list of soloists is, as usual, a notable one, and includes Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mr. Gilibert, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Mme. Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Busoni, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. George Proctor, Mr. M. Fernandez Arbos, the new first violin and concert master; Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Rudolph Krasselt, the new first violoncello, and others. Mme. Melba returns after an absence of two years, and four seasons have passed since Mme. Gadski appeared with the orchestra in Boston. Mme. Schumann-Heink has just secured her release by Kaiser Wilhelm from the Royal Opera Company in Berlin, which enables her to fill her concert engagements in this country. Mr. Gilibert will be most pleasantly remembered from last season, as will also Miss Maud MacCarthy, and Miss Olive Mead, who made such a favorable impression two seasons ago. Mr. Busoni returns to America after an absence of nine years, during which time he has made a splendid reputation in Europe. The recent triumphs of Mr. Harold Bauer afford the best possible reason for his re-engagement. Mr. Joseffy has a host of friends and admirers who will always welcome his appearnces and who regret that he has not favored Boston for five years. Mr. Proctor's rapid advancement in his profession lends an interest and attractiveness to all his performances, and Mr. Adamowski is an artist well established with Symphony patrons.

There will be the usual two series of 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals and 24 Saturday evening concerts. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Symphony Hall, Monday, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Symphony Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 29, at 10 A. M. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction, at Symphony Hall on Thursday, Oct. 1, at 10 A. M. The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on Friday, Oct. 2, at 10 A. M. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and not more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

Admission, first come, first served, to the second balcony on Friday afternoons only, at 25 cents, will be given according to the plan adopted two years ago, and which has given entire satisfaction.

The first of the 24 public rehearsals of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be on Friday afternoon, Oct. 16th, with the concert the following evening, as usual. Among the soloists for the season will be Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mr. Gilibert, Mme. Hopekirk, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Timothee Adamowski, Mr. George Proctor, and Mr. Harold Bauer. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Symphony Hall, Monday, Sept. 28; the $7.50 seats for the rehearsals on Tuesday, the $12 seats for the concerts on Thursday, and the $7.50 seats for the concerts on Friday. All the auctions will be at 10 o'clock in the morning.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER,

MONDAY MORNING,

SEPTEMBER 21, 1903.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SALE.

The 23d Symphony Orchestra season, which begins with the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening performances on October 16 and 17, will in every way equal, and if possible surpass its predecessors. Wilhelm Gericke will again be welcomed as the conductor for the 11th season, a record which speaks for itself and in a most convincing way.

The list of soloists is a notable one and includes Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mr. Gilibert, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Mme. Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Busoni, Harold Bauer, Rafael Joseffy, George Proctor, Fernandez Arbos, the new first violin and concertmaster; T. Adamowski, Rudolph Krasselt, the new first violoncello, and others.

Melba returns after an absence of two years, and four seasons have passed since Mme. Gadski appeared with the orchestra in Boston. Mme. Schumann-Heink has just secured her release by Kaiser Wilhelm from the Royal Opera Company in Berlin, which enables her to fill her concert engagements in this country.

There will be the usual two series of 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals and 24 Saturday evening concerts. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Symphony Hall, Monday, Sept. 28, at 10 a.m. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Symphony Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 29, at 10 a.m. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction, at Symphony Hall, on Thursday, Oct. 1, at 10 a.m. The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on Friday, Oct. 2, at 10 a.m.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and not more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold, or they will be immediately resold. Admission first come, first served, to the second balcony on Friday afternoons only at 25 cts., will be given according to the plan adopted two years ago.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, SEPT 22, 1903.

Boston Symphony Season.

The Boston Symphony orchestra's announcement for its 23d season has aroused widespread interest in musical circles. The list of soloists includes Mme Melba, Mme Gadski, Mme Schuman-Heink, Mr Gilibert, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Mme Hopekirk, Miss Maud McCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr Busoni, Mr Harold Bauer, Mr Raphael Joseffy, Mr George Proctor, Mr M. Fernandez Arbos, Mr T. Adamowski, Mr Rudolph Krasselt and others. The auction sales begin next Monday, Sept 28, at Symphony hall at 10 a m. The season tickets for the 24 Friday afternoons will be sold Monday and Tuesday, and the tickets for the 24 Saturday evenings Thursday and Friday, Oct 1 and 2.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1903

In the Boston Symphony Orchestra's announcement for the coming season the list of soloists is a most notable one and includes Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mr. Gilibert, Miss aus der Ohe, Mme. Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Busoni, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. George Proctor, Mr. M. Fernandez Arbos, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Rudolph Krasselt, and others. The auction sales begin next Monday, Sept. 28, at Symphony Hall, at 10 A. M. The season tickets for the twenty-four Friday afternoons will be sold on Monday and Tuesday, and the tickets for the twenty-four Saturday evenings on Thursday and Friday, Oct. 1 and 2.

BOSTON POST,

TUESDAY,

SEPTEMBER 22, 1903

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's announcement for its twenty-third season has aroused a widespread interest in musical circles. The list of soloists has never been surpassed, if equalled. It includes Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mr. Gilibert, Miss Aus der Oe, Mme. Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Busoni, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. George Proctor, Mr. M. Fernandez Arbos, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Rudolph Krasselt and others.

The auction sales will begin next Monday, Sept. 28, at Symphony Hall, at 10 a. m. The season tickets for the 24 Friday afternoons will be sold on Monday and Tuesday, and the tickets for the 24 Saturday evenings on Thursday and Friday, Oct. 1 and 2.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CXIV., NO. 84.

TUESDAY, SEPT. 22, 1903.

THE SYMPHONY SOLOISTS.

The Boston Symphony orchestra's announcement for the coming season proves its always apparent purpose to equal, if not outdo, its previous record. The list of soloists is a most notable one, and includes Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mr. Gilibert, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Mme. Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Busoni, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. George Proctor, Mr. M. Fernandez Arbos, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Rudolph Krasselt and others. The auction sales begin next Monday, Sept. 28, at Symphony Hall, at 10 A. M. The season tickets for the 24 Friday afternoons will be sold on Monday and Tuesday, and the tickets for the 24 Saturday evenings on Thursday and Friday, Oct. 1 and 2.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD,

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 22 1903.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's announcement for its 23d season has aroused a widespread interest in musical circles. The list of soloists has never been surpassed if equalled. It includes Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mr. Gilibert, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Mme. Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Busoni, Harold Bauer, Rafael Joseffy, George Proctor, M. Fernandez Arbos, T. Adamowski, Rudolph Krasselt and others. The auction sales begin next Monday, Sept. 28, at Symphony Hall, at 10 a.m. The season tickets for the 24 Friday afternoons will be sold on Monday and Tuesday, and the tickets for the 24 Saturday evenings on Thursday and Friday, Oct. 1 and 2.

[9]

BOSTON JOURNAL—

—TUESDAY,

SEPTEMBER 22, 1903.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's announcement for the coming season proves its always apparent purpose to equal, if not outdo, its previous record. The list of soloists is a most notable one, includes Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mr. Gilbert, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Mme. Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Busoni, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. George Proctor, Mr. M. Fernandez Arbos, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Rudolph Krasselt and others. The auction sales begin next Monday, Sept. 28, at Symphony Hall, at 10 A. M. The season tickets for the twenty-four Friday afternoons will be sold on Monday and Tuesday and the tickets for the twenty-four Saturday evenings on Thursday and Friday, Oct. 1 and 2.

BOSTON POST.

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1903

ITS THIRD LEADER IN 22 YEARS

Concert Master Arbos of Symphony Orchestra Well Known in London as Soloist and Teacher

(Photo by Notman.)
FERNANDEZ ARBOS,
Concert master and first violin of the Symphony Orchestra.

(Photo by Notman.)
RUDOLPHE KRASSELT,
First violoncello Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The change in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was exclusively announced in the Post several weeks ago, has aroused great curiosity in musical circles about the concert master and first violin, and the new first 'cello.

Of Fernandez Arbos, who will be the third concert master of the orchestra in its 22 years of existence, E. A. Baughan, the London musical critic, says:

"In 1890, after a successful debut at a series of concerts given by Senor Albeniz at St. James's Hall, Senor Arbos practically settled in London. He was engaged to play at the 'pops' with Joachim, and he then toured through the provinces with Edward Lloyd, Santley and other artists, and for many years he has appeared as soloist and leader of a quartet in London concert rooms. Two years ago he played Spohr's duet concerto in B minor with Dr. Joachim at the Leeds festival, one of the most important of the English musical meetings. His work in London was by no means confined to the concert room, for he was chief professor of the violin at the Royal College of Music and a member of the board of professors, an honorary member of the Royal Academy of Music, and an examiner of the associated board. He has made a high reputation as a teacher, and one of his pupils, Miss Maud MacCarthy, is known to American audiences.

"Senor Arbos has composed a good deal of chamber music as well as comic opera."

Rudolphe Krasselt, the new 'cellist, will make his first appearance in America at the second concert of the organization. His year of compulsory military service in the German army is just expiring and he will not be free in time to play at the first concert.

THE BOSTON HERALD—WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1903.

New Symphony Orchestra Concert Master Pupil of Vieuxtemps, Gevaert and Joachim.

Has Been Director of the Berlin Philharmonic Society's Orchestra and Has Won Success in London—Rudolphe Krasselt Secured as First 'Cellist.

[Photo by Notman.]
RUDOLPHE KRASSELT,
First Violincello of Boston Symphony Orchestera.

[Photo by Notman.]
SENOR FERNANDEZ ARBOS,
First Violin and Concert Master of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The change in the personnel of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which brings from Europe a new concert master and first violin and a new first violincello, has most naturally aroused great interest in musical circles throughout the country. It is a most notable illustration of the stability of this organization that the newcomer, Senor Arbos, is only the third concert master in its 22 years' existence. The following sketch of Mr. Arbos was written by Mr. E. A. Baughan, a London journalist of note:

According to the popular idea the Spanish national temperament is compact of passion. It is, indeed, quite a commonplace of descriptive critics when dealing with Spanish musicians to refer to the molten "fire" which glows through their performances with a peculiar warmth. English writers, such as Byron and Charles Kingsley, have helped to form this ready-made idea of the Spanish temperament, and to most of us the word "Spain" conjures up visions of dark beauties with flashing eyes and of men who are either Don Juans or bull fighters.

The popular figure of a Spanish musician should be that brilliant Venezuelan, Mme. Carreno, and not Senor Sarasate or Senor Arbos. She has iridescent moods. They have the restrained and nervous subtlety of the Latin mind, with its passion for accuracy to perfection or the aristocratic fastidiousness of an ancient and dying race.

Senor Arbos himself is cosmopolitan. Born nearly 40 years ago (to be precise, on Christmas day, 1863), at Madrid, where his father was a military bandmaster, he early showed talent for music and a special predilection for the violin, which his father did his best to foster.

The childhood of the young violinist was passed in the province of Galicia, but on the breaking out of the war the Arbos family moved to Madrid, a favorable circumstance for the young musician, who was thus able to continue his musical studies at the Madrid Conservatoire. His professor of the violin there was Jesus Monasterio, who had been a pupil of De Beriot, and was solo violinist of the royal band and the royal chamber musicians, and later on became a director of the conservatoire.

Monasterio proved the arbiter of young Arbos' destinies, for the court musician introduced his promising pupil (when only 12 years of age he had gained first prizes for violin, harmony, theory, etc.) to the Princess Isabel, aunt of the reigning King, and she took a lively interest in the young musician, making him an allowance, so that he could continue his studies abroad, a kindness which Senor Arbos has never forgotten.

For some four years Vieuxtemps had settled down as principal professor of the violin at the Brussels Conservatoire, and to Brussels went young Arbos, accompanied by his mother. At that time Vieuxtemps had ceased to play in public, owing to a stroke of paralysis of his left side, but he still taught, and the promising young Spanish violinist became his pupil, studying composition and theory under Gevaert, director of the conservatoire. At 15 Arbos gained the prix d'honneur and was already a sound, all-round musician, as well as a brilliant violinist.

While living at Brussels the young musician heard Joachim and was much struck by a style of playing almost diametrically opposed to the Vieuxtemps school. Joachim was then at the height of his fame, both as virtuoso and teacher, and for some 10 years had been director of the Berlin high school for music.

This admiration for Joachim had far-reaching results on the artistic development and career of Fernandez Arbos. So much was he impressed by the great violinist's playing that he went to Berlin and studied with Joachim for three years. It might have been thought that Joachim, the leader of the German "classical" school, would have been the last man to influence a young Spaniard who had been taught his instrument first by a man who had been a favorite pupil of De Beriot, and then by Vieuxtemps, both leaders of the brilliant Belgian school of virtuosity, but then Senor Arbos is not the typical Spaniard of the popular imagination, and no doubt the tuition of Gevaert, a most solidly learned musician, had had its effect in forming the young violinist's mind.

The study under Joachim certainly made a deep impression on Senor Arbos. Had he finished his studies at Brussels he might have been content to be a virtuoso only; the German training grafted a depth and breadth of musicianship on his racial passion for perfection of detail. And the study at Berlin also had its effect on Senor Arbos' career in a material sense. He became leader of the Berlin Philharmonic Society's orchestra and played as soloist at one of the concerts. Five years were spent in Germany, during which period Senor Arbos played as soloist in all the principal towns and then toured through France, Holland, Belgium, Spain, Portugal and as far afield as Poland.

For a time he settled down as professor of the violin at the Hamburg conservatoire, but at the express desire of the Queen of Spain he accepted the same post at the Madrid conservatoire, and soon afterward founded a chamber music society there, by means of which Madrid amateurs were made acquainted with all the modern works of chamber music hitherto unknown to them.

So sound and cultured a musician, however, could not be expected to find full scope for his talents at Madrid, and in 1890, after a successful debut at a series of concerts given by Senor Albeniz at St. James' Hall, Senor Arbos practically settled in London.

He was engaged to play at the "Pops" with Joachim and then toured through the provinces with Edward Lloyd, Santley and other artists, and for many years he has appeared as soloist and leader of a quartet in London concert rooms. Two years ago he played Spohr's duet concerto in b minor with Dr. Joachim at the Leeds festival, one of the most important of the English musical meetings. The occasion was no doubt inspiring for Senor Arbos and he has seldom played more finely. His work in London was by no means confined to the concert room, for he was the chief professor of the violin at the Royal College of Music and a member of the board of professors, an honorary member of the Royal Academy of Music and an examiner of the associated board. He has made a high reputation as a teacher, and one of his pupils, Miss Maun MacCarthy, is known to American audiences. Senor Arbos has composed a good deal of chamber music as well as comic opera.

Of the man himself it should be said that, in these days of self-advertisement, it is refreshing to find a musician who is content to let his reputation rest on his merits alone, and one who, in spite of arduous professional toil, has remained an artist in his whole-hearted love for his art.

Rudolphe Krasselt, the new 'cellist of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will make his first appearance in America at the second concert of the organization. His year of compulsory military service in the German army is just expiring, and he will not be free in time to play at the first concert.

Mr. Krasselt is one of a family distinguished for musical ability. His father is concert-master of the orchestra at Baden Baden, and one of his brothers is concert-master at Weimer. A few years ago Rudolphe Krasselt was playing with Hekking at the first desk of the Berlin Philharmonic Society under Nikisch. On Hekking's retirement he became first 'cellist of that organization. His last engagement before joining the army was as first 'cellist of the Vienna Opera House.

For a young man he has played much in quartet concerts in Berlin and Vienna, and has had much success as a soloist. It is believed that he will prove a valuable acquisition to the ranks of resident musicians.

[10]

Boston Daily Globe.
WEDNESDAY, SEPT 23, 1903

CONCERT MASTER.

Fernandez Arbos Succeeds Franz Kneisel.

Interesting Career of the Symphony Orchestra's First Violinist.

Rudolphe Krasselt, New 'Cellist, Also a Musician of Note.

The change in the personnel of the Boston Symphony orchestra which brings from Europe a new concert-master and first violin and a new first violoncello, has most naturally aroused great interest in musical circles throughout the country.

It is a notable illustration of the stability of this organization that the newcomer, Mr Arbos, is only the third concert-master in its 22 years' existence. The following is from a sketch of Mr Arbos by Mr E. A. Baughan, a London journalist:

Fernandez Arbos was born on Christmas day, 1863, at Madrid, where his father was a military bandmaster, he early showed talent for music, and a special predilection for the violin.

FERNANDEZ ARBOS,
New Concert Master of the Symphony Orchestra.

RUDOLPHE KRASSEET,
New Cellist of the Symphony Orchestra.

The childhood of the young violinist was passed in the province of Galicia, but on the breaking out of the war, the Arbos family moved to Madrid, a favorable circumstance for the young musician, who was thus able to continue his musical studies at the Madrid conservatoire. His professor of the violin there was Jesus Monasterio, who had been a pupil of De Beriot. Monasterio proved the arbiter of young Arbos' destinies, for the court musician introduced his promising pupil to the Princess Isabel, aunt of the reigning king, and she took a lively interest in the young musician.

Vieuxtemps had settled down as principal professor of the violin at the Brussels conservatoire, and to Brussels went young Arbos, accompanied by his mother. At that Vieuxtemps had ceased to play in public, owing to a stroke of paralysis of his left side, but he still taught, and the promising young Spanish violinist became his pupil, studying composition and theory under Gevaert. At 15 Arbos gained the prix d'honneur.

While living at Brussels the young musician heard Joachim, and was much struck by a style of playing almost diametrically opposed to the Vieuxtemps school. So much was he impressed by the great violinist's playing that he went to Berlin and studied with Joachim for three years. It might have been thought that Joachim, the leader of the German "classical" school, would have been the last man to influence a young Spaniard who had been taught his instrument first by a man who had been a favorite pupil of De Beriot, and then by Vieuxtemps, both leaders of the brilliant Belgian school of virtuosity, but then Mr Arbos is not the typical Spaniard of the popular imagination.

He became leader of the Berlin Philharmonic society's orchestra, and played as soloist at one of the concerts. Altogether five years were spent in Germany, during which period Senor Arbos played as soloist in all the principal towns, and then toured through France, Holland, Belgium, Spain, Portugal and Poland.

For a time he settled down as professor of the violin at the Hamburg Conservatoire, but at the express desire of the queen of Spain he accepted the same post at the Madrid Conservatoire, and soon afterwards founded a chamber music society there, by means of which Madrid amateurs were made acquainted with all the modern works of chamber music hitherto unknown to them.

In 1890, after a successful debut at a series of concerts given by Senor Albeniz at St James' hall, Senor Arbos practically settled in London.

He was engaged to play at the "pops" with Joachim, and he then toured through the provinces with Edward Lloyd, Santley and other artists, and for many years he has appeared as soloist and leader of a quartet in London concert rooms. He was chief professor of the violin at the royal college of music and a member of the board of professors, honorary member of the royal academy of music, and an examiner of the associated board. He has made a high reputation as a teacher, and one of his pupils, Miss Maud MacCarthy, is known to American audiences. Senor Arbos has composed a good deal of chamber music, as well as comic opera.

Rudolphe Krasselt, the new cellist of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will make his first appearance in America at the second concert of the organization. His year of compulsory military service in the German army is just expiring, and he will not be free in time to play at the first concert.

Mr Krasselt is one of a family distinguished for musical ability. His father is concertmeister of the orchestra at Baden Baden, and one of his brothers is concertmeister at Weimar.

A few years ago Rudolphe Krasselt was playing with Hekking at the first desk of the Berlin Philharmonic society under Nikisch. On Hekking's retirement he became first cellist of that organization.

His last engagement before joining the army was as first cellist of the Vienna opera house.

For a young man he has played much in quartet concerts in Berlin and Vienna and has had much success as a soloist. It is believed that he will prove a valuable acquisition to the ranks of resident musicians.

THE BOSTON JOURNAL—
—WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1903.

Noted Musicians Coming To Fill Symphony Gaps

New Concert Master and First Violin Prominent in Spain.

OTHERS FROM GERMANY

Ranks of Boston's Famous Organization Ably Recruited.

Senor Arbos and Rudolphe Krasselt,
Noted musicians who are to join Boston Symphony.

Two famous musicians, one a Spaniard and the other a German, are coming from Europe this fall to fill two of the gaps left in the Boston Symphony Orchestra last spring by the resignation of the Kneisel quartette. Senor Fernandez Arbos is coming as a new concert master and first violin, and Rudolphe Krasselt as a first violincello.

These important changes in the personnel of the famous musical organization, have aroused great interest in musical circles through the country.

It is a notable illustration of the stability of the organization that Mr. Arbos is only the third concert master in the twenty-two years that it has been in existence.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD,
WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 23 1903

SYMPHONY'S NEW CONCERT— MASTER A FAMOUS MUSICIAN

The change in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which brings from Europe a new concertmaster and first violin and a new first violoncello has most naturally aroused great interest in musical circles throughout the country.

It is a notable illustration of the stability of this organization that the newcomer, Mr. Arbos, is only the third concertmaster in its 22 yrs.' existence. This sketch of Mr. Arbos was written by E. A. Baughan, a London journalist of note.

"The study under Joachim certainly made a deep impression on Senor Arbos. Had he finished his studies at Brussels he might have been content to be a virtuoso only; the German training grafted a depth and breadth of musicianship on his racial passion for perfection of detail. And the study at Berlin also had its effect on Senor Arbos' career in a material sense. He became leader of the Berlin Philharmonic Society's orchestra, and played as soloist at one of the concerts. Altogether five years were spent in Germany, during which period Senor Arbos played as soloist in all the principal towns, and then toured through France, Holland, Belgium, Spain, Portugal and as far afield as Poland.

"For a time he settled down as professor of the violin at the Hamburg Conservatoire, but at the express desire of the queen of Spain, he accepted the same post at the Madrid Conservatoire, and soon afterwards founded a chamber music society there, by means of which Madrid amateurs were made acquainted with all the modern works of chamber music hitherto unknown to them.

"So sound and cultured a musician, however, could not be expected to find full scope for his talents at Madrid, and in 1890, after a successful debut at a series of concerts given by Senor Albeniz at St James' Hall, Senor Arbos practically settled in London.

"He was engaged to play at the "Pops" with Joachim, and he then toured through the provinces with Edward Lloyd, Santley and other artists, and for many years he has appeared as soloist and leader of a quartette in London concert rooms. Two years ago he played Spohr's Duet Concerto in B minor with Dr. Joachim at the Leeds festival, one of the most important of the English musical meetings.

"The occasion was no doubt inspiring to Senor Arbos, and he has seldom played more finely. His work in London was by no means confined to the concert room, for he was chief professor of the violin at the Royal College of Music, and a member of the board of professors, an honorary member of the Royal Academy of Music, and an examiner of the associated board. He has made a high reputation as a teacher.

Boston Daily Globe.
WEDNESDAY, SEPT 23, 1903

CONCERT MASTER.

Fernandez Arbos Succeeds Franz Kneisel.

Interesting Career of the Symphony Orchestra's First Violinist.

Rudolphe Krasselt, New 'Cellist, Also a Musician of Note.

The change in the personnel of the Boston Symphony orchestra which brings from Europe a new concert-master and first violin and a new first violoncello, has most naturally aroused great interest in musical circles throughout the country.

It is a notable illustration of the stability of this organization that the newcomer, Mr Arbos, is only the third concert-master in its 22 years' existence. The following is from a sketch of Mr Arbos by Mr E. A. Baughan, a London journalist:

Fernandez Arbos was born on Christmas day, 1863, at Madrid, where his father was a military bandmaster, he early showed talent for music, and a special predilection for the violin.

FERNANDEZ ARBOS,
New Concert Master of the Symphony Orchestra.

RUDOLPHE KRASSEET,
New Cellist of the Symphony Orchestra.

The childhood of the young violinist was passed in the province of Galicia, but on the breaking out of the war, the Arbos family moved to Madrid, a favorable circumstance for the young musician, who was thus able to continue his musical studies at the Madrid conservatoire. His professor of the violin there was Jesus Monasterio, who had been a pupil of De Beriot. Monasterio proved the arbiter of young Arbos' destinies, for the court musician introduced his promising pupil to the Princess Isabel, aunt of the reigning king, and she took a lively interest in the young musician.

Vieuxtemps had settled down as principal professor of the violin at the Brussels conservatoire, and to Brussels went young Arbos, accompanied by his mother. At that Vieuxtemps had ceased to play in public, owing to a stroke of paralysis of his left side, but he still taught, and the promising young Spanish violinist became his pupil, studying composition and theory under Gevaert. At 15 Arbos gained the prix d'honneur.

While living at Brussels the young musician heard Joachim, and was much struck by a style of playing almost diametrically opposed to the Vieuxtemps school. So much was he impressed by the great violinist's playing that he went to Berlin and studied with Joachim for three years. It might have been thought that Joachim, the leader of the German "classical" school, would have been the last man to influence a young Spaniard who had been taught his instrument first by a man who had been a favorite pupil of De Beriot, and then by Vieuxtemps, both leaders of the brilliant Belgian school of virtuosity, but then Mr Arbos is not the typical Spaniard of the popular imagination.

He became leader of the Berlin Philharmonic society's orchestra, and played as soloist at one of the concerts. Altogether five years were spent in Germany, during which period Senor Arbos played as soloist in all the principal towns, and then toured through France, Holland, Belgium, Spain, Portugal and Poland.

For a time he settled down as professor of the violin at the Hamburg Conservatoire, but at the express desire of the queen of Spain he accepted the same post at the Madrid Conservatoire, and soon afterwards founded a chamber music society there, by means of which Madrid amateurs were made acquainted with all the modern works of chamber music hitherto unknown to them.

In 1890, after a successful debut at a series of concerts given by Senor Albeniz at St James' hall, Senor Arbos practically settled in London.

He was engaged to play at the "pops" with Joachim, and he then toured through the provinces with Edward Lloyd, Santley and other artists, and for many years he has appeared as soloist and leader of a quartet in London concert rooms. He was chief professor of the violin at the royal college of music and a member of the board of professors, honorary member of the royal academy of music, and an examiner of the associated board. He has made a high reputation as a teacher, and one of his pupils, Miss Maud MacCarthy, is known to American audiences. Senor Arbos has composed a good deal of chamber music, as well as comic opera.

Rudolphe Krasselt, the new cellist of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will make his first appearance in America at the second concert of the organization. His year of compulsory military service in the German army is just expiring, and he will not be free in time to play at the first concert.

Mr Krasselt is one of a family distinguished for musical ability. His father is concertmeister of the orchestra at Baden Baden, and one of his brothers is concertmeister at Weimar.

A few years ago Rudolphe Krasselt was playing with Hekking at the first desk of the Berlin Philharmonic society under Nikisch. On Hekking's retirement he became first cellist of that organization.

His last engagement before joining the army was as first cellist of the Vienna opera house.

For a young man he has played much in quartet concerts in Berlin and Vienna and has had much success as a soloist. It is believed that he will prove a valuable acquisition to the ranks of resident musicians.

THE BOSTON JOURNAL—
—WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1903.

Noted Musicians Coming To Fill Symphony Gaps

New Concert Master and First Violin Prominent in Spain.

OTHERS FROM GERMANY

Ranks of Boston's Famous Organization Ably Recruited.

Two famous musicians, one a Spaniard and the other a German, are coming from Europe this fall to fill two of the gaps left in the Boston Symphony Orchestra last spring by the resignation of the Kneisel quartette. Senor Fernandez Arbos is coming as a new concert master and first violin, and Rudolphe Krasselt as a first violincello.

Senor Arbos and Rudolphe Krasselt,
Noted musicians who are to join Boston Symphony.

These important changes in the personnel of the famous musical organization, have aroused great interest in musical circles through the country.

It is a notable illustration of the stability of the organization that Mr. Arbos is only the third concert master in the twenty-two years that it has been in existence.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD,
WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 23 1903

SYMPHONY'S NEW CONCERT— MASTER A FAMOUS MUSICIAN

The change in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which brings from Europe a new concertmaster and first violin and a new first violoncello has most naturally aroused great interest in musical circles throughout the country.

It is a notable illustration of the stability of this organization that the newcomer, Mr. Arbos, is only the third concertmaster in its 22 yrs.' existence. This sketch of Mr. Arbos was written by E. A. Baughan, a London journalist of note.

"The study under Joachim certainly made a deep impression on Senor Arbos. Had he finished his studies at Brussels he might have been content to be a virtuoso only; the German training grafted a depth and breadth of musicianship on his racial passion for perfection of detail. And the study at Berlin also had its effect on Senor Arbos' career in a material sense. He became leader of the Berlin Philharmonic Society's orchestra, and played as soloist at one of the concerts. Altogether five years were spent in Germany, during which period Senor Arbos played as soloist in all the principal towns, and then toured through France, Holland, Belgium, Spain, Portugal and as far afield as Poland.

"For a time he settled down as professor of the violin at the Hamburg Conservatoire, but at the express desire of the queen of Spain, he accepted the same post at the Madrid Conservatoire, and soon afterwards founded a chamber music society there, by means of which Madrid amateurs were made acquainted with all the modern works of chamber music hitherto unknown to them.

"So sound and cultured a musician, however, could not be expected to find full scope for his talents at Madrid, and in 1890, after a successful debut at a series of concerts given by Senor Albeniz at St James' Hall, Senor Arbos practically settled in London.

"He was engaged to play at the "Pops" with Joachim, and he then toured through the provinces with Edward Lloyd, Santley and other artists, and for many years he has appeared as soloist and leader of a quartette in London concert rooms. Two years ago he played Spohr's Duet Concerto in B minor with Dr. Joachim at the Leeds festival, one of the most important of the English musical meetings.

"The occasion was no doubt inspiring to Senor Arbos, and he has seldom played more finely. His work in London was by no means confined to the concert room, for he was chief professor of the violin at the Royal College of Music, and a member of the board of professors, an honorary member of the Royal Academy of Music, and an examiner of the associated board. He has made a high reputation as a teacher.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

WEDNESDAY MORNING, SEPTEMBER 23, 1903

SYMPHONY'S NEW CONCERT— MASTER A FAMOUS MUSICIAN

The change in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which brings from Europe a new concertmaster and first violin and a new first violoncello has most naturally aroused great interest in musical circles throughout the country.

It is a notable illustration of the stability of this organization that the newcomer, Mr. Arbos, is only the third concertmaster in its 22 yrs.' existence. This sketch of Mr. Arbos was written by E. A. Baughan, a London journalist of note.

"According to the popular idea, the Spanish national temperament is compact of passion. It is indeed quite a commonplace of descriptive critics when dealing with Spanish musicians to refer to the molten 'fire' which glows through their performances, with a peculiar warmth. English writers, such as Byron and Charles Kingsley, have helped to form this ready made idea of the Spanish temperament, and to most of us the word Spain conjures up visions of dark beauties with flashing eyes and of men who are either Don Juans or bull-fighters.

"The popular figure of a Spanish musician should be that brilliant Venezuelan, Mme. Carreno, and not Senor Sarasate or Senor Arbos. She has irridescent moods, they have the restrained and nervous subtlety of the Latin mind, with its passion for accuracy to perfection, or the aristocratic fastidiousness of an ancient and dying race.

"Senor Arbos himself is cosmopolitan. Born nearly 40 yrs. ago (to be precise, on Christmas day, 1863), at Madrid, where his father was a military bandmaster, he early showed talent for music, and a special predilection for the violin, which his father did his best to foster.

"The childhood of the young violinist was passed in the province of Galicia, but on the breaking out of the war, the Arbos family moved to Madrid, a favorable circumstance for the young musician, who was thus able to continue his musical studies at the Madrid conservatoire. His professor of the violin there was Jesus Monasterio, who had been a pupil of De Beriot, and was solo violinist of the Royal Band and the Royal Chamber Musicians, and later on became a director of the conservatoire.

"Monasterio proved the arbiter of young Arbos' destinies, for the court musician introduced his promising pupil to the Princess Isabel, aunt of the reigning king, and she took a lively interest in the young musician, making him an allowance so that he could continue his studies abroad, a kindness which Señor Arbos has never forgotten.

"For some four years Vieuxtemps had settled down as principal professor of the violin at the Brussels conservatoire, and to Brussels went young Arbos, accompanied by his mother. At that time Vieuxtemps had ceased to play in public, owing to a stroke of paralysis of his left side, but he still taught, and the promising young Spanish violinist became his pupil, studying composition and theory under Gevaert, the director of the conservatoire. At 15 Arbos gained the prix d'honneur, and was already a sound all-round musician, as well as a brilliant violinist.

"While living at Brussels, the young musician heard Joachim, and was much struck by a style of playing almost diametrically opposed to the Vieuxtemps school. Joachim was then at the height of his fame, both as virtuoso and teacher, and for 10 yrs. had been director of the Berlin High School for Music.

"This admiration for Joachim had far-reaching results on the artistic development and career of Fernandez Arbos. So much was he impressed by the great violinist's playing that he went to Berlin and studied with Joachim for three years. It might have been thought that Joachim, the leader of the German 'classical' school, would have been the last man to influence a young Spaniard who had been taught his instrument first by a man who had been a favorite pupil of De Beriot, and then by Vieuxtemps, both leaders of the brilliant Belgian school of virtuosity, but then Senor Arbos is not the typical Spaniard of the popular imagination, and no doubt the tuition of Gevaert, a most solidly learned musician, had had its effect in forming the young violinist's mind.

"The study under Joachim certainly made a deep impression on Senor Arbos. Had he finished his studies at Brussels he might have been content to be a virtuoso only; the German training grafted a depth and breadth of musicianship on his racial passion for perfection of detail. And the study at Berlin also had its effect on Senor Arbos' career in a material sense. He became leader of the Berlin Philharmonic Society's orchestra, and played as soloist at one of the concerts. Altogether five years were spent in Germany, during which period Senor Arbos played as soloist in all the principal towns, and then toured through France, Holland, Belgium, Spain, Portugal and as far afield as Poland.

"For a time he settled down as professor of the violin at the Hamburg Conservatoire, but at the express desire of the queen of Spain, he accepted the same post at the Madrid Conservatoire, and soon afterwards founded a chamber music society there, by means of which Madrid amateurs were made acquainted with all the modern works of chamber music hitherto unknown to them.

"So sound and cultured a musician, however, could not be expected to find full scope for his talents at Madrid, and in 1890, after a successful debut at a series of concerts given by Senor Albeniz at St James' Hall, Senor Arbos practically settled in London.

"He was engaged to play at the "Pops" with Joachim, and he then toured through the provinces with Edward Lloyd, Santley and other artists, and for many years he has appeared as soloist and leader of a quartette in London concert rooms. Two years ago he played Spohr's Duet Concerto in B minor with Dr. Joachim at the Leeds festival, one of the most important of the English musical meetings.

"The occasion was no doubt inspiring to Senor Arbos, and he has seldom played more finely. His work in London was by no means confined to the concert room, for he was chief professor of the violin at the Royal College of Music, and a member of the board of professors, an honorary member of the Royal Academy of Music, and an examiner of the associated board. He has made a high reputation as a teacher.

THE NEW CELLIST.

Rudolphe Krasselt, the new cellist of the Symphony Orchestra, will make his first appearance in America at the second concert of the organization. His year of compulsory military service in the Germany army is just expiring and he will not be free in time to play at the first concert.

Mr. Krasselt is one of a family distinguished for musical ability. His father is concertmeister of the orchestra at Baden Baden and one of his brothers is concertmeister at Weimer.

A few years ago Rudolphe Krasselt was playing with Hekking at the first desk of the Berlin Philharmonic Society under Nikisch. On Hekking's retirement he became first cellist of that organization.

His last engagement before joining the army was as first cellist of the Vienna Opera House.

For a young man he has played much in quartet concerts in Berlin and Vienna and has had much success as a soloist. It is believed that he will prove a valuable acquisition to the ranks of resident musicians.

Boston Transcript

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1903

The New Symphony Players

It is a remarkable illustration of the stability of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that Señor Fernandez Arbos, who succeeds Mr. Kneisel as first violin, is only the third concert-master in its twenty-two years' existence. Señor Arbos, though a Spaniard by birth, is, as he is termed by E. A. Baughan, a cosmopolitan, and far removed from the popular conception of the Spanish national temperament. A figure to fit that idea—of fire and glowing passion—would be that brilliant Venezuelan, Mme. Carreño, and not Señor Sarasate or Señor Arbos. She has iridescent moods. They have the restrained and nervous sublety of the Latin mind, with its passion for accuracy to perfection, or the aristocratic fastidiousness of an ancient and dying race.

Señor Arbos was born nearly forty years ago at Madrid, where his father was a military bandmaster. He early showed talent for music, and a special predilection for the violin, which his father did his best to foster. At the Madrid Conservatoire his professor of the violin was Jesus Monasterio, who had been a pupil of De Beriot, and was solo violinist of the royal band, and the royal chamber of musicians. Monasterio introduced his promising pupil (who when only twelve years of age had gained first prizes for violin, theory, etc.) to the Princess Isabel, aunt of the reigning king, and she took a lively interest in the young musician, making him an allowance so that he could continue his studies abroad, a kindness which Señor Arbos has never forgotten.

For some four years Vieuxtemps had settled down as principal professor of the violin at the Brussels Conservatoire, and to Brussels went young Arbos, and became his pupil, studying composition and theory under Gevaert, the director of the Conservatoire. At fifteen Arbos gained the Prix d'Honneur and was already a sound all-round musician, as well as a brilliant violinist. While living at Brussels he heard Joachim, and was much struck by a style of playing almost diametrically opposed to the Vieuxtemps school. Joachim was then at the height of his fame both as virtuoso and teacher, and for some ten years had been director of the Berlin high school for music.

This admiration for Joachim had far-reaching results on the artistic development and career of Fernandez Arbos. So much was he impressed by the great violinist's playing that he went to Berlin and studied with Joachim for three years. It might have been thought that Joachim, the leader of the German classical school, would have been the last man to influence a young Spaniard who had been taught his instrument first by a favorite pupil of De Beriot, and then by Vieuxtemps, both leaders of the brilliant Belgian school of virtuosity, but Señor Arbos is not the typical Spaniard of the popular imagination, and no doubt the tuition of Gevaert, a most solidly-learned musician, had had its effect in forming the young violinist's mind.

The study under Joachim certainly made a deep impression on Señor Arbos. Had he finished his studies at Brussels he might have been content to be a virtuoso only; the German training grafted a depth and breadth of musicianship on his racial passion for perfection of detail. The study at Berlin also had its effect on Señor Arbos' career in a material sense. He became leader of the Berlin Philharmonic Society's orchestra, and played as soloist in all the principal towns of the continent.

For a time he settled down as professor of the violin at the Harburg Conservatoire, but at the express desire of the queen of Spain, he accepted the same post at the Madrid Conservatoire.

So sound and cultured a musician, however, could not be expected to find full scope for his talents at Madrid, and in 1890, after a successful début at a series of concerts given by Señor Albeniz at St. James's Hall, Señor Arbos practically settled in London.

His work there was by no means confined to the concert room, for he was chief professor of the violin at the Royal College of Music and a member of the board of professors; an honorary member of the Royal Academy of Music, and an examiner of the associated board. Señor Arbos has composed a good deal of chamber music as well as comic opera.

Rudolph Krasselt, the new 'cellist, will make his first appearance in America at the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His year of compulsory military service in the German army is just expiring and he will not be free in time to play at the first concert.

Mr. Krasselt is one of a family distinguished for musical ability. His father is concertmaster of the orchestra at Baden Baden and one of his brothers is concertmaster at Weimer. A few years ago Rudolphe Krasselt was playing with Hekking at the first desk of the Berlin Philharmonic Society under Nikisch. On Hekking's retirement he became first 'cellist of that organization.

The Providence Journal.

Published by the Providence Journal Co. Nos. 209 and 213 Westminster St. Providence, R. I.

WEDNESDAY, SEPT. 23, 1903.

NEW CONCERTMASTER.

Also a New 'Cello Soloist in Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston, Sept. 22.—(Special.)—As the Boston Symphony Orchestra is well known in Providence, where it will give two concerts this winter (on the evenings of Tuesday, Nov. 24, and Tuesday, Feb. 2), many people in Rhode Island will be glad to learn of the changes in the organization due to the retirement of the Kneisel Quartet from the orchestra.

The change in the personnel of the orchestra, which brings from Europe a new concertmaster and first violin, and a new first violoncello, has most naturally aroused great interest in musical circles. It is a notable illustration of the stability of this organization that the newcomer, Mr. Arbos, is only the third concertmaster in its 22 years existence.

Senor Fernandez Arbos is cosmopolitan. Born on Christmas Day, 1863, at Madrid, where his father was a military bandmaster, he early showed talent for music. His childhood was passed in the province of Galicia, but on the breaking out of the war the Arbos family moved to Madrid, a favorable circumstance for the young musician, who was thus able to continue his musical studies at the Madrid Conservatoire. His professor of the violin there was Jesus Monasterio. Monasterio proved the arbiter of young Arbos's destinies, for the Court Musician introduced his promising pupil to the Princess Isabel, aunt of the reigning King, and she took a lively interest in the young musician, making him an allowance so that he could continue his studies abroad.

SENOR FERNANDEZ ARBOS.
First violin and concertmaster of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

For some four years Vieuxtemps had settled down as principal professor of the violin at the Brussels Conservatoire, and to Brussels went young Arbos, accompanied by his mother. At that time Vieuxtemps had ceased to play in public, but he still taught, and the young Spanish violinist became his pupil, studying composition and theory under Gevaert, the Director of the Conservatoire. At 15 Arbos gained the Prix d'Honneur, and was already a sound all-round musician, as well as a brilliant violinist.

While living at Brussels the young musician heard Joachim and was much struck by a style of playing almost diametrically opposed to the Vieuxtemps school. This admiration for Joachim had far-reaching results on the artistic development and career of Fernandez Arbos. So much was he impressed by the great violinist's playing that he went to Berlin and studied with Joachim for three years. He became leader of the Berlin Philharmonic Society's orchestra and played as soloist at one of the concerts. Altogether five years were spent in Germany, during which period Senor Arbos played as soloist in all the principal towns and then toured through France, Holland, Belgium, Spain, Portugal, and as far afield as Poland.

For a time he settled down as professor of the violin at the Hamburg Conservatoire, but at the express desire of the Queen of Spain he accepted the same post at the Madrid Conservatoire and soon afterward founded a Chamber Music Society there, by means of which Madrid amateurs were made acquainted with all the modern works of chamber music hitherto unknown to them.

So sound and cultured a musician, however, could not be expected to find full scope for his talents at Madrid,

RUDOLPHE KRASSELT.
First 'cellist of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

and in 1890, after a successful debut at a series of concerts given by Senor Albeniz at St. James's Hall, Senor Arbos practically settled in London.

He was engaged to play at the "Pops" with Joachim, and he then toured through the Provinces with Edward Lloyd, Santley and other artists, and for many years he has appeared as soloist and leader of a quartet in London concert rooms. Two years ago he played Spohr's duet.. Concerto in B-minor with Dr. Joachim at the Leeds Festival, one of the most important of the English musical meetings. The occasion was no doubt inspiring for Senor Arbos, and he has seldom played more finely. His work in London was by no means confined to the concert room, for he was the chief professor of the violin at the Royal College of Music and a member of the board of professors, an honorary member of the Royal Academy of Music and an examiner of the Associated Board. He has made a high reputation as a teacher, and one of his pupils. Miss Maud MacCarthy, is known to American audiences. Senor Arbos has composed much chamber music as well as comic opera.

Rudolphe Krasselt, the new 'cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his first appearance in America at the second concert of the organization. His year of compulsory military service in the German Army is just expiring and he will not be free in time to play at the first concert.

Mr. Krasselt is one of a family distinguished for musical ability. His father is concertmaster of the orchestra at Baden Baden, and one of his brothers is concert master at Weimer.

A few years ago Rudolphe Krasselt was playing with Hekking at the first desk of the Berlin Philharmonic Society under Nikisch. On Hekking's retirement he became first 'cellist of that organization.

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, SEPT 24, 1903

Two newcomers in the ranks of the Boston symphony orchestra, Mr M. Fernandez Arbos, concert master and first violin, and Mr Rudolph Krasselt, first violoncello, have aroused a widespread interest in the approaching 23d season, in addition to a most notable list of soloists, which includes Mme Melba, Mme Gadski, Mme Schumann-Heink, Mr Gilbert, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Mme Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr Busoni, Mr Harold Bauer, Mr Rafael Joseffy, Mr George Proctor, Mr T. Adamowski and others. The auction sales begin next Monday at Symphony hall, at 10 a m.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER,

THURSDAY MORNING,

SEPTEMBER 24, 1903

Two newcomers in the ranks of the Boston symphony orchestra, Fernadez Arbos, concert master and first violin, and Rudolph Krasselt, first violoncello, have roused a widespread interest in the approaching season. The auction sales begin next Monday at Symphony hall at 10 a.m.

BOSTON POST.

THURSDAY.

SEPTEMBER 24, 1903

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Two newcomers in the ranks of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, M. Fernandez Arbos, concert master and first violin, and Rudolph Krasselt, first violoncello, have aroused a widespread interest in the approaching 23d season, in addition to a most notable list of soloists, which includes Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mr. Gilbert, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Mme. Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Busoni, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. George Proctor, Mr. T. Adamowski and others. The auction sales begin next Monday, Sept. 28, at Symphony Hall, at 10 a. m. The season tickets for the 24 Friday afternoons will be sold on Monday and Tuesday, and the tickets for the 24 Saturday evenings on Thursday and Friday, Oct. 1 and 2.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CXIV., NO. 86.

THURSDAY, SEPT. 24, 1903.

Two newcomers in the ranks of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. M. Fernandez Arbos, concertmaster and first violin, and Mr. Rudolph Krasselt, first violoncello, have aroused a widespread interest in the approaching 23d season, in addition to a most notable list of soloists, which includes Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mr. Gilbert, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Mme. Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Busoni, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. George Proctor, Mr. T. Adamowski and others. The auction sales begin next Monday, at Symphony Hall, at 10 A. M. The season tickets for the 24 Friday afternoons will be sold on Monday and Tuesday, and the tickets for the 24 Saturday evenings on Thursday and Friday, Oct. 1 and 2.

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1903

The two newcomers in the ranks of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. M. Fernanlez Arbos, concertmaster and first violoncello, have aroused a widespread interest in the approaching twenty-third season. In addition there is a notable list of soloists, which includes Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mr. Gilbert, Miss aus der Ohe, Mme. Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Busoni, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. George Proctor, Mr. T. Adamowski, and others. The auction sales begin next Monday, Sept. 28, at Symphony Hall, at 10 A. M. The season tickets for the twenty-four Friday afternoons will be sold on Monday and Tuesday, and the tickets for the twenty-four Saturday evenings on Thursday and Friday, Oct. 1 and 2.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD,

THURSDAY,

SEPTEMBER 24, 1903.

Two newcomers in the ranks of the Boston symphony orchestra, Fernadez Arbos, concert master and first violin, and Rudolph Krasselt, first violoncello, have roused a widespread interest in the approaching season. The auction sales begin next Monday at Symphony hall at 10 a.m.

BOSTON POST.

SATURDAY.

SEPTEMBER 26, 1903

Next Monday morning, Sept. 28, at Symphony Hall, at 10 o'clock, the $12 seats for the 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be offered for sale at auction, and if the history of the past three season repeats itself, every seat offered will be sold, not only the $12 seats, but the $7.50 seats, which go on sale on Tuesday, and also the seats for the 24 Saturday evening concerts, which are sold on Thursday and Friday.

Boston Daily Globe.

SATURDAY, SEPT 26, 1903.

The auction sales of season tickets for the 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals and the 24 Saturday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra begin next Monday at Symphony hall at 10 a m. The coming of a new first violin and a new first cello lends an added interest, coupled with a strong list of soloists which includes Mme Melba, Mme Gadski, Mme Schumann-Heink, Mr Gilbert, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Mme Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr Busoni, Mr Harold Bauer, Mr Rafael Joseffy, Mr George Proctor, Mr M. Fernandez Arbos, Mr T. Adamowski, Mr Rudolph Krasselt and others.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CXIV., NO. 88.

SATURDAY, SEPT. 26, 1903.

There will be the usual large crowd of purchasers at the auction sales of season tickets for the 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals and the 24 Saturday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, which begin next Monday, Sept. 28, at Symphony Hall, at 10 A. M., and continue through the week. The coming of a new first violin and a new first 'cello lends an added interest, coupled with as strong a list of soloists as has ever been presented. It includes Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mr. Gilbert, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Mme. Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Busoni, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. George Proctor, Mr. M. Fernandez Arbos, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Rudolph Krasselt and others.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

SATURDAY MORNING,

SEPTEMBER 26, 1903.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Next Monday at Symphony Hall, at 10 a.m. there will begin a series of auction sales of season tickets for the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. To Bostonians these sales are most familiar after 20 years' annual repetition, but in no other city in existence can they be duplicated. Strangers listen with incredulity growing to wonder when they hear the story of every seat in the house sold for the season, and very largely to the same people year after year. Conductor Gericke returned from Europe last week with a series of most admirable programmes already prepared for the entire season. The list of soloists is strong and includes Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mr. Gilibert, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Mme. Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Messrs. Busoni, Harold Bauer, Rafael Joseffy and others.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD,

SATURDAY,

SEPTEMBER 26 1903.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Next Monday at Symphony Hall, at 10 a.m. there will begin a series of auction sales of season tickets for the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. To Bostonians these sales are most familiar after 20 years' annual repetition, but in no other city in existence can they be duplicated. Strangers listen with incredulity growing to wonder when they hear the story of every seat in the house sold for the season, and very largely to the same people year after year. Conductor Gericke returned from Europe last week with a series of most admirable programmes already prepared for the entire season. The list of soloists is strong and includes Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mr. Gilibert, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Mme. Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Messrs. Busoni, Harold Bauer, Rafael Joseffy and others.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

Saturday, September 26, 1903.

With ninety-four performers and Mr. Wilhelm Gericke conductor, the Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its 23d season on October 17, the sale of seats begining next Monday, and continuing, for the different concerts and rehearsals, up to Friday. The list of soloists is most attractive, including Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mr. Gilbert, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Mme. Hopekirk, Miss Maud McCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Busoni, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. George Proctor, Mr. M. Fernandez Arbos, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Rudolph Krasselt and others. The musical season of Boston may be said to have really begun when the sale of Symphony seats is over, and to be in full swing when the first rehearsal—this year set for Friday, the 16th of October—is followed by the opening concert.

The Providence Journal.
Published by the Providence Journal Co.
Nos. 209 and 213 Westminster St.
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

WEDNESDAY, SEPT. 23, 1903.

NEW CONCERTMASTER.

Also a New 'Cello Soloist in Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston, Sept. 22.—(Special.)—As the Boston Symphony Orchestra is well known in Providence, where it will give two concerts this winter (on the evenings of Tuesday, Nov. 24, and Tuesday, Feb. 2), many people in Rhode Island will be glad to learn of the changes in the organization due to the retirement of the Kneisel Quartet from the orchestra.

The change in the personnel of the orchestra, which brings from Europe a new concertmaster and first violin, and a new first violoncello, has most naturally aroused great interest in musical circles. It is a notable illustration of the stability of this organization that the newcomer, Mr. Arbos, is only the third concertmaster in its 22 years existence.

Senor Fernandez Arbos is cosmopolitan. Born on Christmas Day, 1863, at Madrid, where his father was a military bandmaster, he early showed talent for music. His childhood was passed in the province of Galicia, but on the breaking out of the war the Arbos family moved to Madrid, a favorable circumstance for the young musician, who was thus able to continue his musical studies at the Madrid Conservatoire. His professor of the violin there was Jesus Monasterio. Monasterio proved the arbiter of young Arbos's destinies, for the Court Musician introduced his promising pupil to the Princess Isabel, aunt of the reigning King, and she took a lively interest in the young musician, making him an allowance so that he could continue his studies abroad.

SENOR FERNANDEZ ARBOS.
First violin and concertmaster of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

For some four years Vieuxtemps had settled down as principal professor of the violin at the Brussels Conservatoire, and to Brussels went young Arbos, accompanied by his mother. At that time Vieuxtemps had ceased to play in public, but he still taught, and the young Spanish violinist became his pupil, studying composition and theory under Gevaert, the Director of the Conservatoire. At 15 Arbos gained the Prix d'Honneur, and was already a sound all-round musician, as well as a brilliant violinist.

While living at Brussels the young musician heard Joachim and was much struck by a style of playing almost diametrically opposed to the Vieuxtemps school. This admiration for Joachim had far-reaching results on the artistic development and career of Fernandez Arbos. So much was he impressed by the great violinist's playing that he went to Berlin and studied with Joachim for three years. He became leader of the Berlin Philharmonic Society's orchestra and played as soloist at one of the concerts. Altogether five years were spent in Germany, during which period Senor Arbos played as soloist in all the principal towns and then toured through France, Holland, Belgium, Spain, Portugal, and as far afield as Poland.

For a time he settled down as professor of the violin at the Hamburg Conservatoire, but at the express desire of the Queen of Spain he accepted the same post at the Madrid Conservatoire and soon afterward founded a Chamber Music Society there, by means of which Madrid amateurs were made acquainted with all the modern works of chamber music hitherto unknown to them.

So sound and cultured a musician, however, could not be expected to find full scope for his talents at Madrid,

RUDOLPHE KRASSELT.
First 'cellist of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

and in 1890, after a successful debut at a series of concerts given by Senor Albeniz at St. James's Hall, Senor Arbos practically settled in London.

He was engaged to play at the "Pops" with Joachim, and he then toured through the Provinces with Edward Lloyd, Santley and other artists, and for many years he has appeared as soloist and leader of a quartet in London concert rooms. Two years ago he played Spohr's duet, Concerto in B-minor with Dr. Joachim at the Leeds Festival, one of the most important of the English musical meetings. The occasion was no doubt inspiring for Senor Arbos, and he has seldom played more finely. His work in London was by no means confined to the concert room, for he was the chief professor of the violin at the Royal College of Music and a member of the board of professors, an honorary member of the Royal Academy of Music and an examiner of the Associated Board. He has made a high reputation as a teacher, and one of his pupils, Miss Maud MacCarthy, is known to American audiences. Senor Arbos has composed much chamber music as well as comic opera.

Rudolphe Krasselt, the new 'cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his first appearance in America at the second concert of the organization. His year of compulsory military service in the German Army is just expiring and he will not be free in time to play at the first concert.

Mr. Krasselt is one of a family distinguished for musical ability. His father is concertmaster of the orchestra at Baden Baden, and one of his brothers is concert master at Weimar.

A few years ago Rudolphe Krasselt was playing with Hekking at the first desk of the Berlin Philharmonic Society under Nikisch. On Hekking's retirement he became first 'cellist of that organization.

Boston Daily Globe.
THURSDAY, SEPT 24, 1903

Two newcomers in the ranks of the Boston symphony orchestra, Mr M. Fernandez Arbos, concert master and first violin, and Mr Rudolph Krasselt, first violoncello, have aroused a widespread interest in the approaching 23d season, in addition to a most notable list of soloists, which includes Mme Melba, Mme Gadski, Mme Schumann-Heink, Mr Gilibert, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Mme Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr Busoni, Mr Harold Bauer, Mr Rafael Joseffy, Mr George Proctor, Mr T. Adamowski and others. The auction sales begin next Monday at Symphony hall, at 10 a m.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER,
THURSDAY MORNING,
SEPTEMBER 24, 1903

Two newcomers in the ranks of the Boston symphony orchestra, Fernadez Arbos, concert master and first violin, and Rudolph Krasselt, first violoncello, have roused a widespread interest in the approaching season. The auction sales begin next Monday at Symphony hall at 10 a.m.

BOSTON POST,
THURSDAY,
SEPTEMBER 24, 1903

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Two newcomers in the ranks of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, M. Fernandez Arbos, concert master and first violin, and Rudolph Krasselt, first violoncello, have aroused a widespread interest in the approaching 23d season, in addition to a most notable list of soloists, which includes Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mr. Gilibert, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Mme. Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Busoni, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. George Proctor, Mr. T. Adamowski and others. The auction sales begin next Monday, Sept. 28, at Symphony Hall, at 10 a. m. The season tickets for the 24 Friday afternoons will be sold on Monday and Tuesday, and the tickets for the 24 Saturday evenings on Thursday and Friday, Oct. 1 and 2.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CXIV., NO. 86.
THURSDAY, SEPT. 24, 1903.

Two newcomers in the ranks of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. M. Fernandez Arbos, concertmaster and first violin, and Mr. Rudolph Krasselt, first violoncello, have aroused a widespread interest in the approaching 23d season, in addition to a most notable list of soloists, which includes Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mr. Gilibert, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Mme. Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Busoni, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. George Proctor, Mr. T. Adamowski and others. The auction sales begin next Monday, at Symphony Hall, at 10 A. M. The season tickets for the 24 Friday afternoons will be sold on Monday and Tuesday, and the tickets for the 24 Saturday evenings on Thursday and Friday, Oct. 1 and 2.

Boston Transcript
THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1903.

The two newcomers in the ranks of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. M. Fernanlez Arbos, concertmaster and first violin, and Mr Rudolph Krasselt, first violoncello, have aroused a widespread interest in the approaching twenty-third season. In addition there is a notable list of soloists, which includes Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mr. Gilibert, Miss aus der Ohe, Mme. Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Busoni, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. George Proctor, Mr. T. Adamowski, and others. The auction sales begin next Monday, Sept. 28, at Symphony Hall, at 10 A. M. The season tickets for the twenty-four Friday afternoons will be sold on Monday and Tuesday, and the tickets for the twenty-four Saturday evenings on Thursday and Friday, Oct. 1 and 2.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD,
THURSDAY,
SEPTEMBER 24, 1903.

Two newcomers in the ranks of the Boston symphony orchestra, Fernadez Arbos, concert master and first violin, and Rudolph Krasselt, first violoncello, have roused a widespread interest in the approaching season. The auction sales begin next Monday at Symphony hall at 10 a.m.

BOSTON POST,
SATURDAY,
SEPTEMBER 26, 1903

Next Monday morning, Sept. 28, at Symphony Hall, at 10 o'clock, the $12 seats for the 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be offered for sale at auction, and if the history of the past three season repeats itself, every seat offered will be sold, not only the $12 seats, but the $7.50 seats, which go on sale on Tuesday, and also the seats for the 24 Saturday evening concerts, which are sold on Thursday and Friday.

Boston Daily Globe.
SATURDAY, SEPT 26, 1903.

The auction sales of season tickets for the 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals and the 24 Saturday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra begin next Monday at Symphony hall at 10 a m. The coming of a new first violin and a new first cello lends an added interest, coupled with a strong list of soloists which includes Mme Melba, Mme Gadski, Mme Schumann-Heink, Mr Gilibert, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Mme Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr Busoni, Mr Harold Bauer, Mr Rafael Joseffy, Mr George Proctor, Mr M. Fernandez Arbos, Mr T. Adamowski, Mr Rudolph Krasselt and others.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CXIV., NO. 88.
SATURDAY, SEPT. 26, 1903.

There will be the usual large crowd of purchasers at the auction sales of season tickets for the 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals and the 24 Saturday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, which begin next Monday, Sept. 28, at Symphony Hall, at 10 A. M., and continue through the week. The coming of a new first violin and a new first 'cello lends an added interest, coupled with as strong a list of soloists as has ever been presented. It includes Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mr. Gilibert, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Mme. Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Busoni, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. George Proctor, Mr. M. Fernandez Arbos, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Rudolph Krasselt and others.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
SATURDAY MORNING,
SEPTEMBER 26, 1903.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Next Monday at Symphony Hall, at 10 a.m. there will begin a series of auction sales of season tickets for the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. To Bostonians these sales are most familiar after 20 years' annual repetition, but in no other city in existence can they be duplicated. Strangers listen with incredulity growing to wonder when they hear the story of every seat in the house sold for the season, and very largely to the same people year after year. Conductor Gericke returned from Europe last week with a series of most admirable programmes already prepared for the entire season. The list of soloists is strong and includes Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mr. Gilibert, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Mme. Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Messrs. Busoni, Harold Bauer, Rafael Joseffy and others.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD,
SATURDAY,
SEPTEMBER 26 1903.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Next Monday at Symphony Hall, at 10 a.m. there will begin a series of auction sales of season tickets for the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. To Bostonians these sales are most familiar after 20 years' annual repetition, but in no other city in existence can they be duplicated. Strangers listen with incredulity growing to wonder when they hear the story of every seat in the house sold for the season, and very largely to the same people year after year. Conductor Gericke returned from Europe last week with a series of most admirable programmes already prepared for the entire season. The list of soloists is strong and includes Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mr. Gilibert, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Mme. Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Messrs. Busoni, Harold Bauer, Rafael Joseffy and others.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.
Saturday, September 26, 1903.

With ninety-four performers and Mr. Wilhelm Gericke conductor, the Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its 23d season on October 17, the sale of seats begining next Monday, and continuing, for the different concerts and rehearsals, up to Friday. The list of soloists is most attractive, including Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mr. Gilbert, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Mme. Hopekirk, Miss Maud McCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Busoni, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. George Proctor, Mr. M. Fernandez Arbos, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Rudolph Krasselt and others. The musical season of Boston may be said to have really begun when the sale of Symphony seats is over, and to be in full swing when the first rehearsal—this year set for Friday, the 16th of October—is followed by the opening concert.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 26, 1903

Next Monday morning at Symphony Hall will begin the auction sales of seats for the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold Monday, the $7.50 seats on Tuesday. The $12 seats for the Saturday concerts will be sold on Thursday, the $7.50 seats on Friday. Conductor Wilhelm Gericke returned from Europe last week with a series of most admirable programmes already prepared for the entire season. He begins his eleventh year as conductor, and during the winter will pass the one thousand mark in the number of concerts by this famous organization under his direction. The usual monthly trips to New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Baltimore, ten concerts at Harvard University, three concerts in Hartford, one each in Springfield, New Haven and Troy, and two concerts in Providence, guaranteed by public-spirited residents, with President Faunce of Brown University as the leader, complete the season. The list of soloists is sufficiently strong to warrant repetition and includes Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mr. Gilibert, Miss aus der Ohe, Mme. Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Busoni, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. George Proctor, Mr. M. Fernandez Arbos, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Rudolph Krasselt and others.

BOSTON TIMES

SEPTEMBER 26, 1903.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The 22d season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which begins with the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening performances on October 16 and 17, will in every way equal, and, if possible, surpass its predecessors. Mr. Wilhelm Gericke will again be welcomed as the conductor of his 11th season, a record which speaks for itself in a most assuring way. The list of soloists is, as usual, a notable one, and includes Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mr. Gilibert, Miss aus Der Ohe, Mme Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Busoni, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Raffael Joseffy, Mr. George Proctor, Mr. M. Fernandez Arbos, the new first violin and concert master; Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Rudolph Krasselt, the new first violoncello, and others. Mme. Melba returns after an absence of two years, and four seasons have passed since Mme. Gadski appeared with the orchestra in Boston. Mme. Schumann-Heink has just secured her release by Kaiser Wilhelm from the Royal Opera company in Berlin, which enables her to fill her concert engagements in this country. Mr. Gilibert will be most pleasantly remembered from last season, as will also Miss Maud MacCarthy, and Miss Olive Mead, who made such a favorable impression two seasons ago. Mr. Busoni returns to America after an absence of nine years, during which time he has made a splendid reputation in Europe. The recent triumps of Mr. Harold Baue: afford the best possible reason for his re-engagement. Mr. Joseffy has a host of friends and admirers who will always welcome his appearances and who regret that he has not favored Boston for five years. Mr. Proctor's rapid advancement in his profession lends an interest and attractiveness to all his performances, and Mr. Adamowski is ah artist well established with Symphony patrons.

There will be the usual two series of 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals and 24 Saturday evening concerts. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Symphony hall, Monday, Sept. 28, at 10 a. m. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Symphony hall, Tuesday, Sept. 29, at 10 a. m. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction, at Symphony hall, on Thursday, Oct. 1, at 10 a. m. The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on Friday, Oct. 2, at 10 a. m. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and not more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

Admission, first come, first served, to the second balcony on Friday afternoons only, at 25 cents, will be given according to the plan adopted two years ago, and which has given entire satisfaction.

The position of master of the Boston Symphony orchestra, vacated by Franz Kneisel, has been filled by the engagement of Fernandez Arbos, a young violinist of Spanish birth, who has for some years been teacher at the Royal College of Music in London.

Melba will arrive in America about Oct. 10. Her tour will begin in Montreal Oct. 13, and she will be heard in Boston and New York with the Boston Symphony orchestra. In all probability she will be the first soloist with that organization.

SATURDAY EVENING GAZETTE,

BOSTON, SEPTEMBER 26, 1903.

——Mr. Fernandez Arbos, concert master and first violinist, and Rudolph Krasselt, first violoncello, are fresh and notable additions to the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the coming season. Among the soloists will be Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mr. Gilibert, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Mme. Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Busoni, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. George Proctor, Mr. T. Adamowski. The auction sale at Symphony Hall at 10 A. M., on Monday next, is sure to be largely attended. On Monday and Tuesday the season tickets for the twenty-four Friday afternoon rehearsals will be disposed of, and on Thursday and Friday, Oct. 1 and 2, the tickets for the twenty-four Saturday evening concerts will be sold.

SUNDAY HERALD.

SUNDAY, SEPT. 27, 1903.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Tomorrow morning, at Symphony Hall, at 10 o'clock, will begin the series of auction sales of season tickets for the concerts by the most unique musical organization in the world, the Boston Symphony orchestra. A symphony concert either on Friday afternoon or Saturday evening is a week-end feast too satisfying to be missed, and no more convincing testimony to the ennobling influence of good music can be found than the two enormous audiences of Boston's best people. Each week a new standard seems to obtain only to the repeated again into one splendid ensemble, and the seasons come and go with always an unbroken record of finished and artistic performances. Conductor Gericke returned from Europe last week.

He begins his 11th year as conductor, and during the winter will pass the 1000 mark in the number of concerts by this famous organization under his direction, truly a remarkable record and perhaps unsurpassed elsewhere. The list of soloists is sufficiently strong to warrant repetition, and includes Melba, Gadski, Schumann-Heink, Gilibert, Aus Der Ohe, Hopekirk, Maud MacCarthy, Olive Mead, Busoni, Harold Bauer, Rafael Joseffy, George Proctor, Fernandez Arbos, T. Adamowski, Rudolph Krasselt and others.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold Monday, the $7.50 seats Tuesday. The $12 seats for the Saturday concerts will be sold on Thursday, the $7.50 seats on Friday.

The opening of the Symphony season is at hand, with the auctioneer for soloist.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, SEPT 27, 1903.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Tomorrow morning at Symphony hall, at 10 o'clock, will begin the auction sales of season tickets for the concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra. To Bostonians these sales are familiar after 21 years' annual repetition, but in no other city in existence can they be duplicated. Strangers listen with incredulity when they hear the story of every seat in the house sold for the season, and very largely to the same people year after year. A Symphony concert either on Friday afternoon or Saturday evening is a week-end feast too satisfying to be missed, and no more convincing testimony to the ennobling influence of good music can be found than the two enormous audiences of Boston's best people.

Conductor Wilhelm Gericke returned from Europe last week with a series of admirable programs already prepared for the entire season. He begins his 11th year as conductor, and during the winter will pass the 1000 mark in the number of concerts by this famous organization under his direction; a remarkable record and perhaps unsurpassed elsewhere. The usual monthly trips to New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Baltimore, 10 concerts at Harvard university, three concerts in Hartford, one each in Springfield, New Haven and Troy, and two concerts in Providence, guaranteed by public-spirited residents, with Pres Faunce of Brown university as the leader, complete the season.

The list of soloists includes Mme Melba, Mme Gadski, Mme Schumann-Heink, Mr Gilibert, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Mme Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr Busoni, Mr Harold Bauer, Mr Rafael Joseffy, Mr George Proctor, Mr M. Fernandez Arbos, Mr T. Adamowski, Mr Rudolph Krasselt and others.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold Monday, the $7.50 seats Tuesday. The $12 seats for the Saturday concerts will be sold Thursday, the $7.50 seats Friday.

——There will be the usual excitement at Symphony hall tomorrow when the sale of tickets for the reheasals of the Boston symphony orchestra will begin. The first rehearsal will be on the afternoon of Oct 16, and the concert will follow the next evening. With these concerts the Boston musical season will be fully launched, as everything for some years dated from this event. With such soloists as Melba, Gadski, Schumann-Heink and others of note, and the unrivalled musical organization which is thought to be second to none in the world, the musical public of Boston will have a series of concerts of the highest type of excellence.

BOSTON SUNDAY JOURNAL.

SEPTEMBER 27, 1903.

Conductor Wilhelm Gericke has returned from Europe with many admirable programs already prepared for the Symphony season. He begins his eleventh year as conductor, and during the winter will pass the one thousand mark in the number of concerts by this organization under his direction, truly a remarkable record, and perhaps unsurpassed elsewhere. The usual monthly trips to New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Baltimore, ten concerts at Harvard University, three concerts in Hartford, one each in Springfield, New Haven and Troy, and two concerts in Providence, guaranteed by public spirited residents, with President Faunce of Brown University as the leader, complete the season.

Tomorrow morning, at Symphony Hall, at 10 o'clock, the $12 seats for the twenty-four Friday afternoon public rehearsals by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be offered for sale at auction, and if the history of the past three seasons repeats itself every seat offered will be sold, not only the $12 seats, but the $7.50 seats, which go on sale on Tuesday, and also the seats for the twenty-four Saturday evening concerts, which are sold on Thursday and Friday. The list of soloists is unusually strong, as has been already stated by The Journal, and will much enhance the value of the orchestral programs.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST.

SEPTEMBER 27, 1903

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Tomorrow morning at Symphony Hall at 10 o'clock, there will begin a most remarkable series of auction sales of season tickets for the concerts by the most unique musical organization in the world, the Boston Symphony Orchestra. To Bostonians these sales are most familiar after 20 years of annual repetition, but in no other city in existence can they be duplicated. Strangers listen with incredulity growing to wonder when they hear the story of every seat in the house sold for the season and very largely to the same people year after year. A Symphony concert either on Friday afternoon or Saturday evening is a week-end feast too satisfying to be missed, and no more convincing testimony to the ennobling influence of good music can be found than the two enormous audiences of Boston's best people. Each week a new standard seems to obtain only to be repeated again into one splendid ensemble, and the seasons come and go with always an unbroken record of finished and artistic performances.

Conductor Wilhelm Gericke returned from Europe last week with a series of most admirable programmes already prepared for the entire season. He begins his 11th year as conductor, and during the winter will pass the 1000 mark in the number of concerts by this famous organization under his direction, truly a remarkable record and perhaps unsurpassed elsewhere. The usual monthly trips to New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Baltimore, 10 concerts at Harvard University, three concerts in Hartford, one each in Springfield, New Haven and Troy, and two concerts in Providence, guaranteed by public-spirited residents, with President Faunce of Brown University as the leader, complete the season.

The list of soloists is sufficiently strong to warrant repetition, and includes Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mr. Gilbert, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Mme. Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Busoni, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. George Proctor, Mr. M. Fernandes Arbos, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Rudolph Krasselt and others.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold Monday, the $7.50 seats Tuesday. The $12 seats for the Saturday concerts will be sold on Thursday, the $7.50 seats on Friday.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CXIV., NO. 90.

MONDAY, SEPT. 28, 1903.

SYMPHONY TICKETS.

The auction sale of $12 season tickets for the series of 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals by the Boston Symphony orchestra will commence at 10 o'clock this morning in Symphony Hall. The series of programmes for this season's concerts will be of even more than usual interest. The strong array of soloists announced should add much to the interest of the coming concerts. There is also much interest being manifested regarding the new men of the orchestra who will be heard in this country for the first time in the important positions of concert master (first violin) and leading violoncello. For a number of seasons past every seat has been sold at auction, and for those who desire to attend these concerts it will be necessary to secure their tickets during the present sale.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER,

MONDAY MORNING,

SEPTEMBER 28, 1903.

SYMPHONY TICKETS.

The auction sale of $12 season tickets for the series of 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will commence at 10 a.m. today in Symphony hall. The series of programmes for this season's concerts will be of even more than usual interest. The strong array of soloists announced should add much to the success of the coming concerts. There is also much interest being manifested regarding the new men of the orchestra, who will be heard in this country for the first time, in the important positions of concert master and leading violoncello. For a number of seasons past every seat has been sold at auction, and for those who desire to attend these concerts it will be necessary to secure their tickets during the present sale.

THE SPRINGFIELD SUNDAY REPUBLICAN.

SEPTEMBER 27, 1903.

OF MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

ART IN PRACTICE AND THEORY.

EVENTS OF OPENING SEASON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Of the arrangements for the coming season of the Boston symphony orchestra the Boston Transcript says:—

Wilhelm Gericke will again be welcomed as the conductor for the 11th season. As a matter of interest to the many patrons who regularly attended the concerts from the beginning, Mr Henschel conducted for the first three years, Mr Gericke for the next five years, then Mr Nikisch for four years, Mr Paur following with five years, and last season was the fifth year of Mr Gericke's second regime. The list of soloists is, as usual, a notable one, and includes Mme Melba, Mme Gadski, Mme Schumann-Heink, Mr Gilibert, Miss Aus der Ohe, Mme Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr Busoni, Harold Bauer, Rafael Joseffy, George Proctor, Fernandez Arbos, the new first violin and concert master; T. Adamowski, Rudolph Krassait, the new first violoncello, and others. Mme Melba returns after an absence of two years, and four seasons have passed since Mme Gadski appeared with the orchestra in Boston. Mme Schumann-Heink has just secured her release by Kaiser Wilhelm from the Royal opera company in Berlin, which enables her to fill her concert engagements in this country. Mr Gilibert will be most pleasantly remembered from last season, as will also Miss Maud MacCarthy and Miss Olive Mead, who made such a favorable impression two seasons ago. Mr Busoni returns to America after an absence of nine years, during which time he has made a splendid reputation in Europe. The recent triumphs of Harold Bauer afford the best possible reason for his re-engagement. Mr Joseffy has a host of friends and admirers who will always welcome his appearances and who regret that he has not favored Boston for five years. Mr Proctor's rapid advancement in his profession lends an interest and attractiveness to all his performances, and Mr Adamowski is an artist too well established with symphony patrons to need extensive exploiting. Of the newcomers in the ranks of the orchestra, Mr Fernandez Arboz, the first violin and concert master, and Rudolph Krassait, the first violoncello, notice will be given during the coming weeks.

There will be the usual two series of 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals and 24 Saturday evening concerts. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Symphony hall, Monday, September 28, at 10 a. m. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold by auction, at Symphony hall, Tuesday, September 29, at 10 a. m. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold by auction, at Symphony hall, on Thursday, October 1, at 10 a. m. The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on Friday, October 2, at 10 a. m. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice, and not more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold. Admission, first come first served, to the second balcony on Friday afternoons only, at 25 cents, will be given, according to the plan adopted two years ago and which has met with universal satisfaction.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 26, 1903

Next Monday morning at Symphony Hall will begin the auction sales of seats for the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold Monday, the $7.50 seats on Tuesday. The $12 seats for the Saturday concerts will be sold on Thursday, the $7.50 seats on Friday. Conductor Wilhelm Gericke returned from Europe last week with a series of most admirable programmes already prepared for the entire season. He begins his eleventh year as conductor, and during the winter will pass the one thousand mark in the number of concerts by this famous organization under his direction. The usual monthly trips to New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Baltimore, ten concerts at Harvard University, three concerts in Hartford, one each in Springfield, New Haven and Troy, and two concerts in Providence, guaranteed by public-spirited residents, with President Faunce of Brown University as the leader, complete the season. The list of soloists is sufficiently strong to warrant repetition and includes Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mr. Gilibert, Miss aus der Ohe, Mme. Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Busoni, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. George Proctor, Mr. M. Fernandez Arbos, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Rudolph Krasselt and others.

BOSTON TIMES

SEPTEMBER 26, 1903.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The 22d season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which begins with the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening performances on October 16 and 17, will in every way equal, and, if possible, surpass its predecessors. Mr. Wilhelm Gericke will again be welcomed as the conductor of his 11th season, a record which speaks for itself in a most assuring way. The list of soloists is, as usual, a notable one, and includes Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mr. Gilibert, Miss aus Der Ohe, Mme Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Busoni, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Raffael Joseffy, Mr. George Proctor, Mr. M. Fernandez Arbos, the new first violin and concert master; Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Rudolph Krasselt, the new first violoncello, and others. Mme. Melba returns after an absence of two years, and four seasons have passed since Mme. Gadski appeared with the orchestra in Boston. Mme. Schumann-Heink has just secured her release by Kaiser Wilhelm from the Royal Opera company in Berlin, which enables her to fill her concert engagements in this country. Mr. Gilibert will be most pleasantly remembered from last season, as will also Miss Maud MacCarthy, and Miss Olive Mead, who made such a favorable impression two seasons ago. Mr. Busoni returns to America after an absence of nine years, during which time he has made a splendid reputation in Europe. The recent triumps of Mr. Harold Baue: afford the best possible reason for his re-engagement. Mr. Joseffy has a host of friends and admirers who will always welcome his appearances and who regret that he has not favored Boston for five years. Mr. Proctor's rapid advancement in his profession lends an interest and attractiveness to all his performances, and Mr. Adamowski is an artist well established with Symphony patrons.

There will be the usual two series of 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals and 24 Saturday evening concerts. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Symphony hall, Monday, Sept. 28, at 10 a. m. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Symphony hall, Tuesday, Sept. 29, at 10 a. m. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction, at Symphony hall, on Thursday, Oct. 1, at 10 a. m. The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on Friday, Oct. 2, at 10 a. m. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and not more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

Admission, first come, first served, to the second balcony on Friday afternoons only, at 25 cents, will be given according to the plan adopted two years ago, and which has given entire satisfaction.

The position of master of the Boston Symphony orchestra, vacated by Franz Kneisel, has been filled by the engagement of Fernandez Arbos, a young violinist of Spanish birth, who has for some years been teacher at the Royal College of Music in London.

Melba will arrive in America about Oct. 10. Her tour will begin in Montreal Oct. 13, and she will be heard in Boston and New York with the Boston Symphony orchestra. In all probability she will be the first soloist with that organization.

SATURDAY EVENING GAZETTE,

BOSTON, SEPTEMBER 26, 1903.

——Mr. Fernandez Arbos, concert master and first violinist, and Rudolph Krasselt, first violoncello, are fresh and notable additions to the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the coming season. Among the soloists will be Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mr. Gilibert, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Mme. Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Busoni, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. George Proctor, Mr. T. Adamowski. The auction sale at Symphony Hall at 10 A. M., on Monday next, is sure to be largely attended. On Monday and Tuesday the season tickets for the twenty-four Friday afternoon rehearsals will be disposed of, and on Thursday and Friday, Oct. 1 and 2, the tickets for the twenty-four Saturday evening concerts will be sold.

SUNDAY HERALD.

SUNDAY, SEPT. 27, 1903.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Tomorrow morning, at Symphony Hall, at 10 o'clock, will begin the series of auction sales of season tickets for the concerts by the most unique musical organization in the world, the Boston Symphony orchestra. A symphony concert either on Friday afternoon or Saturday evening is a week-end feast too satisfying to be missed, and no more convincing testimony to the ennobling influence of good music can be found than the two enormous audiences of Boston's best people. Each week a new standard seems to obtain only to the repeated again into one splendid ensemble, and the seasons come and go with always an unbroken record of finished and artistic performances. Conductor Gericke returned from Europe last week. He begins his 11th year as conductor, and during the winter will pass the 1000 mark in the number of concerts by this famous organization under his direction, truly a remarkable record and perhaps unsurpassed elsewhere. The list of soloists is sufficiently strong to warrant repetition, and includes Melba, Gadski, Schumann-Heink, Gilibert, Aus Der Ohe, Hopekirk, Maud MacCarthy, Olive Mead, Busoni, Harold Bauer, Rafael Joseffy, George Proctor, Fernandez Arbos, T. Adamowski, Rudolph Krasselt and others.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold Monday, the $7.50 seats Tuesday. The $12 seats for the Saturday concerts will be sold on Thursday, the $7.50 seats on Friday.

The opening of the Symphony season is at hand, with the auctioneer for soloist.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, SEPT 27, 1903.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Tomorrow morning at Symphony hall, at 10 o'clock, will begin the auction sales of season tickets for the concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra. To Bostonians these sales are familiar after 21 years' annual repetition, but in no other city in existence can they be duplicated. Strangers listen with incredulity when they hear the story of every seat in the house sold for the season, and very largely to the same people year after year. A Symphony concert either on Friday afternoon or Saturday evening is a week-end feast too satisfying to be missed, and no more convincing testimony to the ennobling influence of good music can be found than the two enormous audiences of Boston's best people.

Conductor Wilhelm Gericke returned from Europe last week with a series of admirable programs already prepared for the entire season. He begins his 11th year as conductor, and during the winter will pass the 1000 mark in the number of concerts by this famous organization under his direction; a remarkable record and perhaps unsurpassed elsewhere. The usual monthly trips to New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Baltimore, 10 concerts at Harvard university, three concerts in Hartford, one each in Springfield, New Haven and Troy, and two concerts in Providence, guaranteed by public-spirited residents, with Pres Faunce of Brown university as the leader, complete the season.

The list of soloists includes Mme Melba, Mme Gadski, Mme Schumann-Heink, Mr Gilibert, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Mme Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr Busoni, Mr Harold Bauer, Mr Rafael Joseffy, Mr George Proctor, Mr M. Fernandez Arbos, Mr T. Adamowski, Mr Rudolph Krasselt and others.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold Monday, the $7.50 seats Tuesday. The $12 seats for the Saturday concerts will be sold Thursday, the $7.50 seats Friday.

——There will be the usual excitement at Symphony hall tomorrow when the sale of tickets for the reheasals of the Boston symphony orchestra will begin. The first rehearsal will be on the afternoon of Oct 16, and the concert will follow the next evening. With these concerts the Boston musical season will be fully launched, as everything for some years dated from this event. With such soloists as Melba, Gadski, Schumann-Heink and others of note, and the unrivalled musical organization which is thought to be second to none in the world, the musical public of Boston will have a series of concerts of the highest type of excellence.

BOSTON SUNDAY JOURNAL-

-SEPTEMBER 27, 1903.

Conductor Wilhelm Gericke has returned from Europe with many admirable programs already prepared for the Symphony season. He begins his eleventh year as conductor, and during the winter will pass the one thousand mark in the number of concerts by this organization under his direction, truly a remarkable record, and perhaps unsurpassed elsewhere. The usual monthly trips to New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Baltimore, ten concerts at Harvard University, three concerts in Hartford, one each in Springfield, New Haven and Troy, and two concerts in Providence, guaranteed by public spirited residents, with President Faunce of Brown University as the leader, complete the season.

Tomorrow morning, at Symphony Hall, at 10 o'clock, the $12 seats for the twenty-four Friday afternoon public rehearsals by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be offered for sale at auction, and if the history of the past three seasons repeats itself every seat offered will be sold, not only the $12 seats, but the $7.50 seats, which go on sale on Tuesday, and also the seats for the twenty-four Saturday evening concerts, which are sold on Thursday and Friday. The list of soloists is unusually strong, as has been already stated by The Journal, and will much enhance the value of the orchestral programs.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST.

SEPTEMBER 27, 1903

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Tomorrow morning at Symphony Hall at 10 o'clock, there will begin a most remarkable series of auction sales of season tickets for the concerts by the most unique musical organization in the world, the Boston Symphony Orchestra. To Bostonians these sales are most familiar after 20 years of annual repetition, but in no other city in existence can they be duplicated. Strangers listen with incredulity growing to wonder when they hear the story of every seat in the house sold for the season and very largely to the same people year after year. A Symphony concert either on Friday afternoon or Saturday evening is a week-end feast too satisfying to be missed, and no more convincing testimony to the ennobling influence of good music can be found than the two enormous audiences of Boston's best people. Each week a new standard seems to obtain only to be repeated again into one splendid ensemble, and the seasons come and go with always an unbroken record of finished and artistic performances.

Conductor Wilhelm Gericke returned from Europe last week with a series of most admirable programmes already prepared for the entire season. He begins his 11th year as conductor, and during the winter will pass the 1000 mark in the number of concerts by this famous organization under his direction, truly a remarkable record and perhaps unsurpassed elsewhere. The usual monthly trips to New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Baltimore, 10 concerts at Harvard University, three concerts in Hartford, one each in Springfield, New Haven and Troy, and two concerts in Providence, guaranteed by public-spirited residents, with President Faunce of Brown University as the leader, complete the season.

The list of soloists is sufficiently strong to warrant repetition, and includes Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mr. Gilbert, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Mme. Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. Busoni, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. George Proctor, Mr. M. Fernandez Arbos, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Rudolph Krasselt and others.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold Monday, the $7.50 seats Tuesday. The $12 seats for the Saturday concerts will be sold on Thursday, the $7.50 seats on Friday.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CXIV., NO. 90.

MONDAY, SEPT. 28, 1903.

SYMPHONY TICKETS.

The auction sale of $12 season tickets for the series of 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals by the Boston Symphony orchestra will commence at 10 o'clock this morning in Symphony Hall. The series of programmes for this season's concerts will be of even more than usual interest. The strong array of soloists announced should add much to the interest of the coming concerts. There is also much interest being manifested regarding the new men of the orchestra who will be heard in this country for the first time in the important positions of concert master (first violin) and leading violoncello. For a number of seasons past every seat has been sold at auction, and for those who desire to attend these concerts it will be necessary to secure their tickets during the present sale.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER,

MONDAY MORNING,

SEPTEMBER 28, 1903.

SYMPHONY TICKETS.

The auction sale of $12 season tickets for the series of 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will commence at 10 a.m. today in Symphony hall. The series of programmes for this season's concerts will be of even more than usual interest. The strong array of soloists announced should add much to the success of the coming concerts. There is also much interest being manifested regarding the new men of the orchestra, who will be heard in this country for the first time, in the important positions of concert master and leading violoncello. For a number of seasons past every seat has been sold at auction, and for those who desire to attend these concerts it will be necessary to secure their tickets during the present sale.

THE SPRINGFIELD SUNDAY REPUBLICAN:

SEPTEMBER 27, 1903.

OF MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

ART IN PRACTICE AND THEORY.

EVENTS OF OPENING SEASON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Of the arrangements for the coming season of the Boston symphony orchestra, the Boston Transcript says:—

Wilhelm Gericke will again be welcomed as the conductor for the 11th season. As a matter of interest to the many patrons who regularly attended the concerts from the beginning, Mr Henschel conducted for the first three years, Mr Gericke for the next five years, then Mr Nikisch for four years, Mr Paur following with five years, and last season was the fifth year of Mr Gericke's second regime. The list of soloists is, as usual, a notable one, and includes Mme Melba, Mme Gadski, Mme Schumann-Heink, Mr Gilibert, Miss Aus der Ohe, Mme Hopekirk, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Miss Olive Mead, Mr Busoni, Harold Bauer, Rafael Joseffy, George Proctor, Fernandez Arbos, the new first violin and concert master; T. Adamowski, Rudolph Krassait, the new first violoncello, and others. Mme Melba returns after an absence of two years, and four seasons have passed since Mme Gadski appeared with the orchestra in Boston. Mme Schumann-Heink has just secured her release by Kaiser Wilhelm from the Royal opera company in Berlin, which enables her to fill her concert engagements in this country. Mr Gilibert will be most pleasantly remembered from last season, as will also Miss Maud MacCarthy and Miss Olive Mead, who made such a favorable impression two seasons ago. Mr Busoni returns to America after an absence of nine years, during which time he has made a splendid reputation in Europe. The recent triumphs of Harold Bauer afford the best possible reason for his re-engagement. Mr Joseffy has a host of friends and admirers who will always welcome his appearances and who regret that he has not favored Boston for five years. Mr Proctor's rapid advancement in his profession lends an interest and attractiveness to all his performances, and Mr Adamowski is an artist too well established with symphony patrons to need extensive exploiting. Of the newcomers in the ranks of the orchestra, Mr Fernandez Arboz, the first violin and concert master, and Rudolph Krassait, the first violoncello, notice will be given during the coming weeks.

There will be the usual two series of 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals and 24 Saturday evening concerts. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Symphony hall, Monday, September 28, at 10 a. m. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold by auction, at Symphony hall, Tuesday, September 29, at 10 a. m. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold by auction, at Symphony hall, on Thursday, October 1, at 10 a. m. The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place on Friday, October 2, at 10 a. m. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice, and not more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold. Tickets will be delivered in the hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold. Admission, first come, first served, to the second balcony on Friday afternoons only, at 25 cents, will be given, according to the plan adopted two years ago and which has met with universal satisfaction.

[14]

Boston Daily Globe.
TUESDAY, SEPT 29, 1903.

SYMPHONY SALE.

Drop in the Prices From Last Year's Rates.

Seats for the Friday Afternoon Rehearsals at Auction Today.

About Half as Much Realized as for the 1902 Concerts.

Whatever may be the cause, and the management seems unwilling to discuss the subject, seats for Friday afternoon rehearsals of the Boston Symphony orchestra so far in the public sale have brought only about half the prices received for them last year unde rsimilar conditions.

When the public auction of the seats was resumed this morning at 10 in Symphony hall there was about the same sized attendance as yesterday, and the assembly was constantly changing as those present managed to secure seats and left the hall to make room for those who had just arrived with the intention of making purchases. This morning the bidding was more among individuals, although the ticket agents were present and secured a number of desirable locations.

The sale opened with the seats on the rear quarter of the floor, beginning at KK, and the rear half of the first balcony was also auctioned. Last season when these seats were sold three of them in row KK were disposed of at premiums ot $22.50, $21.50 and $20, while this morning the highest premium obtained was $18.50 for two end seats, while some of this row sold for premiums of $12 and $12.50. In the next row the prices dropped to $16.50 as the highest premium, and many seats in that row went for $8, $9 and $9.50. The average premiums paid for this row last season was from $15 to $17. Seat 13 in this row sold at a premium of $13, and some merriment was caused as to what may happen to the purchaser when on Jan 29th the 13th rehearsal takes place.

Just $13 wa sthe highest premium paid in the next row, and that was for an end seat, while the lowest in the same row was $7.50, and the average rate was about $9.50. In row NN the highest premium was $9, most of the seats selling for $7.50. Last season row OO sold almost entirely at a premium of $13 each, while this morning $8.50 was the best obtained, and many seats went as low as $5 and $6, while two were purchased at premiums of $4.50.

Row PP is that in which the pillars supporting the first balcony come, and the best secured for a seat in this row was $5.50, while one seat sold for $3.50, and most of them went at advances of $4.50 and $5.

The next three rows are more or less blocked by the pillars, but last year $8 and $10 premiums were paid for seats here, while this morning $4.50 was the high mark and quite a large number sold at premiums of $2.50. In row RR the two center aisle end seats brought $4 each premium, two for $2 each, and others at $2.50 and $3. The 12 seats in row SS realized $2 premium each with the exception of three which went at $2.50.

Prices jumped again when the rear half of the first balcony was offered, and in row E, the first placed on sale, the highest premium obtained was $14 for two seats on the right end of the center tier. One group of four seats went for premiums of $4 each, while $5, $6 and $8 were the prevailing rates. Last year practically $19 each was offered on this row.

One seat in the next row sold at $12.50, but the average premium on the remainder was about $7. Just $5.50 was the average for the next row, and a group of three sold at $6.50, the best price secured. On the last row—H—the best premium was $4 and the majority sold for $3, and the 12 end seats in the corners, at the extreme rear of the balcony, sold at about the same rates.

THE PHILADELPHIA RECORD,
SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 27, 1903.

The New Concert-Meister of the Boston Symphony.

The change in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which brings from Europe a new concert-meister and first violin and a new first violoncello, has aroused great interest in musical circles. It is a notable illustration of the stability of this organization that the newcomer, Fernandez Arbos, is only the third concert-meister in its twenty-two years' existence.

Senor Arbos was born at Madrid on Christmas day, 1863. His father was a military bandmaster, and the young Fernandez' musical tastes were thus quickly appreciated and cultivated. After a course at the Madrid Conservatoire Senor Arbos became a pupil of Vieuxtemps. Subsequently three years were spent under Joachim at Berlin, and Senor Arbos eventually became not merely a violinist of wide attainment but a sound and highly cultured musician in all branches of the art. He has been leader of the Berlin Philharmonic Society's Orchestra, professor of violin at both the Hamburg and Madrid conservatories, chief professor of the violin at the Royal College of Music (London) and a very successful violin soloist.

Rudolphe Kresselt, the new 'cellist, will make his American debut at the second concert of the season. He comes of a distinguished musical family and has been first 'cellist with the Berlin Philharmonic Society and at the Vienna Opera House.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CXIV., NO. 91.
TUESDAY, SEPT. 29, 1903.

GOOD MUSIC TO BE HEARD AT MODERATE PRICES.

Symphony Lovers and Students Get Agreeable Bargains at Sale of Symphony Seats.

Symphonies slumped again today in the market. A persistent raid, driven by the amalgamated lovers of music who sit in the second best seats at the Boston Symphony orchestra Friday afternoon rehearsals knocked the props from under the traditions of what Symphony reserved seats are worth. Weaker prices were bid yesterday by the agents of the society folk who picked out the seats on the first floor, so the music students and symphony lovers followed suit today when the $7.50 seats were offered. These seats are the last eight rows on the first floor and the back half of the first balcony centre.

As a result of the auction, the music students of Boston are especially delighted. No complaint can be made this year that the best music cannot be heard at prices most moderate.

Seats in the rear of the hall on the first floor sold this morning as low as $2 and $2.50 premium, which, added to the 7.50 face value of the tickets, makes it possible to hear 24 Boston Symphony rehearsals for $10, or at about 42 cents a concert. The lowest premiums on these seats last year were $15 and $16.

The bidding this morning started for seats in row KK on the first floor and ranged from $19 to $12, the entire row going rapidly at an average of $15 premium. Most of the sales were single seats. This indicated the nature of the buyers, most of them being music teachers or students buying for themselves. The next row brought from $16.50 to $9 premium on each seat. As the chart was rapidly marked off the prices declined for the three last rows, the average price being about $4 premium. Seats in the extreme ends of the hall sold for $2.50 and $2 premium.

The balcony centre seats beginning with the fourth row back were sold rapidly, the buying being largely in sets of four seats, and went at an average of $6.50. The highest premium was $12.50, the lowest $3. The lowest for these seats last year was $15 premium.

That superstition has no terrors for earnest music students was evidenced when a young lady bought seat 13 in row LL for $13 premium. The superstitious number is also brought into the combination by the fact that the 13th concert comes Jan. 29, which is a Friday.

The management of the Symphony concerts considered the sale of seats very satisfactory.

The next sale will be Thursday at 10 A. M., when the $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be auctioned.

THE PHILADELPHIA PRESS,
SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 27, 1903.

RUDOLPH KRASSELT, FIRST VIOLONCELLO, IN BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The change in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which brings from Europe a new concertmaster and first violin, and a new first violoncello, has most naturally aroused great interest in musical circles throughout the country. It is a notable illustration of the stability of this organization that the newcomer, Mr. Arbos, is only the third concertmaster in its twenty-two years existence.

Senor Fernandez Arbos is cosmopolitan. Born on Christmas day, 1863, at Madrid, where his father was a military bandmaster, he early showed talent for music. His childhood was passed in the province of Galicia, but on the breaking out of the war, the Arbos family moved to Madrid, a favorable circumstance for the young musician, who was thus able to continue his musical studies at the Madrid Conservatoire. His professor of the violin there was Jesus Monasterio. Monasterio proved the arbiter of young Arbos' destinies, for the court musician introduced his promising pupil to the Princess Isabel, aunt of the reigning King, and she took a lively interest in the young musician, making him an allowance so that he could continue his studies abroad.

For some four years Vieuxtemps had settled down as principal professor of the violin at the Brussels Conservatoire, and to Brussels went young Arbos, accompanied by his mother. At that time Vieuxtemps had ceased to play in public, but he still taught, and the young Spanish violinist became his pupil, studying composition and theory under Gevaert, the director of the conservatoire. At 15 Arbos gained the Prix d'Honneur, and was already a sound all-round musician, as well as a brilliant violinist.

While living at Brussels the young musician heard Joachim and was much struck by a style of playing almost diametrically opposed to the Vieuxtemps school. This admiration for Joachim had far-reaching results on the artistic development and career of Fernandez Arbos. So much was he impressed by the great violinist's playing that he went to Berlin and studied with Joachim for three years. He became leader of the Berlin Philharmonic Society's orchestra and played as soloist at one of the concerts. Altogether five years were spent in Germany, during which period Senor Arbos played as soloist in all the principal towns and then toured through France, Holland, Belgium, Spain, Portugal, and as far afield as Poland.

For a time he settled down as professor of the violin at the Hamburg Conservatoire, but at the express desire of the Queen of Spain he accepted the same post at the Madrid Conservatoire, and soon afterward founded a Chamber of Music Society there, by means of which Madrid amateurs were made acquainted with all the modern works of chamber music hitherto unknown to them.

In 1890 Senor Arbos practically settled in London.

He was engaged to play at the "Pops" with Joachim, and he then toured through the provinces with Edward Lloyd, Santley and other artists, and for many years he has appeared as soloist and leader of a quartet in London concert rooms. Senor Arbos has composed a good deal of chamber music as well as comic opera.

* * *

Rudolphe Krasselt, the new 'cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his first appearance in America at the second concert of the organization. His year of compulsory military service in the German army is just expiring and he will not be free in time to play at the first concert. Mr. Krasselt is one of a family distinguished for musical ability. His father is concertmaster of the orchestra at Baden Baden, and one of his brothers is concertmaster at Weimer. A few years ago Rudolphe Krasselt was playing with Hekking at the first desk of the Berlin Philharmonic Society under Nikisch. On Hekking's retirement he became first 'cellist of that organization.

M. FERNANDEZ ARBOS, FIRST VIOLIN AND CONCERT MASTER OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Boston Daily Globe.
THURSDAY, OCT 1, 1903.

The auction sale of season tickets of the Boston symphony orchestra will be continued at Symphony hall this morning, when the $12 tickets for the Saturday evening concerts will be offered. Patrons who intend purchasing tickets should attend the sale, as there will be no opportunity of securing season tickets after the sale is over. The $7.50 season tickets for the concerts will be sold in the same manner on Friday.

BOSTON JOURNAL—THURSDAY,
OCTOBER 1, 1903.

The auction sale of season tickets of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be continued at Symphony Hall this morning, when the $12 tickets for the Saturday evening concerts will be offered. Patrons who intend purchasing tickets should attend the sale, as there will be no opportunity of securing season tickets after the sale is over. All seats are plainly shown on a large diagram, and are marked off as sold. The $7.50 season tickets for the concerts will be sold in the same manner on Friday.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CXIV., NO. 93.
THURSDAY, OCT. 1, 1903.

Concertmaster Arbos Here for Symphony Orchestra

Arrives on the Ivernia with Mr. E. Ferir, Fir Viola, Both of Whom Will Take Part in String Quartet.

Mr. F. Arbos was a passenger of the Cunarder Ivernia, arriving yesterday afternoon, and is at the Hotel Brunswick. Mr. Arbos comes to take up his duties as concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and as principal of the string quartet, which will bear his na and will give a series of concerts h this winter. Mr Arbos was accom nied by Mr E. Ferir, who has been e gaged as one of the first violas of orchestra and a member of the qua

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The auction sale of season tickets of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be continued at Symphony Hall this morning, when the $12 tickets for the Saturday evening concerts will be offered. Patrons who intend purchasing tickets should attend the sale, as there will be no opportunity of securing season tickets after the sale is over. All seats are plainly shown on a large diagram, and are marked off as sold. The $7.50 season tickets for the concerts will be sold in the same manner on Friday.

BOSTON POST,
THURSDAY,
OCTOBER 1, 1903

The auction sale of season tickets of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be continued at Symphony Hall this morning, when the $12 tickets for the Saturday evening concerts will be offered. Patrons who intend purchasing tickets should attend the sale, as there will be no opportunity of securing season tickets after the sale is over. The $7.50 season tickets for the concerts will be sold in the same manner on Friday.

[15]

BOSTON JOURNAL
—THURSDAY,
OCTOBER 1, 1903.

SYMPHONY TICKETS SELL TODAY AT DOLLAR EACH

Music Loving Public Will Have Chance at Low Prices.

While nearly all of the best seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals of the Symphony concerts have been sold, some as high as $7.7, there are many of the dollar seats to be sold today at auction. This will give those of the music-loving public that cannot afford to pay fancy prices a chance to secure seats at a reasonable price.

Though there will be many ticket brokers present, the management is determined that the public shall have a fair show in obtaining tickets. It is expected that the rush for dollar seats will be great. The management is pleased with the large number of tickets sold the past few days.

BOSTON GLOBE
—THURSDAY.
OCTOBER 1. 1903.

Two others were Mr F. Abos, the newly engaged concertmeister of the Boston symphony orchestra, and Mr E. Ferir, who has been engaged as one of the first violas of the orchestra and as a member of the string quartet, of which Mr Abos will be the principal. They took part in the concert given on the way over for the benefit of the seamen's fund.

BOSTON JOURNAL
—THURSDAY,
OCTOBER 1, 1903.

NEW SYMPHONY MEMBERS ARRIVE ON THE IVERNIA

M. Arbos and M. Ferir Play in Concerts on Vessel.

PASSENGER LIST WAS 2138

Body of Dr. J. P. Oliver of Boston, Who Died in Paris, Is Brought to His Relatives.

With a total of 2138 passengers on board, the Cunard steamer Ivernia arrived at her East Boston dock yesterday afternoon, after an eight-day passage from Liverpool. Not for several months has such a large number been landed at this port—the 1755 in the steerage being almost a record for the ship. Of the remaining passengers 155 were in the first-class and 228 second.

Among those in the saloon were Enrique Arbos and Emil Ferir, two new members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The former comes direct from Spain, where he has achieved a high reputation as a violinist and will lead the first violins. Ferir will play the viola.

During the voyage the usual concert was held in aid of the seamen's charity, at which the violinists gave their services. Their performance is spoken of by those who heard it as "perfection itself." M. Arbos and M. Ferir were met at the dock by a party of several musicians and after the examination of their baggage had been completed, were driven away at once.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER,
THURSDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 1,

The auction sale of season tickets of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was continued at Symphony Hall this morning, when the $12 tickets for the Saturday evening concerts were offered. The $7.50 season tickets for the concerts will be sold on Friday.

Boston Transcript
THURSDAY, OCTOBER 1, 1903

BETTER SYMPHONY PREMIUMS

Seats for Saturday Evening Concerts Sold by Auction at Good Steady Rates—Two Premiums of Fifty Dollars

A rally in Symphony prices took place today, when the twelve-dollar seats for the Saturday evening concerts were sold by auction at the hall. After comparatively low rates at the rehearsal sales on Monday and Tuesday, the premiums paid this morning were considerably above last year's averages. The attendance from the opening of the sale at ten o'clock was large, and bidding never lagged; at times, in fact, it was extremely lively. Prices started well, struck a satisfactory level early in the sale, and kept to it with the usual variations all morning. This level, though above that of last year, was of course lower than that of the sale on Monday, because the rehearsals have in the past few years gone far ahead of the regular concerts in point of popularity. The growing interest in music, especially among women, who as a rule are more highly educated in that subject than men, accounts for this reversal of conditions in the old Music Hall. The demand for seats which ladies can occupy unattended is bound to be the greatest.

Of course it is the general run of seats which tells the story in a sale of this kind, but it is a suggestive fact that during the morning no less that eight premiums (representing the purchase of twice or three times that number of seats) were above the high-water mark of last year. The high-water mark then was $34; this year it touched $50 on two different bids. The other high bids were for $39, $41 and $42. Nearly all of them were made by the brokers, who seemed to be loaded even heavier with commissions than on Monday. Twice or three times they were caught in traps by which they were forced very unwillingly up to high figures. Mr. Herrick, having bought nearly all of row N, at premiums ranging from $17 to $19 and in blocks of four, found himself finally within one seat of the middle aisle. Somebody not far behind him wanted that aisle seat, but the broker needed it to protect his latest purchase. A duel between the two finally gave the single place to Mr. Herrick for $42. In the very next row Mr. Connelly found himself in a like situation, and the same man who had fought Mr. Herrick started the bidding for the aisle seat at the unusual figure of $25. The whole row of brokers looked around at him with expressions of astonishment. Mr. Connelly was bound to have his seat, however, and the other dropped out at $39.

In this part of the house—the most desirable section—the brokers took large blocks of seats at premiums which held very near $20 each, and these rates, were, on the whole, considerably higher than last year's. The lowest premium of the morning, paid in Row B, was four dollars, while four seats were knocked down last year, by one of those curious auction chances, for one dollar. In K and back of K the prices began to lower a little, but held stiff and steady nevertheless.

The bulk of the floor and second balcony is sold today, and tomorrow, at the final sale, the $7.50 seats for the Saturday concerts, will be put under the hammer. These may number many more than at the rehearsal sale Tuesday for the whole second balcony, used for "rush seats" in the afternoon, is reserved in the evening.

SYMPHONY TICKET SALE.

The auction sale of season tickets of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be continued at Symphony Hall this morning, when the $12 tickets for the Saturday evening concerts will be offered. The $7.50 season tickets for the concerts will be sold in the same manner on Friday.

BOSTON POST,
FRIDAY,
OCTOBER 2, 1903

SYMPHONY TICKET AUCTION CLOSES TODAY

The closing sale of season tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's performances will be held at Symphony Hall today, when the 917 $7.50 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be offered at auction.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
FRIDAY
OCTOBER 2, 1903.

TODAY'S AUCTION OF SYMPHONY TICKETS.

The closing sale of season tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's performances will be held at Symphony Hall today when the $7.50 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be offered at auction. These low priced seats afford opportunities for many music lovers to hear at a very reasonable outlay concerts of extraordinary attractiveness at which many of the world's great singers and instrumentalists will appear. There are 917 tickets to be sold today.

[16]

BOSTON JOURNAL
—FRIDAY, OCTOBER 2, 1903.

SYMPHONY SEAT AT PREMIUM OF $61

Bidding at Yesterday's Sale Lively and Average Good.

Sixty-one dollars was the highest premium paid yesterday when the $12 concert seats were put on sale. The prize seat was S 17. Seats on either side brought half as much. The next highest figure was $51, paid for an aisle seat in the center of the hall. Several seats in the immediate vicinity brought over $40 and two over $45.

The strangest bid was $44 for seats in U 24 and 25, while seat 28 of the same row brought only $9. The lowest bid was $2, which was paid for several seats in J J, the last $12 row on the floor. The highest balcony bid was $38, for seats A 20 and 21. The attendance was good and the prices for the day averaged a bit better than usual.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CXIV., NO. 94.

FRIDAY, OCT. 2, 1903.

SYMPHONY STOCK GOES UP.

Yesterday's Sales About the Average---Closing Sale of Tickets Will Be Held Today.

Auction sale bids for $12 seats to the Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra took a brace yesterday morning after low prices for rehearsal seats, and brought the prices up to an average of what they were last year for the sale. The rehearsal auctions led to an impression that the bottom had fallen from the Symphony market, but yesterday morning interesting competitions for many end seats kept the prices at a good average.

The highest premiums yesterday were $50 each for seats 18 and 19 in row J; $50 for end seat 17, row P, and $47 each for 15 and 16 in the same row. Bids over $20 for aisle seats were frequent. Five dollars was a starter on most bids, and only rarely did seats sell lower.

Last year the highest bid on $12 seats at the evening concerts was $34 for seats 18 and 19 in row K. These seats sold this year for $24 and $39.

In the sale were many paradoxes of bidding, inside seats in row I bringing $20 premium, when aisle seats in the same row sold for $10. A $50 premium bid was sandwiched between $22 and $17 sales. After a $19 sale the next two seats sold at $42 premium.

Many of the peculiar variations of price for seats presumably equally advantageous came from interesting manipulations by the bidders. Most of the purchasers were regular ticket dealers, buying for clients. Unlike many of the scattering bidders, they could not take seats at random wherever the opportunity for a low bid occurred, but had to purchase seats already designated by their clients. These brokers very soon became identified with a bear movement to keep the bids on their seats as low as possible. Several bidders, however, became conspicuous in a bull charge upon the bears, and put many of the bids up, wherever the dealers seemed especially to want certain seats.

Very often when a dealer got the choice of a pair of end seats at a high bid he would take but one, hoping to get the other at a much lower figure. At times the scheme was successful, and this accounts for the great difference in the premiums of contiguous seats. At other times, however, a gentleman who was bidding apparently to inject a little ginger in the sales would catch a dealer and chase him into the high figures to keep two seats together.

After such flurries the squad of dealers seated together in a front row turned around to this gentleman, and with thundercus expressions would play a chorus of facial symphonies that were highly Wagnerian.

An average of the premiums for the choice $12 seats at the Saturday evening concerts is not much below $20.

The closing sale of season tickets for the Boston Symphony orchestra's performances will be held at Symphony Hall today, when the $7.50 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be offered at auction. These low priced seats afford opportunities for many music lovers to hear at a very reasonable outlay concerts of extraordinary attractiveness at which many of the world's great singers and instrumentalists will appear. There are 917 tickets to be sold today

Boston Daily Globe.
FRIDAY, OCT 2, 1903.

PRICES ARE BETTER.

Sale of $12 Seats for Saturday Evening Symphony Concerts Brings In Higher Premiums.

When the public sale of the $12 seats for the regular Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra had been more than half concluded yesterday morning it was found that better prices had been obtained than at the other sales this fall. The average of the premiums obtained for these seats yesterday was above that of last year. Last season the highest premium obtained was $34 for seats 18 and 19 in row K. Yesterday at different times two single seats sold for premiums of $50, a number for premiums over $40, and a great many at $30 and over.

Bids came briskly after the sale was well started, and the large gathering made competition for desirable end seats so brisk that the regular ticket agents who were after them showed signs of grave surprise at the rates they were compelled to pay to obtain the seats they most desired.

In row J came the surprise of the morning, when the dealers were making things lively in bidding for seats 18 and 19, the two end seats in the center. When they had run the price up pretty well an outsider in the rear of the house began to bid, and the two seats were knocked down to him at a premium of $50 each. All the ticket dealers "rubbered" to see the man to whom the seats had gone, but he was unknown to them.

Row P was also a very high-priced tier of seats, Mr Wadsworth securing a single center end seat at a premium of $50, and $47 each being paid for two others in the same row.

Today the $7.50 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be auctioned.

Boston Transcript
FRIDAY, OCTOBER 2, 1903

BETTER SYMPHONY PREMIUMS

Seats for Saturday Evening Concerts Sold by Auction at Good Steady Rates—Two Premiums of Fifty Dollars

A rally in Symphony prices took place yesterday, when the $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts were sold by auction at the hall. After comparatively low rates at the rehearsal sales on Monday and Tuesday, the premiums paid yesterday morning were considerably above last year's averages. The attendance from the opening of the sale at ten o'clock was large, and bidding never lagged; at times, in fact, it was extremely lively. Prices started well, struck a satisfactory level early in the sale, and kept to it with the usual variations all morning. This level, though above that of last year, was of course lower than that of the sale on Monday, because the rehearsals have in the past few years gone far ahead of the regular concerts in point of popularity. The growing interest in music, especially among women, who as a rule are more highly educated in that subject than men, accounts for this reversal of conditions in the old Music Hall. The demand for seats which ladies can occupy unattended is bound to be the greatest.

Of course it is the general run of seats which tells the story in a sale of this kind, but it is a suggestive fact that during the morning no less that eight premiums (representing the purchase of twice or three times that number of seats) were above the high-water mark of last year. The high-water mark then was $34; this year it touched $50 on two different bids. The other high bids were for $39, $41 and $42. Nearly all of them were made by the brokers, who seemed to be loaded even heavier with commissions than on Monday. Twice or three times they were caught in traps by which they were forced very unwillingly up to high figures. Mr. Herrick, having bought nearly all of row N, at premiums ranging from $17 to $19 and in blocks of four, found himself finally within one seat of the middle aisle. Somebody not far behind him wanted that aisle seat, but the broker needed it to protect his latest purchase. A duel between the two finally gave the single place to Mr. Herrick for $42. In the very next row Mr. Connelly found himself in a like situation, and the same man who had fought Mr. Herrick started the bidding for the aisle seat at the unusual figure of $25. The whole row of brokers looked around at him with expressions of astonishment. Mr. Connelly was bound to have his seat, however, and the other dropped out at $39.

In this part of the house—the most desirable section—the brokers took large blocks of seats at premiums which held very near $20 each, and these rates, were, on the whole, considerably higher than last year's. The lowest premium of the morning, paid in Row B, was four dollars, while four seats were knocked down last year, by one of those curious auction chances, for one dollar. In K and back of K the prices began to lower a little, but held stiff and steady nevertheless.

The bulk of the floor and second balcony was sold yesterday and today at the final sale, the $7.50 seats for the Saturday concerts, will be put under the hammer. These may number many more than at the rehearsal sale Tuesday for the whole second balcony, used for "rush seats" in the afternoon, is reserved in the evening.

BALTIMORE SUNDAY
HERALD, OCTOBER 4, 1903.

MUSIC HALL.

Boston
Symphony
Orchestra.

(94 Performers.)
MR. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.
FIVE CONCERTS:
TUESDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 3.
TUESDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 8.
TUESDAY EVENING, JANUARY 12.
TUESDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 16.
TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 15.
SOLO ARTISTS:

MME. MELBA
(Her only appearance in Baltimore this season),
MME. GADSKI,
MME. SCHUMANN-HEINK,
MR. BUSONI,
MISS MEAD.

Season Tickets, with Reserved Seats for the Series of Five Concerts, $7.00 and $5.00, according to location.
The sale of tickets will open MONDAY MORNING, October 12, at Albaugh's (in Sanders & Stayman's).
Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each Concert to purchasers of season tickets.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Mgr. C. A. ELLIS, Mgr.

THERE is to be a new man in the Kneisel chair.

According to information received from the Hub, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when next it appears here, is to have a new concertmeister. This individual is Senor Fernandez Arbos.

There is also to be a new first 'cello in the person of Rudolphe Krasselt.

The change in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which brings from Europe a new concert master and first violin, and a new first violincello, has most naturally aroused great interest in musical circles throughout the country. It is a most notable illustration of the stability of this organization that the newcomer, Senor Arbos, is only the third concert master in its twenty-two years of existence. The following sketch of Mr. Arbos is written by Mr. E. A. Baughan, a London journalist of note:

"According to the popular idea the Spanish temperament is compact of passion. It is indeed quite commonplace of descriptive critics when dealing with Spanish musicians to refer to the molten 'fire' which glows through their performance with a peculiar warmth. English writers, such as Byron and Charles Kingsley, have helped to form the ready-made idea of the Spanish temperament, and to most of us the word 'Spain' conjures up visions of dark beauties with flashing eyes, and with men who are either Don Juans or bull fighters. The popular figure of a Spanish musician should be that brilliant Venezuelan, Mme. Carreno, and not Senor Sarasate or Senor Arbos. She has iridescent moods. They have the restrained and nervous subtlety of the Latin mind, with its passion for accuracy to perfection, or the aristocratic fastidiousness of an ancient and dying race.

"Senor Arbos himself is cosmopolitan. Born nearly forty years ago (to be precise, on Christmas day, 1863), at Madrid, where his father was a military bandmaster, he early showed talent for music and a predilection for the violin, which his father did his best to foster.

The childhood of the great violinist was passed in the Province of Galicia, but on the breaking out of the war the Arbos family moved to Madrid, a favorable circumstance for the young musician, who was thus able to continue his musical studies at the Madrid Conservatoire. His professor of the violin there was Jesus Monasterio, who had been a pupil of Du Beriot, and was solo violinist of the royal band, and the royal chambers musicians, and later on became a director of the conservatoire.

Monasterio proved the arbiter of young Arbos' destinies, for the court musician introduced his young pupil (when only 12 years of age he had gained first prizes in violin, harmony, theory, &c.), to the Princess Isabel, aunt of the reigning King, and she took a lively interest in the young musician, making him an allowance, so that he could continue his studies abroad, a kindness which Senor Arbos had never forgotten.

For some four years Vieuxtemps had settled down as the principal professor of the violin at the Brussels Conservatoire, and to Brussels went young Arbos, accompanied by his mother. At that time Vieuxtemps had ceased to play in public, owing to stroke of paralysis of his left side, but he still taught, and the promising young violinist became his pupil, studying composition and theory, under Gevaert, director of the conservatoire. At the age of 15, Arbos gained the Prix d'honneur, and was already a sound all-round musician, as well as a brilliant violinist.

When living at Brussels the young musician heard Joachim and was much struck by the style of playing almost diametrically opposed to the Vieuxtemps school. Joachim was then at the height of his fame, both as virtuoso and teacher, and for some ten years had been teacher of the Berlin high school for music.

This admiration for Joachim had far-reaching results of the artistic development of Fernandes Arbos. So much was he impressed with the great violinist's playing that he went to Berlin and studied with Joachim for three years. It might have been thought that Joachim, the leader of the German "classical" school would have been the last man to influence a young Spaniard, who had been taught his instrument by a man who had been a favorite pupil of De Beriot, and then by Vieuxtemps, both leaders of the brilliant Belgian school of virtuosity, but then Senor Arbos is not the only typical Spaniard of the popular imagination, and no doubt the tuition of Gevaert, a most solidly learned musician, had had its effect in forming the young violinist's mind.

The study under Joachim certainly made a deep impression on Senor Arbos. Had he finished his studies at Brussels he might have been content to be a virtuoso only; the German training grafted a depth and breadth of musicianship for racial passion of perfection of detail. And the study at Berlin also had its effect of Senor Arbos' career in a material sense. He became leader of the Berlin Philharmonic Society's orchestra and played as soloist in one of the concerts. Five years were spent in Germany, during which period Senor Arbos played as soloist in all the principal towns and then toured through France, Holland, Belgium, Spain, Portugal and as far afield as Poland.

For a time he settled down as professor of the violin in the Hamburg conservatoire, but at the express desire of the Queen of Spain he accepted the same post at the Madrid conservatoire, and soon afterward founded a chamber music society there, by means of which Madrid amateurs were made acquainted with all the modern works of chamber music hitherto unknown to them.

So sound and cultured a musician, however, could not be expected to find full scope for his talents at Madrid, and in 1890, after a successful debut at a series of concerts given by Senor Albeniz, at St. James' Hall, Senor Arbos practically settled in London.

He was engaged to play at the "Pops" with Joachim, and then toured through the provinces with Edward Lloyd, Santley and other artists, and for many years he has appeared as soloist and leader of a quartet in London concert halls. Two years ago he played Spohr's duet concerto in B minor with Dr. Joachim at the Leeds festival, one of the most important of the English musical meetings. The occasion was no doubt inspiring for Senor Arbos, and he has seldom played more finely. His work in London was by no means confined to the concert room, for he was the chief professor of violin at the Royal College of Music and a member of the board of professors, an honorary member of the Royal College of Music and an examiner of the associated board. He has made a high reputation as a teacher, and one of his pupils—Miss Maun MacCarthy—is known to American audiences. Senor Arbos has composed a good deal of chamber music as well as comic opera.

Of the man himself it should be said that, in these days of self-advertisement, it is refreshing to find a musician who is willing to let his reputation rest with his merits alone, and one who, in spite of arduous professional toil has remained an artist in his whole-hearted love for his art.

Rudolphe Krasselt, the new 'cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his first appearance in America at the second concert of the organization. His year of compulsory military service in the Germany army is just expiring, and he will not be free in time to play at the first concert.

Mr. Krasselt is one of a family distinguished for musical ability. His father is concert master of the orchestra at Baden-Baden, and one of his brothers is concert master at Weimar. A few years ago Rudolphe Krasselt was playing with Hekking at the first desk of the Berlin Philharmonic Society under Nikisch. On Hekking's retirement he became first 'cellist of that organization. His last engagement before joining the army was as first 'cellist of the Vienna Opera House.

For a young man he has played much in quartet concerts in Berlin and Vienna, and has had much success as a soloist. It is believed that he will prove a valuable acquisition to the ranks of resident musicians.

The Boston Symphony.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its nineteenth season in this city at the Academy of Music on November 2. According to the preliminary announcements of this justly celebrated musical organization the Orchestra will doubtless equal in its coming achievements its enviable record of the past.

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke will again occupy the position of conductor, and ample evidence of his fitness is afforded in his record of 10 years in this capacity, five of which were during his first term, beginning in 1884, while the coming season will be the sixth of his second regime.

The list of soloists includes Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Busoni, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. M. Fernandez Arbos, Mr. Krasselt and others. Mme. Schumann-Heink has just secured her release by Kaiser Wilhelm from the Royal Opera Company in Berlin, which enables her to fill her concert engagements in this country. Miss Aus Der Ohe's high rank as a pianist in both Europe and this country always insures great interest in her appearances. The recent triumphs of Mr. Harold Bauer afford ample reason for his re-engagement. The favorable impression made by Miss Mead two seasons ago will be pleasantly recalled, and a very cordial welcome will doubtless be extended to both the newcomers, Mr. Arbos, the new first violin and concertmaster, and Mr. Krasselt, the new first violoncello.

There will be the usual two series, the first one on Monday evenings, November 2, December 7, January 11, March 14. The February concert of the first series will be on Friday evening the 19th, owing to a conflict of dates. The second series will be on the five Wednesday evenings, as follows; November 4, December 9, January 13, February 17 and March 16.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Under the directorship of Wilhelm Gericke the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its usual two series of concerts at the Academy of Music the presnt season. The first series is Monday evenings, November2, December 7, January 11, March 14. The February concert of the first series will be on Friday evening, the 19th, owing to a conflict of dates. Thes cond series will be on the five Wednesday evenings as follows: November 4, December 9, January 13, February 17 and March 16. The public ticket sale for first series opens October 12 and for second series October 14 at the Heppe piano rooms, 1115 Chestnut street.

[17]

BALTIMORE AMERICAN, SUNDAY,
OCTOBER 4, 1903

Phila Press.

MUSIC HALL.

Boston
Symphony
Orchestra

(94 Performers.)
Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

FIVE CONCERTS.

TUESDAY EVENING, NOV. 3.
TUESDAY EVENING, DEC. 8.
TUESDAY EVENING, JAN. 12.
TUESDAY EVENING, FEB. 16.
TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 15.
At 8:15 o'Clock.

SOLO ARTISTS:

Mme. Melba,
(Her Only Appearance in Baltimore This Season),
Mme. Gadski,
Mme. Schumann-Heink,
Mr. Busoni,
Miss Mead.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7.00 and $5.00, according to location.
The sale of tickets will open Monday morning, October 12, at Albaugh's (in Sanders & Stayman's).
Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Mgr. C. A. ELLIS, Mgr.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

All musical Baltimore will be interested in the preliminary announcement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its twenty-third year and its nineteenth in this city. A second generation, if one recalls the patrons of the early days, are now enjoying these concerts, remarkable for their even excellence and high standard. And the good opinion of the musical public obtains not alone at home, but in the cities visited by the orchestra on its monthly tours.

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke will again occupy the position of conductor, and ample evidence of both his popularity and fitness is afforded in his record of 10 years in this capacity, five of which were during his first term, beginning in 1884, while the coming season will be the sixth of his second regime.

The list of soloists includes Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mr. Busoni, Miss Olive Mead and Mme. Schumann-Heink.

Mme. Melba returns after an absence of two years, and it will be her only appearance in Baltimore this season. Mme. Gadski is too great a favorite in Baltimore to need further exploiting here. Mr. Busoni returns to America after an absence of nine years, during which time he has made a splendid reputation in Europe. The success scored by Miss Mead in previous years with the orchestra will create great interest in her appearance here. Mme. Schumann-Heink has just secured her release by Kaiser Wilhelm from the Royal Opera Company, in Berlin, which enables her to fill her concert engagements in this country.

There will be the usual series of five Tuesday evenings- November 3, December 8, January 12, February 16 and March 15.

The public sale of tickets will open Monday morning, October 12, at Albaugh's ticket office, 15 North Charles street.

There will be the usual two series of Boston Symphony concerts in this city, the first one on Monday evenings, November 2, December 7, January 11 and March 14. The February concert of the first series will be on Friday evening, the 19th, owing to a conflict of dates. The second series will be on the five Wednesday evenings, as follows: November 4, December 9, January 13, February 17 and March 16.

Season ticket-holders of last season will be allowed to retain the same seats for both the first and second series, payment for the same to be made on or before Saturday, October 10, for the first series, and Monday, October 12, for the second series.

Mr. William Gericke will again be welcomed as the conductor, and the list of soloists includes Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Miss Aus der Ohe, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Busoni, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. M. Fernandez Arbos, the new first violin, and concertmaster; Mr. Krasselt, the new first violoncello, and others.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's announcements are for its twenty-third year, and its nineteenth in Philadelphia. Through all this period its high standard has been well maintained, and it has deservedly held the confidence of the musical public. The organization owes much of its excellence to William Gericke, who begins this season his eleventh year as its conductor, having served five years immediately following Mr. Henschel and five years since his return after the interval filled by Nikisch and Paur. The orchestra has a new concertmaster this year—Fernandez Arbos—and some other changes will be noticed, but the fine organization will remain unimpaired. Except in February, where a conflict of dates throws the concert of the first series over to a Friday, the usual concerts will be given on Monday evenings, November 2, December 7, January 11, February 19 (Friday), and March 11. Those of the second series will be on Wednesday evenings, November 4, December 9, January 13, February 17 and March 16. The list of soloists is headed by Madame Melba, who is making a concert tour under the management of Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, and includes Madame Gadski, Madame Schumann-Heink, Miss Aus der Ohe, Harold Bauer, Busoni, Olive Mead, violinist; Arbos and Krapel, who succeeds Mr. Schroeder as first 'cellist. The two series of concerts are alike in character, but with different programmes and soloists.

Music Hall.

Boston
Symphony
Orchestra

(94 Performers),
MR. WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

FIVE CONCERTS:
TUESDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 3,
TUESDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 8,
TUESDAY EVENING, JANUARY 12,
TUESDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 16,
TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 15,
AT 8.15 O'CLOCK.

SOLO ARTISTS:

MME. MELBA
(Her Only Appearance in Baltimore This Season),
MME. GADSKI
MME. SCHUMANN-HEINK
~~MR. VAN ROOY~~
MR. BUSONI
MISS MEAD

Season Tickets, with Reserved Seats for the Series of Five Concerts, $7.00 and $5.00, according to location.
The sale of tickets will open MONDAY MORNING, October 12, at Albaugh's (in Sanders & Stayman's).
Program books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Mgr. C. A. ELLIS, Mgr.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This season's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given on Tuesday evenings—November 3, December 8, January 12, February 16 and March 15.

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke will again occupy the position of conductor, and ample evidence of both his popularity and fitness is afforded in his record of 10 years in this capacity, five of which were during his first term, beginning in 1884, while the coming season will be the sixth of his second régime.

The list of soloists includes Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mr. Busoni, Mme. Schumann-Heink and Miss Olive Mead. Mme. Melba returns after an absence of two years, and it will be her only appearance in Baltimore this season. Mme. Gadski is too great a favorite in Baltimore to need further exploiting. Mr. Busoni returns to America after an absence of nine years, during which time he has made a splendid reputation in Europe. The success scored by Miss Mead in previous years with the orchestra will create great interest in her appearance here. Mme. Schumann-Heink has just secured her release by Kaiser Wilhelm from the Royal Opera Company, in Berlin, which enables her to fill her concert engagements in this country.

Phila. INQUIRER, SUNDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 4, 1903

ARTISTS WHO ARE TO BE HEARD WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA DURING THE SEASON OF 1903-04

MR. WILHELM GERICKE.

This group of artists, all of whom are to be heard with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city during the course of the impending season, is in the highest degree representative of all that is rarest and best in the field of musical achievement. The three vocalists and the three instrumentalists whom it comprises stand in the very forefront of their profession. Mme. Melba, now in the maturity of her unequaled powers, is easily the finest lyric soprano which this generation has produced. To a voice of incomparable beauty she has added a perfectly finished art, and her singing is recognized as the acme of delightful vocalization. Mme. Schumann-Heink is easily the greatest of dramatic contraltos, while her versatility is such that she is just as effective upon the concert platform as on the operatic stage. The same thing is true of Madam Gadski, who is not only admirable as a dramatic soprano, but whose interpretation of the German lieder is full of intelligence and charm. Adele Aus de Ohe is a pianist of extraordinary power, while Bussoni and Bauer, the other figures in the group, are well worthy to be her colleagues. Attendants at the Boston Symphony concerts have a rich treat in store.

The local program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season which is about to open has been announced. As during the past five years, the concerts of this unsurpassed organization, which has a record of twenty-two years of unbroken artistic triumph, will be given under the direction of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke. There will be the usual two series. The dates of the performances included in the first series are Monday evenings, November 2, December 7, January 11 and March 14. Owing to a conflict of dates, the February concert of the first series will take place on Friday evening, the 19th of that month. The concerts of the second series will be given on five Wednesday evenings, as follows: November 4, December 9, January 13, February 17 and March 16. The concerts of the two series will be identical in character, value and attractiveness, but they will in every instance present different programs and different soloists.

Of the latter the list includes Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Busoni, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. M. Fernandez Arbos, the new first violin and concertmaster; Mr. Kresselt, the new first violoncello, and others. Mme. Melba returns after an absence of two years; Mme. Gadski is too great a favorite in Philadelphia to need further exploiting here. Mme. Schumann-Heink has just secured her release by Kaiser Wilhelm from the Royal Opera Company in Berlin, which enables her to fill her concert engagements in this country. Miss Aus Der Ohe's high rank as a pianist, in both Europe and this country, always insures great interest in her appearances. The recent triumphs of Mr. Harold Bauer afford the best possible reason for his re-engagement. The favorable impression made by Miss Mead two seasons ago will be pleasantly recalled, and it goes without saying that a most cordial welcome will be extended to both the new comers, Mr. Arbos and Mr. Krasselt.

Season ticket holders of last season will be allowed to retain the same seats for both the first and second series, payment for the same to be made on or before Saturday, October 10, for the first series, and Monday, October 12, for the second series, by cash, money order or check, payable to Miss H. Harris, to whom all renewals of seats should be sent, at 1115 Chestnut street.

The public sale of tickets for the first series will open Monday morning, October 12, and for the second series on the following Wednesday morning, October 14, at the Heppe Piano Rooms, 1115 Chestnut street.

Program books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

Baltimore Sun
Oct 13 '03

MUSIC HALL UNDER LEASE

Messrs. Gottlieb And Knabe Secure It For Five Years.

TO GIVE OPERA AND CONCERTS

High-Class Theatrical Attractions Also Contemplated—Mr. Ulrich To Remain As Manager.

Messrs. Frederick H. Gottlieb and William Knabe have about concluded a lease of Music Hall for five years, with the privilege of renewal for five years more, and intend to book high-class opera companies and orchestras, as well as the best class of theatrical companies independent of the theatrical trust.

An agreement has already been reached with the directors of the Auditorium Company, which owns the hall, and the papers will be signed in a day or two. Bookings under the new name of Fred H. Gottlieb and William Knabe, lessees, and Bernhard Ulrich, manager, are being made and it is expected that the hall will be opened under the new management the first of October.

In speaking of the new arrangement and the reasons that led up to it last night Mr. Gottlieb said:

"The Music Hall property was acquired and improved by a company of gentlemen who thought that Baltimore should have a hall suitable for high-class orchestras and musical attractions. About $275,000 has been expended in the venture and experience has shown us that we cannot pay the expenses of keeping up such a hall with the revenue derived from a few concerts, political meetings and other affairs that we could secure.

"It was impossible to obtain other attractions, as they were unwilling to come here unless the local management would assume part of the risk, and this the directors were naturally unwilling to do. The latter had invested a large amount of money and the property was not paying expenses, so they did not care to take any more risks. It was a question then of allowing the hall to be used for lesser attractions.

To Keep Up Present Plane.

"I knew that this would be a distinct disappointment to a large number of people who wanted the city to have a place where only high-class musical entertainments would be presented. As I was one of the original promoters of the plan and a director in the Auditorium Company, I decided that if I could get some gentleman to join me in the venture I would lease the hall, thus securing the company against any future loss, and continue the edifice on the plane on which it had been started. I mentioned the matter to Mr. Knabe, and, after I had explained my plan, he agreed to go into it with me. At the meeting of the directors last Thursday night we presented our proposition and it was agreed to at once, the directors expressing their appreciation of our efforts in the matter.

"Of course we are assuming a considerable risk, but I believe the people of Baltimore will come to our assistance and patronize the attractions we will give them. We have already closed with the Castle Square Opera Company and about closed with the Metropolitan Opera Company. The latter organization had abandoned the idea of visiting Baltimore this season because it could not get the necessary guarantee, but we have induced it to reconsider its determination, and it will be heard here at our hall. We are now negotiating with a number of other companies as well as with orchestras, and expect to close with them shortly.

After Theatrical Attractions.

"We will also endeavor to secure the high-class independent theatrical attractions, such as Mrs. Fiske, Mr. Hackett and others of that character. In the summer we will probably give musical attractions at popular prices, and may decide to secure a first-class stock company for the season. In addition, we will have Victor Herbert and other orchestras for the 'pop' concerts which have become so popular.

"We have retained Mr. Ulrich as manager, and I think he is one of the best in the country. Of course he has been seriously hampered while working under a board of directors, as he was unable to offer inducements to companies, but with proper support, such as Mr. Knabe and I are prepared to give him, I am satisfied that the house will be managed in a thorough manner and the attractions will be the best obtainable.

Pave Symphony Orchestra In View.

"Another plan which we had in view in securing the hall is, I think, of especial local interest. We are confident that with a large hall and one so admirably fitted for musical purposes—for Music Hall is one of the best in the country—we can establish a local symphony orchestra that will eventually equal those of Boston, Pittsburg or any other city.

"The trouble with a large orchestra is to obtain a hall where entertainments can be given and reasonable prices charged. It is necessary to attract large audiences to meet the expense of maintaining an orchestra of this character. The 45 or 50 musicians must be paid, not only for the concerts, but for the rehearsals as well, and to bring an orchestra to the perfection demanded by audiences of the present day the rehearsals must be frequent. I am satisfied that Baltimore music lovers will support an orchestra of this character, and we propose to give them a chance to furnish a hall where musical students and others who are not able to pay $1 and $1.50 for a seat can hear fine orchestral music."

Mr. Gottlieb is sanguine over the prospect of success, but realizes that there is a large element of risk in all such ventures, and says he relies on the support of the music-loving people of the city.

No Secret About Agreement.

Mr. Lawrason Riggs, vice-president of the Auditorium Company, was seen last night at his residence, 814 Cathedral street, and said there was no secret about the agreement which had been entered into with Messrs. Gottlieb and Knabe. The lease had not yet been signed, he said, adding that this was the only reason the matter had not been given publicity.

He explained that the whole transaction in a nutshell was that Messrs. Gottlieb and Knabe had leased Music Hall from the Company for five years with an option of renewal. The lessees assumed all obligations, responsibilities and engagements, the company only stipularing that Music Hall should be maintained at its present high standard. In explaining the reason for leasing the property Mr. Riggs said:

"Almost since its inception the Auditorium Company has found Music Hall a losing venture. Year after year the stockholders have received little or nothing on their holdings. In spite of this we all recognized that every city should have a hall of the character of Music Hall, and we continued to maintain it as the one place in the city where large gatherings could take place.

"Mr. Gottlieb has been a director of the company for years and has been greatly interested in its affairs. While Mr. William Knabe was not identified with the company, Mr. Ernest Knabe, was a director and their interest were almost identical.

"At a meeting of the directors last Thursday these gentlemen made us the proposition to lease the property. They knew the financial considerations incidental to such an undertaking; with rare public spirit they entered into the agreement."

[18]

Phila. INQUIRER, SUNDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 4, 1903

ARTISTS WHO ARE TO BE HEARD WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA DURING THE SEASON OF 1903-04

MME. SCHUMANN-HEINK
COPYRIGHT BY A. DUPONT

MELBA

MME. GADSKI
COPYRIGHT BY A. DUPONT

AUS DER OHE

MR. WILHELM GERICKE.

BUSONI

HAROLD BAUER.

This group of artists, all of whom are to be heard with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city during the course of the impending season, is in the highest degree representative of all that is rarest and best in the field of musical achievement. The three vocalists and the three instrumentalists whom it comprises stand in the very forefront of their profession. Mme. Melba, now in the maturity of her unequaled powers, is easily the finest lyric soprano which this generation has produced. To a voice of incomparable beauty she has added a perfectly finished art, and her singing is recognized as the acme of delightful vocalization. Mme. Schumann-Heink is easily the greatest of dramatic contraltos, while her versatility is such that she is just as effective upon the concert platform as on the operatic stage. The same thing is true of Madam Gadski, who is not only admirable as a dramatic soprano, but whose interpretation of the German lieder is full of intelligence and charm. Adele Aus de Ohe is a pianist of extraordinary power, while Bussoni and Bauer, the other figures in the group, are well worthy to be her colleagues. Attendants at the Boston Symphony concerts have a rich treat in store.

MR. WILHELM GERICKE.

The local program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season which is about to open has been announced. As during the past five years, the concerts of this unsurpassed organization, which has a record of twenty-two years of unbroken artistic triumph, will be given under the direction of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke. There will be the usual two series. The dates of the performances included in the first series are Monday evenings, November 2, December 7, January 11 and March 14. Owing to a conflict of dates, the February concert of the first series will take place on Friday evening, the 19th of that month. The concerts of the second series will be given on five Wednesday evenings, as follows: November 4, December 9, January 13, February 17 and March 16. The concerts of the two series will be identical in character, value and attractiveness, but they will in every instance present different programs and different soloists.

Of the latter the list includes Mme. Melba, Mme. Gadski, Mme. Schumann-Heink, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Mr. Harold Bauer, Mr. Busoni, Miss Olive Mead, Mr. M. Fernandez Arbos, the new first violin and concertmaster; Mr. Kresselt, the new first violoncello, and others. Mme. Melba returns after an absence of two years; Mme. Gadski is too great a favorite in Philadelphia to need further exploiting here. Mme. Schumann-Heink has just secured her release by Kaiser Wilhelm from the Royal Opera Company in Berlin, which enables her to fill her concert engagements in this country. Miss Aus Der Ohe's high rank as a pianist, in both Europe and this country, always insures great interest in her appearances. The recent triumphs of Mr. Harold Bauer afford the best possible reason for his re-engagement. The favorable impression made by Miss Mead two seasons ago will be pleasantly recalled, and it goes without saying that a most cordial welcome will be extended to both the new comers, Mr. Arbos and Mr. Krasselt.

Season ticket holders of last season will be allowed to retain the same seats for both the first and second series, payment for the same to be made on or before Saturday, October 10, for the first series, and Monday, October 12, for the second series, by cash, money order or check, payable to Miss H. Harris, to whom all renewals of seats should be sent, at 1115 Chestnut street.

The public sale of tickets for the first series will open Monday morning, October 12, and for the second series on the following Wednesday morning, October 14, at the Heppe Piano Rooms, 1115 Chestnut street.

Program books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

Baltimore Sun
Sept 27 '03

MUSIC HALL UNDER LEASE

Messrs. Gottlieb And Knabe Secure It For Five Years.

TO GIVE OPERA AND CONCERTS

High-Class Theatrical Attractions Also Contemplated—Mr. Ulrich To Remain As Manager.

Messrs. Frederick H. Gottlieb and William Knabe have about concluded a lease of Music Hall for five years, with the privilege of renewal for five years more, and intend to book high-class opera companies and orchestras, as well as the best class of theatrical companies independent of the theatrical trust.

An agreement has already been reached with the directors of the Auditorium Company, which owns the hall, and the papers will be signed in a day or two. Bookings under the new name of Fred H. Gottlieb and William Knabe, lessees, and Bernhard Ulrich, manager, are being made and it is expected that the hall will be opened under the new management the first of October.

In speaking of the new arrangement and the reasons that led up to it last night Mr. Gottlieb said:

"The Music Hall property was acquired and improved by a company of gentlemen who thought that Baltimore should have a hall suitable for high class orchestras and musical attractions. About $275,000 has been expended in the venture and experience has shown us that we cannot pay the expenses of keeping up such a hall with the revenue derived from a few concerts, political meetings and other affairs that we could secure.

"It was impossible to obtain other attractions, as they were unwilling to come here unless the local management would assume part of the risk, and this the directors were naturally unwilling to do. The latter had invested a large amount of money and the property was not paying expenses, so they did not care to take any more risks. It was a question then of allowing the hall to be used for lesser attractions.

To Keep Up Present Plane.

"I knew that this would be a distinct disappointment to a large number of people who wanted the city to have a place where only high-class musical entertainments would be presented. As I was one of the original promoters of the plan and a director in the Auditorium Company, I decided that if I could get some gentleman to join me in the venture I would lease the hall, thus securing the company against any future loss, and continue the edifice on the plane on which it had been started. I mentioned the matter to Mr. Knabe, and, after I had explained my plan, he agreed to go into it with me. At the meeting of the directors last Thursday night we presented our proposition and it was agreed to at once, the directors expressing their appreciation of our efforts in the matter.

"Of course we are assuming a considerable risk, but I believe the people of Baltimore will come to our assistance and patronize the attractions we will give them. We have already closed with the Castle Square Opera Company and about closed with the Metropolitan Opera Company. The latter organization had abandoned the idea of visiting Baltimore this season because it could not get the necessary guarantee, but we have induced it to reconsider its determination, and it will be heard here at our hall. We are now negotiating with a number of other companies as well as with orchestras, and expect to close with them shortly.

After Theatrical Attractions.

"We will also endeavor to secure the high-class independent theatrical attractions, such as Mrs. Fiske, Mr. Hackett and others of that character. In the summer we will probably give musical attractions at popular prices, and may decide to secure a first-class stock company for the season. In addition, we will have Victor Herbert and other orchestras for the 'pop' concerts which have become so popular.

"We have retained Mr. Ulrich as manager, and I think he is one of the best in the country. Of course he has been seriously hampered while working under a board of directors, as he was unable to offer inducements to companies, but with proper support, such as Mr. Knabe and I are prepared to give him, I am satisfied that the house will be managed in a thorough manner and the attractions will be the best obtainable.

Have Symphony Orchestra In View.

"Another plan which we had in view in securing the hall is, I think, of especial local interest. We are confident that with a large hall and one so admirably fitted for musical purposes—for Music Hall is one of the best in the country—we can establish a local symphony orchestra that will eventually equal those of Boston, Pittsburg or any other city.

"The trouble with a large orchestra is to obtain a hall where entertainments can be given and reasonable prices charged. It is necessary to attract large audiences to meet the expense of maintaining an orchestra of this character. The 45 or 50 musicians must be paid, not only for the concerts, but for the rehearsals as well, and to bring an orchestra to the perfection demanded by audiences of the present day the rehearsals must be frequent. I am satisfied that Baltimore music lovers will support an orchestra of this character, and we propose to give them a chance to furnish a hall where musical students and others who are not able to pay $1 and $1.50 for a seat can hear fine orchestral music."

Mr. Gottlieb is sanguine over the prospect of success, but realizes that there is a large element of risk in all such ventures, and says he relies on the support of the music-loving people of the city.

No Secret About Agreement.

Mr. Lawrason Riggs, vice-president of the Auditorium Company, was seen last night at his residence, 814 Cathedral street, and said there was no secret about the agreement which had been entered into with Messrs. Gottlieb and Knabe. The lease had not yet been signed, he said, adding that this was the only reason the matter had not been given publicity.

He explained that the whole transaction in a nutshell was that Messrs. Gottlieb and Knabe had leased Music Hall from the Company for five years with an option of renewal. The lessees assumed all obligations, responsibilities and engagements, the company only stipulating that Music Hall should be maintained at its present high standard. In explaining the reason for leasing the property Mr. Riggs said:

"Almost since its inception the Auditorium Company has found Music Hall a losing venture. Year after year the stockholders have received little or nothing on their holdings. In spite of this we all recognized that every city should have a hall of the character of Music Hall, and we continued to maintain it as the one place in the city where large gatherings could take place.

"Mr. Gottlieb has been a director of the company for years and has been greatly interested in its affairs. While Mr. William Knabe was not identified with the company, Mr. Ernest Knabe, was a director and their interest were almost identical.

"At a meeting of the directors last Thursday these gentlemen made us the proposition to lease the property. They knew the financial considerations incidental to such an undertaking; with rare public spirit they entered into the agreement."

[18]

REDUCTION

RATIO

13x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

A BRILLIANT OCCASION

Banquet of Ancients One of Magnificence

Ladies Watched Spectacle from Balcony

Prominent Men Made Interesting Speeches

Honourables Were Bewildered at What They Saw

Symphony Hall was a veritable fairyland last evening on the occasion of the banquet which was tendered the Honourable Artillery Company of London and prominent men in the various walks of life of this and other cities, by the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company, as a fitting climax to the observance of its 266th fall field day. Much had been said and printed in advance about the banquet, but words can hardly describe the actual scene. Certainly Boston never saw the like and it will be a long time before such a magnificent spectacle is again attempted.

As described in these columns in last evening's issue there were myriads of colored electric lights which had been tastefully arranged, and in addition there were thousands of roses and a vast amount of laurel, smilax, etc., in evidence. First of all there was a reception in Horticultural Hall and then the company of more than a thousand marched across Massachusetts avenue to Symphony Hall. The soldiers and their civilian guests did not have to pass over the pavement. They walked on a handsome carpet, woven especially for the occasion, and under an immense canopy which was lighted by a row of colored lights. Ordinarily it would be supposed that it would be difficult to seat such a large number at the tables, but on entering Horticultural Hall each man had been given a diagram showing the arrangements of the tables and the seats. All were arranged by sections and by looking at the index there was no trouble in finding where each one was to be seated.

As the assemblage entered Symphony Hall only the ordinary ceiling lights were turned on, but even with them the sight was beyond description. Hardly had all entered the dining hall when Colonel Hedges raised his hand for silence, and Rev. Edward Everett Hale invoked the divine blessing. As he finished there blazed forth a glory of golden light from myriads of incandescent bulbs hung pendent from a huge illuminated crown which overhung the stage.

A minute later, by a magic touch, there streamed out the subdued light of the green and purple bulbs fringing the lofty upper balcony amid intertwined festoons of laurel and evergreen. Until this time the lower balcony was in darkness. Then the magnificent crossed cannons were lighted with thousands of white and green and golden lights that flooded the banquet boards. The culmination came in the illumination of the tables with countless red and green bulbs, that were buried beneath dainty curving streamers of smilax and laurel and roses.

At nine o'clock the climax came, when the ladies were admitted to the balconies. There were suggestions of every color in the gowns, which added to the charm of the pretty decorations and the brilliancy of the military uniforms. Among the first to enter the first balcony to the left of the speakers was Lady Denbigh, accompanied by Mrs. Hedges and some friends. As she entered the hall every man was on his feet in an instant, and she was lustily cheered.

Near the end of the dinner tickets were given to those at the tables entitling them to the beautiful souvenir dish and menu enclosed in a white leather case. In addition to this the diners were given a souvenir loving cup, in which were served the ices. During the evening the Salem Cadet Band furnished a fine musical programme. At the conclusion of the dinner, Colonel Hedges made the opening address, and afterward introduced Colonel Charles K. Darling, the adjutant of the Ancients, as the toastmaster for the evening.

Those seated at the head tables on the stage, in addition to the speakers, were General N. A. M. Dudley, General Edmund Rice, Major F. Farrington, H. A. C.; Rear Admiral Mortimer L. Johnson, Major P. W. Legatt, H. A. C.; General George M. Cole, adjutant general of Connecticut; Hon. A. A. Chamberlin, governor of Connecticut; George A. Marden, sub-treasurer; Major Munday, H. A. C.; General Adna R. Chaffee, U. S. A.; Lieutenant Colonel Stohwasser, H. A. C..; General Samuel Dalton, Lieutenant Governor Curtis Guild, Hon. J. Q. A. Brackett, Major C. E. D. Budworth, H. A. C.; Captain C. A. P. Talbot, British consul; Hon. L. F. C. Garvin, governor of Rhode Island; George A. Hibbard, postmaster; Hon. N. J. Bachelder, governor of New Hampshire; Adjutant General Aug. D. Ayling of New Hampshire, General John L. Tiernon.

The menu was as follows:

Cape Cod Oysters.
Clear Green Turtle.
Prince Albert Sherry.
Aiguillettes of Halibut Cardinal.
Cucumbers. Potatoes Hollandaise.
Haut Sauterne.
Tournedos of Filet of Beef à la Previllot.
String Beans.
Champagne.
Epigrammes of Sweetbreads Sévigné.
Green Peas.
Sorbet à la Militaire.
Cigarettes.
Squab Chickens Roasted.
Romaine and Tomato Salad.
Bombé Glacés International.
Pétits Fours.
Cheese. Coffee.
Cigars.

Good Fellowship the Keynote

Colonel Sidney M. Hedges Started the Speechmaking in an Interesting Vein

In beginning the after-dinner speechmaking, Colonel Sidney M. Hedges, commander of the Ancients, spoke in part as follows:

"Your Excellency, Lord Denbigh and Gentlemen: Words cannot adequately express the pleasure I feel on this occasion in welcoming you, our guests from beyond the sea, and I cannot but feel that the mission has been fulfilled of one, who years ago, in a very small beginning, laid the foundation on which has grown the structure that made possible this magnificent gathering tonight.

"The growth of our international relations, or rather, the development of our family spirit in these two organizations, began when a small delegation from our company was sent to the 350th anniversary of the Honourable Artillery Company in 1887. This was followed by a delegation of twenty-one from the Honourable Artillery Company to our 250th anniversary in 1888, and from this meeting many warm personal friendships have been dated. In 1896 came the visit of this company to London, one of the most remarkable and enjoyable ever paid by the civilian soldiery of one land to an organization whose commander-in-chief and officers were of the royalty and nobility of another.

"Can we ever forget the gracious welcome of Her Majesty, Queen Victoria, whose name will ever stand in history for strength of character and rare qualities of mind and heart that can never be excelled? We remember with deepest appreciation our reception by their majesties, King Edward and Queen Alexandra, to whom today, I am sure, every member of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company would be glad to send a message of best wishes for a long and glorious reign.

"The company that came in the Mayflower was so notable that her name is embalmed forever in the history of our country. Let us hope that your voyage in the new Mayflower may prove a harbinger of events no less important in the history of our land and race! Whatever years may have in store for us let us all here resolve that, in storm and sunshine, those great emblems of justice, freedom and daring, the union jack and the stars and stripes, shall be found floating side by side!

"Tonight we send a message of greeting to your beloved and royal commander, His Majesty, King Edward, and to all your brethren in arms in England, and so, as Tiny Tim observed: 'May God bless us, every one!'"

Spoke for the President

Collector Lyman Said: "The Union of the Eagle and the Lion Stands for One Race Alone on the Globe"

In responding to the toast "The President of the United States," Hon. George H. Lyman, collector of the port, said, in part:

"A toast to the President is a formal salute to the United States, of which he is the official head, and our country hails you, our guests from across the sea, in the same spirit of welcome and respect that you may be assured he would rejoice personally to extend to you could we have been honored this evening by the presence of our Chief Executive, President Roosevelt. Our people greet you individually and as a body. We welcome you for what you represent—a brotherhood in arms, an institution ancient and honorable by purpose and tradition, inspiring and emphasizing that patriotic and democratic spirit which, independent of rank or wealth, was in our forefathers, your forefathers, bred in the bone, and from which has emanated and expanded this broad heritage of ours, the envy of nations.

"Gentlemen, look upon this land as she is today. Behold her agricultural products, her forests, her mines—all her natural resources. Behold her triumphs in the arts and sciences, in mechanics, her foreign and domestic trade, and her vast business interests. Behold her seats of learning, her Government, her laws, her courts of justice, her institutions, religious and secular, her 80,000,000 of people and their rating among the nations of the earth. What greater glory to the parent than a child's success? And mother England, the foremost evangelist of civilization, may with honest pride point her finger westward to the shores of the great republic and exclaim, 'Behold my offspring!'"

Greeting of Massachusetts

Governor Bates Spoke for the Commonwealth, Though "the People Have Already Spoken"

"Welcome from the Commonwealth of Massachusetts" was the toast selected for Governor Bates, and he responded in a happy vein, saying in part:

"Mr. Toastmaster, Distinguished Guests, Ladies and Gentlemen—I am asked to do something unnecessary, but yet most agreeable—to extend the greetings of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts to the guests of this occasion. Unnecessary, gentlemen of England, because the welcome has already been spoken by the people of Massachusetts, spoken by them as they gathered by thousands and tens of thousands on the day of your arrival, spoken again yesterday by the multitude that like a great torrent flowed through the streets of this city, spoken in the holiday vestments with which our metropolis has clothed itself, spoken in every grasp of the hand, in the smile of every face, in the cheer that has rent the air wherever you have gone—spoken in the intermingling of the Stars and Stripes with the crosses of St. George and St. Andrew; and this we trust has satisfied you that, however your predecessors may have fared among us, you are in no danger except from our attempted kindness.

"While unnecessary, therefore, it is nevertheless a privilege to say to you, Lord Denbigh, and to you, soldiers of the Honourable Artillery Company of London, welcome to Massachusetts, welcome to her hospitality, welcome to her homes and to her firesides. You bring with you the sabre and the gun, but there is no threat in them, rather are they the symbols of that military spirit that has made possible England's greatness and America's future.

"When we were but a child, we quarrelled with you oftener than with any other people, but the exercise developed strength in us both. We have had no serious trouble, lo, these scores of years. We have been settled on the shores of Massachusetts Bay, more or less settled for 283 years, and during that time we have been at war with you eleven years, and at peace with you 272 years. From present appearances it will be 272 years more before we shall again declare war against you. Better than that, we believe that America has fought her last war against England. And this we believe not because we send you 10,000,000 barrels of flour a year and other necessaries of life in proportion, so that you would starve while fighting us; not because the inventions in modern warfare make it a contest of annihilation; not because the one is afraid and the other dare not, for the British lion and the American eagle have never blinked an eye when facing each other—but because hands have clasped across the seas and hearts have joined, and the ties of blood and the instincts derived from the common origin compel us to march all one way—for the liberty of the individual, the overthrow of the oppressor, the uplifting of the downtrodden, and the advancement of the Christian civilization throughout the world."

Response of Mayor Collins

For the City of Boston He Tendered the Englishmen a Hearty Welcome

Mayor Patrick A. Collins responded to the toast "Welcome from the city of Boston." He was in a witty mood and kept the audience in laughter. "I tender you my heartiest welcome," he said, "but the first thing I do wish to refer to is the republican simplicity of this occasion. My first salutation is to the ladies. Colonel Hedges, I rise in response to your summons as a pleasure. But, my Lord Denbigh and the artillery company, whatever I might have been able to say in welcome to you has already been anticipated by the governor of the Commonwealth.

"The welcome of Boston does not need to be expressed by my lips or by any other official. From the time you landed until now the welcome has been everywhere given, and is so hearty that every one of you must have seen it. If you came on a hostile mission you might have had another sort of welcome. You, gentlemen, and my lord, the welcome is such that you will need to use the word of our militant President to lead a strenuous life. If you are to be under the guidance of this body of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company of Boston you will find that they are men with splendid constitutions, tough people, and of large experience.

"But, as perhaps the only individual present who knew you in London, I think you can hold your own. You will come back after a brief glimpse of a fringe of this great country and we shall meet again, and you will return to old England with the impression that here there is a friendly sentiment to all men and for peace on earth. We bid you godspeed and shall take great pleasure in wishing you godspeed to your homes and all within your lands."

Lord Denbigh's Speech

Distinguished Englishman Pays a Felicitous Compliment to His Hosts and to Boston

"May we never meet them but in peace; never engage them but in hospitality; never part from them but in love," was the toast given to the Honourable Artillery Company of London, and responded to by Lord Denbigh.

"This morning at three," began his lordship, "I asked Colonel Hedges how many weeks we had been in Boston. (Laughter.) Colonel Hedges assured me on his word as a citizen of the United States and commander of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company, that we only arrived last Friday. (Laughter.) While engaged today in making my 25th swift change of uniform since my arrival, I observed to the valet who was kindly assisting me that I had never had so much dressing up before in all my life. 'And, sir, the way in which you slide in and out of your clothing,' he replied, 'just takes my eye.'

"I mention these incidents to you to convey some idea of the abject bewilderment I find myself in as a result of your great kindness to us. Our welcome at Providence Saturday was magnificent. I have no doubt that Colonel Hedges would refer to the spread tendered to us by Colonel Gross and his distinguished regiment of light infantry as a little lunch. His condensed prospectus in the two words, 'clam bake,' certainly conveyed no idea of what was coming."

Lord Denbigh then paid a pretty compliment to the Boston press and continuing described the impression made by their reception on the day they landed in Charlestown. The Union Jack at the top of Bunker Hill Monument was one of the first things that caught his eye, he said. That monument, he said, had long been regarded in England "as a reminder of how colonies ought not to be governed, and perhaps with ill-feeling, but henceforth it will be looked upon in another light, as a monument to brave men and to them only.

The generous welcome extended to him and his followers went beyond them and their hosts, the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company. It would be conceit to think that it was all meant for such "humdrum individuals" as they. It was really the expression of the good will that exists between the two nations. "We once had a difference of opinion over the subject of tea," he continued. "We wanted it in fresh water and hot, and you insisted that it go into salt water and be cold. But that was a trifle. The Union Jack fluttering from Bunker Hill disposes of that incident. There were hard words and hard knocks. The visit of the Ancients was token of the existing and growing friendship. We did our best to receive them, led by our late and gracious Queen, but I cannot say that you got as hearty a reception in the streets of London as we have received here."

"Old Mother Country"

George Frisbee Hoar Mingles Gracious Welcome with Serious Reference to America's Debt to the Mother Country

George Frisbie Hoar, senior senator from Massachusetts, responded to the toast, "Old Mother England," in his happiest vein. In his address gracious welcome to our English guests mingled with delicious pleasantry and more serious reference to the good fellowship of men and nations which this visit of the Honourable Artillery Company must foster. In brief the senator said:

"The first speech ever made on this continent is still one of the best. It was made by the Indian Sachem Samoset to the Pilgrim Fathers, at Plymouth, on the 16th of March, 1621. It sums up in two words everything needed to be said on this occasion: 'Welcome, Englishmen!'

"We are people made up of many races and nations. The instinct of race is strong in the bosom of all of us—Celt and Swede and Frenchman and Saxon. Yet, England is still the mother country. We owe great debts to each of the other great nations of Europe. But surely there can be no greater debt, no greater benefit conferred on one people by another than law, liberty, language, literature. All these we owe to England. We have had our differences and, unhappily, our wars. We have been restless under each other's criticism. But we have sought, if we could, to find the justification of our wars in English principles and on English authority. The severest critics of America in England are the men who have severely criticised England for the same faults. And the severest critics of England in America have been the men, in general, who severely criticised their own country for the same faults.

"The leaders of our Revolutionary War, so far as the debate was concerned, were Englishmen—Chatham and Burke and Fox. Our fathers placed the justification for it upon the fundamental doctrines of the English constitution. It was for a pure, simple English doctrine that our fathers raised their flag against England, and not for any considerable practical grievance whatever. I suppose that before our Revolution Massachusetts had the best and mildest Government on the face of the earth; better and milder than that which England enjoyed at home. But, as Edmund Burke, the greatest English statesman of his day, declared, 'It was the English constitution, which triumphed in the American revolution.' It was a theory, and not a practice of taxation against which we took up arms.

"Our English friends may be sure of their welcome. They are in the house of their friends, in the dwelling place of their brethren. We cannot show you wonders like those you have left behind. We have few glories of architecture and of art. We have little antiquity. We have no palaces or castles. Yet possibly we also may have something to exhibit, in a modest way, of the fruitage of the tree of English liberty. We must yield the palm to other nations in art and architecture and music. We have tried to emulate them, if not to excel them, in the things which constitute the strength and happiness of a free people. We have gone without the architectural glories of palaces and castles and cathedrals. We have tried to perfect the architecture of the people's dwellings, and you will find the English Bible and the English Shakspeare upon their shelves. The canvas does not live or breathe for us under the touch of Guido or Raphael. We have no Lawrence or Reynolds to preserve the features of high-born beauty. But health paints here with her roses the cheek of the factory girl. The music of Beethoven or Handel may not here rise and swell till it fills the dome which Angelo or Wren builded. But we have the music of children's voices in the well-paid workmen's home.

"We hope you may feel at home while you are here. When you go back to old Mother England, tell her her boys are contented and happy and growing. Give her our best love. Tell her we think of her with nothing but friendliness and goodwill. We have no sore feeling left, even for the spanking she used to give us. If she did not spare the rod, she did not spoil the child."

Hon. John D. Long's Address

A Warm Tribute to England's Friendship and to His Associate in Honorary Membership in the Ancients—The King

Hon. John D. Long, responding to the toast "Our Honorary Members," which was prefaced by Colonel Hedges' remark that they are only two, King Edward and the ex-secretary of the American Navy, said:

"Of course the great distinction of our honorary members is he whom you, our visitors here, royally honor and regard, King Edward VII. Think for a moment of the long line of predecessors, stretching far back into the past behind him and of which he today is the culmination. I am glad to see King Edward making these visits to other countries, and my one hope is that he will some day extend this visit to us. What a royal welcome would we give him!

"I rejoice in the tributes that have been paid to the mother land. We do not forget that we owe much to the mother of the present king and to Prince Albert for standing by us during the War of the Rebellion. Let us not forget that when the recent war with Spain was on, the one Power which was in sympathy with us was England. And in those fateful days at Manila, when Dewey was meeting the unfriendly associations of other nations, the flag of England flying told him that a friend was near. I join with you therefore as an honorary member, in extending a cordial welcome to our visitors. We are really brothers, brothers in all that makes for human happiness and welfare and, may I not say—aye, it is written—brothers in destiny."

Our Canadian Neighbors

Lieutenant Colonel F. W. Hibbard of Montreal Spoke of the Brotherhood Which Exists Between the Two Peoples

Sir Frederick W. Borden, who was to have represented Canada, was unavoidably absent, and in his place Lieutenant Colonel F. W. Hibbard of the Second Canadian Artillery, replied to the toast, "Our Canadian Neighbors," saying:

"There are strange conjunctions in the lives of nations. About a century and a quarter ago a great and hateful conflict was waging between the mother land and colonies, in which the sons of old France were aiding the righteous cause; and now after a century of doubt and estrangement, when you gentlemen of the Honourable Artillery Company and of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company come in fraternal association to Montreal, the descendants of the same old France will gladly welcome you, worthy scions of two great nations and but one people, harbingers of more than a glorious century to come of peace, understanding and good will.

"Gentlemen of the Honourable Artillery Company, we Canadians are of yours and your allegiance. We stand upon the same broad base of liberty under the British constitution, the one grand and glorious flag waves over us both. We share your hopes and your sorrows, we have shed common blood upon the stricken field. And these are but some of the ties that draw us close and closer still, and if they do not suffice for the union and stability of the empire, I know no ordered system of tariff arrangements that will.

"Gentlemen of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company, you are true types of all that has made your country's name surpassingly great and glorious upon the pages of world history. Our nations have fought with one another of a time happily gone by; we have trafficked together and our people have commingled, and the outcome of it all is a mutual and growing respect and confidence, which, if I may repeat, no tariff arrangements or commercial rivalry can ever annihilate. Shadows between us there have been and may yet be again, but there is room upon this continent for two nations, working in harmony to make this new world renowned above all things for the happiness and contentment of its people of whatever origin, and a land of bright and smiling homes. We are two nations, but common in our laws and institutions if not in our lawgivers, and we are partners in a great work of realizing the brightest hopes and most promising future."

Real Duty of the Race

Professor de Sumichrast of Harvard University Points It Out

Professor de Sumichrast of Harvard addressed the assemblage as follows:

"The keynote of this meeting is 'brotherhood'; not military brotherhood alone, but the brotherhood of the two great Anglo-Saxon nations. This is evidenced by the spontaneity, the warmth, the cordiality of the welcome which has been given my fellow-countrymen. Now, a welcome is spoken on behalf of Harvard University, no less hearty, no less warm than the other welcomes which have preceded it. Yet it may well occur to many to ask what part the university has in this event which will pass into history, and wherefore it is represented here tonight. The answer is simple; not only were its foundations and the establishment of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company of Boston practically synchronous, but among the innumerable ties which bind the United States and Great Britain together, some of the strongest are to be found in the history of Harvard. For Harvard is, indeed, a lasting monument to English interest in America, and its name and the name of the city in which it stands are commemorative of an Englishman and of an English city. And this is not the only tie that conects Harvard with our motherland. Not only have English scholars come to the university to give American youth the benefit of their ripe knowledge, but Harvard professors have in their turn been called to the halls of the old country and have won fame there as they had already won it in their country.

"The real duty of the United States and Great Britain, the real duty of our united nations, of our race, which is one, is not to foster and keep alive ancient grudges and hatreds of yore, but to fulfil the mission intrusted to us, to carry out the noblest task ever laid upon a race—the bearing through the wide world the light of political truth; the bestowing on all nations the blessing of true liberty; the giving to all men their birthright of equality before the law; the establishment in all lands of even-handed justice; the spread among all inhabitants of the universe of the benefits of the highest Christian civilization."

A Word from the Militia

Major General William A. Bancroft, Retired Commander of the Second Brigade, Spoke for the Citizen Soldier

Major General William A. Bancroft, replying to the toast, "The Volunteer Militia," said, in part:

"The militia, both of this Commonwealth and of the country, will feel much pleased, I am sure, to know that it has been named upon an occasion of so much distinction, and indeed it is highly appropriate that this institution of Government should have formal attention at this extraordinary festivity, for nearly four hundred years ago this institution brought into existence one of the famous corps, and, transplanted to another continent, brought also into existence the other, a hundred years later.

"I am sure the militia in this community had never a more agreeable duty to perform than they had when privileged to escort the Boston company and its guests through the streets of this town. I am equally sure that our militia appreciated the high martial appearance which the London company made. Your command, my lord, looked so 'very smart' (I believe that is what they would say at home), and I say this of our militia, who are accustomed to be astonished every year at the marching of the Boston company, of whom a certain commander-in-chief said some years ago that he had never seen anything like it. It is certainly a very great pleasure to witness such soldierly bearing and such soldierly position of movement."

Rev. W. H. Rider

Chaplain of Ancients Invoked Blessing on Both Countries, and the Banquet Closed with Cheers by London Company

The closing address was by Rev. William H. Rider, at 12.30 A. M. He said: "Out of all this glad evening, this day which no one of us will forget, may we not rise, one and all, and invoke the favor of our God upon those who are our neighbors and are close to us; upon the prosperity of England, the wealth of our own republic; let us rise, and may the Father's blessing descend upon us, each and everyone."

With another round of rapid-firing cheers from Lord Denbigh's company, the great banquet to the visiting Honourable Artillery Company of London was brought to a close.

Cigars for the Ancients

The cigars used at the banquet of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company of Boston to the Honourable Artillery Company of London were imported by Estabrook & Eaton, from the celebrated Vilar factory in Havana. They are new goods made for the occasion and packed under military titles of Colonels and Captains, and are fine specimens of the cigar making industry. The cigarettes used at the banquet were the famous Egyptian Deities. The cigars used for general entertainment were the El Principe de Gales, Creme de la Creme sizes, all selected and specially packed, each cigar having a band suitably inscribed.

SPLENDID BANQUET OF ANCIENTS UNEQUALLED IN MAGNIFICENCE

London Honourables Dazed by Gorgeousness of the Affair—Lord Denbigh's Address a Notable Feature—Eloquent Greetings From Sen. Hoar and Other Dignitaries

SEN. HOAR'S GREETING TO LONDON MILITIAMEN.

"We have made some improvement on this continent since we came over. But, after all, the first speech recorded in history as made on this continent is still one of the best. It was made by the Indian sachem Samoset to the Pilgrim fathers, at Plymouth, on the 16th of March, 1621. It sums up in two words everything needed to be said on this occasion:—Welcome, Englishmen!"

THE TOASTS.

Col. Darling officiated as toastmaster.

The President of the United States—"One in $0,000,000 and $0,000,000 in one." Collector Lyman.

His Britannic Majesty King Edward VII. —Response by the band playing "God Save the King." "The manly chief of a manly people, the apostle of fellowship among the nations of the earth."

Welcome from the Commonwealth of Massachusetts—"From western hills to eastern strand, the Bay State greets you heart and hand." Gov Bates.

Welcome from the City of Boston—"As God was with our fathers so may he be with us and with those gathered within our gates." Mayor Collins.

The Honourable Artillery Co. of London—"May we never meet them but in peace; never engage them but in hospitality; never part from them but in love." Lord Denbigh.

Old Mother England—"The stalwart son honors the sturdy parent." Sen. Hoar.

Our Honorary Members—"Two in number: Edward, king and emperor, and J. D. Long, the best fellow of all princes, the prince of all good fellows." Ex-Gov. Long.

Our Canadian Neighbors—"Not cold, but full of warmth and glow, is our fair lady of the snow." Col. F. W. Hibbard, Montreal.

Harvard Univ.—"Imperial in her colors, her history and her truth." Prof. de Sumichrast.

The Volunteer Militia—"The best type of citizen is he who will fight to make citizenship worth having." Gen. W. A. Bancroft.

The Ancient and Honorable Artillery Co. of Massachusetts—"Proud of its history; true to its traditions; loyal to the Commonwealth whose name it bears." Chaplain W. H. Rider.

(Photo by Chickering.)
RIGHT HON. LORD DENBIGH.

BANQUET A FITTING CLIMAX.

The magnificent banquet given in Symphony hall last night, by the Ancients, to the Honourable Artillery Co. of London, was a fitting climax to the series of ovations, fetes, and triumphs, excelling even those of a Roman emperor, which have marked the visit of this British military body to Boston.

Columns have already been given to descriptions, in advance, of the sumptuous affair of last night.

But only the brush of a master artist, and the genius of a poet-laureate, could do justice to the splendid spectacle itself.

Even the unlimited expenditure of the most epicurean of old-world monarchs could have unfolded such a scene, for they had not the magic wand of modern science.

When Lord Denbigh said he had never before looked upon such a sight, and doubted if many of those present had, there was no dissenting opinion.

The marvels of electricity, together with the florist's art, transformed the already beautiful hall into an enchanted bower.

To epitomize: it was the dinner of the age.

The arrangements proved faultless.

The guests assembled in Horticultural Hall, where a brilliant reception preceded the major event. Gov. Bates, Lord Denbigh, Gen. Chaffee, Gov. Bachelder of New Hampshire, and Gov. Long, stood in the receiving line, while Col. Hedges and Col. Darling presented the guests. A distinguished group stood behind or near the line, among whom were ex-Gov. Boutwell, Rev. Dr. Hale, Adm. Johnson, Capt. Hodges of the Chicago, Judge Lowell of the U. S. court, Lt.-Gov. Guild and Mayor Collins while the governor's staff made a glittering background.

The various halls of the building, some of which were used for coat rooms, were superbly decorated. The brick walls being well nigh covered with bunting, flags, the coats-of-arms of the Honourables, the Ancients, the British empire, the United States, the Commonwealth, and all the colonies and dependencies of Great Britain as well as the flags of that nation, of the United States and of Scotland and Ireland.

Naturally, it was Lord Denbigh who was followed with closest attention, especially as he spoke briefly, extemporaneously, and in good voice. He was given "Three cheers and a tiger," when called on, and the great assembly rose a second time to their feet, in the exuberance of their enthusiasm, to cheer and applaud again. He began, with studied courtesy,—

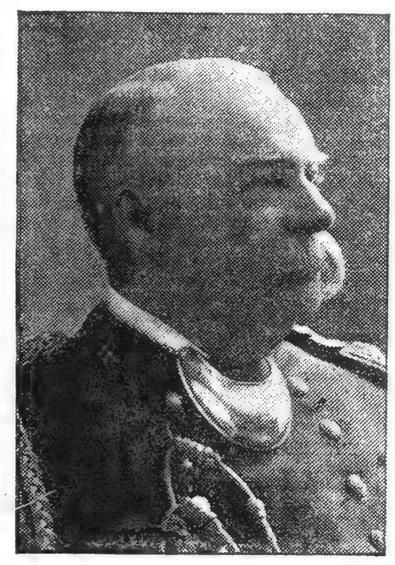

Photo by Chickering.
COL. SIDNEY HEDGES.

THE EARL OF DENBIGH.

"Col. Hedges, Your Excellency, Your Honor, Ladies and Gentlemen:—At the hour of 3 a.m. today, just as I had finished a four hours' conversation (laughter) with your indefatigable chairman, and our indefatigable secretaries, on the subject of the arrangements for next week, I asked him if he could tell me how many weeks we'd been in Boston. (Laughter.) Col. Hedges assured me, on his honor as a gentleman, and as the commander of the Ancients, that we had only arrived Friday. (Laughter.)

"This morning, as I was engaged in my 24?th quick change of uniform (laughter), I observed to the valet, that I had never done so much dressing up in my life.

"'Well,' he said, 'I've assisted many gentlemen to dress, but the way you slide into your clothes just takes my eye.' (Laughter and applause). I mention this little thing to give you some small sense of the abject state of bewilderment I find myself in continually.

"The other day we visited Providence, and enjoyed the magnificent hospitality of that city. ('Hear! hear!' from the Honourables). It was a 'little lunch,' Col. Hedges would call it. I have a great grudge against Col. Hedges for the meagre programme he forwarded to London. He simply described the day's event as—'Visit to Providence and clambake.'

"I am surprised at Col. Hedges. (Laughter). He is a distinguished citizen of a great country, which posseses many interesting and remarkable attributes—among which is the enterprise of the daily press. I try to thank them for the kind way they have treated us.

"The first distinguishing marks of that press is its resourcefulness and its power of description, both of things that do happen and things that might happen! (Great laughter and applause.)

"Well, ladies and gentlemen, I don't profess to be what is known professionally as a descriptive reporter. I would have been vanquished before I begun. But, considering Col. Hedges' experience, I am surprised at his meagreness of description. If I couldn't give a better description of events before they occur than he did I would hide my diminished head, and retire from business! (Laughter.)

"We arrived Friday, and one of the first things we saw was the Union Jack on top of Bunker Hill monument! (Laughter and applause.) A monument, it is superfluous for me to say in these days, we, in England, might regard without any ill-feeling, as a monument of how colonies ought not to be governed. (Tremendous applause and laughter.)

"In another light, the monument might be regarded as a monument to brave men, and that only. (Applause.)

"We steamed into a somewhat lonely and desolate dock, and landed in a large and empty shed, silent as a vault.

"We had been told a hearty welcome awaited us, and we were not surprised to find outside our old friends, or perhaps I should say, our ancient offspring. (Laughter and applause.)

"We passed them, and then we began to realize what was in store for us. We saw the Union Jack hanging out of windows beside the Stars and Stripes, and we were assured that there would have been ten times as many Union Jacks, only the supply ran out. (Laughter and applause).

"As we went on there were more crowds and more enthusiasm, and we began to think we were really somebody in particular." (Laughter and applause.)

"We passed through the ranks of your well-trained and well-drilled militia.

"It was the first time in history, I have no doubt, that a British force, with British colors, on American soil, marched past an American force, with American colors, and saluted it.

"From then on it has been one unbroken scene of enthusiasm and hearty greeting, whether we went about as individuals or as a body.

"I was told that yesterday there were a larger number of people on the streets of Boston than ever before seen.

"And now matters have culminated in such a scene—certainly I never before have witnessed, and I doubt if ever you have, either."

Lord Denbigh paid high tribute to the decorations, and to the culinary achievements. He returned thanks for the souvenirs, which he said his men would keep as "family heirlooms," and went on to say:—

"But what is behind all this? The welcome comes from far behind the ranks of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Co. But it would be intolerable conceit on our part to assume for a moment that the welcome was for such ordinary humdrum individuals as we are! (Cries of "No! No!")

"We've got to go farther back. Once we had a difference of opinion on tea! We thought it ought to be made in fresh water, and served hot, and you thought it ought to be made in salt water and served cold. (Laughter and applause.)

"That was a trifling thing.

"I can't say you got as good a reception in London streets as we got here, because we British are a desperately prosaic lot, and need a good deal of rousing. But I imagine it would be different if you came again.

"Then you got into trouble, and some other things happened. We two great nations had been envious of one another. But then we got to thinking if it wouldn't be a good idea to turn two negatives into a positive, and turn two envies int. one admiration. (Applause.)

"Why can we not do something to bring this about? And that's where things seem to be getting now! (Applause.)

"Tomorrow we say a temporary farewell to Boston, and we are promised that we shall be received in your big cities with as hearty a welcome as in Boston. But I am not prophetic. If it turns out so, then the feeling I speak of is not confined to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

"We're going to have the honor of being presented to your president; and the British colors will be dipped to your president. We should be proud if the feeling should be symbolized by the picture with which this menu closes."

Lord Denbigh here referred to the picture of an Ancient and Honourable clasping hands, with the word "Forever" beneath it. Long applause followed his manly speech, and he then led the Honourables in their peculiar yell.

Gov. Bates' speech made a great impression. Delivered, as it was, in such sonorous, full diaphason tones, every syllable was audible to the farthest corridor.

SEN. HOAR'S GREAT SPEECH TO LONDON HONOURABLES

"The first speech ever made on this continent is still one of the best. It was made by the Indian sachem Samoset to the Pilgrim fathers at Plymouth, on Mar. 16, 1621. It sums up in two words everything needed to be said on this occasion: 'Welcome, Englishmen!'

"We are a people made up of many races. It is said that, leaving out the negro, we are made up of about the same races, in about the same proportions, that the English were made of in the time of Queen Elizabeth and King James, when the Pilgrims came over and our fathers settled Boston.

"Yet England is still the mother country. Whatever may have happened, or whatever may happen, we have no heartier welcome, no warmer pressure of the hand, than for her.

"We may not always be ready to admit it, but there is nothing that touches the heart of an American, certainly of a Massachusetts man, or a Boston man, [illegible] or kindness from England. It gave us an infinite pleasure when you put the bust of Lowell, our Boston poet, and Longfellow, our Cambridge poet, in Westminster Abbey. There is another monument erected there, placed as the inscription tells us, by the province of Massachusetts Bay, in America. It is to the memory of Lord Howe, an honored Englishman who was beloved here as at home.

"Boston was settled by Englishmen in the beginning. Its institutions were English. The lion and the unicorn still adorn the Old State House. It was inevitable that as London had an Honourable Artillery Co., Boston should have an Ancient and Honorable Artillery Co. I think you will find that your American kinsmen have tried to copy you as well as they could.

"They believe that, after all, the best soldier is the citizen soldier. They have tried during all these years and generations to devote themselves, when not actually in battle—and there have been times when our Ancients and Honorables were not actually in battle—to cultivating the things that belong to peace. They have found, as I believe you have, that there is no more delightful martial music than the ringing of cut glass, and no flag of truce like a napkin.

"We owe great debts to each of the other great nations of Europe. But surely there can be no greater debt, no greater benefit conferred on one people by another than law, liberty, language, literature. All these we owe to England.

"We have had our differences and, unhappily, our wars. We have been restless under each other's criticism. But we have sought, if we could, to find the justification of our wars in English principles and on English authority.

Her father's blood before her father's face
Pelled up, and proved her truly of his race.

"Among the things in which Englishmen and Americans feel a common pride is the battle of Bunker Hill. I do not think either you or we would like to wipe out that memory. It is one of the best examples of Yankee fighting, and one of the best examples of English fighting to be found in history.

"We might, if we had thought of it, have put up a monument to the valor of both sides, like that at Quebec, which bears the names of Wolfe on one side and Montcalm on the other. It was an instance on both sides of clear English bull-dog grit. Both parties were so ready and eager to fight that they seem to have lost their heads. I suppose the American general and the British general, if the thing had happened lately, would have been lucky if he got off with nothing worse than a severe reprimand.

"Our English friends may be sure of their welcome. They are in the house of their friends, in the dwelling-place of their brethren. We cannot show you wonders like those you have left behind. We have few glories of architecture and of art. We have little antiquity. We have no palaces or castles or cathedrals or galleries like those to which you are accustomed at home. Yet possibly we also may have something to exhibit, in a modest way, of the fruitage of the tree of English liberty. We must yield the palm cheerfully to other nations in art and architecture and music. We have tried to emulate them, if not to excel them, in the things which constitute the strength and happiness of a free people. We have gone without the architectural glories of palaces and castles and cathedrals. We have tried to perfect the architecture of the people's dwellings, and you will find the English Bible and the English Shakespeare upon their shelves. The canvas does not live or breathe for us under the touch of Guido or Raphael. We have no Lawrence or Reynolds to preserve the features of high-born beauty. But at least health paints here with her roses the cheek of the factory girl. The music of Beethoven or Handel may not here rise and swell till it fills the dome which Angelo or Wren builded. But we have the music of children's voices in the well-paid workmen's home.

"We hope you may feel at home while you are here. When you go back to old Mother England, tell her her boys are contented and happy and growing. Give her our best love. Tell her we think of her with nothing but friendliness and good will. We have no sore feeling left, even for the spankings she used to give us. If she did not spare the rod, she did not spoil the child.

"We mourned with you for the loss of your gracious queen, alike the type of gentlest womanhood and the most illustrious sovereign in history. We look with you with confident anticipation and desire for a long and happy reign for her successor."

[20]

BALL ADVERTISER.

BOSTON, TUESDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 6, 1903. PRICE TWO CENTS.

GRIST OF INDICTMENS

AGAINST POST OFFICE OFFICIAS

Wholesale Fraud Alleged Agaist Trusted Officials of the Departmat —Tyner and Barrett Included.

Washington, Oct. 5.—Fifteen new indictments were brought in by the supreme court for the District of Columbia today as the final result of the investigation in the post office depstment. Several of these findings wre against persons who have already ben indicted.

The new indictments involve:—

J. N. Tyner, the late assistant attorney general for the post office department, and his assistant.

H. J. Barrett.

J. T. Metcalf, supt. of the money order system of the P. O. department.

Norman Metcalf, son of J. T. Metcalf.

H. C. Hallenback, president and general manager of the Wynkkoop, Hallenback & Crawford Co., of New York, the firm which for several years supplied the department with its money order blanks.

W. D. Boremus, who is connected with a house which has been supplying a stamp cancelling machine.

There were additional indictments against A. W. Machen, former supt. of free delivery; G. W. Beavers, former chief of the salary and allowance division; W. S. Towers, who was in charge of a sub-station of the Washington city post office, and State Senator C. A. Green of New York.

In some cases there were several indictments against one person.

Concerning the indictments against Tyner and Barrett, this statement was made by the post office department:—

"These indictments charge Tyner and Barrett with conspiracy and two additional indictments charge Barrett with agreeing, while still in office, to receive fees for services rendered or to be rendered in cases pending before him as an officer. All the indictments are founded upon the treatment by Tyner and Barrett of the business of the so-called bond investment companies.

"It is charged that it was the duty of Tyner and Barrett—assistant attorney general and assistant attorney for the post office department—to investigate the methods of concerns charged with improper use of the mails, and in case of guilt to report to the postmaster general and recommend the issue of a fraud order; that in this connection they investigated the business of the bond investment cos. and learned that they were all carrying on business that involved fraud or lottery or both, but that instead of recommending to the postmaster general the issue of an order that would prevent the delivery of mail or the payment of money orders to those concerns, and would thus break up their business, Tyner and Barrett conspired to give them unobstructed use of the mails in order that Barrett might profit thereby."

The principal charge against Tyner and Barrett is that of misconduct in office, in obstructing and preventing the due and orderly administration of the law. It is stated that there were no less than 80 of the so-called bond investment companies to which an "opinion of the department" was sent together with the circular intimating that Barrett's services as attorney could be secured.

The charge against Hallenback and the Metcalfs is that of conspiracy to defraud the U. S. The company of which Hallenback is the head had a contract with the U. S. to furnish the postal service with its money order blanks.

Norman Metcalf was employed as a clerk in the office of the Wynkkoop, Hallenback & Crawford Co. at a salary of $30 a week.

It is alleged that a conspiracy existed between Hallenback and the Metcalfs in that there was an agreement between them that there should be no inspection of the forms supplied by the company; that on account of this agreement the forms were printed on inferior paper; that only one side of them was lithographed, while the contract called for the lithographing of both sides and that by other devices the company was enabled to save large sums of money at the expense of the government.

While it is not so stated in the indictment it is asserted by the post office authorities that the government lost at least $50,000 in one year by this arrangement. It is also asserted that there was an agreement whereby the contracting company paid young Metcalf 11-5 cents for each book of forms shipped, and it is stated that the shipments reached as high as 800,000 books. The allegation is made that the elder Metcalf secured the payment for the inferior work supplied by the contractors.

The new charge against Machen is that of accepting a bribe in connection with the delivery of badges worn by rural free delivery carriers which were made by C. J. Heller of Philadelphia.

There are two new indictments against Beavers, one of them charging him with accepting $25 each on a number of book typewriting machines sold to the government by Scott Towers and the other alleging misconduct in the purchase of stamp cancelling machines from W. D.

WARNING WAS NOT IN VAIN; CRAZY MAN TAKEN IN TIME

After a Desperate Struggle, Elliott is Overpowered, Before He Reaches the President—Washington Still Apprehensive

Washington, Oct. 5.—Today's warning in The Advertiser to the secret service men to be on the lookout for a dangerous "crank," was quickly followed by the news of his arrest. Elliott's desperate attack at the very door of the white house has startled the city.

More than ever, the men who guard Pres. Roosevelt are convinced that there is an anarchist plot of a dangerous character afoot. The country need not be surprised to hear at any moment of the arrest of some desperate anarchists of Chicago and other western cities.

If there has not been a dastardly plot against the life of the president, then many signs are misleading.

If the secret service men have not yet evidence enough to justify them in putting the "Reds" under arrest, at least they have enough to make it worth the while of the police in each large city to keep the closest watch on the acts and words of the anarchist groups in their section.

The warning published in The Advertiser Oct. 2 and repeated this morning, that proof had been found of a plot to send an armed crazy man to the white house, is more than confirmed. What would have happened had not the president had warning, it is impossible to say.

"If the people of the United States knew all that we know," says one official, "there would be a pretty strong demand that every anarchist group in this country be driven out of it. They are a nest of vipers. They crawl like snakes, noiselessly and in the dirt; but they have not been able to strike the president yet, thank God!"

That the information of the secret service is correct is plain from these significant facts:—

(1) Elliott's case is only one of several.

(2) Within a week no less than four such men have been arrested.

(3) One of the others was armed and was aiming a revolver at a white house window, when arrested.

(4) All four either are or pretend to be insane.

(5) All four come from sections where anarchist groups exist.

The secret service men deprecate the publication of their proof against the anarchists until the arrests shall be made.

"When will that be?" one official was asked.

"Not until we have such proof that nothing but immediate conviction will be possible," was the determined reply. "We have had them men before, but the courts let them go or gave them mild sentences. This time it is war to the death."

CRANK AT WHITE HOUSE

Said He Was Peter Elliott, Swede, but Was Quiet Until Refused Entrance to President.

Washington, Oct. 5.—A Swede, who gave his name as Peter Elliott, was arrested at the White House about 11:30 o'clock this morning, while making an endeavor to see Pres. Roosevelt, and when being taken to the House of Detention in a glass covered cab drew a revolver and showed fight. In the struggle which followed Elliott was badly cut by the broken glass of the cab and severely bruised, and Policeman James Cissel, one of the White House guards, was also cut severely.

Elliott had written several letters to Pres. Roosevelt, in one of which he inclosed a poem complimentary to the president. He expressed in the letters a desire and intention of seeing Roosevelt, and as it was evident from these communications that he was a crank, the force of police men and ushers at the White House and the adjacent executive offices were instructed to be on the look out for him.

At the station house Elliott gave his occupation as that of a machinist. He said he had lived in this country for 11 years, most of the time in Minneapolis. He said he came to Washington from Paterson, N. J.

Late this afternoon the police surgeons, after a careful examination of Elliott, certified that he was insane. An order was issued immediately for his removal to St. Elizabeth's hospital for the insane.

About 10 a.m. this morning he appeared at the executive offices. Entering the vestibule, he inquired for Pres. Roosevelt. One of the doorkeepers asked him why he wanted to see the president.

"Oh, just for fun," he responded. 'The

CONTINUED ON PAGE EIGHT.

DUKE OF DEVONSHIRE IS OUT OF BALFOUR'S CABINET

THE NEW BRITISH CABINET.

J. F. BRODRICK, formerly secretary for war, succeeds LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, as secretary for India.

AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN, postmaster general, succeeds C. T. RITCHIE, as chancellor of the exchequer.

ALFRED LYTTLETON, recorder of Oxford, succeeds JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN, as secretary of the colonies.

H. O. ARNOLD-FORSTER, secretary to the admiralty, succeeds MR. BRODRICK, as secretary for war.

GRAHAM MURRAY, lord advocate of Scotland, succeeds LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH, as secretary for Scotland.

LORD STANLEY, financial secretary of the war office, succeeds AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN, as postmaster general.

London, Oct. 5—The duke of Devonshire (who was leader of the conservative party in the house of lords) has resigned the office of lord president of the council and the king has accepted his resignation.

The duke of Devonshire wrote to Mr. Balfour giving his reasons for his resignation which he attributed among other things to the premier's speech at Sheffield and his pamphlet on insular free trade.

In his letter the duke says:

"It was necessary, in my opinion, for the purpose of the statement to which I had assented, to assert that the controversy of 1846, which you describe as the great lawsuit between free trade and protection, is of no interest whatever to us except from an historical point of view. Nor can I think that it was necessary to assert that you desired to reverse the fiscal tradition, to alter fundamentally the fiscal tradition that has prevailed during the last two generations.

"I had hoped to have found in your speech a definite statement of adherence to the principles of free trade as the ordinary basis of our fiscal and commercial system and an equally definite repudiation of the principle of protection in the interest of our national industries.

"But in their absence I cannot help thinking that such declarations as those which I have quoted cannot fail to have the effect of materially encouraging the advocates of direct protection in the controversy which has been raised throughout the country and of discouraging those who, like me, and I hoped yourself, believe that our present system of free imports and especially of food imports is on the whole most advantageous to the country, although we do not contend that the principles on which it rests possess any such authority or sanctity as to forbid any departures from it for sufficient reasons."

The three weeks' cabinet crisis has ended in a manner more remarkable and dramatic than that of its inception. Balfour's new ministry affords a measure of the enormous difficulty he has had to contend with in the task of reconstruction and its composition seems to indicate that the premier himself can have little belief of its durability.

The most sanguine supporters of the government tonight express the smallest hopes of such an administration living many months, and the prevalent idea is that there will be a general election before parliament reassembles.

The withdrawal of the Duke of Devonshire is a heavy blow. Had he remained the government might possibly have survived another parliamentary session by avoiding legislation dealing with the fiscal problem, but with him goes the support of the strong party of liberal unionists in the country.

Mr. Balfour's extraordinary letter reproaching the Duke of Devonshire with breach of faith, is the theme of universal surprise and comment.

HEBREW FAITHFUL OBSERVE FEAST OF TABERNACLE

The feast of Succoth, or Succous, the thanksgiving festival of the Jews, began last night with a service in the synagogue.

During this feast, which lasts nine days, the orthodox Hebrew lives much in a tent, either in his backyard or on the roof, and eats altogether there. The object is to commemorate the children of Israel's being brought out of the land of Egypt, and their deliverance from bondage under Pharaoh.

In Salem st. and other quarters of the North End where the Hebrew residents mostly congregate, very many of the houses had tents specially erected for the present observance and in the yards and on the roofs of others the first meal of the feast was eaten in structures which are a permanent adjunct of the dwelling. Some of these were plain square huts, the sides constructed of boarding with bamboo for a top covering. In rainy weather the surroundings would be rather uncomfortable.

The huts have two or more windows loosely fitted into the boarding. Some of the tents were tastefully decorated with branches of palm trees and willows, and all had at least a little bit of live green within.

It will be remembered by Bible students that when the ancestors of the Hebrews came out of Egypt they journeyed for 40 yrs. in the desert, living in huts, booths, the feast would be under unfavorable auspices so far as the weather was concerned, but the rain ceased to fall just before the hour of eating and the moon came out.

The dim lights in many of the tents were augmented by a beam of moonlight, which, here and there, where the position was favorable, struggled through the window panes, making the scene, with the venerable head of the family presiding over a gathering of his own and sometimes of neighbors who were without the opportunity of having a booth of their own, a strangely picturesque one.

The first two days of the festival are held sacred, and the truly orthodox will do no work then on, but in the five middle days business may be pursued with restrictions. So pronounced is this rule that when The Advertiser reporter requested Max Levine, a bright lad of 13, the son of the janitor of the Jewish synagogue on Baldwin pl., who had with an unusual intelligence answered many questions on the occasion, to write a name in English, the lad courteously refused, saying that he was permitted to do no work that day.

While there are many among the Hebrews, as among other sects, who have departed from the orthodoxy of the fathers, yet the celebration of Succoth is observed by the majority of the race, although by some with less strictness than others.

Conjointly with the commemoration of the deliverance, the feast is intended to be a "grateful acknowledgment to the Almighty" for His goodness in providing wine, oil and fruits for His people—and of the gathering of the harvest.

BRASS and BRASS.

Remember that all Brass Bedsteads are not alike.

It is impossible to get reliable tubing, proper finish and sound construction at the cost of thin tubing, superficial finish and cheap construction. It simply cannot be done.

We sell Brass Bedsteads for the smallest amount of money for which a proper bedstead can be made. We handle only such grades as we should be willing to use ourselves. Any other kind is worse than money wasted.

If you want standard tubing at the smallest margin above actual cost we can supply you.

PAINE FURNITURE CO.

RUGS, DRAPERIES AND FURNITURE,

48 CANAL STREET.

SPLENDID BANQUET OF ANCIENTS UNEQUALLED IN MAGNIFICENCE

London Honourables Dazed by Gorgeousness of the Affair—Lord Denbigh's Address a Notable Feature—Eloquent Greetings From Sen. Hoar and Other Dignitaries

SEN. HOAR'S GREETING TO LONDON MILITIAMEN.

"We have made some improvement on this continent since we came over. But, after all, the first speech recorded in history as made on this continent is still one of the best. It was made by the Indian sachem Samoset to the Pilgrim fathers, at Plymouth, on the 16th of March, 1621. It sums up in two words everything needed to be said on this occasion:—Welcome, Englishmen!"

THE TOASTS.

Col. Darling officiated as toastmaster.

The President of the United States—"One in 80,000,000 and 80,000,000 in one." Collector Lyman.

His Britannic Majesty King Edward VII. —Response by the band playing "God Save the King." "The manly chief of a manly people, the apostle of fellowship among the nations of the earth."

Welcome from the Commonwealth of Massachusetts—"From western hills to eastern strand, the Bay State greets you heart and hand." Gov Bates.

Welcome from the City of Boston—"As God was with our fathers so may he be with us and with those gathered within our gates." Mayor Collins.

The Honourable Artillery Co. of London—"May we never meet them but in peace; never engage them but in hospitality; never part from them but in love." Lord Denbigh.

Old Mother England—"The stalwart son honors the sturdy parent." Sen. Hoar.

Our Honorary Members—"Two in number: Edward, king and emperor, and J. D. Long, the best fellow of all princes, the prince of all good fellows." Ex-Gov. Long.

Our Canadian Neighbors—"Not cold, but full of warmth and glow, is our fair lady of the snow." Col. F. W. Hibbard, Montreal.

Harvard Univ.—"Imperial in her colors, her history and her truth." Prof. de Sumichrast.

The Volunteer Militia—"The best type of citizen is he who will fight to make citizenship worth having." Gen. W. A. Bancroft.

The Ancient and Honorable Artillery Co. of Massachusetts—"Proud of its history; true to its traditions; loyal to the Commonwealth whose name it bears." Chaplain W. H. Rider.

BANQUET A FITTING CLIMAX.

The magnificent banquet given in Symphony hall last night, by the Ancients, to the Honourable Artillery Co. of London, was a fitting climax to the series of ovations, fetes, and triumphs, excelling even those of a Roman emperor, which have marked the visit of this British military body to Boston.

Columns have already been given to descriptions, in advance, of the sumptuous affair of last night.

But only the brush of a master artist, and the genius of a poet-laureate, could do justice to the splendid spectacle itself.

Even the unlimited expenditure of the most epicurean of old-world monarchs could have unfolded such a scene, for they had not the magic wand of modern science.

When Lord Denbigh said he had never before looked upon such a sight, and doubted if many of those present had, there was no dissenting opinion.

The marvels of electricity, together with the florist's art, transformed the already beautiful hall into an enchanted bower.

When the thousand guests were once seated, each group of 11 at a round table, first the laurel canopy, with its superb jewelled crown, over the stage, burst into a soft lambent flame; then the laurel festooned balconies glowed with a rosy light, like the finger-tips of Aurora, and then amber, and ruby, and cool green; last, the smilax-wreathed, rose laden tables were suddenly illuminated with tiny, vari-colored, electric lamps.

At the back of the stage a blazing coat-of-arms of the Honourables, in kaleidoscopic coloring, reflected the coat-of-arms of the Ancients, similarly picked out, above the second gallery.

When the ladies entered, at 9 p.m., the grand spectacle was complete. Below, on stage and floor, was the vivid sea of color furnished by the brilliant uniforms of the Ancients, the Honourables, and army and navy officers, varied by the black and white of evening civilian attire. Above, tier on tier, like the terraces of a flower garden, rose the banks of fair faces, and elegant gowns, and jewels.

The costliness of the fete has already been set down in figures—the thousands of lights, the miles of wire, the miles of laurel, the thousands of roses, the specially woven carpet, the specially constructed furniture and culinary appliances, and the beautiful souvenirs, as well as the victuals and drink.

Photo by Chickering.
COL. SIDNEY HEDGES.

To epitomize: it was the dinner of the age.

The arrangements proved faultless.

The guests assembled in Horticultural Hall, where a brilliant reception preceded the major event. Gov. Bates, Lord Denbigh, Gen. Chaffee, Gov. Bachelder of New Hampshire, and Gov. Long, stood in the receiving line, while Col. Hedges and Col. Darling presented the guests. A distinguished group stood behind or near the line, among whom were ex-Gov. Boutwell, Rev. Dr. Hale, Adm. Johnson, Capt. Hodges of the Chicago, Judge Lowell of the U. S. court, Lt.-Gov. Guild and Mayor Collins, while the governor's staff made a glittering background.

The various halls of the building, some of which were used for coat rooms, were superbly decorated. The brick walls being well nigh covered with bunting, flags, the coats-of-arms of the Honourables, the Ancients, the British empire, the United States, the Commonwealth, and all the colonies and dependencies of Great Britain as well as the flags of that nation, of the United States and of Scotland and Ireland.

Naturally, it was Lord Denbigh who was followed with closest attention, especially as he spoke briefly, extemporaneously, and in good voice. He was given "Three cheers and a tiger," when called on, and the great assembly rose a second time to their feet, in the exuberance of their enthusiasm, to cheer and applaud again. He began, with studied courtesy,—

THE EARL OF DENBIGH
FROM THE SKETCH

THE EARL OF DENBIGH.

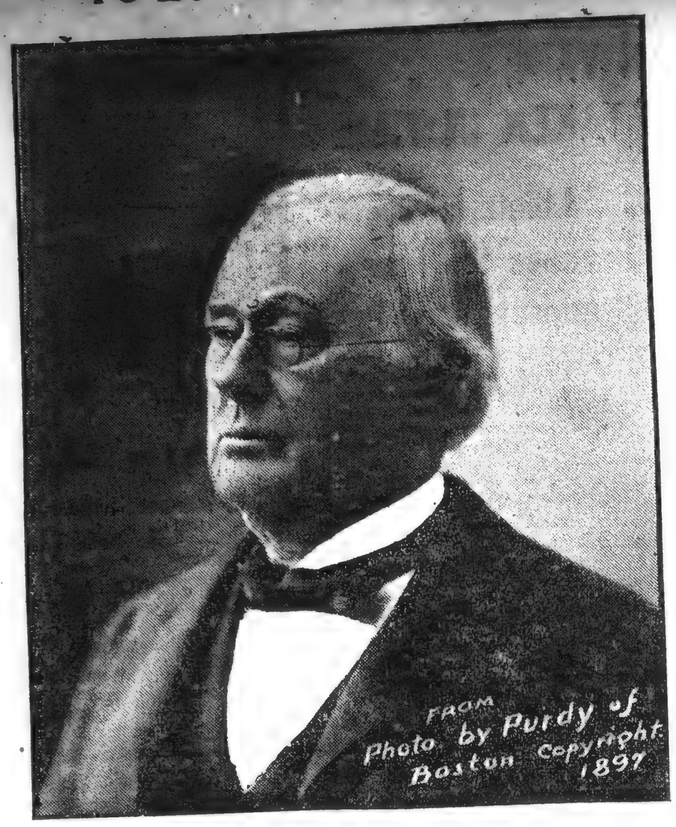
"Col. Hedges, Your Excellency, Your Honor, Ladies and Gentlemen:—At the hour of 3 a.m. today, just as I had finished a four hours' conversation (laughter) with your indefatigable chairman, and our indefatigable secretaries, on the subject of the arrangements for next week, I asked him if he could tell me how many weeks we'd been in Boston. (Laughter.) Col. Hedges assured me, on his honor as a gentleman, and as the commander of the Ancients, that we had only arrived Friday. (Laughter.)

"This morning, as I was engaged in my 247th quick change of uniform (laughter), I observed to the valet, that I had never done so much dressing up in my life.

"'Well,' he said, 'I've assisted many gentlemen to dress, but the way you slide into your clothes just takes my eye.' (Laughter and applause). I mention this little thing to give you some small sense of the abject state of bewilderment I find myself in continually.

"The other day we visited Providence, and enjoyed the magnificent hospitality of that city. ('Hear! hear!' from the

SEN. HOAR'S GREAT SPEECH TO LONDON HONOURABLES



SEN. HOAR.

"The first speech ever made on this continent is still one of the best. It was made by the Indian sachem Samoset to the Pilgrim fathers at Plymouth, on Mar. 16, 1621. It sums up in two words everything needed to be said on this occasion: 'Welcome, Englishmen!'

"We are a people made up of many races. It is said that, leaving out the negro, we are made up of about the same races, in about the same proportions, that the English were made of in the time of Queen Elizabeth and King James, when the Pilgrims came over and our fathers settled Boston.

"Yet England is still the mother country. Whatever may have happened, or whatever may happen, we have no heartier welcome, no warmer pressure of the hand, than for her.

"We may not always be ready to admit it, but there is nothing that touches the heart of an American, certainly of a Massachusetts man, or a Boston man, more than an honor or kindness from England. It gave us an infinite pleasure when you put the bust of Lowell, our Boston poet, and Longfellow, our Cambridge poet, in Westminster Abbey. There is another monument erected there, placed as the inscription tells us, by the province of Massachusetts Bay, in America. It is to the memory of Lord Howe, an honored Englishman who was beloved here as at home.

"On that monument there is an allegorical figure, which I think cannot be found anywhere else in sculpture, the genius of the province of Massachusetts Bay. The sculpture, I suppose, is not of the first excellence among the famous works of art to be found in London. But, after all, as a near kinsman of mine said more than 50 yrs ago: It is pleasant to think that the genius of Massachusetts Bay has an honest fight, and finds a fitting place in Westminster Abbey among the heroic spirits which the English race has nurtured.

"Boston was settled by Englishmen in the beginning. Its institutions were English. The lion and the unicorn still adorn the Old State House. It was inevitable that as London had an Honourable Artillery Co., Boston should have an Ancient and Honorable Artillery Co. I think you will find that your American kinsmen have tried to copy you as well as they could.

"They believe that, after all, the best soldier is the citizen soldier. They have tried during all these years and generations to devote themselves, when not actually in battle—and there have been times when our Ancients and Honorables were not actually in battle—to cultivating the things that belong to peace. They have found, as I believe you have, that there is no more delightful martial music than the ringing of cut glass, and no flag of truce like a napkin.

"We owe great debts to each of the other great nations of Europe. But surely there can be no greater debt, no greater benefit conferred on one people by another than law, liberty, language, literature. All these we owe to England.

"We have had our differences and, unhappily, our wars. We have been restless under each other's criticism. But we have sought, if we could, to find the justification of our wars in English principles, and on English authority.

Her father's blood before her father's face
Poured up, and proved her truly of his race.

"Among the things in which Englishmen and Americans feel a common pride is the battle of Bunker Hill. I do not think either you or we would like to wipe out that memory. It is one of the best examples of Yankee fighting, and one of the best examples of English fighting to be found in history.

"We might, if we had thought of it, have put up a monument to the valor of both sides, like that at Quebec, which bears the names of Wolfe on one side and Montcalm on the other. It was an instance on both sides of clear English bull-dog grit. Both parties were so ready and eager to fight that they seem to have lost their heads. I suppose the American general and the British general, if the thing had happened now, would have been lucky if he got off with nothing worse than a severe reprimand.

"Our commander sent his forces imperfectly provided with ammunition, and with rations not enough for 24 hours. All Sir William Howe had to do on your side was to move his ships up Charles River and up Mystic River, where they commanded the isthmus, and the Yankees would have been completely at his mercy. He need not, I suppose, have lost a man. He had only to draw the strings, and we were bagged. There was never an example of blundering generalship worse than that on our side; although I believe it is claimed that the officer who led our detachment took possession of the wrong hill.

"On the other hand, instead of pursuing his advantage and easily bagging his game, the English commander stormed our earthworks. His men charged with a magnificent and desperate courage up the steepest and most difficult part of the hill. They were repulsed twice. They stormed our redoubts with a magnificent English pluck, and we held on, also, with magnificent English pluck, until our ammunition was gone, and then sullenly made good our retreat.

"A delightful Englishman, a dear friend of mine, told me this story, which shows that if you have not built a monument to British valor over here at Charlestown, you fight over the battle of Bunker Hill occasionally, even now, at home.

"My friend told me that an intimate friend of his was Lt. Col. Holland, a retired officer of the Royal Marines. I dare say he is living now. Col. Holland told him that the Royal Marines never could be stationed anywhere near the 88th Connaught Rangers. They perpetually stir up quarrels with the men of the 88th, so that some years ago the Rangers had to be removed from Portsmouth, the headquarters of the Royal Marines, to another district. The reason is that they always get into a fight when they meet. If one of the marines finds a ranger in a public house or meets him in the street, he calls out, 'Lie down 88th, and let the marines pass to the front.' Then follows a fight.

"Neither of the men has the slightest idea where that comes from. Col. Holland says it came from the battle of Bunker Hill in America. The Americans were entrenched in a very strong position. Most of them were backwoodsmen, and about the best marksmen in the world. To reach the American lines the British had to march up the open slopes, fully exposed to the sweeping fire of American sharpshooters, who, sheltered by their entrenchments, were bound to sweep away their exposed assailants.

"The old 88th, or Connaught Rangers, were in the first line of attack, with a battalion of Royal Marines behind them in the second line, as their support. The Rangers suffered terribly. Half the regiment were killed, and their ammunition run out. It was time to relieve them, and the general rode up and ordered them to lie down, in the usual manner of relieving under fire.

"The exhausted men would form four deep and lie down, leaving a space; and the relieving line would form four deep also and advance and pass between the blank files. So the word was passed along the shattered, 'Lie down 88th, and let the marines pass to the front.'

"This was done. The marines suffered fearfully, but accomplished the relief and captured the redoubt. For this service they were awarded a laurel-leaf, to be worn on their buttons and caps. Col. Holland added: 'I wore it myself for 26 yrs.'

"So, my friends, while we have been celebrating it over here, you have been fighting Bunker Hill over again, some of you, over there. I do not wonder that you wanted to come over and see the spot.

"Our English friends may be sure of their welcome. They are in the house of their friends, in the dwelling-place of their brethren. We cannot show you wonders like those you have left behind. We have few glories of architecture and of art. We have little antiquity. We have no palaces or castles or cathedrals or galleries like those to which you are accustomed at home. Yet possibly we also may have something to exhibit, in a modest way, of the fruitage of the tree of English liberty. We must yield the palm cheerfully to other nations in art and architecture and music. We have tried to emulate them, if not to excel them, in the things which constitute the strength and happiness of a free people. We have gone without the architectural glories of palaces and castles and cathedrals. We have tried to perfect the architecture of the people's dwellings, and you will find the English Bible and the English Shakespeare upon their shelves. The canvas does not live or breathe for us under the touch of Guido or Raphael. We have no Lawrence or Reynolds to preserve the features of highborn beauty. But at least health paints here with her roses the cheek of the factory girl. The music of Beethoven or Handel may not here rise and swell till it fills the dome which Angelo or Wren builded. But we have the music of children's voices in the well-paid workmen's home.

"We hope you may feel at home while you are here. When you go back to old Mother England, tell her her boys are contented and happy and growing. Give her our best love. Tell her we think of her with nothing but friendliness and good will. We have no sore feeling left, even for the spankings she used to give us. If she did not spare the rod, she did not spoil the child.

"We mourned with you for the loss of your gracious queen, alike the type of gentlest womanhood and the most illustrious sovereign in history. We look with you with confident anticipation and desire for a long and happy reign for her successor."

"Whatever years may have in store for us let us all here resolve that in storm and sunshine those great emblems of justice, freedom and daring, the Union Jack and the Stars and Stripes, shall be found floating side by side!

"Tonight we send a message of greeting to your beloved and royal commander, his majesty, King Edward, and to all of your brethren in arms in England, and so, as Tiny Tim observed: 'May God bless us, every one!' "

COLLECTOR LYMAN.

Collector Lyman was virile and resourceful as usual.

"A toast to the president is a formal salute to the United States, of which he is the official head, and our country hails you, our guests from across the sea, in the same spirit of welcome and respect that you may be assured he would rejoice personally to extend to you, could we have been honored this evening by the presence of our chief executive, Pres. Roosevelt.

"Look upon these banners, their folds so beautifully and artistically draped, and blending in fraternal strength the might of England's standard and the glory of the Stars and Stripes. On the one side is the crowned king of beasts, a lion rampant, and his battle-cry is first, 'For God,' and then for 'His right.' And yonder the king of birds, the American eagle, with pinions raised and talons spread, and his battle-cry is 'Union.' And beside the two, ready for attack or defense, stand the shields of both.

"How noble an ideal is set forth in such a union! Each is the true soldier of civilization and each the knight errant of virtue, for both proclaim by act and precept the vital germ and principle of all true progress and success—moral force.

"It signifies that the lion of Great Britain and all he represents, and the eagle of America and all he represents, both know that for every reason, selfish or holy, such a union stands for one race alone among all the dwellers on this globe. It means that its component parts may dwell apart, but that no other race can or will dare to come between them.

"It means that if ever joined in common cause, united for God and right, they would march together under the unconquerable banner of progress. It means that however its different peoples may be separated by land or sea, however diverse may be their personal aims or business interests, the history of the past, the needs of the present, the hopes of the future, all point out with unerring hand, as the champion of this world's onward march of civilization, the race of the Anglo-Saxon.

"Gentlemen, look upon this land as she is today. Behold her agricultural products, her forests, her mines—all her natural resources. Behold her triumphs in the arts and sciences, in mechanics, her foreign and domestic trade, and her vast business interests. Behold her seats of learning, her government, her laws, her courts of justice, her institutions, religious and secular, her 80,000,000 of people and their rating among the nations of the earth.

"What greater glory to the parent than a child's success? And Mother England, the foremost evangelist of civilization, may with honest pride point her finger westward to the shores of the great republic and exclaim, 'Behold my offspring!' "

Mayor Collins was brief and witty.

Gov. Long made a hit when he said: "Chester Arthur (the only other honorary member of the Ancients besides King Edward and himself) surprised the American people as much as one senior senator surprised our present president."

Col. Hibbard, who spoke in place of Sir F. W. Borden, made a ringing speech full of patriotic feeling for Great Britain.

PROF. DE SUMICHRAST.

Prof. de Sumichrast, in opening, referred to the great work Harvard Univ. had done towards bringing England and the United States into closer relations. He referred to the few who "twisted the lion's tail" for pastime, and condemned the use in the public schools of history text books which give a biassed account of the events leading up to the Revolutionary War. After touching on the hostility of many Irish-Americans towards England, and expressing his belief in a better and brighter day for Ireland, Prof. de Sumichrast closed with these words:—

"We have the same national anthem, and the words of 'God Save the King' mingle harmonious and resonant with those of 'My Country, 'Tis of Thee, Sweet Land of Liberty, of Thee I Sing.' So let them ever be heard together, sung with heart and soul by Britons and Americans together, typical of that union which is the more real, the more firm, the more lasting that it is not embodied in any treaty or written document, but in the hearts and lives of the men of each land, and that, with the help of the Lord, we mean, Americans and Britons together, to carry out for man's advantage, come what may!"

GEN. BANCROFT.

Sen. Bancroft was enthusiastically applauded.

"The militia, both of this Commonwealth and of the country, will feel much pleased, I am sure, to know that it has been named upon an occasion of so much distinction, and indeed it is highly appropriate that this institution of government should have formal attention at this extraordinary festivity; for nearly 400 yrs. ago, this institution brought into existence one of these famous corps, and, transplanted to another continent, brought also into existence the other 100 yrs. later.

"I am sure the militia in this community had never a more agreeable duty to perform than they had when privileged to escort the Boston company and its guests through the streets of this town. I am equally sure that our militia appreciated the highly martial appearance which the London company made. Your command, My Lord, looked so 'very smart' (I believe that is what they would say at home), and I say this of our militia, who are accustomed to be astonished every year at the marching of the Boston company, of whom a certain commander-in-chief said some years ago that he had never seen anything like it.

"You have named, sir, the militia, the militia in its broad sense in distinction from the profession of arms. In fact, there is much difference between them, but if we are to believe Blackstone, the spirit of the British constitution did not find a place for the professional soldier. The same idea is expressed in the motto upon the seal of our Commonwealth of Massachusetts; 'Ense petit placidam sub libertate quietem,' which a gallant officer of our militia has somewhat freely translated: 'He will have peace even if he has to fight for it.' The congress also expresses the idea in our small regular army.

"In other words, the British and the American conception of military force is an organized body of citizens, trained in the art of war, and while in practice it is found expedient that some men should devote their time and thought constantly to the military service; in political plan, every regular soldier is a citizen, temporarily performing special duties for the good of all.

"It is, however, peculiarly the part of the militiamen, the citizen soldier, by whatever name he may be called, to exemplify the spirit both of the British constitution and of the republic of the United States. He studies and practices the profession of arms as a public spirited citizen. He regards military service as he regards jury duty or the exercise of the suffrage. Individually he devotes himself to military service, either because he may conceive that he is better fitted for it, or because it needs him, and indeed, he is quite as likely to make a personal sacrifice as though he entered some branch of the civil service. He may enter both services.

"May I couple, sir, the citizen soldier of the empire and the citizen soldier of the republic, one in language, one in civilization, one in spirit? Together may they uphold the principles of the great English speaking peoples.

Till the war-drum throbs no longer and the battle flags are furled
In the parliament of men, the federation of the world.

"Citizens always; soldiers when needed. Duty alone determines. Zealous, devoted, Loving country! Loving liberty under law! Such a soldier I make bold to say had you in Arthur, Duke of Wellington; such a soldier had we in Washington. May their
* * * * * * Great example stand
Colossal, seen of every land,
And keep the soldier firm, the statesman pure,
Till in all lands and thro' all human story
The path of duty be the way to glory."

Rev. W. H. Rider made a militant speech, for a parson, eulogizing the Ancients.

THE EARL OF DENBIGH'S SIGNIFICANT EPIGRAM

"This welome comes from far behind the ranks of the Ancients. We two great nations had been envious of one another. But then we got to thinking if it wouldn't be a good idea to turn two negatives into one positive, two envies into one admiration. (Applause.) And that's where things seem to be getting now."

THE MENU.

Cape Cod Oysters.
Clear Green Turtle.
Prince Albert Sherry.
Aiguillettes of Halibut Cardinal.
Cucumbers. Potatoes Hollandaise.
Haut Sauterne.
Tournedos of Filet of Beef a la Previllot.
String Beans.
Pommery Sec et Brut.
Epigrammes of Sweetbreads Sevigni.
Green Peas.
Sorbet a la Militaire.
Cigarettes.
Squab Chickens Roasted.
Romaine and Tomato Salad.
Bombe Glaces International.
Petits Fours.
Coffee.
Cheese. Cigars.

Gov. Bates' speech made a great impression. Delivered, as it was, in such sonorous, full diaphason tones, every syllable was audible to the farthest corridor.

The speechmaking began soon after 9 p.m., and lasted till 12:35 a.m.

Col. Hedges opened, saying:—

COL. HEDGES.

"Could Robert Keayne, the founder of the company, and its first commander, but look in upon us tonight and see these two companies mingling in good fellowship, what joy and pride would be his!

"This thought makes me feel that in some way we are realizing what was in the soul of Robert Keayne, and bringing to fulfilment what to him was, at the best, but a vague and simple dream.

"The growth of our international relations, or rather, the development of our family spirit in these two organizations, began when a small delegation from our company was sent to the 350th anniversary of the Honourable Artillery Co. in 1887. This was followed by a delegation of 21 from the Honourable Artillery in 1888, and from this meeting many warm personal friendships have been dated.

"In 1896 came the visit of this company to London, one of the most remarkable and enjoyable ever paid by the civilian soldiery of one land to an organization whose commander-in-chief and officers were of the royalty and nobility of another.

"And so the history grows, until now we welcome this splendid delegation to our annual fall field day. In the name of our company, my friends, I give you a cordial greeting and a welcome from New England to old England.

"The company that came in the Mayflower was so notable that her name is embalmed forever in the history of our country. Let us hope that your voyage in the new Mayflower may prove a harbinger of events no less important in the history of our land and race.

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

1.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

BRILLIANT BANQUET FITTING CLIMAX TO BOSTON'S WELCOME

(Copyright by Purdy, 1903.)

The Earl of Denbigh and Desmond,

Commander of the Honourable Artillery Company of London. Made from a photograph taken at his only sitting in America. Lord Denbigh appears in the undress uniform of the corps.

The climax of the spectacular hospitality that Boston began to extend to the Honourable Artillery Company of London four days ago, a hospitality that has grown as a tidal wave of public enthusiasm always grows, broke with brilliancy as the guests were ushered into Symphony Hall last evening, their eyes to be dazzled in the extravagance yet elegance of decoration of flowers and light, their ears to be filled with the strains of sweetest music, their appetites to be appeased by a feast that has been for months in preparations, and their patriotism to be fired, as the dual patriotism of England and America has never before been fired, by the speeches of some of the most eloquent orators of the land.

At the banquet in the evening Col. Hedges officiated, with Lord Denbigh as the guest of honor, Governor Bates, his staff, Lieutenant Governor Guild, Senator Hoar, Mayor Collins, former Secretary John D. Long, Gen. Chaffee and a score of other men who had won military or professional fame in this and other countries being also guests. The speakers of the evening were Governor Bates, United States Senator Hoar, Mayor Collins, Earl of Denbigh, ex-Governor Long, Collector George H. Lyman, Sir Frederick W. Borden of Canada, Professor F. C. de Sumichrast of Harvard, Gen. William A. Bancroft and Rev. William H. Rider. Col. Charles K. Darling was the toastmaster.

BANQUET ONE THAT AMAZED THE GUESTS

At Symphony Hall last evening all that the Ancient and Honorable Company of Boston had promised during their years of preparation was offered in a feast to every sense of those present—a picture of light and color, of life and motion to dazzle the eye, of

GUESTS AT HEAD TABLE AT ANCIENTS' BANQUET.

33	31	29	27	25	23	21	19	17	15	13	11	9	7	5	3	1	2	4	6	8	10	12	14	16	18	20	22	24	26	28	30
Professor F. C. SUMICHRAST.	Col. CHARLES K. DARLING.	Rev. WILLIAM H. RIDER.	Gen. JOHN L. THERNAN.	Adjt.-Gen. AUGUSTUS D. AYLING of New Hampshire.	Hon. N. J. BACHELDER, Governor of New Hampshire.	GEORGE A. HIBBARD, Postmaster.	Hon. L. F. C. GARVIN, Governor of Rhode Island.	Capt. C. A. F. TALBOT, British Consul.	Maj. C. E. D. BUDWORTH, H. A. C.	Hon. JOHN D. LONG.	Lieutenant Governor CURTIS GUILD, JR.	Hon. J. Q. A. BRACKETT.	Hon. P. A. COLLINS.	Gen. SAMUEL DALTON.	Governor JOHN L. BATES.	Col. SIDNEY M. HEDGES.	COL DENSIGH, H. A. C.	Hon. GEORGE H. LYMAN, Collector of Port.	Hon. GEORGE F. HOAR.	Lieut.-Col. STORTWASSER, H. A. C.	Gen. ADNA R. CHAFFEE, U. S. A.	Gen. WILLIAM A. BANCROFT.	Maj. MUNDAY, H. A. C.	GEORGE A. MARDEN, Sub-Treasurer.	Hon. A. A. CHAMBERLIN, Governor of Connecticut.	Gen. GEORGE M. COLE, Adjutant-General of Connecticut.	Maj. P. W. LEGATT, H. A. C.	Rear Admiral MORTIMER L. JOHNSON.	Maj. F. FARRINGTON, H. A. C.	Gen. EDMUND RICE.	Gen. N. A. M. DUDLEY.

RECEPTION SPLENDID IN ALL OF ITS FEATURES

Pretty Women in Handsome Gowns and Brave Soldiers in Dashing Uniforms Form Strikingly Brilliant Scene.

Horticultural Hall was a scene of unusual splendor last night at the preliminary reception where the distinguished civil and military guests of the Boston Ancients were introduced. The display of handsome gowns and pretty women, together with the bright naval and military uniforms, made a pretty picture.

The reception began at 6 o'clock and continued for an hour, during which time the hall was filled with guests standing in small groups exchanging greetings and chatting about the costly banquet which was to follow.

American and English flags, which were the principal decorations, blended harmoniously throughout. Broad-leaved tropical plants were freely used and added to the general effect.

The guests entered the hall at the Falmouth street entrance, where a guard of honor, composed of members of the Boston [illegible], was lined up. The receiving line was in the smaller hall. In order to reach it the guests had to traverse the larger one. Those who composed the receiving line were Lord Denbigh, Gov. John L. Bates and staff, consisting of Adjt. Gen. Samuel Dalton, Surgeon Gen. Robert A. Blood, Inspector Gen. William H. Brigham of Hudson, Commissary Gen. Fred W. Wellington of Worcester, Judge Advocate Gen. Henry S. Dewey, Col. James G. White of Newton, Lieut. Col. William C. Capelle, Lieut. Col. Edward J. Gihon of Wakefield, Lieut. Col. George H. Benyon of Watertown, Lieut. Col. Paul R. Hawkins of Springfield, Lieut. Col. Walter C. Hagar, Lieut. Col. Frederick B. Carpenter; Lieut. Col. John Perrins, Jr., Maj. Frank R. Stevens of Newton, Maj. Henry Hastings, Maj. Charles Hayden of Nahant, Maj. Ainsley R. Hooper, Maj. William M. Clarke, and Col. Sidney M. Hedges, commander of the Boston Ancients.

When United States Senator George F. Hoar of Worcester entered the hall he was given a tremendous ovation, which he smilingly acknowledged.

At 7 o'clock the entire company marched from Horticultural Hall across to Symphony Hall under a canopy stretched across Massachusetts avenue, and shutting off all traffic, including the street car service. The canopy was brilliantly lighted with small electric bulbs. A crowd, composed chiefly of women, pushed and jostled to get a nearer view of the handsomely gowned women and their escorts.

An extra detail of police kept the crowd a good distance from the canopy.

GREATEST FEAST IN THE HISTORY OF BOSTON

(Continued From First Page.)

exquisite music to charm the ear, of old wines and delicious viands to tempt and then appease the appetite, and of brilliant and patriotic addresses to stir the blood of Great Britain and America and to urge their sons to closer unity.

The guests were nominally the Honourable Artillery Company, but there were other guests of honor, men whom ambition had led into the higher spheres of life; men who had won civil fame; men who had come from other lands officially to represent their countries; men from other States and other climes, and men who had risked their lives on the field of battle. All these were present to participate in the greatest American military banquet of modern times.

To Feast Through Canopy.

At 6 o'clock there was held in Horticultural Hall a reception, where men in their variety of uniforms and their evening dress came to meet their friends and to be introduced to Lord Denbigh and to Governor Bates who, with his staff, received with the guest of honor of the evening. At 7 a start was made to Symphony Hall, across the street, not through the damp out-of-door air and over rough and wet pavements, but beneath a handsome arch, carpeted and closed where the street had been denied to traffic, to the magnificent spectacle upon which so many hours and so much thought and money had been expended.

The first view was pastoral yet artistic. Art had improved on nature. Garlands and ropes of flowers were hanging from every point. The room was exotic with the scent of roses. The lights from the dome burned with seeming dimness. A crown of gold and glass lost their richness in the shadows of the overhead light. Armorial banners of the two companies seemed lifeless. It was as if a cloud had shadowed the sun and left a soft but quiet beauty in some wooded and flowering glen.

Dazzling Electrical Effect.

In a short while the stage and the room had filled. There was the usual glint of metal and color. There were the usual effects of a brilliantly garbed throng of stalwart men moving about with joke and laughter on their lips, till all had come in and been seated.

Then a flash of light told of a dazzling change. From the streamers that canopied the stage, from that seemingly dim crown to the edge of the carpet, there burned little globes of yellow light that mingled brightly but harmoniously amid the leaves of the green ropes. While the wondering crowds were watching bewilderingly this spectacle, there came another flash and from either end of the upper gallery, among the flowery drapings, other lights burned and a thousand green lamps mingled their rays with the shadows in the leaves.

Then the scene appeared to be ever changing in the strange and unusual glow, when suddenly the white lights went out, red lights appeared, the crossed guns that were hung on the lower balcony rail became aglow, more bulbs grew bright, specks of fire appeared among the floral decorations of the table, and while all were wondering the glare mellowed and there appeared from every point the softest blendings of red and yellow and green and white into one calm tone that spoke of rest and comfort and readiness to partake of the feast that was only at that moment ready for those whom it would tempt.

The menu was as follows:

MENU.

Cape Cod Oysters.
Clear Green Turtle.
Prince Albert Sherry.
Aiguillettes of Halibut Cardinal.
Cucumbers. Potatoes Hollandaise.
Haut Sauterne.
Tournedos of Filet of Beef a La Previllot
String Beans.
Champagne.
Epigrammes of Sweetbreads Sevigne.
Green Peas.
Sorbet a la Militaire.
Cigarettes.
Squab Chickens Roasted.
Romaine and Tomato Salad.
Bombe Glaces International.
Petits Fours.
Cheese. Coffee.
Cigars.

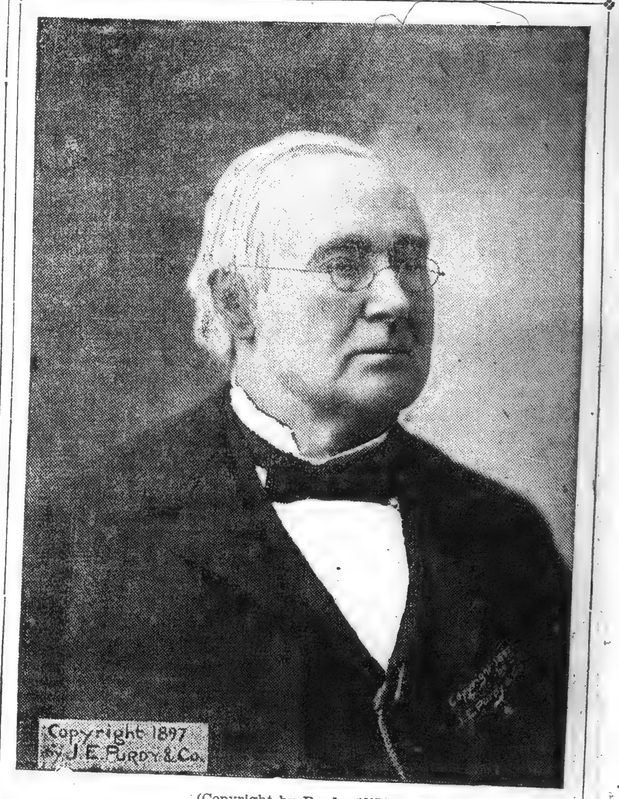
Toasts and Cheers.

At 9 o'clock, when the dinner was over, there came the final brilliancy of the spectacle. The galleries had filled with the ladies, who had come elegantly gowned. From them there came suggestions of every color. Lady Denbigh was there and was cheered. Others were moving about seeking out with their eyes their friends on the floor. Again the monster chandeliers on the ceiling broke into light, the calm glow so like the opal in its changing but hidden fires took on all the flame of the diamond and flooded everything with its sparkling luster. It was then and not till then that one realized how indescribable it all was.

There followed the speeches, toasts to Great Britain and her King, and toasts to others, in reply to which the orators of the evening gave voice. The cheering at times was continuous, and the enthusiasm never flagged. Every noble sentiment, every friendly word, was a signal for loud recognition, and it all ended in a mighty cheer for the two greatest nations on the earth.

CHICAGO'S JEALOUSY IN PRINT

The Ancients and their guests will not visit Chicago and the Record-Herald of that city accordingly prints the above cartoon



(Copyright by Purdy, 1897.)

Senator Hoar,

Who was the chief orator at last night's banquet to the H. A. C.'s.

FAIR WOMEN VIEW FEAST FROM BALCONY

One of the Journal's Women Reporters Tells of Scene as It Appeared to Feminine Eyes---Lady Denbigh Present.

Viewing in retrospect the banquet of the Ancients to the Honourables, given last evening in Symphony Hall, many a woman will draw a deep sigh of satisfaction as she declares with a certain note of awe mellowing the tone of elation:

"I was there."

It is a matter of honest pride to be able to say so.

It is with a sense of having lost something really salient that one confessess to absence.

If old Lucullus himself, with all his glory as a dinner host, had been chairman of the banquet committee, it is doubtful if he could have added any to the gorgeousness of the scene. Nor, it is to be presumed, that he could have pleased more perfectly the palates of those about the tables.

It is not for the women, however, to attempt any gastronomic analysis of the banquet. For them it was a feast of sight and hearing, and as such was incomparable.

Lustre Not to Be Dimmed.

Symphony Hall has served as the setting for many a function. Notables of many lands and cults have gathered beneath its roof. But so long as the strength of its foundation stones and timbers endures there is small fear that the magnificence of the love feast of the Ancients and the Honourables will be dimmed.

From the vantage point of the two balconies the feminine contingent, in attractive evening gowns and glittering jewels, beheld the lords of creation, gay with scarlet coats, gold lace and the pomp of military garb, or correct in the black and white of citizens' dress, sip their wine, toast their country and their friends and cheer lustily at every occasion.

It was a fairy land into which the balcony occupants gazed.

Touched With Fairy Wand.

Boston seemed miles away; Symphony Hall was lost sight of, and the place became the banquet hall of an enchanted palace, glorified by the magic touch of fairy wands.

From balcony to balcony, the women looked across garlands of laurel, the sign of victory, studded with emblaids, tipped with glowing rubies, divided and sub-divided by crosses of topaz.

The gilded pipes of the organ, usually the most prominent feature of Symphony Hall, were quite obscured by slender topaz chains alternating with ropes of laurel, and festooned from a marvelous crownof diamonds, white and yellow, of sapphires and emeralds and rubies, while below, gleamed the jeweled insignia of the society.

Glancing down in the pit the tables showed the same circling jewels of light, the same victolous laurel garlands, and in addition the rich crimson and delicate pink of myriads of long stemmed beauty roses.

Wit and Wisdom.

The words of wit and wisdom from the lips of the speakers rose distinctly to the farthest corner of the hall, and the crash of music alternated with words and cheers. It was all a wonderful dream—to the onlookers in the gallery.

Glancing up from the place of the diners the balconies presented, through the jeweled gleam, a kaleidscope of colors, for the women were constantly moving. They walked up and down the stairs, they peeked in at this door and at that, so as to view the scene from every point.

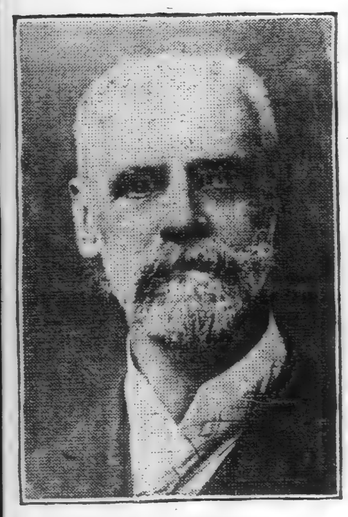
Lady Denbigh in Simple Gown.

However, it was at the upper door, nearly over the speaker's table, on the right side of the first balcony, that most of them paused. It was here that Lady Denbigh and a party of attending ladies listened with rapt attention throughout the speech making, quite oblivious of curious eyes. Lady Denbigh was in a simple black dinner gown, the square neck slightly low and finished with insertion. She wore a necklace of pearls, and in her hair a black velvet bow. Mrs. Hedges on her left was in black. Beyond was Mrs. Jonh L. Bates, also in black and wearing a white hat.

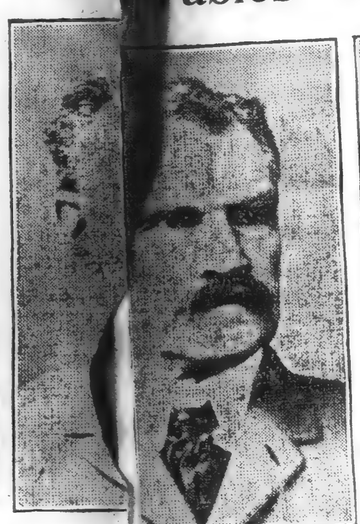
On Lady Denbigh's right was Mrs. Eastwick in white, and beyond, Mrs. Hodges, wife of the commander of the Chicago, in a gown of pale blue and heavy lace.

SUMPTUOUS BANQUET FOR THE HONOURABLES

Four of the Guests Who Had Prominent Places At the Tables in Symphony Hall Last Night.

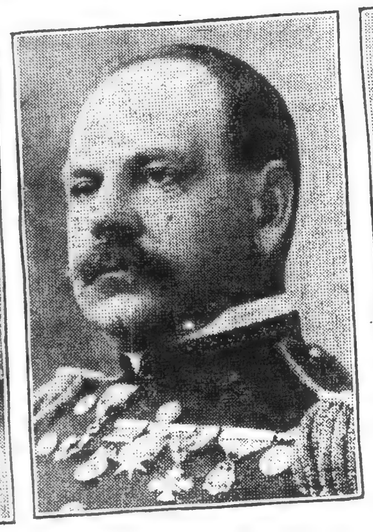


PROF. F. C. DE SUMICHRAST,
Who Spoke for Harvard at the Honourables' Banquet.



[Copyrigh
MAJ.-GEN. AI

t, 1903, by J. E. Purdy.]
NA R. CHAFFEE, U. S. A.



[Photo by Purdy.]
MAJ.-GEN. WILLIAM A. BANCROFT.

THE. REV. W. H. RIDER.

A Brilliant and Notable Assemblage in Symphony Hall—Highest Officials of State and City There—National and Military Circles Represented.

GOV. BATES SPEAKS FOR THE STATE, MAYOR COLLINS FOR THE MUNICIPALITY.

Collector Lyman Responds to the Toast to President—Senator Hoar Speaks to "Old Mother England" — Prof. Sumichrast Spokesman for Harvard.

"Hands have clasped across the seas and hearts have joined, and the ties of blood and the instincts derived from the common origin compel us to march all one way—for the liberty of the individual, the overthrow of the oppressor, the uplifting of the downtrodden, and the advancement of the Christian civilization throughout the world."—GOV. JOHN L. BATES.

"One of the first things we saw was the union jack flying from the top of Bunker Hill monument, which we in England have long felt we could regard with no ill feeling; rather we look upon it as a reminder to the British nation of how colonies ought not to be governed."—LORD DENBIGH.

"The company that came in the Mayflower was so notable that her name is embalmed forever in the history of our country. Let us hope that your voyage in the new Mayflower may prove a harbinger of events no less important in the history of our land and race!"—COL. HEDGES.

These words, spoken by the Governor of the commonwealth, the commander of the Honourable Artillery Company of London and the commander of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company of Massachusetts, voiced eloquently the prevailing spirit of last night's banquet to the guests of a nation.

As a feast, the banquet was the most delightfully planned and the most beautifully executed ever attempted in Boston, if not in the country. It was a dinner to rival the feasts of Lucillus or to ner to rival the feasts of Lucullus or to

And enhanced by its significance as a friendly greeting to the first corps of the British service ever to salute the stars and stripes, and followed by an exchange of courtesies between the two great Anglo-Saxon nations of the earth, the dinner is destined to go down into history as an epoch-maker, as being a mighty strand in the fast-weaving bond of friendship between kith and kin—the same that quarrelled some years ago, as brothers sometimes do.

Not one of the thousand of brilliantly uniformed diners and not one of the thousand of beautifullly gowned women that looked down in beauteous grace upon the scene was impressed half so much by the gorgeousness of an illuminated scene of beauty such as Boston has never seen as by the significance of the words of the post-prandial speakers.

Hands were literally stretched across the seas. The President of the United States was greeted with three cheers and a tiger, amid the flutter of napery from the floor and the waving of handkerchiefs from the lofty balconies. His Britannic Majesty, King Edward VII. was toasted with an outburst of enthusiasm such as red-coats of former days would have sworn impossible.

If the banquet was the crowning glory of the reception of the visitors on the shores of Massachusetts bay, the after-dinner exchange of courtesies was such as to thrill the blood tingling a bit faster through the veins of Britisher and American alike.

The banquet in its sumptuousness and lavishness is calculated to go into annals as the most notable social function of its kind ever planned. The expressions of brotherly love, of recognition of the inseparable bonds of kith, the definite expression of the hope of realization of the fondest dream of alliance enthusiasts—all these are calculated to send into history the story of last night's dinner of the Ancients of Boston to the Honourables of London as the beginning of an end which has been long predicted. At all events, this was the spirit of the exchange of courtesies between the distinguished representatives of the two great Anglo-Saxon nations gathered about the banquet board last night.

The dinner, in its entirety, was nothing short of sumptuous. Boston's most famous hall, as though by the touch of a magic wand, was transformed into a bower of roses, a veritable garden that bloomed as Eden. As though Aladdin himself had touched his fairy lamp, the spacious hall was metamorphosed into a blaze of glory such as it may never see again until it totters and falls by weight of years.

Under the mystic touch of florists, artists and illuminators, the great hall was transformed as though by necromancy from its barren self into a dining salon to boast rivalry with those of kings. Gorgeous the spectacle was, but over all there was the homely atmosphere of the family table. Glorious it was, but over all there was the breath of a subdued richness and elegance that forbade the thought of ostentation.

The scene during the illumination of the hall was one calculated to linger indelibly in memory. Under the blaze of thousands of white electric lights which glared from the vaulted roof of the banquet hall, the long line of guests and hosts filed into the feast.

The honored guests of the evening had just reached their places at the head table and the last of the line had just entered the hall when there blazed forth a glory of golden light from myriads of incandescent bulbs hung pendant from a huge illuminated crown which overhung the stage.

A minute later, by a magic touch, there streamed out the subdued light of the green and purple bulbs fringing the lofty upper balcony amid intertwined festoons of laurel and evergreen Until this time the lower balcony was

[CONTINUED ON FOURTH PAGE.]

[23]

SUMPTUOUS BANQUET FOR THE HONOURABLES.

[CONTINUED FROM FIFTH PAGE.]

civilization, one in spirit? Together may they uphold the principles of the great English-speaking peoples

"Till the war drum throbs no longer and the battle flags are furled
In the Parliament of men, the Federation of the world."

Citizens always; soldiers when needed. Duty alone determines. Zealous, devoted! Loving country! Loving liberty under law! Such a soldier I make bold to say had you in Arthur, Duke of Wellington; such a soldier had we in Washington. May their

"Great example stand
Colossal, seen of every land,
And keep the soldier firm, the statesman pure,
Till in all lands and thro' all human story
The path of duty be the way to glory."

WORDS OF EX-GOV. LONG.

Responding for Honorary Members He Refers Chiefly to King Edward VII.

The response to the toast "Our Honorary Members," by ex-Gov. Long, was prefaced by the remark of Col. Hedges that there were but two honorary members of the company when he was made one—Chester A. Arthur and Albert, prince consort. At present there are but two, King Edward VII. of England, and John D. Long—Gov. Long as we love to call him.

Mr. Long said in part:

There is a warm spot in the American heart for Chester A. Arthur. But of course the great distinction of our honorary members is he to whom you have referred; he whom you, our visitors here, royally honor and regard, King Edward VII. Think for a moment of the long line of predecessors, stretching far back into the past behind him and of which he today is the culmination.

I am very happy to speak for the honorary members of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company. There were but three honorary members at the time I became connected with the Ancients and Honorables. The first was that splendid gentleman, who, as president, surprised the American people as much as our own chief magistrate has recently surprised our senior senator.

And how grandly the line terminates in that exquisitely gracious, pure-minded Queen, not merely queen, but, thank God, wife and mother, whose name is sounded in praise by the American people as well as of her own.

I am glad to see King Edward making these visits to other countries, and my one hope is that he will some day extend this visit to us. What a royal welcome would we give him! I remember his visit in 1859.

I rejoice in the tributes that have been paid to the mother land. Who can pay them so graciously as our senior senator? We do not forget that one of the causes of our independence was one which we sometimes fail to emphasize. We owe our independence as much to England as to any other nation—to the men of England, Camden, Fox, Pitt, Barry and the rest, who on the floor pleaded our cause.

Nor do we forget that we owe much to the mother of the present King and to Prince Albert for standing by us during the war of the rebellion. Let us not forget that when the recent war with Spain was on, the one power which was in sympathy with us was England. (Cries of "Good! Good!") And in those fateful days at Manila, when Dewey was meeting the unfriendly associations of other nations, the flag of England flying told him that a friend was near. (Applause.)

I join with you therefore as an honorary member, in extending a cordial welcome to our visitors. We are really brothers, brothers in all that makes for human happiness and welfare and, may I not say—aye, it is written—brothers in destiny.

GUESTS AT THE HEAD TABLE.

Col. Hedges Flanked on the Immediate Right by Col. Denbigh and on the Left by Gov. Bates.

The guests at the head table were:

30—Gen. N. A. M. Dudley.
28—Gen. Edmund Rice.
26—Maj. F. Farrington, H. A. C.
24—Rear Admiral Mortimer L. Johnson.
22—Maj. P. W. Legatt, H. A. C.
20—Gen. George M. Cole, adjutant-general of Connecticut.
18—The Hon. A. A. Chamberlin, Governor of Connecticut.
16—George A. Marden, sub-treasurer.
14—Maj. Munday, H. A. C.
12—Gen. William A. Bancroft.
10—Gen. Adna R. Chaffee, U. S. A.
8—Lieut.-Col. Stohwasser, H. A. C.
6—The Hon. George F. Hoar.
4—The Hon. George H. Lyman; collector of port.
2—Col. Denbigh, H. A. C.
1—Col. Sidney M. Hedges, A. & H. A. C.
3—Gov. John L. Bates.
5—Gen. Samuel Dalton.
7—The Hon. P. A. Collins, mayor of Boston.
9—Lieut.-Gov. Curtis Guild.
11—The Hon. J. Q. A. Brackett.
13—The Hon. John D. Long.
15—Maj. C. E. D. Budworth, H. A. C.
17—Capt. C. A. P. Talbot, British consul.
19—The Hon. L. F. C. Garvin, Governor of Rhode Island.
21—George A. Hibbard, postmaster.
23—The Hon. N. J. Bachelder, Governor of New Hampshire.
25—Adjt.-Gen. Aug. D. Ayling of New Hampshire.
27—Gen. John L. Tiernon.
29—The Rev. William H. Eider.
31—Col. Charles K. Darling.

FULL LIST OF GUESTS.

Names of Ancients and Their London Visitors Who Gathered About the Banquet Tables.

Following is an alphabetical index of the Ancients and their distinguished guests who were seated at the banquet tables:

A

Edward W. Abbott.
Frederick L. Abbott.
William V. Abbott.
J. H. Abraham, H. A. C.
Carl Adams.
The Hon. C. E. Adams.
Charles C. Adams.
George Adams.
George E. Adams.
Joseph W. Adams.
Samuel G. Adams.
Wilber F. Adams.
H. M. S. Aiken.
The Hon. Edgar Aldrich.
Samuel Alland.
Capt. E. E. Allen.
George H. Allen.
W. A. Allen, H. A. C.
The Hon. Horace G. Allen.
A. H. Alley.
Alfred Anderson.
Augustus Andrews.
C. Ansell, H. A. C.
Charles W. Arnold.
Thomas Arnold.
William B. Arnold.
Charles S. Ashley.
Thomas C. Ashley.
Fred E. Atteaux.
C. P. Attenborough, H. A. C.
R. H. Attenborough, H. A. C.
J. T. Auerbach.
G. Austin, H. A. C.
Gen. Aug. D. Ayling.

B

George F. Babbitt.
Charles Babson.
Thomas M. Babson.
Sol Bacharach.
Hon. N. J. Bachelder.
Daniel B. Badger.
Col. E. W. M. Bailey.
John C. Baird.
Charles T. Baker.
Charles F. Baker.
Gen. Wm. A. Bancroft.
A. I. Barnett, H. A. C.
Charles B. Barrett.
Col. Richard F. Barrett.
V. Barrett, H. A. C.
O. G. Barron.
E. O. Bartels.
Silas A. Barton.
George C. Bartram.
Walter Barwick.
Nathan B. Basch.
George J. Bascom.
C. E. Batchelder.
William J. Batchelder.
R. W. Bateman, H. A. C.
Edward C. Bates.
G. H. W. Bates.
Gov. John L. Bates.
B. Whiteman Bates.
Willis C. Bates.
William A. Batty.
Arthur H. Beal.
Edward C. Beck.
E. Bennett, H. A. C.
T. H. Bennett.
Jacob Bensemoll.
Col. Everett E. Benton.
F. W. A. Bergengren.
Rev. A. A. Berle.
Capt. H. J. Bertram, H. A. C.
James Berwick.
E. H. Best.
William S. Best.
Albert C. Betteley.
R. S. Bickford.
F. B. Bill.
E. W. Billings.
Lewis J. Bird.
H. L. Bishop, H. A. C.
Louis A. Blackington.
H. A. Blackmer.
A. F. Blades, H. A. C.
James E. Blake.
Denman Blanchard.
Arthur Bliss.
George Bliss.
Gen. Robert A. Blood.
Anthony Blum.
Fred E. Bolton.
S. J. Boreham, H. A. C.
Robert P. Bosa.
Hon. Geo. S. Boutwell.
Frank H. Bowles.
Thomas A. Boyd.
C. H. Boynton.
Hon. J. Q. A. Brackett.
Silas W. Brackett.
The Hon. Edward S. Bradford.
Edwin A. Bradley.
Col. J. Payson Bradley.
J. Tisdale Bradley.
R. W. Bradshaw, H. A. C.
Charles Orrin Breed.
Robert C. Bridgham.
Gen. W. H. Brigham.
F. Y. Bright, H. A. C.
Alfred Britten.
O. H. Brock.
Charles H. C. Brown.
J. Henry Brown.
Joseph H. Brown.
Wilfred G. Brown.
William G. Brown.
P. G. Browne, H. A. C.
Frank C. Brownell.
The Hon. Alex. B. Bruce.
Philip B. Bruce.
C. J. Brymer, H. A. C.
Maj. C. E. D. Budworth, H. A. C.
Capt. George R. H. Buffington.
A. J. Bulger.
Col. Wm. M. Bunting.
C. F. P. Burchmore.
Joseph O. Burdett.
Robert Burlin.
Henry A. Burnham.
Walter Burns.
Charles Butcher.
Col. John G. Butler.
Howard F. Butler.
Robert Butterworth.
S. H. Byron, H. A. C.

C

S. Manning Campbell.
Col. W. C. Cappelle.
John D. Carmody.
Col. Fred B. Carpenter.
William Carter.
Lieut. T. J. Cartland, H. A. C.
H. A. Casion-Smith, H. A. C.
George Cassell.
Gen. Adna R. Chaffee, U. S. A.
The Hon. A. A. Chamberlin.
J. M. Chapple.
Caleb Chase.
Benjamin P. Cheney.
James B. Cherry.
Elmer Chickering.
Morris W. Child.
A. D. Collins, H. A. C.
The Hon. P. A. Collins.
The Hon. Le Baron B. Colt.
Lieut. W. T. Comstock, commander H. M. S. Retribution.
The Hon. Joseph Coupy, M. C.
D. Cookes, H. A. C.
William L. Coon.
J. George Cooper.
J. W. Cooper, M. D.
Lieut. P. C. Cooper, H. A. C.
T. W. Cooper, H. A. C.
Timothy F. Corey.
Paul Corson.
W. W. Corson.
John B. Cotter.
Henry C. Cottle.
Lieut.-Col. C. S. Courtenay.
E. B. Cowles.
Samuel L. Coy.
Edward P. Cramm.
J. Boardman Cramm.
J. Chancellor Crafts.
Maj. W. Culver-James, H. A. C.
Charles E. Cummings.
Thomas Cahill Cummings.
Anthony Cunio.
J. H. Cunningham.
M. P. Curran.
Frank D. Currier.
Joshua M. Cushing.
J. Stearns Cushing.
L. C. Cutbill, H. A. C.
Leonard F. Cutter.

D

Henry M. J. Daggett.
Frank W. Dallinger.
J. Dalton, H. A. C.
Gen. Samuel Dalton.
Kendall H. Damon.
Charles S. Damrell.
John S. Damrell.
J. C. Danforth.
Col. Charles K. Darling.
F. M. Darrow.
Maj. J. H. Davenport.
Frank A. Davidson.
Gen. H. O. Davidson.
E. E. Davies.
Charles G. Davis.
George A. Davis.
James A. Davis.
Maj. Howard S. Dearing.
Col. Denbigh, H. A. C.
Thomas M. Denham.
A. E. DeRosay.
George H. Desmond.
Gen. Henry S. Dewey.
E. H. Dickinson.
Henry F. Dickinson.
F. E. Dickerman.
E. H. Doane.
John S. Doane.
The Hon. Edward I. Donovan.
James Donovan.
Col. William H. Donovan.
The Hon. James H. Doyle.
C. Draycott, H. A. C.
Francis Draz.
L. N. Duchesney.
Dana T. Dudley.
Gen. N. A. M. Dudley.
D. Duncan, H. A. C.
Charles T. Dukelow.
A. G. Durgin.
Charles E. Durgin.
Harry Dutton.
Perlie A. Dyar.
Walter A. Dyar.
S. R. Dyas, H. A. C.

E

Charles E. Eager.
A. L. Eastman.
C. H. Eastwick.
W. Eckstein, H. A. C.
Col. Robert B. Edes.
James Edgar.
William B. Edgar.
Col. T. F. Edmands.
Maj. E. H. Eldredge.
Emmons R. Ellis.
James Ellis.
William H. Ellis.
William H. Emerson.
John A. Emery.
W. B. Emery.
The Hon. W. H. H. Emmery.
Capt. Lloyd England.
O. Engster, H. A. C.
Charles Evans.
H. E. Evans, H. A. C.
Thomas W. Evans.
Fred A. Ewell.

F

George Fairburn.
Frank A. Fales.
James D. Fanning.
H. L. Farmer, H. A. C.
Adjt.-Gen. Augustus D. Farnham.
C. F. Farrington.
Maj. F. Farrington.
C. W. Faulkner, H. A. C.
S. S. Faulkner, H. A. C.
Charles M. Faunce.
F. F. Favor.
Robert R. Fears.
John J. Feeley.
C. H. Fellows.
Frank Ferdinand.
Col. Alex M. Ferris.
William M. Ferris.
Fred F. Field.
George P. Field.
William G. Fish.
E. A. Fisher, H. A. C.
Henry N. Fisher.
Charles D. B. Fiske.
The Hon. John M. Fiske.
John L. Fiske.
The Hon. John F. Fitzgerald.
Maj. C. B. Fitzhenry, R. G. R.
Col. Andrew Fitz.
Charles P. Flagg.
John J. Flaherty.
Capt. A. A. Folsom.
John J. Ford.
Lawrence J. Ford.
S. Fortesque, H. A. C.
William H. Forbes.
A. Forster, H. A. C.
Elmer G. Foster.
Jacob Fottler.
Charles H. Fox.
Charles K. Fox.
George Francis.
Daniel Frank.
A. G. Fraser, H. A. C.
R. H. Fraser.
Milton H. French.
Edwin R. Frost.
Capt. Joseph H. Frothingham.
Col. James A. Frye.
James M. Frye.
Arthur Fuller.
F. W. Fuller.
H. E. L. Fuller, H. A. C.

G

Sebastian Gahm.
William B. Gaines.
A. S. Gamie, H. A. C.
George Gannon.
Gen. Asa Bird Gardner.
Edmund H. Garrett.
The Hon. Elijah George.
Charles Gibson.
Charles E. Giles.
R. Gilling, H. A. C.
Wm. J. Gillespie.
Herbert A. Gillman.
James A. Glass.
Frederick Glassup.
Albert A. Gleason.
Frank E. Gleason.
James M. Gleason.
L. S. M. Glidden.
George E. Glover.
F. H. Glover.
I. N. Goldsmith.
A. H. Goetting.
Charles C. Goodwin.
F. C. Gooding, H. A. C.
Hazen T. Goodrich.
Percy F. Goodwin.
William H. Goodwin.
Col. W. D. Gordon.
A. T. Gordon-Smith, H. A. C.
N. T. Gorham, Jr.
Alex P. Graham.
Capt. G. F. Gratwick.
E. R. Graves.
George M. Gray.
Robert S. Gray.
Thomas L. Green, H. A. C.
J. W. Greenalch.
H. S. Greenwood, H. A. C.
J. F. Greenwood, H. A. C.
F. H. Greeley.
William C. Gregory.
T. F. Griggs, H. A. C.
Col. Harold J. Gross.
L. Tudor Gross.
S. Grossmith, H. A. C.
Emery Grover.
William P. Grovestein, M. D.
Lt. Gov. Curtis Guild, Jr.

H

John N. Haines.
The Rev. Edward E. Hale.
I. ... Hall.
Charles F. Hall.
George E. Hall.
William F. Hall.
Warren E. Hall.
The Rev. William K. Hall.
G. E. Halsey, H. A. C.
Harry Hamilton
Howard H. Hamilton.
E. A. Hamlyn, H.A.C.
Edward A. Hammond.
J. B. Hanscom.
Walter A. Hansen.
Edward E. Hardy.
Freeman A. Hardy.
William A. Hardy.
Lieut. G. Harland, H. A. C.
A. G. Harness, H.A.C.
H. Harris, H. A. C.
J. H. Hartley.
J. Hartnoll, H. A. C.
Elisha T. Harvell.
Thomas E. Hawes.
C. C. Haycraft, H.A.C.
S. D. Haydon, H.A.C.
C. H. Hayes.
Norman P. Hayes.
John P. Hazlett.
E. G. Head, H. A. C.
Col. Sidney M. Hedges.
Philip B. Heintz.
William H. Hennessey.
P. F. Henry, H. A. C.
Lieut. A. F. Herbert.
Lieut. G. Hering, H. A. C.
Thomas Hersom.
E. M. Heustis.
George F. Hewett.
Geroge A. Hibbard.
Col. F. W. ...
A. J. Hilbourn.
S. J. Hilburn.
Edward Hill.
E. Dwight Hill, M. D.
Lew C. Hill.
George W. Hills.
George E. Hilton.
Capt. Frank F. Hitchcock.
The Hon. Edwin R. Hoar.
The Hon. George F. Hoar.
Capt. C. C. Hodges, H. A. C.
Everett B. Hodges.
Commodore H. M. Hodges, U. S. N.
J. F. Hodge.
W. W. Hodges.
Thomas M. Holden.
Julius Hollander.
H. T. Holloway, H.A.C.
C. D. Holmes.
William B. Holmes.
Gustavus C. Holt.
Eugene A. Holton.
F. W. Homans.
W. A. Homans.
George A. Homer.
C. G. Hooper, H.A.C.
C. L. Hornby, H.A.C.
B. W. Horne, H.A.C.
The Rev. Edward A. Horton.
Henry O. Houghton.
Charles W. Howard.
E. S. Howard, H.A.C.
Frank H. Howard.
Charles E. Howe.
Capt. F. S. Howes.
E. H. Hoyt.
Fred J. Hutchinson.
Frank Huckins.
The Rev. Alan Hudson.
W. C. Hulbert, H.A.C.
Harrison Hume.
Henry B. Humphrey.
Charles R. Hunt.
Francis Hartubis, Jr.
Hobart S. Hussey.
Bernard Hyneman.

I

E. W. Ilsley, H. A. C.
H. S. Ilsley, H. A. C.
George H. Innis.
A. Inskipp, H. A. C.
The Hon. Richard W. Irwin.
Frank H. Ivers.

J

William Jackson.
Wolf Jackson.
T. H. James, H. A. C.
Fred P. Jaques.
H. Jarrett, H. A. C.
The Rev. Julian C. Jaynes.
Bernard Jenney, Jr.
David L. Jewell.
Maj. A. M. Johnson.
A. W. Johnson, H.A.C.
C. J. Johnson, H. A. C.
E. C. Johnson.
Frank M. Johnson.
John F. Johnson.
J. M. Johnson.
Nelson M. Johnson.
Rear Admiral M. L. Johnson.
Lieut. C. H. Jones.
Edgar W. Jones.
G. Howard Jones.
H. E. Jones, H. A. C.
J. F. Jones, H. A. C.
Lewis L. Jones.
Wesley Jones.
William B. Jones.
W. Tetley Jones, H. A. C.
Maj. H. G. Jordan.
Dwight O. Judd.

K

I. Kaffenburg.
Edward Kakas.
Henry Kavanagh.
J. Murray Kay.
Charles P. Keeler.
George E. Keeler.
B. F. Keith.
Paul A. Keith.
Jasper N. Kellar.
Capt. W. H. Keeley.
J. C. Kendall, H.A.C.
George B. Ketcham.
George W. Kimball.
Otis Kimball.
Henry L. Kincaide.
A. King, H. A. C.
D. B. Kingsbury.
Charles W. Knapp.

L

Lieut. A. L. Ladenburg, H. A. C.
Benj. F. Lamb.
Charles A. Lamson.
Daniel H. Lane.
William B. Lantz.
A. E. Lathrop.
Samuel C. Lawrence.
I. B. Lawton.
Arthur E. Leach.
Chas. W. Leatherbee.
Frank W. Lee.
H. M. Leland.
Maj. P. W. Legatt, H. A. C.
Charles H. Leggs.
Charles A. Leighton.
Charles Leighton.
George H. Leonard.
George A. Levi.
D. M. Lewis, H. A. C.
Edgar P. Lewis.
E. Frank Lewis.
H. Bradford Lewis.
William C. Lewis.
W. Carl Lewis.
Thomas G. Libby.
Marshall Lincoln.
Capt. Walter M. Lindsey.
J. Lines, Jr., H. A. C.
Henry H. Litchfield.
G. St. John Lobb, H. A. C.
A. E. Lockhart.
W. F. Lockhart.
Capt. Walter E. Lombard.
The Hon. John D. Long.
E. P. Longley.
George L. Look.
James B. Lord.
William H. Lott.
Arthur T. Lovell.
Capt. A. C. Lowe, H. A. C.
The Hon. Arthur H. Lowe.
The Hon. Francis C. Lowell.
George F. Lowell.
C. W. Luce.
Winslow B. Lucus.
H. D. Lumby, H. A. C.
A. G. Lund.
William F. Lunt.
The Hon. George H. Lyman.
Jerome E. Lynch.
Albert W. Lyons.

M

J. C. Macdonald.
Rodney Macdonough.
F. J. Macleod.
A. S. Mattocks.
David C. Makepeace.
Henry A. Meley.
E. A. Maloon.
Theodore A. Manchester.
Charles Mann.
H. K. Mansfield.
A. E. Marcus, H. A. C.
George A. Marden.
Capt. Fred Marsh.
F. K. B. Marter.
Stephen Mason, H.A.C.
Gen. Thomas R. Mathews.
F. P. Matthews, H.A.C.
L. M. Maxham.
George H. Maynard.
William M. Maynard.
A. E. A. McCann.
E. Sherman McCarter.
Charles H. McDermott.
F. R. McDonald.
Maj. T. E. F. McGeagh, H. A. C.
James W. McIndoo.
H. F. McIntire.
William N. McKenna.
Capt. E. J. McKenny.
Andrew McNeil.
Fred McQuesten.
Frank B. McQuesten.
Arthur A. McRae.
T. F. Medina, H. A. C.
Charles A. Merserve.
Francis Meredith, Jr.
William A. Miller.
William J. Miller.
B. T. Mills, Sec. H.A.C.
Col. S. M. Mills.
William H. Mills.
George W. Mirrick.
Col. E. V. Mitchell.
John L. Mitchell.
William H. Mitchell.
Hugh Montague.
Capt. E. K. Moore.
James Morgan.
P. L. Morgan, H. A. C.
Charles F. Morrill.
George H. Morrill, Jr.
George Henry Morrill.
William A. Morse.
George C. Morton.
Charles G. Mosea.
Col. George W. Moses.
Jacob Mosser.
F. A. Mostyn, H. A. C.
A. D. Mowry.
Frank H. Mudge.
R. P. Mugford, H. A. C.
James F. Mullen.
Maj. Munday, H. A.C.
Charles F. Munroe.
L. M. Murdock, H.A.C.
G. F. T. Murnane, H. A. C.
Col. A. Murray, R.G.R.
Charles W. Munro.
Capt. E. H. Myddelton-Gavey, H. A. C.
The Hon. James J. Myers.

N

H. W. Nicholson, H. A. C.
W. E. Nickerson.
W. J. W. Nedder, H. A. C.
A. J. Norris, H. A. C.
K. S. Norwood.
J. K. Norwood.
Capt. Charles F. Nostrand.
George O. Noyes.
F. H. Nunas.

O

Col. William H. Oakes.
Henry P. Oakman.
Thomas L. O'Brion.
W. H. L. Odell.
The Hon. William M. Olin.
C. W. Oliver, H. A. C.
William H. Olmsted.
Col. F. F. Olney.
Thomas J. Olys.
Joseph E. Osborn.
Charles E. Osgood.
William Oswald.
Joseph C. Otis.

P

Frank C. Packard.
E. S. Palfelford.
Francis E. Page.
Milton C. Paige.
W. B. Parazina.
Charles Parker.
Boardman J. Parker.
Capt. Horace B. Parker.
Capt. Samuel D. Parker.
Charles W. Parker.
The Rev. Leighton Parks.
C. F. Parslow, H.A.C.
Charles S. Parsons.
Joseph B. Parsons.
William Parsons.
William E. Patenaude.
George A. Patten.
Henry W. Patterson.
Charles M. Pear.
S. B. Pearmain.
Charles H. Pearson.
Maj. Daniel H. Pearson.
Z. W. Pease.
Clarence A. Perkins.
George A. Perkins.
Henry B. Perkins.
George S. Perry.
H. A. Petre, H. A. C.
Col. W. A. Pew, Jr.
Col. Charles Pfaff.
Henry Pfaff, Jr.
Frederick B. Philbrook.
G. S. Philip, H. A. C.
The Hon. James Phillips, Jr.
Frank P. Pickering.
Adams T. Pierce.
Capt. William H. Pierce.
J. Piggott, H. A. C.
E. M. Pitman.
E. W. Pitman.
C. E. Pittit, H. A. C.
G. H. Pizey, H. A. C.
E. C. Platt, H. A. C.
J. S. Platt, H. A. C.
Henry L. Plummer.
H. Pocock, H. A. C.
J. H. Podmore, H.A.C.
Arthur W. Pope.
Col. A. A. Pope.
Gardner Pool.
Charles H. Porter.
H. H. S. Postans, H. A. C.
George M. Potter.
John C. Potter.
D. B. H. Power.
Samuel L. Powers.
Col. Le Gage Pratt.
Henry S. Pratt.
William H. Preble.
Charles B. Presson.
Fred Preston.
W. H. Prior.
F. M. Purmort.
F. H. Putnam.
The Hon. William L. Putnam.

Q

Maj. George F. Quimby.
George J. Quinsler.
William J. Quinnell.

R

Col. Arnold A. Rand.
J. C. Randlett.
I. A. Ratchesky.
George J. Raymond.
Robert Redford.
John Remby.
Gen. Edmund Rice.
Frank W. Richards.
J. B. Richards.
Capt. John D. Richardson.
Albert L. Richardson.
O. P. Richardson.
Alonzo L. Richardson.
Frank B. Riddell.
The Rev. William H. Rider.
Frank Ridlon.
Charles W. Ripley.
James A. Roarty.
Charles M. Robbins.
C. E. Roberts, H.A.C.
The Rev. Oliver A. Roberts.
William H. Robertson.
James W. Robinson.
Nathaniel G. Robinson.
Wallace F. Robinson.
The Rev. Stephen H. Roblin.
F. F. Roby.
Robert J. Rodday.
John M. Rodocanachi.
J. F. Roesch.
W. H Rolfe, H. A. C.
H. R. H. Ronaldson, H. A. C.
Benjamin W. Rowell.
H. W. Ruff, H. A. C.
Col. Jacob Ruppert.
Col. Harry E. Russell.
Charles A. Russell.
George D. Russell.
Henry O. Russell.
J. H. Russell, H. A. C.

S

R. Salem, H. A. C.
Walter S. Sampson.
Capt. R. Samson, R. G. R.
Walter L. Sanborn.
Capt. Charles F. Sargent.
Thomas Saunders.
Henry N. Sawyer.
H. H. Sawyer.
The Rev. M. K. Schermerhorn.
Andrew Schlehuber.
A. A. Scott, H. A. C.
Manning Seamans.
Sheriff Frederick Seavey.
Augustus B. Seeley.
R. F. V. Seton, H. A. C.
C. W. Severance.
A. W. Sibeth, H. A. C.
George A. Shackford.
W. A. Shattuck.
Abraham Shaw.
Joseph C. Shepherd.
John Shepard, Jr.
John Shepard.
L. H. Shepard.
Thomas Sherwin.
H. T. Sherwood, H. A. C.
William G. Shillaber.
Capt. James A. Shipton, U. S. A.
A. Shuman.
Capt. Skupe.
Walter D. Shurtleff, M. D.
Charles D. Sias.
J. A. W. Silver.
W. F. Skilton.
Edward F. Smith.
Fred M. Smith.
Marcel N. Smith.
William H. Smith.
F. H. Smith, H. A. C.
Augustus L. Smith.
Col. Henry E. Smith.
Daniel H. Smith.
Edgar A. Smith.
F. G. Smith, H. A. C.
F. Laugdon Smith.
George L. Smith.
Ira P. Smith.
R. Frost Smith, H. A. C.
Prof. Justin H. Smith.
Edward E. Snow.
Alfred Sorensen.
George W. Spaulding.
R. Speller, H. A. C.
F. J. Spencer, H. A. C.
F. I. Spielman, H. A. C.
William H. Stacy.
Hugh L. Stalker.
Maj. C. E. Staniels.
Albert H. Stearns.
William L. Stedman.
Isaac A. S. Steele.
W. A. Sterling, H. A. C.
P. N. Steinberg, H. A. C.
Alexander Steinert.
George L. Stevens.
Col. Frank B. Stevens.
John G. Stewart.
C. G. Stewart, H. A. C.
George S. Stockwell.
Lt.-Col. Stohwasser, H. A. C.
Capt. Thomas T. Stokes.
Frank P. Stone.
Amos R. Storer.
William P. Stone.
Robert E. Straine.
M. Strauss, H. A. C.
The Hon. A. W. Sulloway.
The Hon. John A. Sullivan, M. C.
Edward Sullivan.
J. Frank Supple.
W. C. Symes, H. A. C.

T

Thomas Talbot.
Capt. C. A. P. Talbot.
C. F. Taylor, H. A. C.
Eugene S. Taylor.
Gen. Charles H. Taylor.
Nathaniel H. Taylor.
Capt. T. F. Temple.
F. C. Thayer.
William H. Thomas.
Charles G. Thompson.
George M. Thompson.
Perley B. Thompson.
T. P. Thompson, H. A. C.
Gen. John L. Tiernan.
J. J. Tillinghast.
Fred W. Tirrell.
Wm. G. Titcomb.
Benjamin B. Torry.
George N. Towle.
Dr. C. W. Townsend.
N. Tozer, H. A. C.
Capt. E. Treffry, H. A. C.
Lord Trinlestown.
Tracy H. Tucker.
Hon. Henry E. Turner.
Jacob A. Turner.
Thomas J. Tute.
Arthur F. Tyler.
William Tyner.

U

Robert H. Upham.
James M. Usher.

V

A. G. Van Nostrand.
Arthur D. Veasey.
E. Venables, H. A. C.
Irving B. Vose.

W

G. H. A. Wade, H. A. C.
Henry F. Wade.
Horace W. Wadleigh.
E. B. Wadsworth.
C. F. G. Wagstaff, H. A. C.
Col. G. R. Wallace.
Col. Henry Walker.
F. L. Walker.
Gustavus P. Walker.
Freeman A. Walker.
T. G. Waller.
W. F. Walters.
E. P. Wanson.
Lieut. A. L. Ward, H. A. C.
John G. Warner.
E. L. Warren, H.A.C.
Philemon D. Warren.
J. B. Waterbury.
Frank S. Waterman.
William R. Waterman.
J. D. H. Watts, H. A. C.
Arthur N. Webb.
George A. Webber.
William O. Webber.
Frank Webster.
Gen. Fred W Wellington.
Charles D. Wentworth.
F. B. Wentworth.
Charles A. West.
J. H. West, H. A. C.
A. C. Weston, H.A.C.
D. Wheatley.
A. C. Wheaton.
Clarence H. Wheeler.
Charles M. Whelden.
Col. James G. White.
George A. White.
George D. White.
John White.
Joseph L. White.
William S. Whiting.
Gen. J. H. Whitney.
C. C. Whittemore.
Daniel G. Wiggins.
B. F. Wild.
John W. Wilde.
C. F. Wildes.
William L. Willey.
Emile F. Williams.
Horace P. Williams.
John S. Williams.
Joseph Sanford Williams.
Joseph S. Williams.
Henry A. Willis.
J. R. Williston.
H. P. Willmarth.
Edwin Wilcock.
Capt. J. E. Wilson.
George H. Wilson.
J. S. Wilton, H.A.C.
Col. M. A. Winter.
H. C. Wirt.
George L. Witherell.
Charles T. Witt.
A. Wolfson.
Beverly R. Wood.
J. C. Wood, H. A. C.
William B. Wood.
H. C. Woodbury.
Maj. J. O. Woodward.
John H. Woodman.
Lieut.-Col. Charles B. Woodman.
Charles A. Woolley.
James Woolley.
Daniel F. Wright.
L. Wright, H. A. C.
Franklin A. Wyman.
George A. Wyman.

Y

Woodford Yerxa.
Capt. D. A. Young.
James G. Young, Jr.
William A. Young.

THE COMMITTEES.

Men Upon Whom Fell the Duties Pertaining to the Honourables' Banquet.

The committees upon whom devolved the duties pertaining to the banquet were as follows:

Executive—Col. Sidney M. Hedges, chairman; Sergt. E. F. Lewis, Col. J. P. Bradley, Lieut.-Col. A. M. Ferris, the Hon. J. D. Long, J. O. Burdett, Col. W. H. Oakes, A. Shuman, Capt. A. A. Folsom, Capt. E. E. Allen, G. P. Field, G. H. Leonard, Lieut. J. D. Nichols.

Finance—A. Shuman, chairman; Capt. E. E. Allen, Caleb Chase, G. H. Morrill, Jr., Capt. J. Fottler, Capt. S. Hichborn, Sergt. J. Edgar, Lieut.-Col. A. M. Ferris.

Hotels and banquets—Sergt. Fred M. Purmort, chairman; G. L. Stevens, Lieut. J. M. Usher, F. E. Atteaux, W. S. Briggs, Sergt. A. Fuller, Sergt. W. Oswald, D. P. Cheeney, Lieut.-Col. E. W. M. Bailey, A. B. Seeley, Maj. H. G. Jordan, Gen. F. W. Wellington.

Press and printing—Capt. J. Stearns Cushing, chairman; Capt. T. J. Olys, Col. H. E. Smith, Fred McQuesten, Lieut. A. A. Gleason, Capt. E. P. Cramm, Col. C. K. Darling, Capt. E. R. Frost, A. T. Lovell, Maj. C. G. Davis, Lieut. F. C. Brownell.

Transportation—Capt. Albert A. Folsom, chairman; Lieut. E. Grover, Capt. E. Huckins, Sergt. F. J. Hutchinson, Lieut. J. E. Cotter, Capt. J. H. Brown, Sergt. H. W. Patterson, Col. H. Walker, William Firth, Sergt. J. L. White, Sergt. R. W. Bates.

[24]

Sunday's Advertising
781/2 Columns
A Big Gain
Over the Corresponding Sunday of 1902

The Boston Post

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 6, 1903

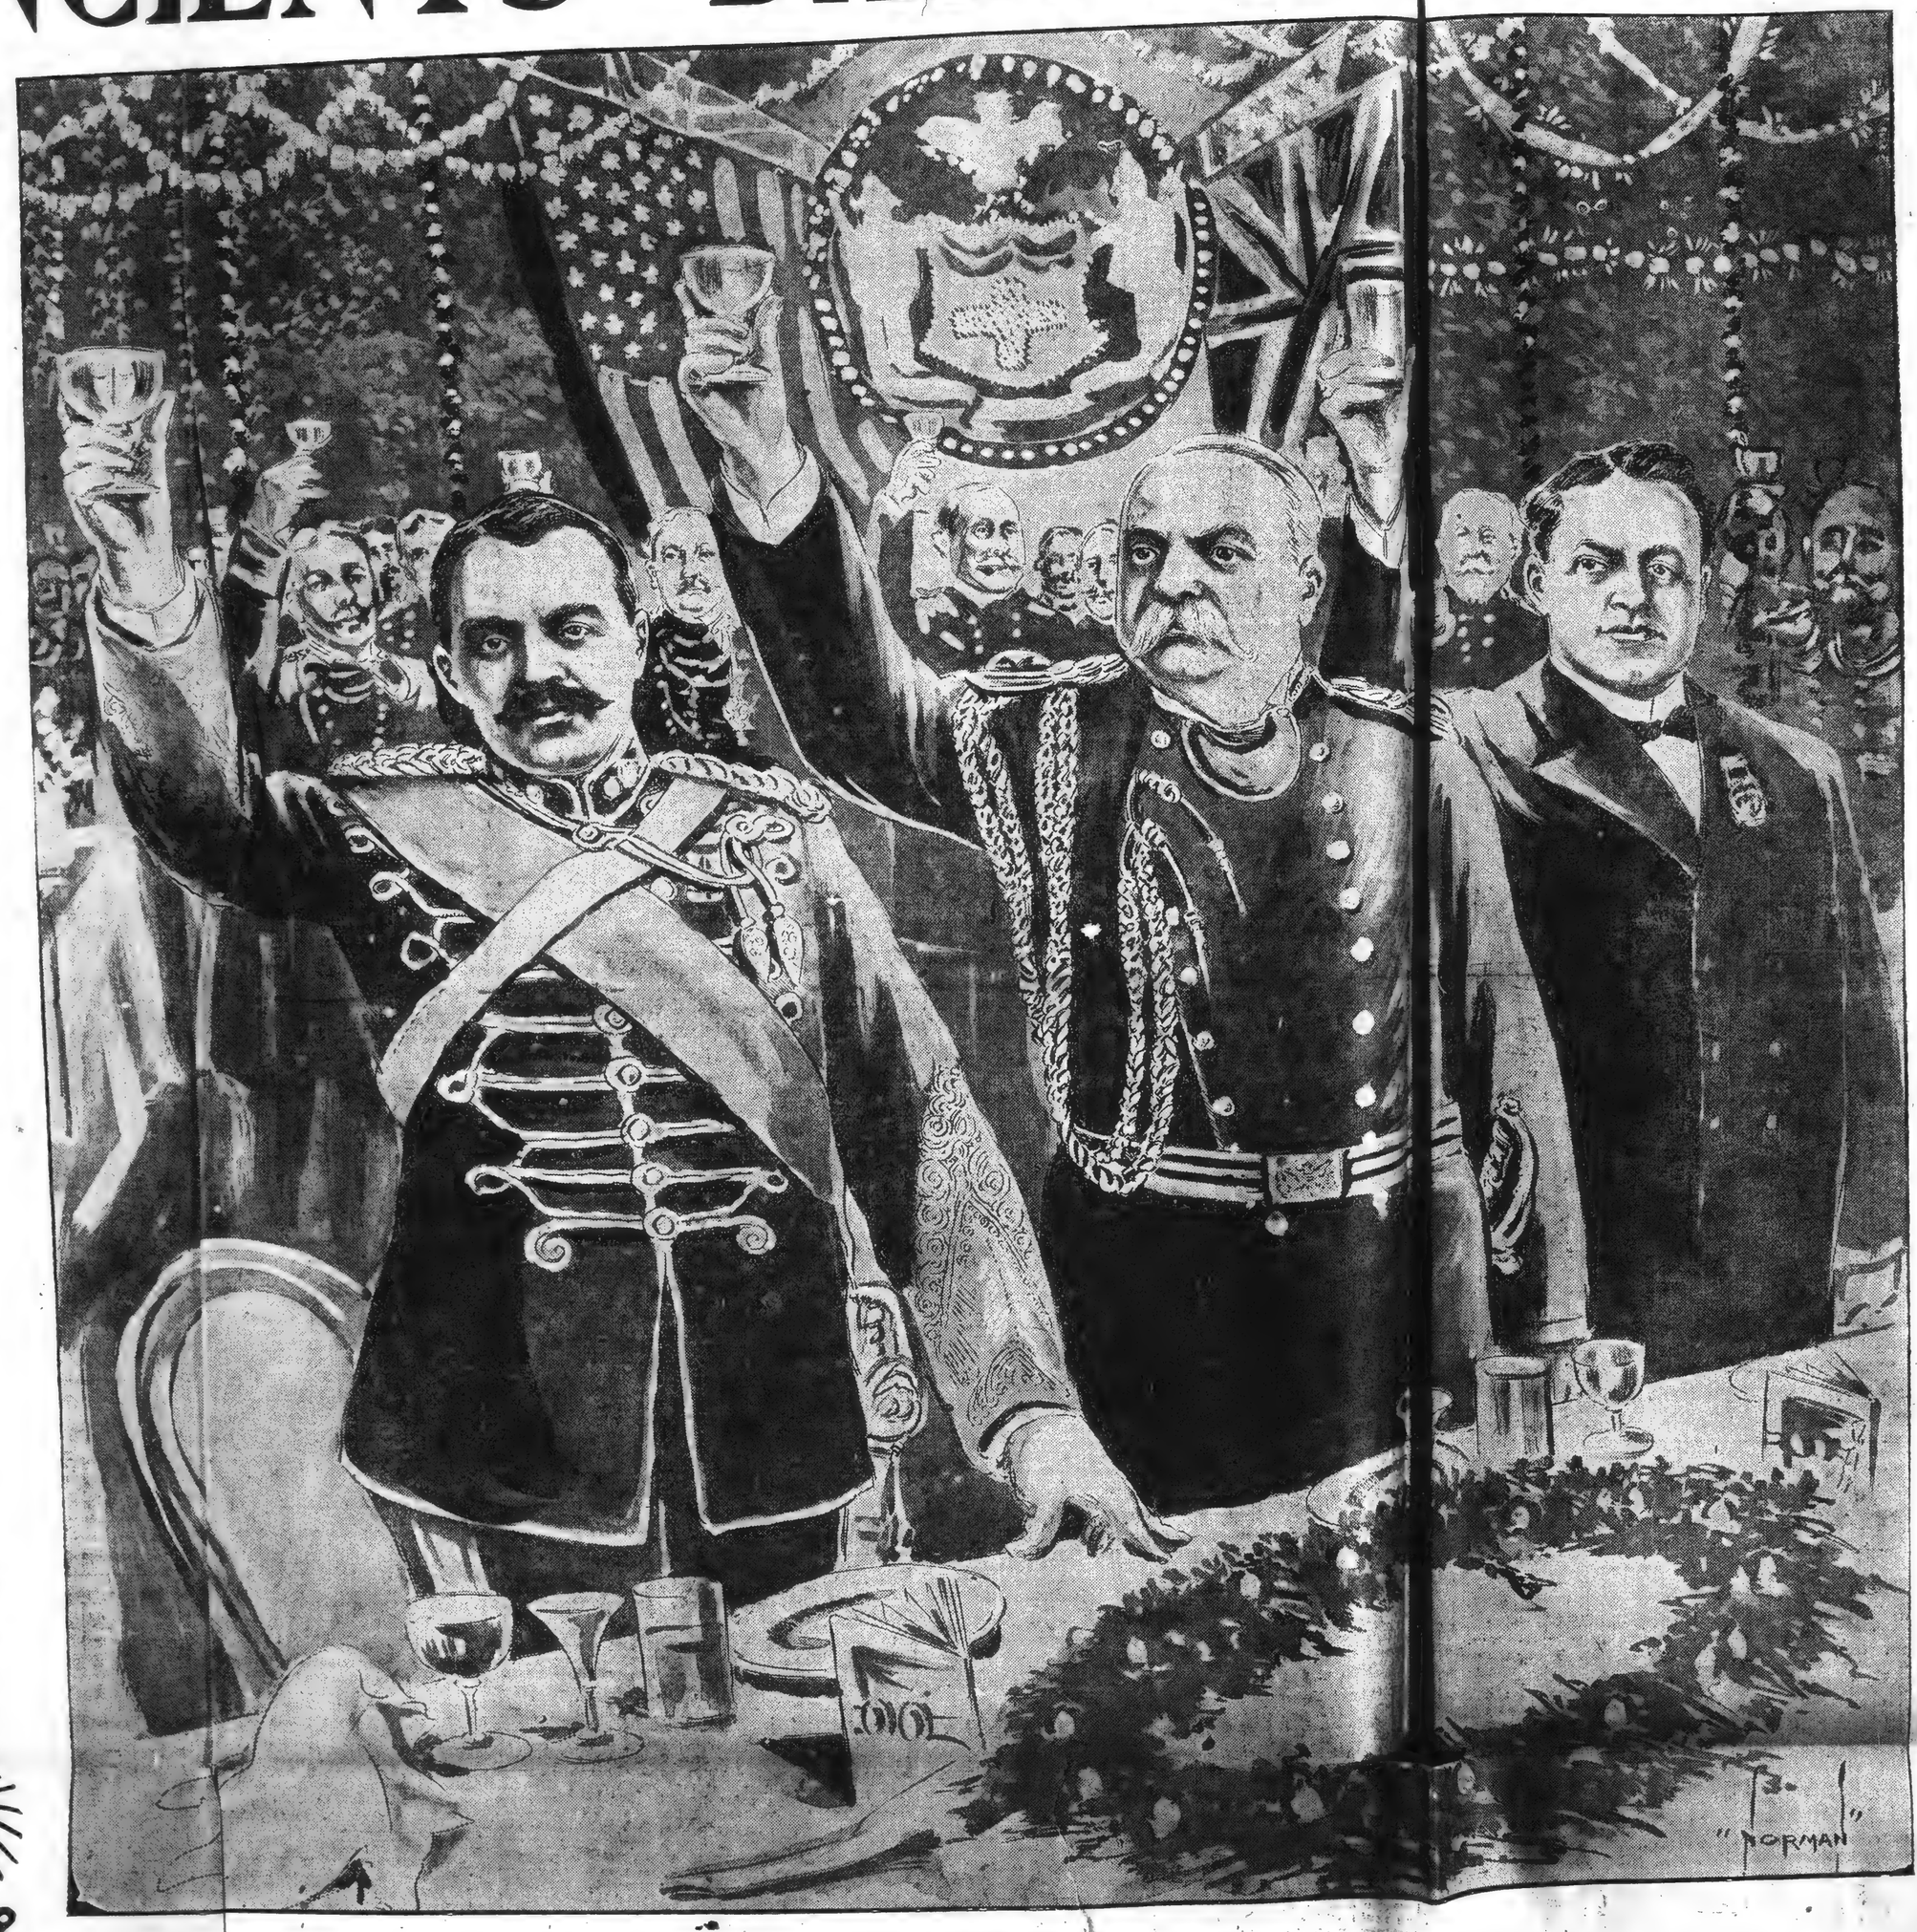
Sunday's Advertising
781/2 Columns
A Big Gain
Over the Corresponding Sunday of 1902

TWELVE PAGES—ONE CENT

TWELVE PAGES—ONE CENT

"This vault a feasting presence full of light;
You are welcome, gentlemen; come, musicians, play."
—Romeo and Juliet

ANCIENTS DAZZLE BRITONS



THE TOAST TO KING EDWARD.
Governor Bates, drank from a goblet filled with clear, sparkling water. The others varied the beverages according to their different tastes and inclinations.

FAIR

Forecast for Boston: Fair Tuesday and Wednesday; cooler Tuesday; warmer Wednesday. Light variable winds.

TEMPERATURE YESTERDAY

Average temperature yesterday, 67 1-4.
Average temperature one year ago yesterday, 59 1-24.

THE MELLOWEST MALT
OLD FOX ALE

Horseshoe Preferred
Hidden Fortune
Eastern Cons. Oil
... these shares special prices. ... any marketable security. JAMES A. CO., 1019 Tremont bldg., Boston.

"BLOODY MONDAY" ENDS IN ARRESTS

Harvard's sturdy sophomores clashed with the verdant members of the entering class of 1907 last evening in the shirt-destroying, bruise-giving, bone-breaking, time-honored and glorious mêlée of Bloody Monday night. For two hours the two classes fought fiercely against each other—the first hour openly and before a dense multitude of undergraduates in the college yard, and the second hour in small cliques and bands which met on terms of more intimate and deadly hostility in the street and in the different dormitories throughout the college grounds.

Seven" had the benefit of numbers, but the Sophs more than made up for this by their grim determination and the concentration of their attack. Consequently, when the two classes mustered their forces and clashed together in front of

Continued on Page 5—Fifth Column

SERIOUS INDIGESTION
Cured by Horsford's Acid Phosphate. It quickly restores the stomach to perfect health. A permanent cure and a most excellent Tonic.

Dr. John's Medicine Cures Colds.

LABOR MEN SCORE THE STATE POLICE

WORCESTER, Oct. 5.—"I ... gence in not executing the ... would give as much time in ... ufacturing districts of the ... spirit, and spend less ... cent Beach, the people of the ... are doing something to earn ...

With these statements, Secretary D. Driscoll of the State branch ... L., startled the 163 delegates ... annual convention of the ... branch at Worcester yesterday ... State police with wilful negli... and factory laws. If the State police ... ing up the conditions obtaining in the manufacturing districts ... to see if the law is observed in letter and ... in such matters as the closing of Crescent Beach, the people of the State might think perhaps that the State police ... salaries."

Denis F. of the 18th ... ration.

Henry Sterling of the State ... on Labor and Capital spoke ... judiciary and its usurpation of the ...

Continued on Page 2

SCENE OF SPLENDOR AT SYMPHONY HALL

KING EDWARD HONORARY MEMBER OF BOSTON ANCIENTS

King Edward was last evening elected an honorary member of the Boston Ancients. The Hon. John D. Long is the only other honorary member.

Hearts and hands of England and America joined in common glory in the crimson glow of Symphony Hall last night, when the welcome of the United States went out to the Honourable Artillery Company of London.

From a flower decked fairyland where golden lights and brilliant flowers made a mass of color, went the message of the common cause. A scene of splendor and a feast of glory, stalwart men with beautiful women looking on, made memorable a gathering of "brothers of the blood."

Peace and good will, welcome and answering thanks, praise for England,

Continued on Page 2

Mrs. R. L. Moseley, a Boston Woman, Says

Quinona
THE DOCTOR'S PRESCRIPTION

Saved Her From Typhoid Fever

Remarkable cures of Stomach and Nerve Trouble

Reported by all taking this wonderful preparation.
Gives fresh strength and vitality

TO TIRED OUT PEOPLE

Mrs. R. L. Moseley, 74 Boylston St., Boston, says:

"I was compelled to give up my business this spring because my health was so poor I did not have the strength to do anything. My back ached continually and my nerves were in an awful condition. The doctor said I was coming down with typhoid fever. Someone told me how Quinona cured them when they felt as I did. I bought a bottle and it acted like magic on my system. I began to feel the good it was doing me at once. I took only one bottle, but it made a new woman of me. My strength came back, I gained in weight and now I look and feel 10 years younger than I did before taking Quinona."—MRS. R. L. MOSELEY, 74 Boylston st., Boston, Mass.

Cures Stomach Trouble

"I have always had more or less trouble with my stomach, and this fall it was worse than ever. Whether I ate light or substantial lunches, the result was always the same. I came back to the office, took logy, and my food didn't seem to digest. After supper it was the same way, also felt faint mornings about 11 o'clock. I tried taking Quinona, a teaspoonful before each meal, and I felt the good it was doing me almost at once. My stomach trouble has completely gone now, and I have more energy and vigor than I have had for years before." (Signed) CHARLES SMITH, 70 State street, Boston, Mass.

Extreme Nervousness Cured

"Quinona quickly took away every bit of my nervousness and that tired-out feeling and built up my general health marvellously. I take it now whenever I have a headache and it soon goes away. It is the only preparation I ever took which did me any good, and I believe the day that I heard of it, Quinona should be in every home." (Signed) MISS KENDRICKS, 85 Westland avenue, Suite 1, Boston, Mass.

We want you to write to or call on these people—We print proofs "near home" for that purpose.

Quickly Builds Up the Run Down System

Quinona will positively cure every case of stomach trouble, no matter how severe or of how long standing. It quickly cures extreme nervousness and prevents nervous prostration. It is not a stimulant, but a purely medicinal formula, which acts quicker and more directly on the nerve system than any other preparation known to medical science. Quinona's cures are certain because it quickly builds up the run-down system, which is the cause of all your ailments: lack of appetite, sleeplessness, headache, constant cold, night sweats, extreme nervousness, bad stomach, backaches, weak action of the heart, poor blood, that all-tired-out feeling disappear as if by magic by taking Quinona, and in their place comes perfect health. We want you to take a teaspoonful of Quinona when you wake up in the morning feeling tired and dragged out. It will give you at once fresh strength and vitality and put you in perfect condition for the day's work. A sip of Quinona will refresh you immediately if you become tired during the day.

We want every woman, tired out from a day's shopping or work, to take a little Quinona. It will throw off every bit of that tired out feeling. If you have no appetite take a teaspoonful of Quinona before each meal. The way it creates a healthful appetite is wonderful. If your head aches, a little Quinona will at once drive away all head pains. Quinona brings sound, restful sleep. It is the one tonic which gives fresh strength and vitality to those recovering from a long sickness. Quinona quickly breaks up a cold. Four tablespoonfuls taken before retiring will nearly always break up the worst cold before morning.

Every elderly person should take Quinona. It brings new life, freshens up the system and makes them look and feel years younger.

Thin people gain in weight and round out into good physique by taking Quinona. Remember, Quinona is

Not a Patent Medicine

Weeks & Potter Co., wholesale druggists of Boston, sold large quantities of it during the last ten years to retail druggists to supply physicians' prescriptions only. The exact formula and directions for taking it are printed on the label of every bottle. It is a perfectly safe and palatable tonic to take.

ALL DRUGGISTS SELL QUINONA—$1 for Large Bottle
THE QUINONA COMPANY, 1 Hartford St., Boston, Mass.

LADY DENBIGH IN BROOKLINE

Entertained at Lunch by Mrs. Charles F. Sprague and Then by Mrs. Jack Gardner

In her stately mansion overlooking the Country Club at Brookline, yesterday, Mrs. Charles F. Sprague gave a luncheon to Lady Denbigh and 10 guests whom she had invited to meet the charming wife of the Honourables' commander. Lady Denbigh arrived shortly before 1 o'clock, and promptly at that hour the guests sat down to the luncheon.

Lady Denbigh wore a simple but elegant gown of buff-colored material. Mrs. Sprague was gowned entirely in black and wore a costly necklace of pearls.

Sprague ordered the workmen upon the new ballroom of the mansion, which is fast nearing completion, to suspend work for the day.

Luncheon over, Lady Denbigh was shown the Sprague mansion and its art treasures. She left at 3:45, during a light shower, and was driven directly to the country home of Mrs. John L. Gardner, a mile or so distant. Most of Mrs. Sprague's other guests were also driven to Mrs. Gardner's. Three or four of them, however, drove to the station praise for America, prayers for the two and the best hopes of all, were blended in the message which will make the night an ever enduring memory.

SCENE OF SPLENDOR AT SYMPHONY HALL

Continued From First Page

Sitting side by side were the men of England and the men of America, cheering each the self same sentiments, doing honor to each flag and rocking the hall with thunder at the "hands across the sea," and the common good will. There was nothing to mar the message. It came stronger and stronger, until the British lion and the American eagle were clasped as brothers in arms.

Briton and Yankee were one last night.

To hear Governor Bates declare that America and England will never be at war against each other though they may be at war with each other, sent the skyrocket cheers swelling to the skies. And a moment later Lord Denbigh, in his gracious courtesy, but in a voice of thunder, declared that, "Bunker Hill monument will ever stand before Britons as an example of how colonies ought not to be governed." Then broke loose such a roar of cheers that it sounded like storm waves on a rocky coast.

Lord Denbigh's Return

Straight out as did Governor Bates extend the hand of good will, Lord Denbigh clasped it warmer still and his boldness startled all. With never an excuse for England, glorious praise for America and all that America had done, he fitly carved his message and no more eloquently could it have been put.

Lord Denbigh dealt no stinted praise to the men of America. His cup of glory that he extended was full to the brim an running over. From the heart his sentiments came and the sincerity of his voice added effect to his message.

He was witty, he was earnest, joking at times, then again dropping into deepest seriousness, his penetrating soldier's voice reaching to the far end of the hall.

Governor Bates was at his best. His speech was an example of eloquence rarely seen at a public dinner. With all the warmth of his splendid delivery the Governor aroused his auditors to a high pitch. Every sentence was cheered, every reference to England as well as to America brought the banqueters to their feet in cheers.

He also could be witty and he also could be serious. When he declared that "we had been at peace with England over 270 years and that it would be 270 more before we had another war," every Englishman was on his feet with shouts and yells.

Wars of Long Ago

There was no malice in the gentle reference to wars of long ago; if there was it would have been swallowed up in the hurrahs that greeted the sentiment that "England and America would ever be hand in hand in advancing Christian civilization."

The sentiments of the Governor were those of all, judging from the whirlwind of enthusiasm that his remarks created. For full five minutes after he sat down the cheers of the audience were still ringing in his ears.

They were still echoing about the hall when Lord Denbigh, who followed Mayor Collins, arose. As if taking up the theme of the Governor the earl made it still stronger. He went further into the question of blood and blood, and when he sat down it was to rise again and again to answer the cheers.

If ever more enthusiasm was bottled up in advance to let loose upon an audience in a Boston hall it was not in the memory of anyone in Symphony Hall.

From the beginning to the end it was one long endless repetition of cheers. Cheers for the music, cheers for the ladies, hurrahs for the speakers, skyrockets for each sentiment made the hall rock like a ship in the wind. There will be hoarse throats today to start away, but happy hearts thinking of a glorious memory.

There was Senator Hoar in his happiest vein, Governor Long never brighter or wittier, the Hon. George H. Lyman to speak for the President, Mayor Collins, suave, silver-tongued, and pleasing with his gentle thrusts at Boston men, Colonel F. W. Hibberd of Montreal to speak for our Canadian neighbors, Professor de Sumichrast of Harvard, ardent Englishmen and lovers of America, General Bancroft to speak for the militia, and Chaplain Ryder to sound the praise of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company.

Ladies in Galleries

The galleries filled with ladies added a picturesque setting to the scene in the gayly lighted hall. The white dresses of the ladies, the flashing gems which caught the light and sent dazzling beams of light dancing across the hall, made an imposing halo for the wonderland below.

It was as if some fairy of the days of long ago had waved a wand, as she used to do in the fairy books, and transformed common earth forms into a portion of her domain. Words could not picture the scene of splendor that the hall presented.

Precisely at 7:15 word was signalled to Colonel Hedges, waiting in Horticultural Hall, that the great banquet was ready. Then Colonel Hedges gave the word. He extended his arm to Lord Denbigh and started the procession.

Behind Lord Denbigh and Colonel Hedges were Governor Bates and General Dalton, and the other guests followed.

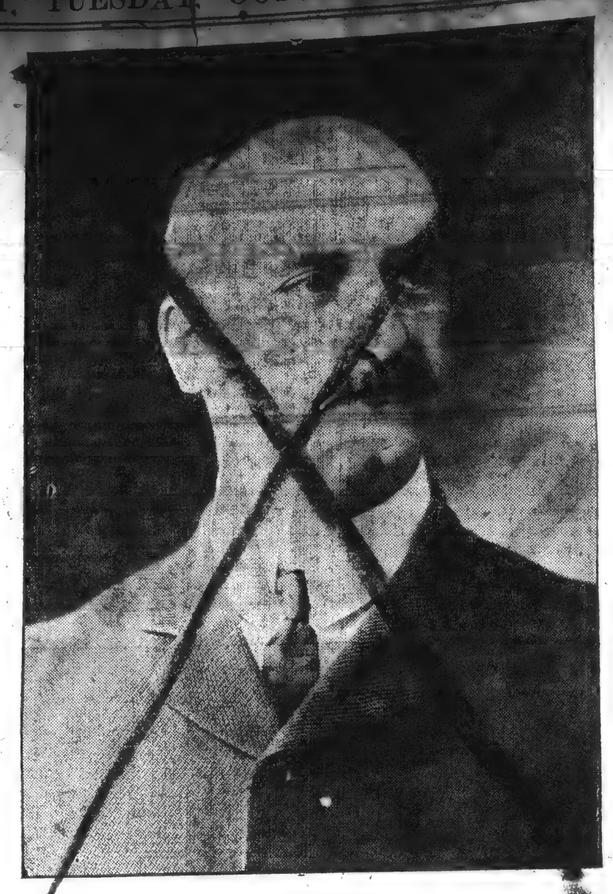
Hardly had the parade to the banquet hall started than Lord Denbigh looked around hastily. He saw Governor Bates behind, and he instantly withdrew his arm from Colonel Hedges's.

"Pardon me, Governor, I did not know I was to precede you," he said, bowing. "I beg that you will kindly lead with Colonel Hedges. It's your place."

Denbigh at the Head

However, Colonel Hedges and the Governor assured Lord Denbigh that his place was at the head, and he then consented to go in the lead.

Across the broad width of Massachu-



(Photo by Conlin.)
JAMES R. CROZIER,
President of the American Federation of Labor, who presided at the national convention in Worcester.

hall, a perfect maze of wondrous glory. The glowing lights tipped every petal, flashed from every green leaf, scintillated on the balcony decoration, making a kaleidoscope wonderland of light and color.

Above the stage were long stretches of golden lights which dropped from the red, green and yellow-tipped crown suspended from the centre of the stage in long lines of gold and smilax.

Every light was agleam on the smilax ropes, shedding a golden light on the tables. Above them were the electric numerals, "1537" and "1638," showing the foundation of the two companies.

Each table, too, was a blaze of color, twisting lines of roses and green being entwined with strings of electric globes to make a dazzling scene on the circular tables.

Spectacular Scene

From above one could look down upon a spectacular scene, a brilliant and amazing spectacle where were mingled scarlet hued uniforms with gold-laced officers and brilliant blue uniforms contrasting with the glow of light.

Great banks of roses lined the hall, each corner having a gorgeous bunch of Jack roses.

Silver and china reflected the sea of light on the tables, dazzling each onlooker with a golden splendor of color.

Such was the wonderful scene in Symphony Hall when visitors and hosts sat down to the banquet which was to be the greatest ever served in Boston.

The service was perfect. Like clockwork the waiters moved, three to each table. Deftly and easily everything moved, each dish sliding on and off the tables like magic.

Over in Two Hours

The banquet was over in just two hours. It was elaborate, but not too much so. Everything was the result of months of work. The wines were especially bottled, the cigars especially chosen, all had been carefully picked out and arranged for last night.

While the dinner was being served the band played martial airs and once in a while when some favorite song, like "Hiawatha" or "Soldiers of the Queen," came floating down from the balcony it was "all join in with a rush." With song and laughter, English and American fraternizing together, the two hours of good fellowship were passed.

At 9 o'clock the appearance of the ladies in the balcony was the signal for a long whirlwind cheer.

A moment later Lady Denbigh, robed in black, came in with Mrs. Hedges and Mrs. Baylor. With one accord the banqueters rose and the long ringing cheers roared out for Lady Denbigh, given with the heartiest will and the stoutest voice.

It was the appearance of the ladies which gave the final touch to the bewildering scene in the hall. It was magnificent, so dazzling that Lord Denbigh confessed that his brain was in a whirl contemplating it.

Boxes of Souvenirs

Before the exercises of the evening great baskets of souvenirs were passed around the hall in brilliant red-covered boxes. They were the famous long-heralded $25 souvenir menus and decorated plates which took two years in the making.

Then came the real treat of the evening, the speech-making, and it was a treat. The finest orators in public life in State and city were on the platform, and such a feast of eloquence has rarely been heard.

As Colonel Hedges called the gathering to order, the Rev. Edward Everett Hale appeared on the stage to offer prayer. Just a few fervent, solemn words, and [illegible] withdrew.

[illegible] Deming had been toastmaster, and his toasts [illegible] models of brevity and elo-

[illegible] first toast, "The President of [illegible] States," was drunk British [illegible] mingled with American hurrahs, [illegible] the King received the honor [illegible] one proposed "three cheers for [illegible] ward," and they were given with [illegible] y will.

Lord Denbigh arose pandemonium [illegible] loose, and if ever the English lord [illegible] royal welcome, he did then.

American Greeting

[illegible] one yelled: "What's the matter [illegible] Denbigh," and loud came the an[illegible]: "He's all right." The earl smiled [illegible] adily at the unique American greeting. [illegible] Though Governor Bates and Lord Den[illegible]gh were the lions of the evening, the [illegible]ther speakers were not forgotten. There [illegible]as applause in plenty for all.

Senator Hoar, white-haired, but eloquent still, was a figure the British wanted to see. They had heard of him, and they greeted him royally.

John D. Long was not forgotten, and he spoke as only John D. Long can speak, wittily and pointedly, here poking fun and there serious and powerful.

Mayor Collins, who ever had the faculty of slipping in a joke in a pleasant way, provoked the laughter of the evening.

Collector Lyman made an earnest address; Colonel F. W. Hibberd evoked the loud hearty applause of all, while Professor de Sumichrast was scholarly and patriotic.

General Bancroft's address in behalf of the militia was an eloquent effort, while Chaplain Ryder closed the speaking with words that added to the good fellowship of all.

Colonel F. W. Hibberd of Montreal responded to the toast "Our Canadian Neighbors," apologizing for the absence of Sir Frederick Borden, Canadian minister of war. He expressed the good will of the colony for the American people and hoped to see the good will long continue. He assured his listeners that they would get as hearty a reception in the city of Montreal as in any city they may visit on the continent, although it would be impossible to tender so lavish an entertainment as the present.

After Chaplain Ryder's speech, which closed the exercises, Lord Denbigh arose and called for a salute to Colonel Hedges, and at the word "Present!" the Londoners arose from their seats and gave their peculiar hurrah. The companies then separated at about 12:20.

EX-GOVERNOR LONG

Reviews Kings of England, Placing Edward VII. as the Greatest of Them All

When Governor Long was introduced Tom Olys stood upon a chair and called for three cheers. Governor Long told a story to preface his speech in replying to the toast "The Honorary Members."

Governor Long told how he was proposed for membership at a gathering of the Honorables. He said: "When my name was proposed with others I could not refuse to accept, for I never refuse an honor of that kind, because I follow the good old plan that they should take who have the power and they should keep who can.

"In the group of our honorary members is one who is our brother, and one we have long honored and remember, King Edward VII. (Tremendous applause.)

"You could add nothing to his title if you were to say his Britannic Majesty, for that is a grand title, an historic title, 'the King of England.' (Loud cheers.)

Governor Long then went through the list of kings and queens from the Norman William to his present Majesty, reciting with historical accuracy the deeds for which they were most distinguished; but of all his predecessors, the speaker said, there was none whose memory was so sacred to Americans as the name of Queen Victoria.

"And it is a great thing," he said, "and a very high honor to every member of this organization that King Edward stands at the head of the line as an honorary member. We cannot help but admire his manhood and many actions and his love of liberty. There was a time when kings oppressed their people, but King Edward stands as the representative of Christian civilization. He has given freedom to the Irish people and there is never anything more significant than his reception in Dublin so recently, so enthusiastic and magnificent. Then his visits to the continent have been productive of much good.

"My great hope is that he may some day visit us. I know a royal reception would be given him. When he came here before as a boy—I remember it, about 1859—his simple, unostentatious manners captivated us all. I remember seeing him very well. He must have thought even then that he would be King of Great Britain some day and be colonel of the Honourable Artillery Company, but his wildest flight of fancy never was that he would be an honorary member of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company of Boston and be associated with me. (Loud laughter and applause.)

"I rejoice in the friendship shown by our motherland to us. Of course, we have had some quarrels, but they have been family quarrels. You won at Bunker Hill, and we did not know we were beaten, and we have cried over it ever since, but that is a monument to your valor and to us. We do not regret that one of the causes of our independence was the action of some Englishmen, who we are glad to remember as Channing, Fox and Pitt and others in Parliament.

Continued on Page 9, First Column

GUARANTEED CURE FOR PILES
Itching, Blind, Bleeding or Protruding Piles. Your druggist will refund money if PAZO OINTMENT fails to cure you in 6 to 14 days. 50c.

Knapp Will Set
a new stone in your engagement ring and fill 8 pages of your green stamp book free. Watches cleaned and repaired. Orders a specialty. Jewelry made to order. 504 Washington st. The Arcade.

Tea and Coffee Dept.
Single stamps with double punch cards, or $4 worth of stamps with $1 purchase. Cards made. 504 Washington st. Arcade.

A Bad Stomach
lessens the usefulness and mars the happiness of life.
It's a weak stomach, a tired stomach that can't properly perform its functions.
Among its symptoms are distress after eating, nausea between meals, heartburn, belching, vomiting, flatulence and nervous headache.
Hood's Sarsaparilla
cures a bad stomach, indigestion and dyspepsia, and the cure is permanent.
Accept no substitute.

LABOR MEN SCORE THE STATE PO

Continued From First Page

of the people, and urged agitation to arouse the citizens of the State.

In his annual report, after welcoming the delegates, President Crozier gave a detailed account of the work of the year in the settlement of trade disputes. He said that the total number of strikes in Massachusetts during the year had been 231, the greatest number of which were for higher wages and shorter hours. Of the 231 strikes, 68 were successful, 46 were compromised on, five are still pending, and in 112 the result is not known. In the matter of child labor, he said that it was necessary to go out of the State to find child labor, and that the students Winslow and Jackson had given considerable time to an investigation and had been successful in having the number of children under 14 years employed in factories.

With reference to the incorporation of trade unions, he said that the law was impudent and presumptuous. He said no friend of the trade union believed in it, advocated or desired it. It was only demanded, he said, by those interests which use every effort at their command to oppose unionism, to counteract its influence and destroy it." He recommended a convention to settle its seal of approval on this movement. He recommended an appropriation from the State to help the organization of women.

The report of Secretary Denis D. Driscoll showed a healthy increase in membership during the year, and that many towns in the commonwealth, never before organized, had been brought under the control of the State branch. During the year unions have obtained membership in State organization.

A feature of the report was a discussion of the sanitary conditions to prevail in the fish factories in Gloucester, which the secretary called "a disgrace to humanity." In connection he offered very severe criticism of the State police, who, he said, would not move against manufacturers in the laws unless organized labor insisted that something be done. The secretary also said that the children of Massachusetts were being enslaved.

To charge the State police with negligence in this matter, and to demand that this convention take some action on that negligence," Secretary Driscoll.

The legislative committee, of which chairman Frank K. Foster was, reported that three petitions [illegible] with bills covering assignments [illegible] and future earnings and loans, [illegible] given leave to withdraw; two [illegible] tions with bills relating to the [illegible] ment of women and minors [illegible] facturing or mechanical establishments requiring the posting of time [illegible] mercantile establishments, and [illegible] to the employment of minors [illegible] school vacations, had been [illegible] of which six were given leave to draw, four rejected in the [illegible] two referred to the next General [illegible] A resolve recommending to the Congress of the Lodge of Probability bill had been voted to pass, in relation to the hours other than those of women and two bills were vetoed by the [illegible] six had been given leave to withdraw, two had been referred to the General Court, and one had been ordered not to pass.

At the afternoon session the report of the special committee on child labor [illegible] the feature of the session.

The report was in part as follows:

"We have inspected the conditions employment in Cambridge, Lowell, Fitchburg, Leominster, Lowell, Lawrence and Maynard. We have found children who were not entitled to certificates working in mills and factories. We complained to the Chief of State Police Wade. He assured us that no children were working illegally and lay with the authorities who issued certificates. The State police, Wade claims, could not go behind the certificates of a child's age even when they felt sure that the person was under the legal age limit.

"Owing to the discrepancy between statements of inspectors and what we made the complaints that the children were working under age with false certificates, we decided to personally investigate the case.

"In Lowell we learned from [illegible] that since the State branch had taken up the matter the authorities had gone very active in enforcing the law. A great number of children who were working without certificates were sent out of the mills, and to get certificates or were refused employment.

"We went to the office of the officers where school certificates are issued, and not being known we had a good opportunity to watch the manner in which certificates were issued. The words used in condemnation of the criminal careless manner in which the officers issued the certificates were strong.

"Little children, evidently under age, were granted certificates without any inspection. The [illegible] administered the oath to parents and guardians in a farcical in the extreme. The whole [illegible] business of granting certificates [illegible] was a disgrace and a [illegible] to the city of Lowell.

"At the mills we saw many children who had worked [illegible] without any certificate and were evidently under age.

"Our observations also [illegible] all sorts of schemes and devices [illegible] to defeat the aims of the law, such as buying and selling and giving away sets of certificates.

"The superintendents of schools all showed a disposition to co-operate with us, gave us every aid, and in many cases told us that they were willing to be assisted by the State police in the enforcement of the laws.

"There should be some change in the manner used by the State police in investigating the child labor laws.

"[illegible] there are not enough of the officers there should be more. The officers employed the same quiet method of personal investigation as did this committee, instead of taking the word of the mill officials, backed up with a force of personal observation, they would soon find many children below the legal age employed [illegible] the mills of the State.

"We have found that many children are stowed away on fire escapes, and some out of the way place to escape the eyes of the inspector during his presence in the building, which is known by word from the office.

"The conditions in Lawrence are similar with those of Lowell. There are 1420 boys and illegal girls working in accordance with certificates, and the committee is sure that many more are employed without certificates and, therefore, illegally."

All delegates attended a banquet at O. H. Hall in the evening. Peter F. Maloney, ex-president of the Knights of C. L. U., presided. Plates were laid for 300, and addresses were made by State and local leaders.

SIX LITTLE TAILORS

Our New Location
297 WASHINGTON
(Opposite the Old South)

GUESTS AT ANCIENTS' $60,000 BANQUET AND WHAT THEY FEASTED ON

MENU

PE COD OYSTERS — CLEIR GREEN TURTLE

PRINCE ALBERT SHERRY

AIGUILLETTES OF HALIBUT CARDINAL

CUCUMBERS — POTATOES HOLLANDAISE

HAUT SAUTERNE

TOURNEDOS OF FILET OF BEEF A LA PREVILLOT

STRING BEANS

POMMERY SEC ET BRUT

EPIGRAMMES OF SWEETBREADS SEVIGNE — GREEN PEAS

SORBET A LA MILITAIRE — SQUAB CHICKENS ROASTED

OMAINE AND TOMATO SALAD — BOMBE GLACES INTERNATIONAL

PETITS FOURS

CHEESE — COFFEE — CIGARS — CIGARETTES

TABLE NO. 1

30—General N. A. M. Dudley.
32—General Edmund Rice.
36—Major F. Farrington, H. A. C.
24—Rear Admiral Mortimer L. Johnson.
22—Major P. W. Legatt, H. A. C.
20—General George M. Cole, adjutant-general of Connecticut.
18—The Hon. A. A. Chamberlin, Governor of Connecticut.
16—George A. Marden, sub-treasurer.
14—Major Munday, H. A. C.
12—General William A. Bancroft.
10—General Adna R. Chaffee, U. S. A.
8—Lieutenant-Colonel Stohwasser, H.A.C.
6—The Hon. George F. Hoar.
4—The Hon. George H. Lyman, collector of port.
2—Colonel Denbigh, H. A. C.

1—Colonel Sidney M. Hedges.
3—Governor John L. Bates.
5—General Samuel Dalton.
7—The Hon. P. A. Collins.
9—Lieutenant-Governor Curtis Guild, Jr.
11—The Hon. J. Q. A. Brackett.
13—The John D. Long.
15—Major C. E. D. Budworth, H. A. C.
17—Captain C. A. P. Talbot, British consul.
19—The Hon. L. F. C. Garvin, Governor of Rhode Island.
21—George A. Hibbard, postmaster.
23—The Hon. N. J. Bachelder, Governor of New Hampshire.
25—Adjutant-General Aug. D. Ayling of New Hampshire.
27—General John L. Tiernan.
29—The Rev. William H. Rider.
31—Colonel Charles K. Darling.

Table 2—Colonel Embury P. Clark, Colonel William A. Pew, Jr., Colonel William H. Donovan, Lieutenant G. Harland, H. A. C.; Major Howard S. Dearing, Lieutenant G. Hering, H. A. C.; Captain Horace B. Parker, Thomas L. Green, H. A. C.; Captain Joseph H. Frothingham, Bascom; Wilfred G. Brown; John A. Emery; C. F. Taylor, H. A. C.

Table 9—Arthur T. Lovell; Geo. D. Russell; F. H. Putnam; Fred E. Bolton; Charles H. Pearson; Daniel H. Lane; F. R. McDonald; Joseph O. Burdett; Boston Herald; Boston Globe; Boston Journal; Boston Post; Boston Advertiser; Boston Traveler; Boston Transcript; New York Sun; New York World; Associated Press; Boston Budget; Boston Record; The Republic; Boston Home Journal.

Table 10.—Geo. P. Field; William F. Hall; David L. Jewell; Frank W. Lee; John L. Mitchell; Thomas Talbot; Geo. M. Potter; H. W. Ruff, H. A. C.; C. G. Stewart, H. A. C.; T. L. Clark, H. A. C.; J. H. West, H. A. C.

Table 11—William S. Best, Thomas A. Boyd, Charles W. Howard, Wesley Jones, E. P. Longley, Fred McQuesten, Sullivan B. Newton, A. E. Lockhart, W. H. Rolfe, H. A. C., G. H. A. Wade, H. A. C., J. C. Wood, H. A. C.

Table 12—Frank C. Brownell, A. G. Harness, H. A. C., Harrison Hume, John White, Major F. W. Childs, E. Venables, H. A. C., Sebastian Gahm, William B. Edgar, Henry B. Perkins, William H. Preble, George Cassell.

Table 13—George L. Stevens, James A. Davis, Henry N. Fisher, the Rev. Stephen H. Roblin, the Rev. Leighton Parks, Henry F. Dickinson, Joseph L. White, Walter Burns, George M. Thompson, L. M. Murdock, H. A. C., H. A. Petre, H. A. C.

Table 14—The Hon. Edgar Aldrich, Edward B. Wadsworth, J. Tisdale Bradley, Manning S. Campbell, Samuel C. Lawrence, Harry Dutton, William G. Shillaber, W. Eckstein, H. A. C., H. E. L. Fuller, H. A. C., J. Piggott, H. A. C., C. E. Roberts, H. A. C.

Table 15—Caleb Chase, Charles D. Sias, Walter Barwick, J. Murray Kay, Captain G. F. Gratwick, Charles T. Dukelow, Edmund H. Garrett, J. T. Auerbach, Nathaniel H. Taylor, H. L. Bishop, H. A. C., S. Fortesque, H. A. C.

Table 16—E. Frank Lewis, George F. Babbitt, Colonel George W. Moses, Charles Gibson, the Hon. James Phillips, Jr., General H. O. Davidson, Nathaniel Cobb, F. W. Fuller, P. F. Henry, H. A. C., T. H. James, H. A. C., H. D. Lumby, H. A. C.

Table 17—Albert H. Stearns, Frank A. Davidson, H. F. McIntire, William M. Miller, Theodore A. Manchester, E. A. Maloon, Charles Parker, George A. Perkins, Edward F. Smith, N. Tozer, H. A. C.; L. Wright, H. A. C.

Table 18—Colonel William H. Oakes, Charles W. Knapp, Edward P. Cramm, Frederick L. Abbott, Frank Huckins, Frank H. Mudge, Colonel Frank B. Stevens, James M. Usher, Thomas J. Olys, R. Gilling, H. A. C.; C. L. Hornby, H. A. C.

Table 19—Arthur Fuller, William L. Willey, Frederick B. Fallbrook, Edward Sullivan, Edward E. Snow, Augustus Andrews, Edward W. Abbott, William G. Fish, Charles M. Wheldon, J. C. Kendall, H. A. C.; A. King, H. A. C.

Table 20—Charles C. Goodwin, E. B. Cowles, Bernard Jenney, Jr., Charles A. West, H. M. Leland, Gustavus C. Holt, W. F. Walters, Alfred Britten, Fred E. Atteaux, H. S. Greenwood, H. A. C.; S. Grossmith, H. A. C.

Table 21—Henry F. Naphen, James Ellis, Herbert A. Gilman, John D. Carmody, Samuel L. Powers, Thomas Sherwin, Jasper N. Kellar, Colonel Alexander M. Ferris, J. R. Williston, H. E. Evans, H. A. C.; C. F. Parslow, H. A. C.

Table 22—Colonel LeGage Pratt, T. H. Bennett, Thomas L. O'Brion, Colonel Harry E. Russell, Carl Adams, Bernard Hyneman, Dr. C. W. Townsend, C. H. Eastwick, J. J. Tillinghast, C. F. Farrington, H. C. Wirt.

Table 23—Lieutenant John D. Nichols, Perley B. Thompson, Colonel Everett E. Benton, Arthur W. Pope, Walter S. Sampson, John Shepard, Jr., A. G. Van Nostrand, John J. Feely, E. A. Fisher, H. A. C.; H. T. Holloway, H. A. C.; J. F. Jones, H. A. C.

Table 24—Perlie A. Dyar, J. Frank Supplee, Charles G. Thompson, Joseph S. Williams, Samuel Alland, O. G. Barron, M. P. Clough, G. S. Philip, H. A. C.; R. V. F. Seton, H. A. C.; H. T. Sherwood, H. A. C.; F. G. Smith, H. A. C.

Table 25—George H. Morrill, Jr., Lewis J. Bird, Charles A. Lamson, Robert F. Straine, the Hon. John E. Fitzgerald, Thomas M. Babson, I. A. Ratshesky, E. M. Pitman, Frank E. Gleason, J. H. Abraham, H. A. C.; J. H. Clements, H. A. C.

Table 26—William M. Ferris, Robert C. Bridgham, George Adams, William F. Lunt, J. F. Roesch, Philip B. Bruce, John C. Potter, J. C. Randlett, John G. Warner, R. C. Cole, H. A. C.; C. Draycott, H. A. C.

Table 27—The Hon. John M. Fiske, Captain Walter M. Lindsey, Henry A. Willis, Colonel George R. Wallace, Colonel Richard F. Barrett, Rodney McDonough, Thomas Cahill Cummings, the Hon. Elijah George, R. E. Childers, H. A. C.; O. Engster, H. A. C.; E. E. Davies.

Table 28—James Morgan, Charles G. Moses, Colonel M. A. Winter, Z. W. Pease, Major E. H. Eldredge, C. F. Wildes, T. F. Medina, H. A. C.; F. A. Mostyn, H. A. C.; F. J. McLeod, William Oswald, Colonel F. F. Olney.

Table 29—Joshua M. Cushing, Charles P. Flagg, W. W. Hodges, Lewis L. Jones, Charles A. Lieghton, A. E. A. McCann, Charles E. Osgood, F. H. Smith, H. A. C.; C. F. G. Wagstaff, H. A. C.; J. S. Platt, H. A. C.; M. Strauss, H. A. C.

Table 30—Emery Grover, William Carter, George Bliss, John S. Doane, Major L. N. Duchesney, John S. Damrell, Captain Jacob Fottler, E. H. Best, C. J. Johnson, H. A. C.; H. E. Jones, H. A. C.; A. E. Marcus, H. A. C.

Table 31—Thomas Arnold, William B. Arnold, Elisha T. Harvell, Everett B. Church, James A. Roarty, William P. Grovestein, M. D.; E. Dwight Hill, M. D.; Walter D. Shurtleff, M. D.; James W. Cooper, M. D.; H. Harris, H. A. C.; C. C. Haycraft, H. A. C.

Table 32—Captain J. Stearns Cushing, Major George F. Quinby, Brigadier-General Fred W. Wellington, Colonel Charles Pfaff, Captain Lloyd England, U. S. A.; Captain James A. Shipton, U. S. A.; Lieutenant-Colonel Charles B. Woodman, Colonel James A. Frye, Lieutenant Clarence N. Jones, U. S. A.; G. E. Halsey, H. A. C.; J. Hartnoll, H. A. C.

Table 33—George H. Desmond, Frank M. Johnson, F. M. Purmort, F. E. Dickerman, the Hon. A. W. Sulloway, Edward Hill, Frank D. Currier, Benjamin P. Cheney, A. S. Nichols, F. Newsom-Smith, H. A. C.; W. J. W. Nodder, H. A. C.

Table 34—Henry W. Patterson, Augustus B. Seeley, Francis Draz, Frederick Glassup, Colonel Jacob Ruppert, Major H. L. Chipman, B. F. Keith, Paul A. Keith, F. C. Gooding, H. A. C.; T. F. Griggs, H. A. C.; Major H. G. Jordan.

Table 35—James Donovan, Hugh Montague, Captain Shupe, the Hon. C. E. Adams, Captain George R. H. Buffington, Major James O. Woodward, Lord Trinlestown, Major C. B. Staniels, James Berwick, Charles T. Baker, John M. Rodocanachi.

Table 36—John W. Wilde, George E. Homer, Edward E. Hardy, Charles E. Durgin, N. T. Gorham, Jr., Thomas W. Evans, Manning Seamans, Charles E. Leggs, Charles M. Pear, J. F. Greenwood, H. A. C., B. W. Horne, H. A. C.

Table 37—Charles E. Howe, John C. Baird, Anthony Blum, Percy F. Goodwin, William H. Goodwin, Harry H. Newcomb, the Hon. Alex B. Bruce, Emile F. Williams, Edgar A. Smith, A. Forster, H. A. C., A. T. Gordon-Smith, H. A. C.

Table 38—Albert L. Richardson, Benjamin W. Rowell, Eugene A. Holton, Samuel I. Coy, George E. Hilton, James M. Gleason, W. H. L. Odell, Joseph E. Osborn, George A. Patten, D. Duncan, H. A. C., S. R. Dyas, H. A. C.

Table 39—George J. Raymond, A. J. Hilbourn, S. J. Hilburn, G. Howard Jones, Charles Leighton, George W. Hills, Edwin R. Frost, Joseph B. Parsons, W. Tetley-Jones, H. A. C., J. H. Clark, H. A. C., D. Cookes, H. A. C.

Table 40—G. Austin, H. A. C., William H. Forbes, A. F. Blades, H. A. C., Benjamin B. Torrey, William R. Waterman, George H. Allen, Joseph C. Otis, William A. Young, Frank B. McQuesten, H. M. S. Aiken, Francis Hurtubis, Jr.

Table 41—David C. Makepeace, Arthur A. McRae, Charles P. Keeler, Daniel H. Smith, William H. Smith, William A. Batty, Charles M. Robbins, George L. Witherell, O. P. Richardson, A. A. Scott, H. A. C.; A. W. Sibeth, H. A. C.

Table 42—F. W. Homans, W. A. Homans, Henry A. Burnham, Gardner Pool, John J. Flaherty, George A. Davis, William Parsons, Charles Babson, Isaac A. S. Steele, V. Barrett, H. A. C.; E. Bennett, H. A. C.

Table 43—A. S. Maddocks, Nelson M. Johnson, Joseph C. Shepherd, F. H. Greeley, William G. Brown, Edwin A. Bradley, E. H. Dickinson, E. P. Wanson, Robert R. Fears, R. W. Bradshaw, H. A. C.; F. Y. Bright, H. A. C.

Table 44—William C. Gregory, Benjamin Cole, Jr; Andrew Schlehuber, D. B. H. Power, Charles E. Giles, Jacob A. Turner, James W. Robinson, A. L. Eastman, Walter A. Hansen, P. G. Browne, H. A. C.; H. A. Caslon-Smith, H. A. C.

Table 45—Harry Hamilton, J. F. Hodge, Edgar P. Lewis, James Woolley, Charles A. Woolley, Alonzo L. Richardson, Arthur Bliss, E. W. Pitman, William P. Jones, J. D. H. Watts, H. A. C.; J. S. Wilton, H. A. C.

Table 46—George B. Ketchum, John R. Newman, William B. Holmes, R. Sherman McCarter, Francis E. Page, H. K. Mansfield, George E. Glover, Willis C. Bates, Leonard F. Cutter, R. Speller, H. A. C.; W. C. Symes, H. A. C.

Table 47—Henry C. Cottle, O. H. Brock, Charles Butcher, Robert Butterworth, Robert J. Rodday, Henry F. Wade, L. S. M. Glidden, E. W. Billings, A. G. Lund, C. Ansell, H. A. C., William H. Robertson.

Table 48—E. C. Johnson, D. B. Ringsbury, F. C. Goddard, F. M. Darrow, F. H. Newton, William H. Emerson, William J. Gillespie, W. F. Skilton, Frank W. Richards, G. H. Pizey, H. A. C.; J. H. Podmore, H. A. C.

Table 49—George C. Morton, James B. Lord, William B. Gaines, Colonel Fred B. Carpenter, Colonel William C. Cappelle, C. H. Hayes, Lew C. Hill, William S. Whiting, W. A. Allen, H. A. C.; C. P. Attenborough, H. A. C.; R. H. Attenborough, H. A. C.

Table 50—J. A. W. Silver, Silas W. Brackett, William H. Lott, William H. Thomas, William J. Quinnell, Irving B. Vose, Frank S. Waterman, F. H. Glover, P. N. Steinberg, H. A. C.; T. P. Thompson, H. A. C.; T. W. Cooper, H. A. C.

Table 51—George O. Noyes, J. Henry Brown, Edward A. Hammond, Charles C. Adams, Joseph H. Brown, Charles H. Porter, Amos R. Storer, C. H. Fellows, James D. Fanning, S. S. Faulkner, H. A. C.; E. A. Hamlyn, H. A. C.

Table 52—Eugene S. Taylor, E. O. Bartels, Robert H. Upham, William N. McKenna, Fred W. Tirrell, George H. Wilson, John J. Ford, Hugh L. Stalker, Henry A. Maley, Alexander P. Graham, R. Salem, H. A. C.

Table 53—George L. Look; George Francis; George A. Wyman; R. H. Fraser; William Tyner; Jacob Benseman; Alfred Sorensen; Anthony Cunic; R. Whiteman Bates; H. R. Ronaldson, H. A. C.; I. H. Russell, H. A. C.

Table 54—Philemon D. Warren; William J. Batchelder; William H. Stacy; Daniel F. Wright; M. C. Clark; William H. Mitchell; Charles D. B. Fisk; Daniel B. Badger; William M. Clarke; S. J. Boreham, H. A. C.; A. D. Collins, H. A. C.

Table 55—C. W. Luce; C. H. Boynton; John A. Coffin; John Remby; William B. Lantz; Henry Kavanagh; E. S. Padelford; Chas. H. McDermott; J. B. Richards; Col. E. W. M. Bailey; J. C. Brymer, H. A. C.

Table 56—H. A. Blackmer; Norman P. Hayes; Samuel A. Nell; William B. Wood; Chas. S. Parsons; H. P. Willmarth; A. C. Wheaton; Bordman Hall; Adams T. Pierce; H. S. Ilsley, H. A. C.; H. Jarrett, H. A. C.

Table 57—Charles R. Hunt; Thomas M. Denham; Thomas Hersom; C. H. Batcheldes; Charles H. Fox; John P. Hazlett; Henry L. Plummer; A. J. Bulger; Fred Preston; E. G. Head, H. A. C.; G. W. Ilsley, H. A. C.

Table 58—George Henry Morrill; Philip B. Heintz; Jacob Mosser; Charles W. Arnold; Dana T. Dudley; William C. Lewis; Arthur D. Veasey; Hazen B. Fraser, H. A. C.; A. S. Game, H. A. C.

Table 59—Joseph W. Adams, George E. Adams, John N. Haines, George D. White, J. W. Greenalch, William V. Abbott, Everett B. Hodges, Robert S. Gray, W. F. Adams, S. D. Haydon, H. A. C.; C. G. Hooper, H. A. C.

Table 60—Augustus L. Smith, Frank W. Dallinger, William L. Stedman, William L. Coon, Frank H. Bowles, Emmons R. Ellis, Henry P. Oakman, Henry H. Litchfield, Frank A. Fales, W. C. Hulbert, H. A. C.; A. Inskipp, H. A. C.

Table 61—George M. Gray, Thomas M. Holden, Arthur W. Clapp, Howard H. Hamilton, William M. Maynard, George H. Maynard, Henry Pfaff, Jr., Frank Ridlon, H. H. S. Postans, H. A. C.; C. E. Pettitt, H. A. C.; R. Frost Smith, H. A. C.

Table 62—Colonel Henry Walker, Wm. Jackson, Elmer Chickering, Freeman A. Walker, George H. Innis, Boardman J. Parker, Timothy F. Corey, Arthur E. Leach, Arthur H. Newman, C. W. Oliver, H. A. C.; D. C. Platt, H. A. C.

Table 63—Charles Orrin Breed, James M. Frye, I. N. Goldsmith, Otis Kimball, Charles W. Parker, Henry O. Russell, Tracy H. Tucker, J. B. Waterbury, E. L. Warren, H. A. C.; D. Wheatley, H. A. C.; D. M. Lewis, H. A. C.

Table 64—Gustavus F. Walker, C. F. P. Burchmore, Henry O. Houghton, Hobart S. Hussey, I. Kaffenburg, Winslow B. Lucas, Frank P. Pickering, Frank B. Riddell, H. W. Nicholson, H. A. C.; H. Pocock, H. A. C.; F. I. Spielman, H. A. C.

Table 65—Thomas J. Tuft, Samuel G. Adams, Frank S. Cleghorn, Milton H. French, A. H. Goetting, George E. Hall, H. Bradford Lewis, Andrew McNeil, W. A. Sterling, H. A. C.; A. C. Weston, H. A. C.; L. E. Cutbill, H. A. C.

Table 66—George J. Quinsler, George L. Smith, E. H. Hoyt, Edwin Wilcock, J. Chancellor Crafts, Franklin A. Wyman, Julius Hollander, Thomas C. Ashley, Thomas Saunders, S. H. Byron, H. A. C.; C. W. Faulkner, H. A. C.

Table 67—Frank P. Stone, G. H. W. Bates, Albert C. Betteley, Edgar W. Jones, Elmer G. Foster, Fred I. Clayton, Henry B. Humphrey, Robert Burlin, James A. Glass, A. I. Barnett, H. A. C.; R. W. Bateman, H. A. C.

Table 68—J. K. Norwood, K. S. Norwood, E. R. Graves, Milton C. Paige, Wallace F. Robinson, John L. Fiske, George N. Towle, T. G. Waller, J. Dalton, H. A. C.; H. L. Farmer, H. A. C.; P. L. Morgan, H. A. C.

Table 69—Louis A. Blackinton, J. C. Danforth, Charles E. Eager, Lawrence J. Ford, Warren F. Hall, J. C. Macdonald, A. D. Mowry, E. S. Howard, H. A. C.; A. W. Johnson, H. A. C.; G. St. John Lobb, H. A. C.; Stephen Mason, H. A. C.

Table 70—Thomas J. Clerkton, J. H. Cunningham, A. G. Durgin, Daniel Frank, Charles Mann, Clarence A. Perkins, W. B. Parazina, H. H. Sawyer, R. P. Mugford, H. A. C.; G. F. T. Murnane, H. A. C.; F. J. Spencer, H. A. C.

Table 71—James B. Cherry, William A. Hardy, L. M. Maxham, George S. Perry, John G. Stewart, John S. Williams, Charles A. Meserve, Fred P. Jaques, George W. Spaulding, John H. Woodman, F. W. A. Bergengren.

Table 72—Ira P. Smith, Robert P. Boss, Charles E. Cummings, Morris W. Child, John E. Cotter, J. M. Johnson, Horace P. Williams, I. B. Lawton, Marshall Lincoln, S. B. Pearmain, Henry N. Sawyer, F. Langdon Smith, Charles T. Witt, A. Wolfson, E. Tudor Gross.

Table 73—F. K. B. Marter, Paul Corson, Henry M. Daggett, Jr., George Fairburn, George F. Hewett, Jerome E. Lynch, William E. Patenaude, L. H. Shephard, William P. Stone, J. George Cooper, Charles G. Davis, Fred F. Field, E. M. Heustis, Charles T. Hall.

Table 74—William H. Ellis, Howard C. Woodbury, Charles W. Leatherbee, Charles W. Munro, William H. Prior, Alexander Stoerer, C. W. Severance, F. C. Thayer, George A. White, Nathan B. Basch, Charles B. Barrett, Charles S. Darrell, F. F. Favor, Thomas E. Hawes.

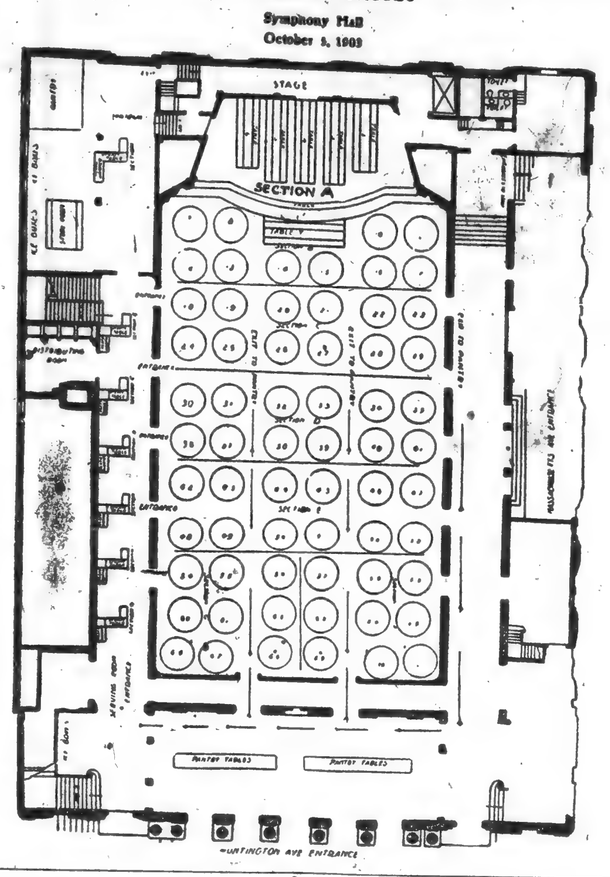
Table 75—Thomas G. Libby, Charles F. Morrill, Frank C. Packard, Captain D. A. Young, Arthur P. Tyler, W. W. Corson, Carroll C. Whittemore, Joseph Sanford Williams.

Table 76 (Annex 1)—Woodford Yerxa, James E. Blake, Edward C. Beck, Frank Ferdinand, Frank H. Howard, George A. Levi, W. Carl Lewis, James F. Mullen, A. E. Lothrop, William J. Miller, George W. Mirrick, Walter L. Sanborn, James W. McIndoo, James Edgar, F. L. Walker, Charles F. Baker, Sol Bacharach, Denman Blanchard, George A. Shackford, William H. Hennessey, Charles F. Munroe, Silas A. Barton, F. P. Roby, J. H. Hartley.

Table 77 (Annex 2)—R. F. Wild, W. E. Nickerson, Charles A. Russell, W. F. Lockhart, C. D. Holmes, William H. Mills, Charles H. C. Brown, Walter R. Dyer, W. B. Emery, Charles K. Fox, George Garnon, Frank H. Ivers, John French Johnson, George E. Keeler, F. H. Nunns, Robert Redford, Benjamin F. Lamb, Charles D. Wentworth, Fred M. Smith, Kendall H. Damon, Charles M. Faunce, George W. Kimball, Edward C. Bates, J. B. Hanscom, Charles H. Wheeler, J. Boardman Cramm, Howard F. Butler, J. M. Chapple, Albert W. Lyons, Freeman A. Hardy, Fred A. Ewell, Charles Evans, Alfred Anderson, Arthur H. Beal, William H. Olmsted, Charles W. Ripley, A. E. DeRosay, F. B. Wentworth, Beverly R. Wood, E. H. Doane, Nathaniel G. Robinson, George F. Lowell, Arthur H. Alley, the Hon. Horace G. Allen, George C. Bartram, F. R. Bill, Lieutenant Walter J. Comstock, Major C. B. Fitzhenry, R. G. R.; Captain F. S. Howes, Colonel A. Murray, R. G. R.; officer, U. S. S. Chicago; officer, U. S. S. Chicago; officer, H. M. S. Retribution; officer, H. M. S. Retribution; Captain R. Samson, R. G. R.; George S. Stockwell, William G. Titcomb, Frank Webster.

DIAGRAM OF TABLES

Symphony Hall
October 5, 1903



The badge worn by the committee of 100 British residents during the visit of the London Honourable Artillery Company.

TOASTS

1—THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—The Hon. George H. Lyman, collector of the port of Boston and Charlestown.
2—HIS BRITANNIC MAJESTY KING EDWARD VII.—The band.
3—WELCOME FROM THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS—The Hon. John L. Bates, Governor of Massachusetts.
4—WELCOME FROM THE CITY OF BOSTON—The Hon. Patrick A. Collins, Mayor of Boston.
5—THE HONOURABLE ARTILLERY COMPANY OF LONDON—Lieutenant-Colonel the Earl of Denbigh and Desmond.
6—OLD MOTHER ENGLAND—The Hon. George F. Hoar, United States Senator.
7—OUR HONORARY MEMBERS—Ex-Governor John D. Long.
8—OUR CANADIAN NEIGHBORS—Sir Frederick W. Borden, Minister of Militia and Defence.
9—HARVARD UNIVERSITY—Professor F. C. De Sumichrast.
10—THE VOLUNTEER MILITIA—Major-General William A. Bancroft, Massachusetts Volunteer Militia (retired).
11—THE ANCIENT AND HONORABLE ARTILLERY COMPANY OF MASSACHUSETTS—The Rev. William H. Rider.

SOUVENIR PLATE, CASE AND MENU FOR THE ANCIENTS' BANQUET AT SYMPHONY HALL LAST EVENING.

THE SOUVENIR CHAIRS USED AT THE SYMPHONY HALL BANQUET LAST EVENING.

(Photo by Post Photographer.)

LONDON HONOURABLES PASSING THE PARK STREET CHURCH DOWN TREMONT STREET ON THE WAY TO THE STEAMER FOR THE EXCURSION.

HOW BANQUET DISHES WERE MADE

Chef Graf Gives Post Recipes for Special Courses Set Before Honourables

Emil Graf, the chef of the banquet to the London Honourables at Symphony Hall, gave the Post the following recipes for the special dishes he served last evening:

TOURNEDOS OF FILET OF BEEF A LA PREVILLOT—This was his masterpiece in cookery, his piece de resistance, as he called it. Select your tenderloin with little white streaks in it. Have it cut, not sliced, to a thickness of half an inch in the shape of an oblong with rounded corners. Put it in your baking pan on ice for a couple of hours. When your fire is burning well and the heat strong in the oven put it in to roast. The time will depend on whether you want it rare, medium or well done. Just about medium will give the best results. Season it with red and green pepper. garnish it with mushrooms and serve it with rich brown sauce, truffles and string beans. A little good Madeira wine in the sauce will add to the flavor.

FILET OF HALIBUT, CARDINAL—Have the halibut cut into pieces about three and a half inches thick and then slice these in turn into hearts half an inch thick. The last slicing must be done with your knife parallel to the table so that you cut with the grain, as it were, of the flesh and not against it. Let the fish stay in the pan on ice for an hour or so. Cook it quickly with Hollandaise dressing and serve it covered with rich lobster sauce. Use white wine with the dressing and sauce. Cucumbers and Hollandaise potatoes go with it.

EPIGRAMMES OF SWEET BREAD, SEVIGNE—Cut your sweet breads in halves. Envelop them in bread crumbs and fry them in rice sauce. Serve them with fresh mushroom sauce. Little potatoes go with it.

These were the great dishes, in the preparation of which the greatest of care and the nicest of judgment were used. The clear green turtle soup was made from rich soup stock with a piece of the green part only of the turtle, two inches square, for every person served. The oysters were natural seed oysters, served on the half shell.

Mr. Graf is the chef of the Algonquin Club. He learned his business abroad and has had experience in many of the aristocratic restaurants of Germany, France, England and Italy. He was 28 years abroad and has been 16 years in this country.

BRITONS HAVE MERRY TRIP DOWN HARBOR

Songs of Two Nations a Feature of the Trip Home

The visiting Honourables had their second glimpse of Boston's harbor yesterday.

On Friday morning last, in the gray of dawn, they steamed slowly up the stream, wearied by a week upon the sea and indifferent to the beauty and picturesqueness of their surroundings.

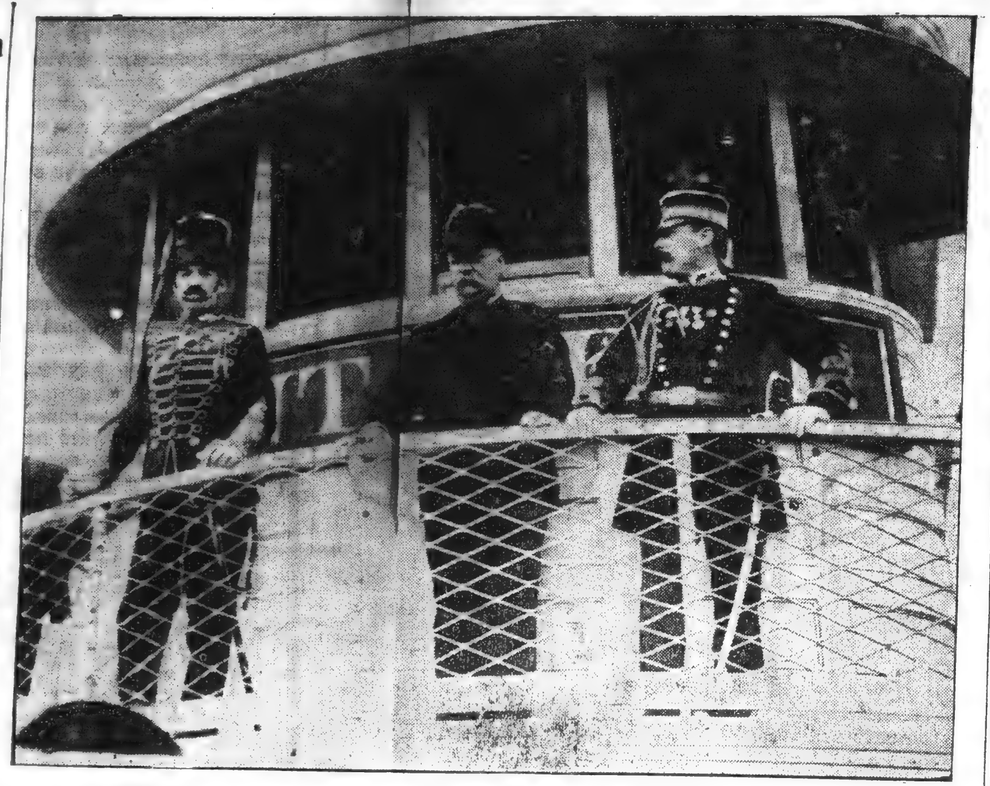
Yesterday, however, with bands playing and colors flying, saluted by every manner of steam craft, hailed enthusiastically from docks and ferries, as well as from the navy yard, they sailed proudly about the harbor and were given plenty of opportunity to admire different points of interest along the north and south shores.

With plenty to eat and drink aboard and a host of jolly good fellows to make the time pass pleasantly, there were few dull moments from the time the steamer Nantasket left Rowe's wharf until its return in the downpouring rain just four hours later.

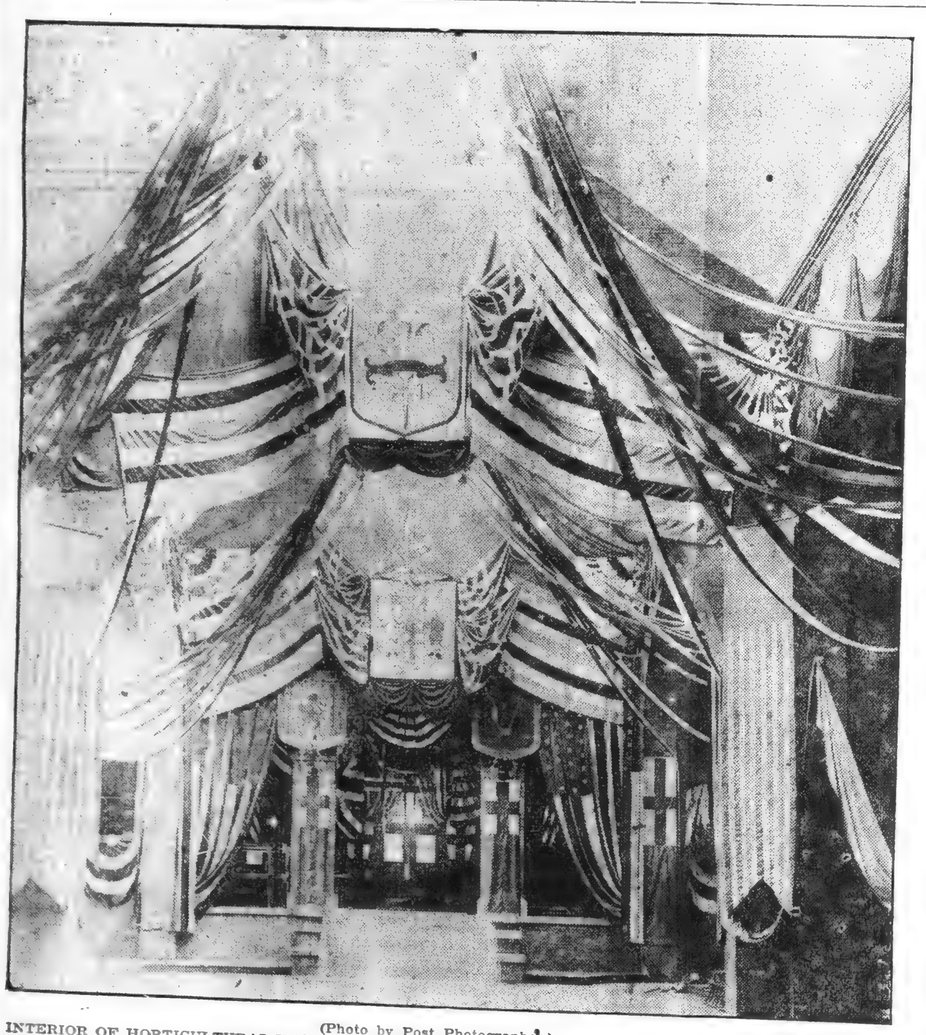
As early as 9:45 o'clock the Ancients had assembled in front of Faneuil Hall, and when, some 15 minutes later, the Boston company sent word to their guests that they were awaiting them, the latter were found already drawn up in Court square, impatiently awaiting the signal for departure.

The Earl of Denbigh and Lady Denbigh, Mrs. Baylor and Mrs. Hedges drove into the square in open landaus, and Lord Denbigh took immediate command of the Honourable Artillery, and the line of march was taken up through Court and Washington streets and Dock square to South Market street, where the London visitors were deployed in line, facing the line of the Ancients.

They then gave a very graceful and pretty present to the colors of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company. Colonel Hedges and the home company responded with an equally handsome present to the colors of the Honourable Artillery. This was an idea which Lord Denbigh suggested to Colonel Hedges.



Lord Denbigh. Colonel Sidney Hedges. Colonel Darling, adjutant.
(Photo by Post Photographer.)
THREE COLONELS ON THE BRIDGE OF THE EXCURSION STEAMER.



(Photo by Post Photographer.)
INTERIOR OF HORTICULTURAL HALL DECORATED FOR MONDAY'S FESTIVITIES OF THE ANCIENTS.

American and British bands combined, in all 70 pieces, broke forth into "God Save the King," as the Honourables' colors dropped in salute, and then, as Old Glory, with the white flag of Massachusetts, drooped, the strains of the "Star Spangled Banner" caused every head for blocks around to be uncovered.

The line of march was then taken up through Washington, Boylston, Tremont, School, Washington, Milk and Broad streets to Rowe's wharf, where the steamer left her moorings at 11:28 a. m.

The three ladies accompanied the party only as far as the dock.

From the time that the steamer left the slip until it had gotten some distance down the stream, the Nantasket's big whistle was kept blowing constantly in answer to salutes.

Instead of heading directly down the harbor, the big pleasure boat skirted the East Boston docks and turned about, passing by the navy yard, where the visitors got a good glimpse of the government buildings and the new dry dock just building.

Lord Denbigh, who stood in front of the pilot house, together with Colonels Hedges and Darling, was the first to call attention to this.

"Hi there! Doctor!" he yelled out to someone on the deck below. "Just look at that new dry dock. Isn't it a bully one?"

Everyone rushed to the side of the boat to catch a glimpse of the big basin. Everyone concurred with their leader in his statement that the new dock surely was a monster affair.

Passing H. M. S. Retribution, the Englishmen fired a salute and gave three cheers for their countrymen who were gathered on the deck in plain view. The cheers were returned with a will.

Going by the forts the gun on the Nantasket kept booming constantly.

Considerable comment was expressed by the Englishmen on the fact that the majority of the cottages and summer houses at the different summer resorts that were passed were built of wood. They thought that stone would have been "so much nicer and cooler," as well as safe from fire.

Nix's Mate some of the party at first thought a monument for some one of America's naval heroes, and one critical Briton thought it was a strange place "to build anybody's tomb, don't you know." Of course explanations were in order, so the story of the mate had to be told. The visitors were considerably awed when told that the prediction of more than a century ago had been verified.

Passing Calf Island, where B. P. Cheney's summer mansion is located, a salute of gun and whistle combined was given and in answer six puffs of black smoke marked the volley that the strong wind made it impossible to hear.

At Nantasket Landing the boat slackened its speed and many thought that the party were going to land, but the steamer merely turned about and then skirted the Hingham shore where the steel mast of the Independence was doing penance as a flag pole.

This was just before the return trip was begun, and the rain which started to fall drove the party from their exposed position on the deck to the shelter of the cabins. Here the fun started.

The band had for some time been playing a series of lively tunes, and when "Mr. Dooley" and others of the better known airs were given, Englishmen and their hosts joined in a jovial refrain. Then solos were in order.

Lieutenant-Colonel J. F. Supplee of the Fourth Maryland Regiment pretended to be bashful, but the fun had reached that stage where self-sacrifice was in order. So the colonel had to get up and sing "Maryland, My Maryland," and the crowd liked his singing so well that they would not let him sit down till he had finished up with the "Star Spangled Banner."

No sooner had Supplee been released from further duty than he turned and pointed out the unlucky Lieutenant John E. Cotter as a singer of the first order. The latter was so surprised that before he was given a chance to escape he was drawn into the charmed circle and soberly ordered to "sing, sing, sing." Protests were of no avail and finally in a weak mezzo-soprano he gave a trembling rendition of the "Blue and Gray." When he finally did escape, he retired into an obscure corner and would take no notice of Supplee's repentant explanations.

Then Captain Lowe, D. S. O., of the Londoners insisted on being given a chance. He sang several comic songs in a peculiarly catching voice and the crowd beat time with their feet. He was willing to sing all the afternoon if the crowd had only allowed him. F. B. K. Marter of the Boston Ancients and his brother, F. C. Marter of Brookline, sang "Soldiers of the Queen," and were warmly applauded by Ancients and Honourables.

Just before the dock was reached, while the band was playing both American and English patriotic airs, an impromptu international cakewalk was arranged on the outer deck. Encouraged by the spectators, including Lord Denbigh, who laughed heartily at the sight, the contestants were dancing away for all that was in them when the boat drew into the slip and nearly lifted them off their feet.

The rain was pouring heavily when the party landed, and, notwithstanding that a large crowd had gathered in expectation of seeing the homeward march, ranks were broken and the excursionists told to get home at once as best they could. They did by means of cabs and the convenient L.

Among those who went on the trip were Brigadier-General Samuel C. Lawrence of Medford and Colonel M. A. Winter, first regiment of minute men, District of Columbia militia.

Of the past commanders of the Ancients were Captain Jacob Fottler, Thomas J. Olys, Colonel J. Payson Bradley, and, besides these, were Colonel Cann of the Governor's staff of Wyoming; Brigade Engineer William F. Webber, First Brigade, M. V. M.; Major Meredith of the Fifth Infantry; Captain E. B. Wadsworth, Lieutenant-Commander Dillaway, Lieutenant J. Boyle Carmody, U. S. N. reserve.

WHAT THE HONOURABLES ARE

Corps Is a Connecting Link Between Regular and Militia Troops

The military position of the Honourable Artillery Company of London is understood by few Englishmen and by still fewer Americans. The corps stands in a unique position. While it is not a part of the regular army of Great Britain it may be called on for active duty just as any of the regiments of the line.

It is the connecting link between the regulars and the militia and volunteer forces. There is no initiation fee and any young man of good character who can pass the doctor is eligible for admission. Having been accepted, although a citizen soldier, he must abide by the regulations and can be punished as though he belonged to the line for any infraction.

While the yeomanry and volunteers of Great Britain can only be called on for home defence the Honourables can be ordered to any of the British dependencies at any moment.

In case the household troops should be engaged in a foreign country the Honourables might be called upon to do service in the guarding of the royal residences, but this has never occurred.

They differ entirely from the Ancients of Boston in that they pay no initiation fee and have no subscription to pay other than their actual service, which is most exacting.

Catholic Societies to Meet

Mayor McNamee of Cambridge will preside, and the Hon. Thomas A. Mullen, the Rev. James T. O'Reilly and others will speak at a public meeting of the Middlesex County Federation of Catholic Societies in Prospect Hall, Cambridgeport, next Sunday, at 3 p. m.

Why Some M

A MAN'S SU things and to pu
ENCYCLOPEDI facts about any tra
ing, chemistry, eng
you afford to go wi
it for a few cents a
that helps men to s
The ENCYC
peer. It supplies needs from day to thought and facts world, it represent research. That is one standard Encyc

A C

In the ENC
1—A corps of teac
2—A series of spe of which have schools.
3—An outline cour
private lines o
4—A mine of gene knowledge uns
5—A wise friend t
the long winte

And

By reason of o
abled to supply th
TION of this peer to customers—giv profit. An enorm during the past f
greater sale than a

Pri

On account of t
ture of books, and th to advance the price cover the extra expe in price shall not go been distributed.
We therefore gi
sary to secure this k easiest terms of payn
Cut out the Cou
IF USED PRO
Offer, but also to a

31 Massive Volumes
Weight Over 200 Pounds

31 Volumes in All.
25 Volumes Ninth Edition.
5 Volumes American Additions.
1 Volume Guide to Systematic Readings of the Whole Work.

$1 Secures This Entire Set of the New 20th Century Edition
You can pay the balance at the rate of only 10c. a day for a short time.

"It is without a
ABBOTT, D. D.
"The Encyclopedia
"If all other book
but little of its informa

BOO

A limited number
POST readers who as the Bookcase Co

The Amer

53 D

Please send me
Encyclopedia Brita
Name.....
Town.....

THE POST'S ORIGINAL
Short Story

To Short Story authors—Please read the rules of the Short Story competition on the Editorial page in the Sunday Post.

SAMPSON FANNING GODFREY

By Elizabeth Bradford, 6 Monponsett Street, Hyde Park, Mass.

Sampson was 6 years old. Everybody called him Sample, and of all the dear youngsters Sampson was the dearest. His mother and father loved him with all their hearts and Uncle Harry worshipped him.

Uncle Harry was mother's brother and made his home with the Godfreys. He was a handsome young fellow of 25, and worked in a bank, the president of which was his uncle. As Uncle Harry, and, of course, Sample's "mother, dear," had lost their father, Uncle Kimball was very near to them and Sample called him grandfather.

Uncle Harry and little Sample had such jolly romps in the nursery.

Then all of a sudden Uncle Harry became less jolly and the romps weren't quite as much fun, and then some mornings he didn't come to the nursery, and now he scarcely ever came home to dinner and was away all evening, so that Sample began to wonder.

One morning he came to play a while and his face looked so sad and tired that little Sample crawled on his knee and asked him the trouble. Uncle Harry looked at the boy and the boy's sympathy made the tears come in his eyes and he squeezed the boy closer to him. "You wouldn't understand, little chap. And, say, Samp, would you miss me if I shouldn't ever come home again?"

Sample sat and thought and thought; and when nurse came he didn't even remonstrate with her for combing his light matted curls. Finally he brightened. Yes, he had made up his mind. He would see grandfather. Grandfather was an invalid, so was at home most of the time. Sample resolved to go to his home and see him privately. When nurse had put on his little military coat and pulled the red stocking-leg cap over his ears, he requested that the drive should be to grandfather's. Arriving there, he asked that he might see his grandfather alone, so the nurse, astonished out of her senses, remained in the reception room, and Sample was shown into the library. Grandfather was delighted, and the boy climbed on the arm of his chair and told him about Uncle Harry. "And, grandfather," he said, in conclusion, "you must keep it a secret."

Grandfather promised, and then walked with the aid of his cane to the mahogany desk and wrote a note, which he told Sample to give to Uncle Harry and not to let anybody else know, and, as he stooped to kiss the boy, added: "And, Sample, dear, when you grow up to be a man leave speculating alone." Sample tucked the note in his pocket and they resumed their drive.

That night he waited for Uncle Harry, but a telephone message to mother said that he would remain down town. Sample was disappointed; but see Uncle Harry he must; so, after he had been tucked into bed and waited and waited for nurse to go, pinching his little fat legs all the time, to keep him awake, he laid his plans. After nurse had gone, he sneaked from his little bed and noiselessly opened the door and then closed it after him and Harry's room.

It was terribly dark, self he must not be af the room and crawled bed, holding fast the fist. Then he went

THE ANCIENT AND H
WHICH HAS ARR
ING THE 13 DAYS
$3000 WORTH OF Item.

Registered
"Name on Every Piece."
LOWNEY'S
Chocolate
& Bonbons
Every Package Warranted!
If you buy Lowney's Candies in the original sealed packages you will find them in perfect condition, or money refunded.

"Special" Assorted	1 lb. 60c.; ½ lb. 35c.
"Souvenir"	1 lb. 60c.; ½ lb. 35c.
"American Beauties"	1 lb. 50c.; ½ lb. 30c.
"Pinks," "Pansies" or "Forget-me-nots"	1 lb. 50c.; ½ lb. 30c.
"Golfers"	1 lb. 50c.; ½ lb. 30c.
"Colonial Dames"	1 lb. 50c.; ½ lb. 30c.
"Chocolate Peppermints"	10c. and 25c.
"Chocolate Almonds"	15c., 25c. and 60c.

Lowney's Packages are Full Weight.

Provident Securities and Banking Company
100 FRANKLIN ST., BOSTON
A system of home banking. Twenty-three thousand banks now in use. Limited number remaining.
GET ONE NOW

These banks are free. Start your account with
ONE DOLLAR
and watch it grow. If you cannot call, write to us or telephone 2502 Main and our representative will call.

Always Remember the Full Name
Laxative Bromo Quinine
Cures a Cold in One Day, Grip in 2 Days
E. W. Grove on every box. 25c

SAVE YOUR MONEY
BEGIN NOW
Don't put it off any longer. Buy shares in the Workingmens Co-operative Bank
3000 Shareholders Assets $1,300,000
Last Dividend 4 1-2% Per annum
NOTHING DEDUCTED if you have to draw out.
GO UP TO THE OFFICE TODAY
If you are a young man, it is just the time to begin. If you are not a young man you cannot afford to wait any longer.
It is as good for Women and Girls as for Men and Boys. If you cannot call, send for "How to Make Money" and other circulars.
101 Tremont St., Cor. Bromfield
FRANK E. BURBANK, Sec'y and Treas.

Liquid Kidney

MRS. REBE
AFTER Y

Aug. 26, 1903, Mrs. wrote: "For a long brick dust deposit in using Dr. Pettingill's now in perfect healt secure Kidney-Wort

"We could not class of patrons a da
ton's high class dru liquid kidney reme contain dangerous
ommend Kidney-Wo
the Tablets are fre prepared from a

Kid
Tab

GUESTS AT ANCIENTS' $60,000 BANQUET AND WHAT T

MENU

CAPE COD OYSTERS — CLEIR GREEN TURTLE

PRINCE ALBERT SHERRY

AIGUILLETTES OF HALIBUT CARDINAL

CUCUMBERS — POTATOES HOLLANDAISE

HAUT SAUTERNE

TOURNEDOS OF FILET OF BEEF A LA PREVILLOT

STRING BEANS

POMMERY SEC ET BRUT

EPIGRAMMES OF SWEETBREADS SEVÍGNE — GREEN PEAS

SORBET A LA MILITAIRE — SQUAB CHICKENS ROASTED

ROMAINE AND TOMATO SALAD — BOMBE GLACES INTERNATIONAL

PETITS FOURS

CHEESE — COFFEE — CIGARS — CIGARETTES

TABLE NO. 1

30—General N. A. M. Dudley.
28—General Edmund Rice.
26—Major F. Farrington, H. A. C.
24—Rear Admiral Mortimer L. Johnson.
22—Major P. W. Legatt, H. A. C.
20—General George M. Cole, adjutant-general of Connecticut.
18—The Hon. A. A. Chamberlin, Governor of Connecticut.
16—George A. Marden, sub-treasurer.
14—Major Munday, H. A. C.
12—General William A. Bancroft.
10—General Adna R. Chaffee, U. S. A.
8—Lieutenant-Colonel Stohwasser, H.A.C.
6—The Hon. George F. Hoar.
4—The Hon. George H. Lyman, collector of port.

2—Colonel Denbigh, H. A. C.

1—Colonel Sidney M. Hedges.
3—Governor John L. Bates.
5—General Samuel Dalton.
7—The Hon. P. A. Collins.
9—Lieutenant-Governor Curtis Guild, Jr.
11—The Hon. J. Q. A. Brackett.
13—The John D. Long.
15—Major C. E. D. Budworth, H. A. C.
17—Captain C. A. P. Talbot, British consul.
19—The Hon. L. F. C. Garvin, Governor of Rhode Island.
21—George A. Hibbard, postmaster.
23—The Hon. N. J. Bachelder, Governor of New Hampshire.
25—Adjutant-General Aug. D. Ayling of New Hampshire.
27—General John L. Tiernan.
29—The Rev. William H. Rider.
31—Colonel Charles K. Darling.

Table 2—Colonel Embury P. Clark, Colonel William A. Pew, Jr., Colonel William H. Donovan, Lieutenant G. Harland, H. A. C.; Major Howard S. Dearing, Lieutenant G. Hering, H. A. C.; Captain Horace B. Parker, Thomas L. Green, H. A. C.; Captain Joseph H. Frothingham, Bascom; Wilfred G. Brown; John A. Emery; C. F. Taylor, H. A. C.

Table 9—Arthur T. Lovell; Geo. D. Russell; F. H. Putnam; Fred E. Bolton; Charles H. Pearson; Daniel H. Lane; F. R. McDonald; Joseph O. Burdett; Boston Herald; Boston Globe; Boston Journal; Boston Post; Boston Advertiser; Boston Traveler; Boston Transcript; New York Sun; New York World; Associated Press; Boston Budget; Boston Record; The Republic; Boston Home Journal.

Table 10.—Geo. P. Field; William F. Hall; David L. Jewell; Frank W. Lee; John L. Mitchell; Thomas Talbot; Geo. M. Potter; H. W. Ruff, H. A. C.; C. G. Stewart, H. A. C.; T. L. Clark, H. A. C.; J. H. West, H. A. C.

Table 11—William S. Best, Thomas A. Boyd, Charles W. Howard, Wesley Jones, E. P. Longley, Fred McQuesten, Sullivan B. Newton, A. E. Lockhart, W. H. Rolfe, H. A. C., G. H. A. Wade, H. A. C., J. C. Wood, H. A. C.

Table 12—Frank C. Brownell, A. G. Harness, H. A. C., Harrison Hume, John White, Major F. W. Childs, E. Venables, H. A. C., Sebastian Gahm, William B. Edgar, Henry B. Perkins, William H. Preble, George Cassell.

Table 13—George L. Stevens, James A. Davis, Henry N. Fisher, the Rev. Stephen H. Roblin, the Rev. Leighton Parks, Henry F. Dickinson, Joseph L. White, Walter Burns, George M. Thompson, L. M. Murdock, H. A. C., H. A. Petre, H. A. C.

Table 14—The Hon. Edgar Aldrich, Edward B. Wadsworth, J. Tisdale Bradley, Manning S. Campbell, Samuel C. Lawrence, Harry Dutton, William G. Shillaber, W. Eckstein, H. A. C., H. E. L. Fuller, H. A. C., J. Piggott, H. A. C., C. E. Roberts, H. A. C.

Table 15—Caleb Chase, Charles D. Sias, Walter Barwick, J. Murray Kay, Captain G. F. Gratwick, Charles T. Dukelow, Edmund H. Garrett, J. T. Auerbach, Na-

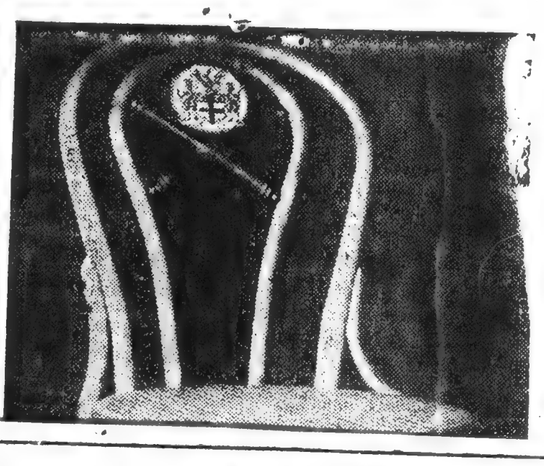

DIAGRAM OF TABLES

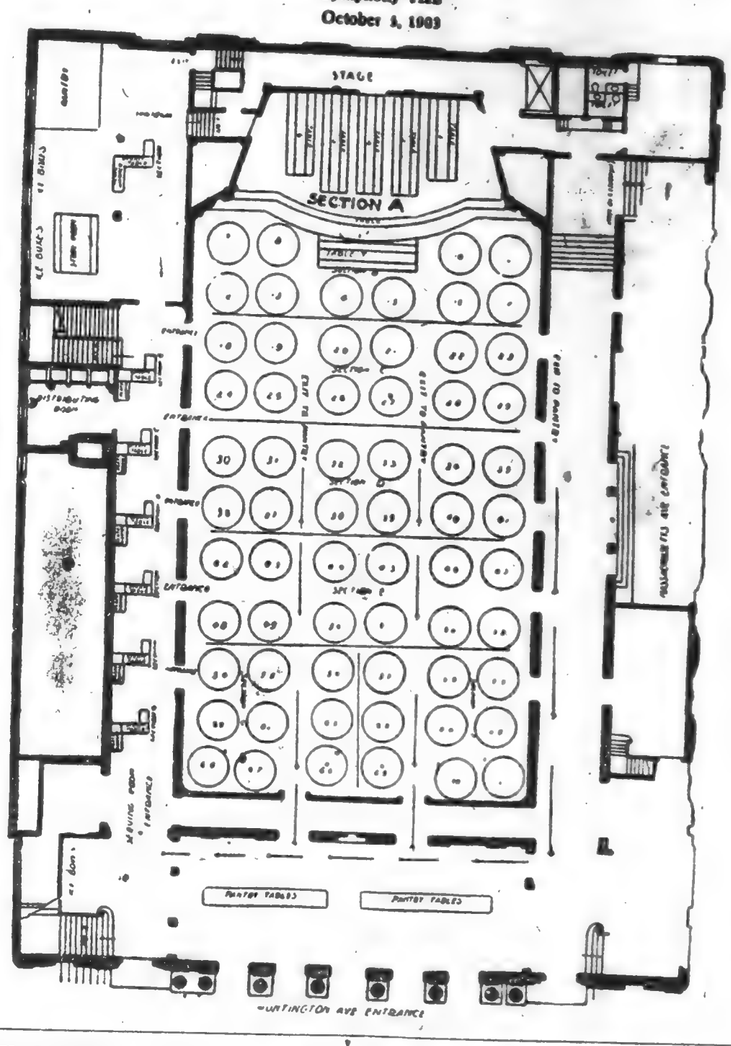
Symphony Hall
October 5, 1903



C., T. H. James, H. A. C., H. D. Lumby, H. A. C.

Table 17—Albert H. Stearns, Frank A. Davidson, H. F. McIntire, William M. Miller, Theodore A. Manchester, E. A. Maloon, Charles Parker, George A. Perkins, Edward F. Smith, N. Tozer, H. A. C.; L. Wright, H. A. C.

Table 18—Colonel William H. Oakes, Charles W. Knapp, Edward P. Cramm, Frederick L. Abbott, Frank Huckins, Frank H. Mudge, Colonel Frank B. Stevens, James M. Usher, Thomas J. Olys, R. Gilling, H. A. C.; C. L. Hornby, H. A. C.

Table 19—Arthur Fuller, William L. Willey, Frederick B. Philbrook, Edward Sullivan, Edward E. Snow, Augustus Andrews, Edward W. Abbott, William G. Fish, Charles M. Wheldon, J. C. Kendall, H. A. C.; A. King, H. A. C.

Table 20—Charles C. Goodwin, E. B. Cowles, Bernard Jenney, Jr., Charles A. West, H. M. Leland, Gustavus C. Holt, W. F. Walters, Alfred Britten, Fred E. Atteaux, H. S. Greenwood, H. A. C.; S. Grossmith, H. A. C.

Table 21—Henry F. Naphen, James Ellis, Herbert A. Gillman, John D. Carmody, Samuel L. Powers, Thomas Sherwin, Jasper N. Kellar, Colonel Alexander M. Ferris, J. R. Williston, H. E. Evans, H. A. C.; C. F. Parslow, H. A. C.

Table 22—Colonel LeGage Pratt, T. H. Bennett, Thomas L. O'Brion, Colonel

Table 28—James Morgan, Charles G. Moses, Colonel M. A. Winter, Z. W. Pease, Major E. H. Eldredge, C. F. Wildes, T. F. Medina, H. A. C.; F. A. Mostyn, H. A. C.; F. J. McLeod, William Oswald, Colonel F. F. Olney.

Table 29—Joshua M. Cushing, Charles P. Flagg, W. W. Hodges, Lewis L. Jones, Charles A. Lieghton, A. E. A. McCann, Charles E. Osgood, F. H. Smith, H. A. C.; C. F. G. Wagstaff, H. A. C.; J. S. Platt, H. A. C.; M. Strauss, H. A. C.

Table 30—Emery Grover, William Carter, George Bliss, John S. Doane, Major L. N. Duchesney, John S. Damrell, Captain Jacob Fottler, E. H. Best, C. J. Johnson, H. A. C.; H. E. Jones, H. A. C.; A. E. Marcus, H. A. C.

Table 31—Thomas Arnold, William B. Arnold, Elisha T. Harvell, Everett B. Church, James A. Roarty, William P. Grovestein, M. D.; E. Dwight Hill, M. D.; Walter D. Shurtleff, M. D.; James W. Cooper, M. D.; H. Harris, H. A. C.; C. C. Haycraft, H. A. C.

Table 32—Captain J. Stearns Cushing, Major George F. Quinby, Brigadier-General Fred W. Wellington, Colonel Charles Pfaff, Captain Lloyd England, U. S. A.; Captain James A. Shipton, U. S. A.; Lieutenant-Colonel Charles B. Woodman, Colonel James A. Frye, Lieutenant Clarence N. Jones, U. S. A.; G. E. Halsey, H. A. C.; J. Hartnoll, H. A. C.

Table 33—George H. Desmond, Frank Hilbourn, S. J. Hilburn, G. Howard Jones, Charles Leighton, George W. Hills, Edwin R. Frost, Joseph B. Parsons, W. Tetley-Jones, H. A. C., J. H. Clark, H. A. C., D. Cookes, H. A. C.

Table 40—G. Austin, H. A. C., William H. Forbes, A. F. Blades, H. A. C., Benjamin B. Torrey, William R. Waterman, George H. Allen, Joseph C. Otis, William A. Young, Frank B. McQuesten, H. M. S. Aiken, Francis Hurtubis, Jr.

Table 41—David C. Makepeace, Arthur A. McRae, Charles P. Keeler, Daniel H. Smith, William H. Smith, William A. Batty, Charles M. Robbins, George L. Witherell, O. P. Richardson, A. A. Scott, H. A. C.; A. W. Sibeth, H. A. C.

Table 42—F. W. Homans, W. A. Homans, Henry A. Burnham, Gardner Pool, John J. Flaherty, George A. Davis, William Parsons, Charles Babson, Isaac A. S. Steele, V. Barrett, H. A. C.; E. Bennett, H. A. C.

Table 43—A. S. Maddocks, Nelson M. Johnson, Joseph C. Shepherd, F. H. Greeley, William G. Brown, Edwin A. Bradley, E. H. Dickinson, E. P. Wanson, Robert R. Fears, R. W. Bradshaw, H. A. C.; F. Y. Bright, H. A. C.

Table 44—William C. Gregory, Benjamin Cole, Jr; Andrew Schlehuber, D. B. H. Power, Charles E. Giles, Jacob A. Turner, James W. Robinson, A. L. Eastman, Walter A. Hansen, P. G. Browne, H. A. C.; H. A. Caslon-Smith, H. A. C.

Table 45—Harry Hamilton, J. F. Hodge, Edgar P. Lewis, James Woolley, Charles A. Woolley, Alonzo L. Richardson, Arthur Bliss, E. W. Pitman, William P. Jones, J. D. H. Watts, H. A. C.; J. S. Wilton, H. A. C.

Table 46—George B. Ketchum, John R. Newman, William B. Holmes, R. Sherman McCarter, Francis E. Page, H. K. Mansfield, George E. Glover, Willis C. Bates, Leonard F. Cutter, R. Speller, H. A. C.; W. C. Symes, H. A. C.

Table 47—Henry C. Cottle, O. H. Brock, Charles Butcher, Robert Butterworth, Robert J. Rodday, Henry F. Wade, L. S. M. Glidden, E. W. Billings, A. G. Lund,

The badge worn by the committee of 100 British residents during the visit of the London Honourable Artillery Company.

1—THE Lyman, co
2—HIS
3—WEL
—The Hon.
4—WE Collins, M
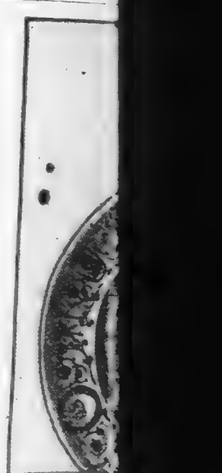
5—TH
tenant-Col
6—OLD
Senator.
7—OUR
8—OUR
of Militia.
9—HAR
10—TH
Massachus
11—TH
MASSACH

moll; Alfred
R. Whitema
H. A. C.; J.
Table 54—P
J. Batchelde
F. Wright;
Mitchell; G.
B. Badger;
Boreham, H.
A. C.
Table 55—C
John A. Co
B. Lantz; H
ford; Chas.
ards; H. G.
Bryner; H.
Table 56—H
Hayes; Sam
Wood; Chas
marth; A. C
Adams T. P
H. Jarrett,
Table 57—
M. Denham,
Batchelder;
Hazlett; Hen
ger; Fred Fre
G. W. Hoag.
Table 58—G
B. Heiman; J
Arnold; Dana
Lewis; Arthu
Goodrich; Fr
Fraser; H. A
Table 59—Jos
Adams; John N
J. W. Greene
Everett B. Ha



Hilbourn, S. J. Hilburn, G. Howard Jones, Charles Leighton, George W. Hills, Edwin R. Frost, Joseph B. Parsons, W. Tetley-Jones, H. A. C., J. H. Clark, H. A. C., D. Cookes, H. A. C.

Table 40—G. Austin, H. A. C., William H. Forbes, A. F. Blades, H. A. C., Benjamin B. Torrey, William R. Waterman, George H. Allen, Joseph C. Otis, William A. Young, Frank B. McQuesten, H. M. S. Aiken, Francis Hurtubis, Jr.

Table 41—David C. Makepeace, Arthur A. McRae, Charles P. Keeler, Daniel H. Smith, William H. Smith, William A. Batty, Charles M. Robbins, George L. Witherell, O. P. Richardson, A. A. Scott, H. A. C.; A. W. Sibeth, H. A. C.

Table 42—F. W. Homans, W. A. Homans, Henry A. Burnham, Gardner Pool, John J. Flaherty, George A. Davis, William Parsons, Charles Babson, Isaac A. S. Steele, V. Barrett, H. A. C.; E. Bennett, H. A. C.

Table 43—A. S. Maddocks, Nelson M. Johnson, Joseph C. Shepherd, F. H. Greeley, William G. Brown, Edwin A. Bradley, E. H. Dickinson, E. P. Wanson, Robert R. Fears, R. W. Bradshaw, H. A. C.; F. Y. Bright, H. A. C.

Table 44—William C. Gregory, Benjamin Cole, Jr; Andrew Schlehuber, D. B. H. Power, Charles E. Giles, Jacob A. Turner, James W. Robinson, A. L. Eastman, Walter A. Hansen, P. G. Browne, H. A. C.; H. A. Caslon-Smith, H. A. C.

Table 45—Harry Hamilton, J. F. Hodge, Edgar P. Lewis, James Woolley, Charles A. Woolley, Alonzo L. Richardson, Arthur Bliss, E. W. Pitman, William P. Jones, J. D. H. Watts, H. A. C.; J. S. Wilton, H. A. C.

Table 46—George B. Ketchum, John R. Newman, William B. Holmes, R. Sherman McCarter, Francis E. Page, H. K. Mansfield, George E. Glover, Willis C. Bates, Leonard F. Cutter, R. Speller, H. A. C.; W. C. Symes, H. A. C.

Table 47—Henry C. Cottle, O. H. Brock, Charles Butcher, Robert Butterworth, Robert J. Rodday, Henry F. Wade, L. S. M. Glidden, E. W. Billings, A. G. Lund,

Kidney-Wort Tablets

Non-Alcoholic
Concentrated Doses
Sure Preventive

DR. PETTINGILL'S

Liquid Kidney Remedies Contain Dangerous Alcohol

MRS. REBECCA T. SAULTNER WAS CURED AFTER YEARS OF KIDNEY TROUBLE

Aug. 26, 1903, Mrs. Rebecca T. Saultner of 1770 Girard Ave., Minneapolis, Minn., wrote: "For a long time I had severe pains and lameness through my kidneys until brick dust deposit in the urine. Years ago I had a similar attack and was cured by using Dr. Pettingill's Kidney-Wort Tablets, which relieved me at once, and I am now in perfect health. No one need suffer from kidney troubles when they can secure Kidney-Wort Tablets."

"We could not hold our intelligent class of patrons a day," said one of Boston's high class druggists, "if we sold liquid kidney remedies that we know contain dangerous alcohol. We do recommend Kidney-Wort Tablets, because the Tablets are free from alcohol and prepared from a well-known prescription of Dr. Pettingill. Every day we hear from persons who have been cured by Kidney-Wort Tablets."

Has your urine, your back, your general health led you to wonder if your kidneys are sound? Write Dr. Pettingill, Burlington, Vermont. Give him your symptoms, he will advise you free.

Item.

One morning he came to pray a while and his face looked so sad and tired that little Sample crawled on his knee and asked him the trouble. Uncle Harry looked at the boy and the boy's symphathy made the tears come in his eyes and he squeezed the boy closer to him. "You wouldn't understand, little chap. And, say, Samp, would you miss me if I shouldn't ever come home again?"

Sample sat and thought and thought; and when nurse came he didn't even remonstrate with her for combing his light matted curls. Finally he brightened. Yes, he had made up his mind. He would see Grandfather. Grandfather was an invalid, so was at home most of the time. Sample resolved to go to his home and see him privately. When nurse had put on his little military coat and pulled the red stocking-leg cap over his ears, he requested that the drive should be to Grandfather's. Arriving there, he asked that he might see his Grandfather alone, so the nurse, astonished out of her senses, remained in the reception room, and Sample was shown into the library. Grandfather was delighted, and the boy climbed on the arm of his chair and told him about Uncle Harry. "And, Grandfather," he said, in conclusion, "you must keep it a secret."

Grandfather promised, and then walked with the aid of his cane to the mahogany desk and wrote a note, which he told Sample to give to Uncle Harry and not to let anybody else know, and, as he stooped to kiss the boy, added: "And, Sample, dear, when you grow up to be a man leave speculating alone." Sample tucked the note in his pocket and they resumed their drive.

That night he waited for Uncle Harry, but a telephone message to mother said that he would remain down town. Sample was disappointed; but see Uncle Harry he must; so, after he had been tucked into bed and waited and waited for nurse to go, pinching his little fat legs all the time, to keep him awake, he laid his plans. After nurse had gone, he sneaked from his little bed and noiselessly opened the door and then noiselessly opened the door and then closed it after him and tiptoed to Uncle Harry's room.

It was terribly dark, but he told himself he must not be afraid. He reached the room and crawled into Uncle Harry's bed, holding fast the note in his little fist. Then he went to sleep. In the morning he woke in his own little bed, and Uncle Harry was sitting beside him. was the dearest, bravest boy in the whole world. That evening the romps commenced again and they were jollier than ever.

Catholic Societies to Meet

Mayor McNamee of Cambridge will preside, and the Hon. Thomas A. Mullen, the Rev. James T. O'Reilly and others will speak at a public meeting of the Middlesex County Federation of Catholic Societies in Prospect Hall, Cambridgeport, next Sunday, at 3 p. m.

Always Remember the Full Name
Laxative Bromo Quinine
Cures a Cold in One Day, Grip in 2 Days
E. W. Grove on every box. 25c

SAVE YOUR MONEY
BEGIN NOW
Don't put it off any longer. Buy shares in the Workingmens Co-operative Bank
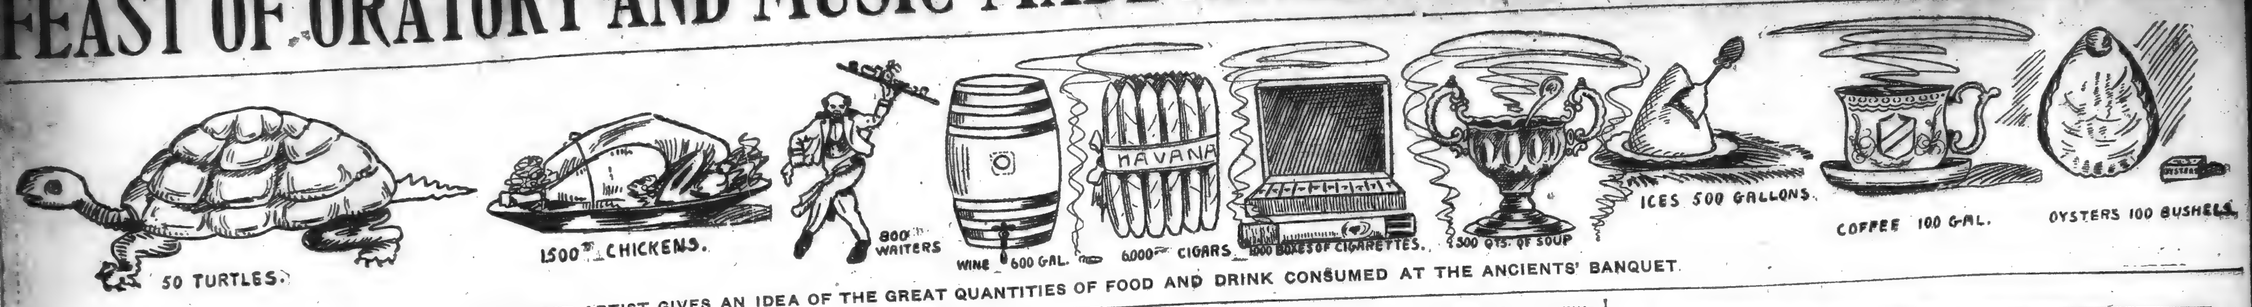
2000 Shareholders Assets $1,300,000
Last Dividend 4 1-2% Per annum
NOTHING DEDUCTED if you have to draw out.
GO UP TO THE OFFICE TODAY
If you are a young man, it is just the time to begin. If you are not a young man you cannot afford to wait any longer.
It is as good for Women and Girls as for Men and Boys. If you cannot call, send for "How to Make Money" and other circulars.
101 Tremont St., Cor. Bromfield
FRANK E. BURBANK, Sec'y and Treas.

GET ONE NOW
A system of home banking. Twenty-three thousand banks now in use. Limited number remaining.
Provident Securities and Banking Company
100 FRANKLIN ST., BOSTON

These banks are free. Start your account with
ONE DOLLAR
and watch it grow. If you cannot call, write to us or telephone 2302 Main and our representative will call.

FEAST OF ORATORY AND MUSIC MADE ANCIENTS' BANQUET MEMORABLE



THE POST ARTIST GIVES AN IDEA OF THE GREAT QUANTITIES OF FOOD AND DRINK CONSUMED AT THE ANCIENTS' BANQUET.

(Photo by Post Photographer.)

TALLEST AND SHORTEST MEMBERS OF THE LONDON HONOURABLES. SERGEANT GILLING STANDS 6 FEET 7 INCHES IN HIS STOCKINGS AND WITH HIS BUSBY MEASURES 7 FEET 10 INCHES. DRIVER PIZEY IS 5 FEET 2 INCHES TALL.

COLONEL HEDGES

He Recalls Welcome Given to the Boston Ancients When They Visited London in 1896

Colonel Sidney M. Hedges in his speech recalled the trip of the Boston Ancients to London in 1896, concluding:

"Can we ever forget the gracious welcome of her Majesty Queen Victoria, whose name will ever stand in history for strength of character and rare qualities of mind and heart that can never be excelled.

"We remember with deepest appreciation our reception by their Majesties, King Edward and Queen Alexandra, to whom today, I am sure, every member of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company would be glad to send a message of best wishes for a long and glorious reign.

"Let us hope that your voyage in the new Mayflower may prove a harbinger of events no less important in the history of our land and race! Whatever years may have in store for us let us all here resolve that, in storm and sunshine, those great emblems of justice, freedom and daring, the Union Jack and the Stars and Stripes! shal, be found floating side by side!

"America has fought no war and has engaged in no enterprise of national interest in which members of this corps have not borne important parts, so it is perhaps eminently fitting that the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company of Massachusetts should give you a national welcome.

"May these festivities, while they give us joy for the hour, nor fail in their deeper and more significant meanings. As both nations look on let us hope that these mighty tides which flow in the blood of kindred people may mingle in a great stream of unity and power which shall have important results for the future of the human race.

"Tonight we send a message of greeting to your beloved and royal commander, his Majesty King Edward, and to all of your brethren in arms in England, and so, as Tiny Tim observed: 'May God bless us, every one!'"

COLLECTOR LYMAN

Draws Lesson From Significance of the Emblems of Both Nations Joined in the Decorations of the Hall

George H. Lyman, collector of the port of Boston, spoke in part as follows:

"Look upon these banners, their folds so beautifully and artistically draped and blending in fraternal strength the knight of England's standard and the glory of the Stars and Stripes. On the one side is the crowned king of beasts, a lion rampant, and his battle cry is first 'For God' and then for 'his right.' And yonder the king of birds, the American eagle, with pinions raised and talons spread, and the battle cry is 'Union.' And beside the two, ready for attack or defence, and the shields of both. How noble the ideal is set forth in such a union! It is the true soldier of civilization and each the knight errant of virtue, both proclaim by act and precept the germ and principle of all true progress and success—moral force.

"Long may the lion of Great Britain and all he represents, and the eagle of America and all he represents, know that for every reason, selfish and unselfish, such a union stands for one supreme among all the dwellers on this earth. It means that its component parts must dwell apart, but that no other race will dare to come between them. It means that if ever joined in common cause for God and right, they will march together under the unconquerable banner of progress. It means that however its different peoples may be separated by land or sea, however diverse may be their personal aims or business interests, the history of the past, the needs of the present, the hopes of the future, all point out with unerring hand, as the champion of this world's onward march of civilization, the race of the Anglo-Saxon."

GOVERNOR BATES

Tells the London Honourables It Is Unnecessary for Him to Extend the State's Greeting to Them

In extending the greetings of the State Governor Bates said:

"I am asked to do something unnecessary, but yet most agreeable—to extend the greetings of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts to the guests of this occasion. Unnecessary, gentlemen of England, because the welcome has already been spoken by the people of Massachusetts; spoken by them as they gathered by thousands and tens of thousands on the day of your arrival; spoken again yesterday by the multitude that like a great torrent flowed through the streets of this city; spoken in the holiday vestments with which our metropolis has clothed itself; spoken in every grasp of the hand, in the smile of every face, in the cheer that has rent the air wherever you have gone—spoken in the intermingling of the Stars and Stripes with the crosses of St. George and St. Andrew; and this we trust has satisfied you that, however your predecessors may have fared among us, you are in no danger except from our attempted kindness.

"While unnecessary, therefore, it is nevertheless a privilege to say to you, Lord Denbigh, and to you, soldiers of the Honourable Artillery Company of London, welcome to Massachusetts, welcome to her hospitality, welcome to her homes and to her firesides.

"You bring with you the sabre and the gun, but there is no threat in them, rather are they the symbols of that military spirit that has made possible England's greatness and America's future; and while we all look forward to the day when the war-drum shall throb no longer and all the battle flags be furled in the parliament of man and the federation of the world, yet we would not purchase the dawn of such a day at the sacrifice of that spirit that from the beginning of the tribes of men has been productive of traits of courage and manliness essential to human character.

"Aye, we know further that the dawn of such a day can never come except the would-be wrong-doer among men and nations realizes that there is behind the calm of peace that same forceful spirit that will fight to avenge the wrongs of the weak and prevent the aggressions of the despoiler.

"For our countries the scenes that have been witnessed on the shores of New England these last few days have a peculiar interest. Formerly parts of one nation, now separated, we are witnesses of the depth of interest that the one has in the welfare of the other. Then we were but a child, we quarrelled with you oftener than with any other people, but the exercise developed strength in us both. We have had no serious trouble these scores of years. We have been settled on the shores of Massachusetts Bay, more or less settled, for two hundred and eighty-three years, and during that time we have been at war with you eleven years and at peace with you two hundred and seventy-two years. From present appearances it will be two hundred and seventy-two years more before we shall again declare war against you.

"Better than that, we believe that America has fought her last war against England. And this we believe, not because we send you ten million barrels of flour a year, and other necessaries of life in proportion, so that you would starve while fighting us; not because the inventions in modern warfare make it a contest of annihilation; not because the one is afraid and the other dare not, for the British Lion and the American Eagle have never blinked an eye when facing each other—but because hands have clasped across the seas and hearts have joined, and the ties of blood and the instincts derived from the common origin compel us to march all one way—for the liberty of the individual, the overthrow of the oppressor, the uplifting of the downtrodden, and the advancement of the Christian civilization throughout the world."

SENATOR HOAR

Assures the English Visitors of Their Welcome in Boston, Quoting the Indian Sachem Samoset

George F. Hoar, the senior Senator from Massachusetts, spoke as follows, in part:

"The first speech ever made on this continent is still one of the best. It was made by the Indian Sachem Samoset to the Pilgrim Fathers at Plymouth on the 16th of March, 1621. It sums up in two words everything needed to be said on this occasion: 'Welcome Englishmen!'

"Our English friends may be sure of their welcome. They are in the house of their friends, in the dwelling-place of their brethren. We cannot show you wonders like those you have left behind. We have few glories of architecture and of art. We have little antiquity. We have no palaces or castles or cathedrals or galleries like those to which you are accustomed at home. Yet possibly we also may have something to exhibit, in a modest way, of the fruitage of the tree of English liberty. We must yield the palm cheerfully to other nations in art and architecture and music. We have tried to emulate them, if not to excel them, in the things which constitute the strength and happiness of a free people. We have gone without the architectural glories of palaces and castles and cathedrals. We have tried to perfect the architecture of the people's dwellings, and you will find the English bible and the English Shakspere upon their shelves. The canvas does not live or breathe for us under the touch of Guido or Raphael. We have no Lawrence or Reynolds to preserve the features of high-born beauty. But at least health paints here with her roses the cheek of the factory girl. The music of Beethoven or Handel may not here rise and swell till it fills the dome which Angelo or Wren builded. But we have the music of children's voices in the well-paid workmen's homes.

"We hope you may feel at home while you are here. When you go back to old mother England, tell her her boys are contented and happy and growing. Give her our best love. Tell her we think of her with nothing but friendliness and good will. We have no sore feeling left, even for the spankings she used to give us. If she did not spare the rod, she did not spoil the child.

"We mourned with you for the loss of your gracious Queen, alike the type of gentlest womanhood and the most illustrious sovereign in history. We look with you with confident anticipation and desire for a long and happy reign for her successor."

PROFESSOR DE SUMICHRAST

Speaks on the Brotherhood of the Anglo-Saxon Races—Each Land Proud of Its Great Men in Peace and War—Same-Colored-Flags Symbolic of Our Human-itarian Duties

Professor F. C. de Sumichrast spoke on the brotherhood of the two great Anglo-Saxon races as exemplified by the banquet. He said in part:

"The keynote of this meeting of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company of Boston and the Honourable Artillery Company of London is 'brotherhood,' not military brotherhood alone, but the brotherhood of the two great Anglo-Saxon nations.

"The same race—a fighting, though not a military race—are ours. Each land has its proud record of great generals—America with its Grant, its Sherman, its Hooker and so many more, and Britain with its Marlborough, its Wellington, its Napier, its Roberts, its Kitchener, to single out out a few from the immortal list.

"Lords of the sea are both Americans and Britons, and the call of Decatur, Lawrence, Farragut, Dewey, awakes as quick response in a British breast as does the sound of Drake and Frobisher, of Anson and Howe, of Collingwood and Duncan, and most of all of Nelson, who, ere he died on the Victory's blood-stained decks, bequeathed to us the unforgetable signal: 'England expects every man this day to do his duty'—and every man did it.

"The real duty of the United States and Great Britain, the real duty of our united nations, of our race, which is one, of our stock, which is the same, of our blood, which Perry proclaimed by the thunder of his guns to be alike in the veins of Americans and Britons, our duty is not to foster and keep alive ancient grudges and hatreds of yore, but to fulfil the mission intrusted to us, to carry out the noblest task ever laid upon a race—the bearing through the wide world the light of political truth; the bestowing on all nations the blessing of true liberty; the giving to all men their birthright of equality before the law; the establishment in all lands of even-handed justice; the spread among all inhabitants of the universe of the benefits of the highest Christian civilization.

"We have the same flag—the red, white and blue—ours with beams radiating to every point of the compass; yours with the starry field and the far outstreiching stripes of light and blood—both flags symbolic of our mission here; flags that we love, flags for which our own and preceding generations have freely shed their blood, flags that mean freedom, justice, equality, protection wherever they wave—and where do they not wave?—flags that together will ever be invincible so long as those who bear them stand shoulder to shoulder and are true to the noble and lofty ideals their flags represent.

"We have the same national anthem, and the words of 'God Save the King' mingle harmonious and resonant with those of 'My Country, 'Tis of Thee, Sweet Land of Liberty, of Thee I Sing.' So let them ever be heard together, sung with heart and soul by Britons and Americans together, typical of that union which is the more real, the more firm, the more lasting that it is not embodied in any treaty or written document, but in the hearts and lives of the men of each land, that it is the right and natural outcome of the consciousness of a kinship we at home), and I say this of our militia, who are accustomed to be astonished every year at the marching of the Boston company, of whom a certain commander-in-chief said some years ago that he had never seeh anything like it. It is certainly a very great pleasure to witness such soldierly bearing and such soldierly precision of movement.

"You have named, sir, the militia—the militia in its broad sense in distinction from the profession of arms. In fact, there is much difference between them; but if we are to believe Sir William Blackstone, your accomplished and learned writer on the common law, the spirit of the British constitution did not find a place for the professional soldier. While what Sir William wrote is not now so keenly felt, yet in theory, at least, I understand it is as true today as it was in 1765. He says: 'In free states the profession of a soldier, taken singly and merely as a profession, is justly an object of jealousy. In these days no man should take up arms but with a view to defend his country and its laws; he puts not off the citizen when he enters the camp; it is because he is a citizen, and would wish to continue so, that he makes himself for a while a soldier. The laws, therefore, and constitution of Great Britain know no such state as that of a perpetual standing soldier, bred up to no other profession that that of war.'

"The same idea is expressed in the motto upon the seal of our Commonwealth of Massachusetts: 'Ense petit placidam sub libertate quietem'—which a gallant officer of our militia has somewhat freely translated: 'He will have peace even if he has to fight for it.' The Congress also expresses the idea in our small regular army. In other words, the British and the American conception of military force is an organized body of citizens trained in the art of war, and, while in practice it is found expedient that some men should devote their time and thought constantly to the military service, just as it is expedient that some men should act constantly as firemen or as police-

Continued on Page 10—Third Column

GENERAL BANCROFT

Speaks for the Militia and Recalls the Origin of Both the Boston Ancients and the London Honourables

Major-General William A. Bancroft's speech was as follows:

"The militia, both of this Commonwealth and of the country, will feel much pleased, I am sure, to know that it has been named upon an occasion of so much distinction, and indeed it is highly appropriate that this institution of government should have formal attention at this extraordinary festivity; for nearly 400 years ago, this institution brought into existence one of these famous corps, and, transplanted to another continent, brought also into existence the other a hundred years later.

"History tells us that the London company first received royal recognition as the company which exercised arms in the 'Artillerie Garden.' It is a long time since this company began to resort to that London garden, and we hope, after an experience of centuries, that the company will find the flowers of such of the gardens of America as it has an opportunity to visit quite as attractive as were those to be seen in the London garden in 1537.

"I am sure the militia in this community had never a more agreeable duty to perform than they had when privileged to escort the Boston company and its guests through the streets of this town. I am equally sure that our militia appreciated the highly martial appearance which the London company made. Your command, my lord, looked so 'very smart' (I believe that is what they would say

FOREVER.

The design on the last page of the menu of the banquet to the London Honourables, significant of the feeling of "Hands Across the Sea" prevailing.

THE SUPERB CROWN OF ELECTRIC LIGHTS AND FERNS OVER THE STAGE. ONE OF THE FINEST PIECES OF THE DECORATOR'S ART EVER SEEN IN BOSTON, IF NOT IN THE UNITED STATES.

DULL TRADING AND SAGGING PRICES

Wall Street, Oct. 5.

Today's stock market dropped into a professional rut, and there was a shrinkage in the dealings to about half the recent daily average. The movement of prices was exceedingly sluggish, and showed little disposition to get far from last week's level.

The bullish professionals, who had formed a hope that the considerable strength shown last week would serve to reassure buyers, and bring them into the market, were decidedly disappointed. When the failure of buying was perceived the traders sold the market, with the result of slowly sagging prices all through the early part of the day.

The news of today was rather favorable than otherwise, but there was very little of it bearing on security values. Tomorrow is the day set for action on the dividend on United States Steel common. Offers were made in the curb market today of the prospective dividend at a fraction of 1 percent. Reports from London, that several million pounds sterling were afloat for that centre, from India and Africa, were a reassuring factor on the local money market, for it promises means to supply American demany upon London for gold, should the exigencies of the money market demand it. Call money here was firm, but quotations for loans on time were somewhat shaded. Stocks which have been saved from sacrifice by response to call for margins, the enormous decline in price of securities, must, of course, have involved the placing of very large additional funds.

Stocks thus held through long decline are a threat hanging over the market on any considerable advance in prices. There was some slight recovery at different times, but the demand was nothing more than shortcovering; and the closing was heavy and nearly stagnant.

Most of the speculative bonds were weak, but some of the higher grade issues were bought in moderate amounts. Total sales par value $2,224,000.

United States bonds were unchanged on call.

In New York large amounts of time money have recently been loaned to commercial houses at 5 1-2 per cent which is a sure indication of returning ease. The usual table follows:

	New York.	Boston.
Call loans	3 @4	3
Time money	5 1-2@6	5 1-2@6
Commercial paper	6 @6 1-2	6 @6 1-2
Clearing house rate	3	.....
New York funds	5c. discount	.....
Exchanges	$17,982,565	$146,662,860
Balances	1,273,954	7,221,159

NEW YORK STOCKS

RAILROADS.

	Sales.	High-est.	Low-est.	Closing Bid.
Atchison	88,220	64	63	63⅜
do pref	655	88¾	88⅛	88⅛
Baltimore & Ohio	16,130	75⅝	73¾	74⅝
do pref	312	87	86¾	86
Canadian Pacific	910	120⅝	120¼	120⅜
Chesapeake & Ohio	1,100	30¼	29⅝	29½
Chicago & Alton	700	22¼	21¾	21¾
do pref	200	61¾	61¾	61¼
Chicago & Great West	385	15½	15	15⅛
Chicago & Northwestern	1,200	157¾	157½	156½
Chicago Ter & Trans	10	10	10	9½
Colorado Southern	200	12⅜	12¾	12¼
do 1st pref	200	50¼	50¼	49½
do 2d pref	150	20¾	20¾	20½
Delaware & Hudson	980	153	154	153
Denver & Rio Grande	100	20⅝	20⅝	20
do pref	410	71	70	70
Erie	46,150	28⅝	27½	27¼
do 1st pref	2,200	66¾	65⅝	65⅝
do 2d pref	1,150	48¾	47	47½
Hocking Valley pr	500	79	79	78
Illinois Central	600	130⅝	129⅜	129½
Iowa Central	100	10	10	9⅝
Kansas City Southern pr	100	35⅞	35⅞	35
Louisville & Nashville	3,710	98¾	97⅝	98
Manhattan L	1,775	131⅜	130⅜	130
Metropolitan St Ry	3,980	107½	105	105⅜
Missouri Pacific	10,170	89⅞	88½	89
Missouri, Kansas & Tex	100	17½	17¼	17
do pref	400	36¼	35½	35
National R R of Mex pr	200	37	37	36¾
New York Central	3,700	117	116	116⅜
Norfolk & Western	2,060	58	57	58
Ontario & Western	950	21¼	20⅝	20¾
Pennsylvania	31,588	119	117⅞	118¼
Reading	27,120	48⅜	47	47½
do 1st pref	600	75	75¼	75½
Rock Island Co	6,230	25	24½	24¾
do pref	500	59	58½	59¼
St Paul ex-div	28,250	137⅜	136	136
Southern Pacific	1,000	42⅜	41¼	41⅜
Southern Railway	3,600	19½	18⅝	18⅞
do pref	600	77¼	76⅛	76
Texas & Pacific	300	23⅜	22½	23½
Toledo, St Louis & West	100	17⅜	17⅜	17½
Union Pacific	45,450	71⅜	70	70½
Wabash	1,700	19⅝	18½	19⅝
do pref	3,000	31⅜	30½	30⅝
Wheeling & Lake E	100	14⅜	14⅜	15
Wisconsin Central	100	16⅜	16¾	16½
do pref	100	36½	36½	36

EXPRESS COMPANIES.

Wells-Fargo	100	200½	200½	200

MISCELLANEOUS.

Amalgamated Copper	20,650	41⅜	40⅝	40⅞
Am Car & Foundry	1,250	26⅛	25½	25⅝
Am Locomotive	200	15⅝	15½	15¼
do pref	1,160	80½	80	80⅜
Am Smelting & Ref	1,630	42⅝	42¼	42
do pref	300	88	87	87
Am Sugar Refining	1,800	111¼	110½	111¼
An conda Mining Co	200	71	71	70½
Brooklyn Rapid Transit	8,276	34⅜	33¼	33½
General Electric	210	149⅜	147⅜	147
Int Paper pref	275	63	61⅜	61⅜
National Lead	695	14	13⅜	13¼
New York American	100	73	73	73
Pacific Mail	500	19⅜	19	19½
People's Gas	645	92¼	91¼	91⅜
Pressed Steel Car	280	34½	34	34
do pref	110	77	77	77
Republic Steel	600	9½	9⅛	9¼
do pref	900	63	61½	61⅜
Rubber Goods	400	15	14⅜	15
Tennessee Coal & Iron	775	34	32½	32½
U S Leather	3,000	7⅝	7¼	7⅜
do pref	500	77½	76½	76½
U S Steel	31,630	18	16⅞	17⅛
do pref	29,200	64⅝	63¼	63⅞
Western Union	400	82	81½	81½

Total sales, 383,600 shares.

PLYMOUTH

properties promise to repeat the history of the Homestake and Treadwell mines.

1st—Because "The Kingman Group," as they are known, is the best in the district. Experted by John W. Winwood, whose reputation stands back of this statement, and by H. J. West, who is vouched for by the Arizona Central Bank.

2d—Because of the large ore bodies.

3d—Because of the nominal cost of mining and milling.

Why not own a copy of our 8-page "Guide to Investors." We mail it free, also send for our "Daily Market Letter." Correspondence solicited.

Haight & Freese Co.

STOCKS, BONDS, GRAIN, COTTON

84 STATE STREET

BOSTON, MASS.

"Determining the character and financial responsibility of your broker is as important as selection of right stocks."

American Telephone & Telegraph Co.

A dividend of One and a Half Dollars per share will be paid on Thursday, Oct. 15, 1903, to stockholders of record at the close of business on Wednesday, Sept. 30, 1903.

The transfer books will be closed from Oct. 1 to Oct. 14, 1903, both days included.

WILLIAM R. DRIVER, Treasurer.

Boston, Sept. 16, 1903.

State Street, Oct. 5.

Boston was content to wait today, trading being very dull with the exception of that in two or three specialties. Prices showed a receding tendency in sympathy with the New York market. It was the sort of market to encourage the bears and there was some short selling early in the day. When they found out, however, that they could not make any move toward covering without quickly putting prices back again, they, too, fell into a do-nothing mood, and the day closed with prices about half-way between the opening and the lowest figures. Very likely they will go a little lower in the morning with a good rally later.

So far as the bulls go, both leaders and followers are not likely to do very much until they know what the Steel common dividend, to be declared tomorrow will be. The majority of those who are best posted say it will be the usual distribution of $1. It was offered at 75 cents on Wall street today, however, but that may have been done for market effect.

Most positive assertions are made by those who claim to know that the enforced liquidation came to an end last week when some ten or a dozen weak big accounts were taken over by a pool in which Standard Oil, Gould and Morgan interests were prominent. It is asserted that dominant interests in Wall street have attained certain ends they have aimed at for months, and if both these assertions are correct two very menacing factors have been removed from the situation and it would seem as though there was very little to oppose an improvement in market tone and prices.

Coppers, aside from Copper Range, were pretty well neglected today, and even that was much less active than usual. It showed a net loss of 1-2 to 49 3-8.

Amalgamated broke 41 three times but closed at 41 1-8, a net loss of 7-8. Utah was off 1 to 24 3-4 on very light trading. There were fractional losses by Centennial, Osceola, U. S. Mining and Winona.

Daly-West also lost 1-2 to 39 1-2. This stock, while yielding about 20 per cent at present, has a record otherwise that is rarely equalled by a copper stock in that it has paid in dividends 100 per cent of its promotion price in about three and one-half years, has raised its dividend five times within that period and has never reduced its dividend or passed it.

Trading in American Telephone was active all day and it sold as high as 129 in the early trading, receding to 127 3-8, at which figure it showed a net gain of 5-8.

United Fruit gained 1 to 95, Dominion Coal lost 3-4 to 71. The general list otherwise was dull and price movements narrow and irregular.

On the Mining and Stock Exchange Boston Consolidated sold at $4.75, Bradwell at $5, Majestic at $2 and Nipissing 3-4 and Jupiter Steel at 19 cents.

The second instalment of 50 cents per share on the capital stock of the Old Colony Copper Company will be payable at the office of the company on Oct. 19, 1903, by stockholders of record Oct. 17, 1903.

Hayden, Stone & Co. have been the principal buyers of Copper Range lately and it is estimated that they have purchased fully 25,000 shares within a few weeks.

The following named directors of the National Suffolk Bank have been chosen to the board of directors of the Second National Bank to hold office until the annual meeting of the latter in January next: Augustus P. Loring, Edward Lovering, Robert Winsor, J. M. Prendergast, Henry L. Day, Ezra H. Baker.

George J. Gould is quoted as saying: "It is true that an almost unaccountable wave of pessimism is now overwhelming Wall street. This wave is erratic and sporadic and is not justified by the business conditions existing in the country at large. My own personal observations show that crops are exceedingly large—the corn crop being a bumper; that railroad earnings must necessarily increase; and that as soon as the money which has been advanced from this financial centre for the purpose of moving the crops and the furtherance of railroad extensions and enterprises reverts to its normal channels, as is inevitable, the country at large will enter upon a new and much greater era of prosperity"

J. Francis Brown, head of the brokerage firm of J. Francis Brown & Co., which firm recently failed, has filed a petition in bankruptcy, giving assets as $200,525 and liabilities as $245,383.

The annual meeting of the shareholders of Massachusetts Gas Companies will be held in this city Oct. 13. An estimate of the net earnings of these companies, based upon the results publicly reported up to June 30, gives a total of $1,376,930, or 4 per cent on the preferred and 1 1-2 per cent on the common stock.

An article published in some of the Boston papers states that Osceola, "as an individual producer, ranks second in the lake district to Calumet & Hecla only." Just what is meant by "individual producer" is not known, but the output in mineral of Osceola Consolidated, usually spoken of as "Osceola," for September was 1155 tons, while that of Copper Range Consolidated, including all of the Baltic, half of the Champion and all of the Trimountain, was 1588 tons. Copper Range Consolidated is certainly entitled to rank as the second producer at the lake and the paragraph referred to above is misleading, though it may not have been intended to be so. HEATH.

THE BOSTON MARKET

BONDS.

	Sales.	High.	Low.	Closing Bid Oct. 5	Oct. 3
Am Tel & Tel 4s	$3,000	94	94	94	94
A, T & S F 4s	5,000	98½	98	97½	98
Bur & Mo 4s, 1910	5,000	98		98½	98½
C, B & Q joint 4s	1,000	90	90	89½	89½
Fre & E H 6s	1,000	135½	135½	135	135
Western T & T 5s	2,000	100	100	99½	99½

STOCKS.

	Sales.	High.	Low.	Closing Bid Oct. 5	Oct. 3
Amalgamated Min	2,8	41⅝	40⅝	41	41⅝
Am Ag Chemical	0	13½	13½	13	13
Am Pneu Service	00	3½	3½	3½	3½
Am Sugar Ref	386	112¾	110¾	111⅝	111⅝
do pref	212	117½	117	117	117
*Am Tel & Tel	2,768	129	127⅝	127½	127¼
*Am Woolen	300	70⅝	70½	70½	70
A, T & S F	215	63⅝	63¼	63½	63⅝
do pref	84	89	87⅝	88	88⅝
Boston Elevated	58	137	136½	136½	136
Boston & Albany	11	246⅞	246	246	246
Boston & Lowell	10	235	235	231	231
Boston & Maine	21	166½	166	166	...
Calumet & Hecla Min	4	430	423	430	425
Central Mining Min	150	16½	16½	16¾	16¼
Cin & Stk Yds	10	135	135	135	...
Con Gas	7	118	118	118	...
Copper Range Min	2,678	50¼	48½	49	49¼
Daly-West Min	90	39¾	39½	39½	39½
Dom Coal Mining	105	72	71	70½	71¾
do pref	10	107	107	108	108
Dom Iron & Steel	290	10⅞	10⅜	10⅝	11
Edison, El Ill	45	230	230	227	227
Fitchburg pref	112	135½	185½	135	135½
*Gen Electric	82	150¾	148½	146	148
Guanajuato Min	275	.75	.75	.50	.50
Mass Electric	2	20½	20½	20	...
do pref	20	78	78	77½	77½
Mass Gas	250	33½	33	33	33
do pref	140	77½	77	76¾	77¼
Mass Mining	25	5	5	4¾	4¾
Mayflower Min		.87½	.75	.75	.62½
Mohawk Mining		39¼	39½	38½	39
N Y, N H & H	3,0	196	194	194	194
Old Colony RR	50		202
Old Dom Mining	5		7	6¼	6¼
Osceola Mining	100	6	6½	51	52½
Pere Marquette	100	74	74		...
Phenix Mining	15	4¾	4¼	4½	4½
Pullman Co	68	210		210	210
Quincy Mining	20	85		85	80
Rutland pref	12	37		34	33
Shannon Mining	100	10	10	9¾	9¾
Tamarack Min	5	90	90	75	75
Union Pacific pref	5	84	84	83½	83¾
*United Fruit	155	95½	94		94
*United Shoe Ma	90	39	39		39
*do pref	30	27¾	27½	27	27
U S Coal & Oil	50	10	10	9¾	9¾
U S Mining	400	18	18	17⅝	...
U S Steel	2,085	18¼	16⅞	17¼	17¼
do pref	1,120	64½	63½	63⅞	64
Utah Mining	358	25½	24¾	24¾	25
Victoria Mining	200	3	3	3	3⅛
W End St Ry pref	49	109	109		108
*Westing Elec	20	75	75	75	72
Winona Mining				7	7
Wolverine Min			63	63	63

*Ex-dividend. Total sales, listed stocks, 13,228 shares; bonds, $24,000, unlisted stocks, 5160 shares.

KLEINERT'S RUBBERS

A NEW CLUETT TAB IN QUARTER SIZES—AT YOUR FURNISHERS

CLUETT, PEABODY & CO. MAKERS

(Photo by Post Photographer.)

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL BAILEY, CAPTAIN CUSHING, COLONEL PFAFF, MAJOR BUDWORTH, ENSIGN CARMOLLY.

Interesting group of London and Boston Honourables, taken on board the steamship during the excursion.

FEAST OF ORATORY

Continued from Page 9

men, in our political plan, every regular soldier is a citizen, temporarily performing special duties for the good of all.

"It is, however, peculiarly the part of the militiaman, the citizen soldier, by whatever name he may be called, to exemplify the spirit both of the British constitution and that of the republic of the United States. He studies and practises the profession of arms as a public spirited citizen. He does not undervalue the proficiency of the professional soldier, neither does he underestimate the horrors of warfare. Individually he regards military service as he regards jury duty, or fire extinction, or guards the exercise of the suffrage. Individually he devotes himself to military service because he may conceive that he is better fitted for it or because it needs him, and, indeed, he is quite as likely to make a personal sacrifice as though he entered some branch of the civil service. He may enter both services.

"He has no quarrel, however, with any other branch of the public service; on the contrary, he expects to be called upon to aid the civil power in all its branches of administration. He has no jealousy, either, of the professional soldier. He admires his attainments, and when opportunity puts him upon an equal footing he emulates his accomplishment. Time was, it may be, when the poet Dryden, in satirical mood, might have said with some truth:

"'And, raw in fields, the rude militia swarms;
Mouths without hands; maintained at vast expense;
In peace a charge, in war a weak defence;
Stout once a month they march, a blustering band,
And ever, but in times of need, at hand.'

"But I am very sure, sir, that in neither country could this now be justly said of the militia, and I should wish to include broadly by this term, my lord, not only technically your militia, but also your volunteers and yeomanry, and in this country the national guard, which is on precisely the same footing as the militia, although called by another name. They stand for order as against disorder; they stand for law as against anarchy; they stand for civilization as against barbarism; they stand for peace as against war.

"May I couple, sir, the citizen soldier of the empire and the citizen soldier of the republic, one in language, one in civilization, one in spirit? Together may they uphold the principles of the great English speaking peoples

"'Till the war drum throbs no longer and the battle flags are furled
In the parliament of man, the federation of the world.'

"Citizens always; soldiers when needed. Duty alone determines. Zealous, devoted! Loving country! Loving liberty under law! Such a soldier, I make bold to say, had you in Arthur, Duke of Wellington; such a soldier had we in Washington. May their

"'Great example stand
Colossal, seen of every land,
And keep the soldier firm, the statesman pure,
Till in all lands and thro' all human story
The path of duty be the way to glory.'"

EARL DENBIGH'S ADDRESS

Praises American Hospitality and Pays a Compliment to the American Press

Colonel Denbigh said: "Your Excellency, your Honors, ladies and gentlemen: At the hour of 3 a. m. this morning, just when I was finishing a four hours' conversation with your indefatigable chairman and our equally indefatigable secretaries on the subject of the arrangements for next week, I asked him if he could tell me how many weeks we had been in Boston. Colonel Hedges assured me on his word of honor as a citizen of the United States and the commander of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company that we had only arrived on Friday.

"This morning, when I was engaged in doing my 247th quick change of uniform since my arrival, I observed to the valet who was assisting me that I had never done so much dressing before in my life, and his reply was: 'I have assisted a good many gentlemen to dress, but the way you slide in and out of your clothes just takes my eye.' (Applause.) I mention this little incident in order to try to convey to you some small idea of the abject bewilderment in which I find myself—the bewilderment which makes it extremely difficult to make up my mind as to what I should say.

"The other day we visited Providence—that industrial city—which turned out and gave us a most magnificent welcome. We were afterwards entertained—at what I suppose Colonel Hedges would call a little lunch—by our kind friends, led by Colonel Gross, and I had occasion to observe that I had a great grudge against Colonel Hedges for the meagre facts he had given me relative to the reception awaiting us.

"We were told we were to go to Providence and enjoy a little clambake. Now, I am surprised at Colonel Hedges. Colonel Hedges is a distinguished citizen of a great country, which possesses many remarkable attributes, and one of the most remarkable of these is the great press, and to whom I beg to tender our thanks, in the name of our company, for the kind way in which they have received us.

"I know that I am only paying a compliment when I say one of the most distinguishing marks of that press is its resourcefulness and its graphic power of description both of things that have happened and of things that might happen.

"Well, ladies and gentlemen, I do not profess to be what is known as a professional descriptive reporter; but considering the education that Colonel Hedges has had in this country I am honestly surprised at the meagreness of his power of description. For my part if I could not do better than he does in giving an accurate description of future events, before they occur, I would hide my head and retire from business. (Laughter.)

"Well, I say for our side, after all we have gone through, that he is the real cause of my object bewilderment.

"We arrived, as I have been informed, Friday last. One of the first things we saw was the Union Jack flying from the top of Bunker Hill monument (applause), a monument which it is superfluous in these days for me to say that we in England have long felt we could regard without any ill will and regard it as a reminder to the British nation as to how colonies ought not to be governed. (Applause.)

"In consequence of this I think that we can henceforth regard that monument in another light as a monument to the memory of brave men whom we honor. (Applause.)

"Well, ladies and gentlemen, we steamed into a somewhat lonely and desolate dock. We disembarked. The shed was lonely looking and gave the impression of a vault.

"We had been told what a hearty welcome awaited us. Presently we began our march. We found a crowd outside. We were not surprised to find our old friends, or rather, I should say, our ancient offspring, because we had been told they were there. We greeted them with much pleasure.

"We passed on. We then began to realize what was in store for us. We found Union Jacks hanging out of windows and we were told in strict confidence that there would have been 10 times more only the supply had run out.

"The crowds grew larger and more enthusiastic. We began to feel rather proud and, after all, that we were somebody in particular. We found ourselves going between the lines of your well trained militia.

Saluted American Colors

"We had the pleasure of saluting their colors. I believe it is the first time in the history of the country that Englishmen carrying the British flag and wearing the British uniform have marched on American soil and saluted American colors.

"It has been one unbroken series of enthusiastic greetings and acts of kindness to us. We had a great reception at Providence, of which I have already spoken. We had that great sight in the streets yesterday, when, I am told, the crowd was larger than has ever before been seen on the streets of Boston.

"We had all the militia and your picturesque corps turning out to do us honor, and today we have had an interesting parade and an equally enthusiastic reception when we were proud to go to Faneuil Hall to pay military honor to the colors of our friends.

"Now matters have culminated in the gorgeous scene we see before us, a scene such as I have never before beheld, and I doubt if you have either.

"I do not know whether this reflects the more credit on the generosity of those who provided upon those who organized it, on the culinary skill, or on the decorative skill of those who provided this beautiful s[cene].

The Meaning of the Welcome

"I have to thank you for these handsome souvenirs, which we will take away with us and look upon as family heirlooms. (Applause.) Now, ladies and gentlemen, it would be affectation on my part to deny the welcome has come from far beyond the ranks of our real hosts. It would at the same time, intolerable conceit on the part of us to suppose for a moment that this welcome was meant for ordinary hum-drum individuals, as we are. We must go back further for and obtaining the proper meaning of all this.

"We once had a reference on the subject of tea. (Applause.) We thought the tea ought to be made in hot; you thought it ought to be made in salt water, (Laughter.) That was a trifling th[ing] flown the Bunker Hill has now [to]ok.

"Well, there were some hard knocks on either [side], and then at intervals there were hard words. Then, it was after the [addi]tion of hard words, came the new [the] Ancients were to visit London authorities of England said: 'We bear our friends across the water no ill will for what they have said against us; let us see if they bear any ill will toward us. Let us see if we cannot give them a downright good reception.' We did our best. (Applause.)

"The reception was led by our late gracious Queen. (Applause.) I cannot say that you got as good a reception in London streets as we have had in Boston. We Britishers are a desperate prosaic, hum-drum lot, and it takes a deal to arouse us, but if you come again it will be different.

"When our country got involved in troubles elsewhere, and then some other things happened, and we began to think 'Why should we be enemies?' Each has advantages that the other has not got. Just as two negatives make a positive, why cannot we two enemies unite into one mutual admiration, and why cannot we bring about a whole-hearted feeling between these two nations? (Applause.) That is where matters have run at the present moment." (Applause.,

The earl continued: "Tomorrow we have to give a temporary farewell to kind and generous Boston, and we are going to some of your other great cities, where, we are informed, we shall be as well received as we have been here, and, if so, it shall be shown that the feeling we have met with is not confined to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

"We are going to have the honor of being received by your President. (Applause.) The British colors will be dipped to the President in salute. (Applause.)

"Well, I have nothing more to say, except that we are proud to be here—all of us are proud—and we shall be ten times more proud if the friendship between the two countries, which now seems to be assured, should be similar to the picture on your label (the menu souvenir), which says 'Forever.'"

When Lord Denbigh concluded the applause that followed lasted for several moments. The band played and the men and women shook the napkins and handkerchiefs. As the applause subsided, Lord Denbigh stood up and shouted in a clear military tone:

"Men of the Honourable Artillery Company: Fire for the Ancients; ready, present, fire."

Then there broke over the hall that short crisp yell of the Britishers, which defies adequate description. It took everyone by storm and won a hearty round of applause from the American people present.

Colonel Hedges then read a telegram from the dramatic profession, which read as follows: "Representatives of the dramatic profession of both countries extend best wishes to the Honourable Artillery Company of London. We hope that they may enjoy the hospitality extended here as we have enjoyed that which has been extended to us in their country." The telegram was signed by William H. Crane, John Drew, Hautrey, Warren, and others.

The next speaker was the Hon. John D. Long, who responded for the honorary members of the Ancients' company, there being but two, King Edward and himself.

MAYOR COLLINS'S SPEECH

Extends Boston's Welcome and Refers to Hospitality of the Ancients

Mayor Collins said: "Colonel Hedges, my Lord Denbigh, your Excellency, ladies and gentlemen: I tender to you my heartiest welcome, but the first thing I do wish to refer to is the republican simplicity of this occasion.

"My first salutation is to the ladies. Colonel Hedges, I rise in response to your summons as a pleasure. But, my Lord Denbigh and the artillery company, whatever I might have been able to say in welcome to you has already been anticipated by the Governor of the Commonwealth.

"The welcome of Boston does not need to be expressed by my lips or by any other official. From the time you landed until now the welcome has been everywhere given and is so hearty that everyone of you must have seen it. (Applause.) If you came on a hostile mission you might have had another sort of welcome.

"You, gentlemen, and my lord, the welcome is such that you will need, to use the word of our military President, to lead a strenuous life. (Laughter and applause.)

"If you are to be under the guidance of this body of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company of Boston you will find that they are men with splendid constitutions, tough people, and of large experience. (Laughter.)

"But, as perhaps the only individual present who knew you in London, I think you can hold your own. You will come back after a brief glimpse of a fringe of this great country and we shall meet again and you will return to old England with the impression that here there is a friendly sentiment to all men and for peace on earth.

"We bid you God-speed and shall take great pleasure in wishing you God-speed to your homes and all within your lands." (Loud applause.)

YOUR WORK

Do you perform your daily tasks with the old-time vigor and energy, or are you becoming dull, careless and indifferent? Perhaps you need a nervetonic. Palmo Tablets invigorate, give a powerful stimulus to ambition and work, mentally and physically. Use them and note how much you accomplish and feel. 50 cents a box; 3 boxes (guaranteed), $1. Book free. Sold by WALKER-RINDLEY DRUG CO., Dudley Sq.; E. F. BRADBURY, Beach St. and Washington Ave.; F. H. PUTNAM, 31 School St.; Washington St.; C. E. BEATON, 2121 Washington St.; C. E. BEATON, Tremont and Friend Sts.; KLEIN'S, corner Tremont and Hanover Sts.; KNIGHT'S, Tremont and Hanover Sts.; corner Tremont and Hollis Sts.

SWORN CIRCULATION 152 COPIES WEEKLY

VOL. XXIX—No. 37.

THE RINGVILLE BUGLE

MARRIAGES

Are you not, g missi

Bil

St

It's j fro

Billy Kend the S and he 8

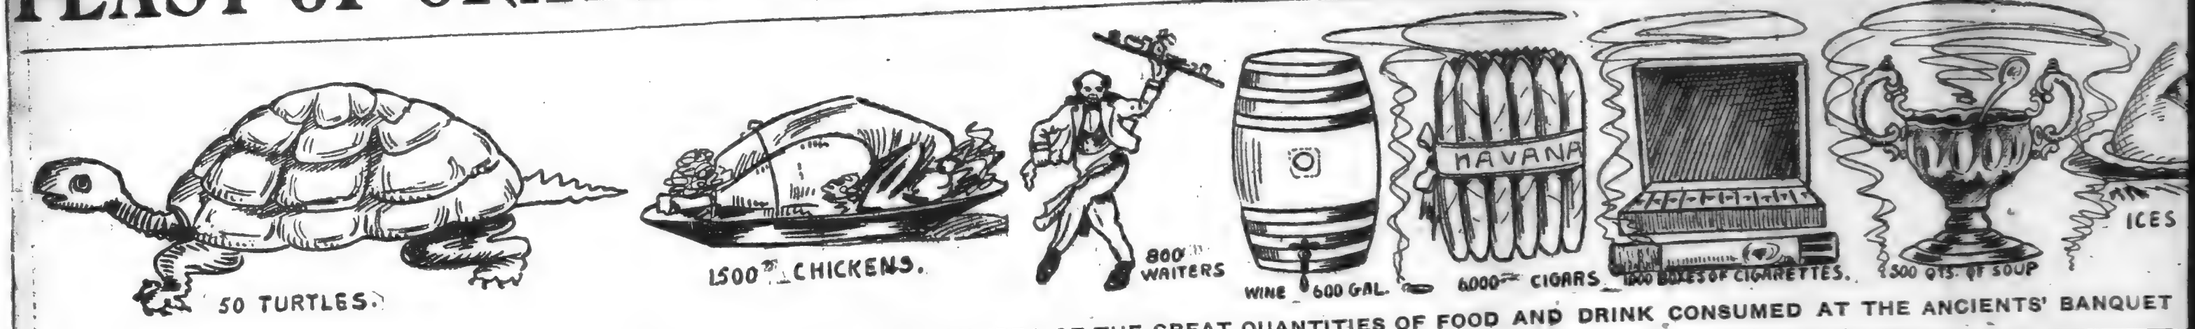
Enj

Li

[27]

FEAST OF ORATORY AND MUSIC MADE ANCIENTS' BANQ



THE POST ARTIST GIVES AN IDEA OF THE GREAT QUANTITIES OF FOOD AND DRINK CONSUMED AT THE ANCIENTS' BANQUET

FILM AS THOUGH ATTACHED TO PAGE

(Photo by Post Photographer.)

TALLEST AND SHORTEST MEMBERS OF THE LONDON HONOURABLES. SERGEANT GILLING STANDS 6 FEET 7 INCHES IN HIS STOCKINGS AND WITH HIS BUSBY MEASURES 7 FEET 10 INCHES. DRIVER PIZEY IS 5 FEET 2 INCHES TALL.

COLONEL HEDGES

Colonel Dowdy's call: "Your Excellency, your Honour, ladies and gentlemen: At the hour of 8 a. m. this morning, just when I was finishing a four hours' conversation with your understandable secretaries on the subject of the Ancients' and our equally understandable society, I could tell me how many weeks we had been in Boston. Colonel Hedges assured me on his word of honor as a citizen of the United States and the commander of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company that we had only arrived on Friday.

"This morning, when I was engaged in doing my 24th quick change of uniform since my arrival, I observed to the valet who was assisting me that I had never done so much dressing before in my life, and his reply was: 'I have assisted a good many gentlemen to dress, but the way you slide in and out of your clothes just takes my eye.' (Applause.) I mention this little incident in order to try to convey to you some small idea of the abject bewilderment in which I find myself—the bewilderment which makes it that however its different peoples may be separated by land or sea, however diverse may be their personal aims or business, they are one in the sight of God, that however the nations may be arrayed against each other in the contest of annihilation; not because the one is afraid and the other dare not, for the British Lion and the American Eagle have never blinked an eye when facing each other—but because hands have clasped across the seas and hearts have joined, and the ties of blood and the instincts derived from the common origin compel us to march all one way—for the liberty of the individual, the overthrow of the oppressor, the uplifting of the downtrodden, and the advancement of the Christian civilization throughout the world."

SENATOR HOAR

Assures the English Visitors of Their Welcome in Boston, Quoting the Indian Sachem Samoset

George F. Hoar, the senior Senator from Massachusetts, spoke as follows, in part:

"The first speech ever made on this continent is still one of the best. It was made by the Indian Sachem Samoset to the Pilgrim Fathers at Plymouth on the 16th of March, 1621. It sums up in two words everything needed to be said on this occasion: 'Welcome Englishmen!'

"Our English friends may be sure of their welcome. They are in the house of their friends, in the dwelling-place of their brethren. We cannot show you wonders like those you have left behind. We have few glories of architecture and of art. We have little antiquity. We have no palaces or castles or cathedrals or galleries like those to which you are accustomed at home. Yet possibly we also may have something to exhibit, in a modest way, of the fruitage of the tree of English liberty. We must yield the palm cheerfully to other nations in art and architecture and music. We have tried to emulate them, if not to excel them, in the things which constitute the strength and happiness of a free people. We have gone without the architectural glories of palaces and castles and cathedrals. We have tried to perfect the architecture of the people's dwellings, and you will find the English bible and the English Shakspere upon their shelves. The canvas does not live or breathe for us under the touch of Guido or Raphael. We have no Lawrence or Reynolds to preserve the features of high-born beauty. But at least health paints here with her roses the cheek of the factory girl. The music of Beethoven or Handel may not here rise and swell till it fills the dome which Angelo or Wren builded. But we have the music of children's voices in the well-paid workmen's homes.

"We hope you may feel at home while you are here. When you go back to old mother England, tell her her boys are contented and happy and growing. Give her our best love. Tell her we think of her with nothing but friendliness and good will. We have no sore feeling left, even for the spankings she used to give us. If she did not spare the rod, she did not spoil the child.

"We mourned with you for the loss of prize, of similar responsibilities and privileges conferred upon us by the Lord of all, and that, with the help of that Lord, we mean, Americans and Britons together, to carry out for man's advantage, come what may!"

GENERAL BANCROFT

Speaks for the Militia and Recalls the Origin of Both the Boston Ancients and the London Honourables

Major-General William A. Bancroft's speech was as follows:

"The militia, both of this Commonwealth and of the country, will feel much pleased, I am sure, to know that it has been named upon an occasion of so much distinction, and indeed it is highly appropriate that this institution of government should have formal attention at this extraordinary festivity; for nearly 400 years ago, this institution brought into existence one of these famous corps, and, transplanted to another continent, brought also into existence the other a hundred years later.

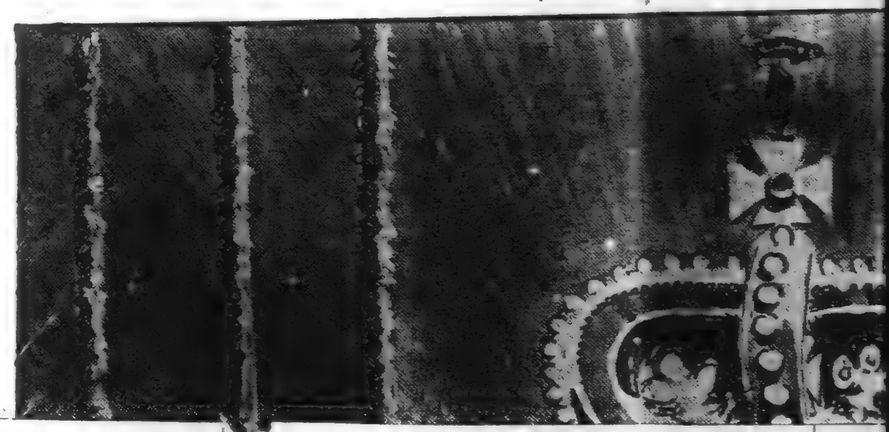
"History tells us that the London company first received royal recognition as the company which exercised arms in the 'Artillerie Garden.' It is a long time since this company began to resort to that London garden, and we hope, after an experience of centuries, that the company will find the flowers of such of the gardens of America as it has an opportunity to visit quite as attractive as were those to be seen in the London garden in 1537.

"I am sure the militia in this community had never a more agreeable duty to perform than they had when privileged to escort the Boston company and its guests through the streets of this town. I am equally sure that our militia appreciated the highly martial appearance which the London company made. Your command, my lord, looked so 'very smart' (I believe that is what they would say at home), and I say this of our militia, who are accustomed to be astonished every year at the marching of the Boston company, of whom a certain commander-in-chief said some years ago that he had never seen anything like it. It is certainly a very great pleasure to witness such soldierly bearing and such soldierly precision of movement.

"You have named, sir, the militia—the militia in its broad sense in distinction from the profession of arms. In fact, there is much difference between them; but if we are to believe Sir William Blackstone, your accomplished and learned writer on the common law, the spirit of the British constitution did not find a place for the professional soldier. While what Sir William wrote is not now so keenly felt, yet in theory, at least, I understand it is as true today as it was in 1765. He says: 'In free states the profession of a soldier, taken singly and merely as a profession, is justly an object of jealousy. In these days no man should take up arms but with a view to defend his country and its laws; he puts not off the citizen when he enters the camp; it is because he is a citizen, and would wish to continue so, that he makes himself for a while a soldier. The laws, therefore, and constitution of Great Britain know no such state as that of a perpetual standing soldier, bred up to no other profession that that of war.'

"The same idea is expressed in the motto upon the seal of our Commonwealth of Massachusetts: 'Ense petit placidam sub libertate quietem,' which a gallant officer of our militia has somewhat freely translated: 'He will have peace even if he has to fight for it.' The Congress also expresses the idea in our small regular army. In other words, the British and the American conception of military force is an organized body of citizens trained in the art of war, and, while in practice it is found expedient that some men should devote their time and thought constantly to the military service, just as it is expedient that some men should act constantly as firemen or as police-

Continued on Page 10—Third Column



Billy Burgundy and John Kendrick Bangs write for the Sunday Post every week and help to make the greatest

8 Pages of Fun

IN THE COUNTRY

Enjoy Sunday Post Sunday Post Sunday Post Life

REDUCTION

RATIO

12x

2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE

OCTOBER 11, 1903.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The first Friday afternoon public rehearsal and Saturday evening concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr Wilhelm Gericke conductor, will take place the coming week. Mr Harold Bauer will be the soloist, and the program will be as follows: Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber; concerto for pianoforte, No. 1, Tschaikowski; Entr Acte from "Messidor" (first time), Bruneau; symphony No. 2, Brahms.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 10, 1903

Mr. Harold Bauer, the distinguished pianist, will be the soloist at the fi st Boston Symphony Concert of the season. Soon after, he will give a recital in Steinert Hall and after that will visit nearly every city in New England giving recitals.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR

VOL. CXIV., NO. 103.

SUNDAY, OCT. 11, 1903.

Mr. Harold Bauer, pianist, will be the soloist at the first Boston Symphony concert of the season. Soon after, he will give a recital in Steinert Hall.

BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, MASS., OCTOBER 10, 1903.

The programme of the first concert of the Boston Symphony orche tra, Mr. Gericke conductor, on Friday and Saturday, Oct. 16 and 17, will be as follows: Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber; concerto in B minor for piano, Tschaikowsky; Entr'acte from "Messidor," (first time in Boston) Bruneau; Symphony No. 2 in D major, Brahms. Mr. Harold Bauer will be the pianist.

N.Y. Tribune Oct 11-03.

Twenty-two years with always a high ideal is a flattering record for any organization, and another record of every seat in the house sold for the season for both series of concerts at a premium at the annual auction sales ever since the occupancy of the new Symphony Hall in Boston, three years ago, is the most satisfactory evidence of the public appreciation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at home. A generous founder and patron with the courage of his convictions, a conductor with ten years of service, in two terms of five years each, ninety-four performers selected from the best in this country and Europe, and a long list of the most distinguished assisting artists available, are the chief factors which are combined in this success.

Wilhelm Gericke will again be welcomed as the conductor for the eleventh season. The management make their eighteenth annual announcement for the coming season of five Thursday evenings, November 5, December 10, January 14, February 18 and March 17, at 8:15; and five Saturday matinees, November 7, December 12, January 16, February 20 and March 19, at 2:30, at Carnegie Hall.

The list of solo singers is as usual a notable one, and includes Mme. Melba, who returns after an absence of two years, and who will make positively her only appearance in this city this season; Mme. Gadski, Mr. Gilibert, Mr. Busoni, who in his nine years' absence in Europe has made a splendid reputation; Miss Maud MacCarthy, T. Adamowski, Mr. Arbos, the new first violin and concert master; Mr. Krasselt, the new first violoncello, and others to be announced. Already the renewals of last year's subscribers and many new applications for seats indicate that the flattering attendance of last season, when the entire house was sold for nearly every performance, will be duplicated.

N. Y. Press Oct 11-03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Boston again will provide for New York a series of symphony concerts of the sort known here only through the medium of the Symphony Orchestra from the Hub. In beautiful finish and artistic ensemble this orchestra has reached a point of excellence, under the careful guidance of Wilhelm Gericke, never before attained in America. The dates for the concerts in Carnegie Hall are the evenings of November 5, December 10, January 14, February 18 and March 17, and the afternoons of November 7, December 12, January 16, February 20 and March 19. Melba, Gadski, Gilibert, Busoni, Maud MacCarthy and T. Adamowski are a few of the soloists who will appear. Mr. Arbos, the new concert master, and Mr. Krasselt, the new first violoncello, also will appear as soloists. Jacques Thibaud, the French violinist, will appear for the first time in America in the first of Hermann Hans Wetzler's symphony concerts. He will play the Mozart concerto. Improvement will be noticed in Mr. Wetzler's orchestra. Several prominent violin virtuosi have been engaged, including Leopold Lichtenberg and Michael Banner. Mr. Lichtenberg will be concert

N. Y. Times Oct 11-03.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Announcement of Dates and Soloists for Its Coming Season.

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke will again be welcomed as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for his eleventh season in New York, a record which speaks for itself and in a most convincing way. As a matter of interest to the many patrons who regularly attended the concerts from the beginning, Mr. Henschel conducted for the first three years, and previous to the visits of the orchestra to New York Mr. Gericke for the next five years, then Mr. Nikisch for four years, Mr. Paur following with five years, and last season was the fifth year of Mr. Gericke's second régime.

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra make their eighteenth annual announcement for the coming New York season of five Thursday evenings, Nov. 5, Dec. 10, Jan. 14, Feb. 18, and March 17, at 8:15, and five Saturday matinées, Nov. 7, Dec. 12, Jan. 16, Feb. 20, and March 19, at 2:30, at Carnegie Hall.

The list of soloists is, as usual, a notable one, and includes Mme. Melba, who returns after an absence of two years, and who will make her only appearance in New York this season; Mme. Gadski, Mr. Gilibert, Mr. Busoni, who during his nine years' absence in Europe has made a splendid reputation; Miss Maud MacCarthy, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Arbos, the new first violin and concertmaster; Mr. Krasselt, the new first violoncello, and others to be announced.

Already the renewals of last year's subscribers and a host of new applicants for seats indicate, according to the management, that the large attendance of last season, when the entire house was sold for nearly every performance, will be duplicated.

N. Y. Staats Zeitung Oct 11-03.

Endlich läßt auch das Bostoner Symphonieorchester von sich hören. Wie zuvor, wird es auch in diesem Winter zehn Symphonie-Konzerte in Carnegie Hall veranstalten, fünf an Donnerstag Abenden und fünf an Samstag-Nachmittagen. Die Daten sind: 5. und 7. November, 10. und 12. Dezember, 14. und 16. Januar, 18. und 20. Februar und 17. und 19. März. Das Orchester und seine Konzerte bedürfen natürlich der besonderen Anpreisung nicht. Wer sich in New York überhaupt für Orchestermusik interessirt, weiß genau, welche Leckerbissen ihm in den Konzerten der Bostoner dargeboten werden. Es wäre also aufdringlich, hier rekapituliren zu wollen, was New Yorker, Philadelphiaer und Baltimorer Zeitungen über die Leistungen des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters gesagt haben. Die Hoffnung, daß dieses Virtuosenorchester durch den Austritt von mehreren hervorragenden Mitgliedern — Kneisel, Löffler, Schröder und Svecensky — nicht gelitten habe, und daß der Ersatz für vollgültig angesehen werden wird, geht hoffentlich gleich am ersten Konzertabend in Erfüllung. Der neue Konzertmeister, Herr Arbos, und der neue Solocellist, Herr Krasselt, werden in den New Yorker Konzerten auch als Solisten auftreten. Außerdem sind als Solisten für diese Konzerte engagirt worden: Melba, Gadski, Gilibert, Busoni, Adamowski und Fräulein Maud MacCarty. Ob die letztere im Laufe von zwölf Monaten diejenige künstlerische Reife erlangt hat, die sie im vorigen Winter bei ihrem hiesigen Auftreten so sehr vermissen ließ, muß natürlich abgewartet werden. Die übrigen Solisten sind so wohl accreditirt, daß sich wahrscheinlich jeder Abonnent über deren Engagement freuen wird. —

N. Y. Mail & Express. Oct 10'03.

Soloists at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Carnegie Hall concerts this winter will include Mme. Melba, who returns after an absence of two years, and who will then make her only appearance in New York this season; Mme. Gadski, Mr. Gilibert, Mr. Busoni, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Arbos, the new first violin and concert master; Mr. Krasselt, the new first violoncello and others.

The concert dates are Thursday evenings, November 5, December 10, January 14, February 18 and March 17, and Saturday matinees, November 7, December 12, January 16, February 20 and March 19. Each of the ten concerts has a separate programme.

N. Y. Sun Oct. 11-03.

This Season's Boston Symphony Concerts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that its soloists for the coming season of ten concerts in Carnegie Hall will be Mmes. Melba, Gadski and Maud MacCarthy and MM. Busoni, Gilibert, T. Adamowski, Arbos, the new concert master of the orchestra, and Krasselt, the new 'cellist. Wilhelm Gericke is again the conductor. The concerts are to be given on five Thursday evenings and five Saturday matinées.

[28]

N. Y. American Oct 11'03

Wilhelm Gericke will again be the conductor for the eleventh season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the management for their eighteenth annual announcement this season have selected for their concerts Thursday evening, November 5, December 10, January 14, February 18 and March 17, at 8:15; and five Saturday matinees, November 7, December 12, January 16, February 20, and March 19, at 2:30, at Carnegie Hall.

N. Y. Commercial Advertiser. Oct 10-03.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces its usual series of ten concerts in Carnegie Hall. The dates are the evenings (Thursdays) of Nov. 5, Dec. 10, Jan. 14, Feb. 18, and March 17, and the afternoons (Saturdays) of Nov. 7, Dec. 12, Jan. 16, Feb. 20, and March 19. Among the soloists will be Melba, who then makes her only appearance in New York; Gadski, Gillibert, Busoni, Maud MacCarthy, Adamowski, Arbos, the new concert master, and Krasselt, the new first 'cellist.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

Oct 14-03

Boston Symphony Soloists.

THE soloists for the Boston Symphony concerts in New York will be Busoni, Mrs. Melba, Miss Maud MacCarthy, T. Adamowski, Arbos, Krasselt and others.

BOSTON JOURNAL-

-SATURDAY,

OCTOBER 17, 1903.

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL BRINGS OUT SOCIETY

Many Fine Gowns Displayed at Yesterday's Concert.

Society was well represented yesterday afternoon at the initial public rehearsal at Symphony Hall. Mrs. Timothee Adamowski attended in a modish gown of black cloth with hat to match. She was with Miss Madelaine Boardman, the latter very chic in a dark blue cloth.

Mrs. "Ollie" Ames was with her mother, Mrs. Preston West.

Mr. Francis Wilson, the comedian, was with his wife, whose costume was a white peau de cynge waist and black skirt.

Mrs. Henry L. Higginson had Mrs. Alexander Higginson with her. Mrs. Neal Rantoul was with her sister, Miss Rosamund Saltonstall. Mrs. Rantoul wore a dark gray tailor gown. Miss Saltonstall was in dark blue veiling trimmed in narrow blue satin ribbons. She wore a blue flat hat.

Others present were Mrs. Gorham Hubbard, Mrs. Wilhelm Geriche, looking well in white silk waist and gray tailor gown; Mrs. J. Montgomery Sears, Miss Higginson, Miss Allison Houghton and her mother, Mrs. E. Houghton, Mr. Holker Abbott, president of the Copley Society; his sister, Mrs. William P. Fay, and her daughter, Miss Katherine Fay, Mrs. Fred R. Comee, Mrs. L. H. Mudgett, Miss Sears, Mrs. Alfred T. Waite, Mr. Honore Norris, Mr. Arthur S. Hyde (cousin of Mme. Eames-Story), Mr. Dennis, Mr. J. Wallace Goodrich, Miss Fay, Mr. Lythgow Devens, Mr. Stoddard, Mrs. Aspinwall, Mrs. George Sanger, Mr. R. H. Stearns, Mr. Arthur Foote and his daughter, Miss Katherine Foot, Mrs. Knowlton, Mrs. Motley, Mrs. Harry Pratt McKean, Mrs. John Lowell, Miss Thorndike, Miss Juliet Higginson, Miss Molly Johnson and her sister. Mrs. Jack Lavalle, Mrs. Edward A. Horton, Miss Mary Pecker, Mrs Rudolph Agassiz, the Misses Susie and Annie Milk, Mrs. Wagniere and her sister, Mrs. Arthur W. Blake, Mrs. Arthur Sargent and her sister, Mrs. Thomas Wales, Mrs. Harold D. Corey, Miss Pancoast, Mr. and Mrs. Lee, Miss Amory, Miss Winthrop, Miss Burnham, Miss Susie Howe, Mrs. King, Miss King, Miss Iasigi.

BOSTON TIMES

OCTOBER 17, 1903.

The Boston Symphony orchestra announces its usual series of ten concerts in Carnegie hall, New York. The dates are the evenings (Thursdays) of Nov. 5, Dec. 10, Jan. 14, Feb. 18 and March 17, and the afternoons (Saturdays) of Nov. 7, Dec. 12, Jan. 16, Feb. 20 and March 19. Among the soloists will be Melba, who then makes her only appearance in New York; Gadski, Gillibert, Busoni, Maud MacCarthy, Adamowski, Arbos, the new concert master, and Krasselt, the new first 'cellist.

Mr. Harold Bauer, pianist, will be the soloist at the first Boston Symphony concert of the season. Soon after he will give a recital in Steinert hall.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE-

-OCTOBER 11, 1903.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The first Friday afternoon public rehearsal and Saturday evening concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr Wilhelm Gericke conductor, will take place the coming week. Mr Harold Bauer will be the soloist, and the program will be as follows: Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber; concerto for pianoforte, No. 1, Tschaikowski; Entr' Acte from "Messidor" (first time), Bruneau; symphony No. 2, Brahms.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 10, 1903

Mr. Harold Bauer, the distinguished pianist, will be the soloist at the first Boston Symphony Concert of the season. Soon after, he will give a recital in Steinert Hall and after that will visit nearly every city in New England giving recitals.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CXIV., NO. 103.

SUNDAY, OCT. 11, 1903.

Mr. Harold Lauer, pianist, will be the soloist at the first Boston Symphony concert of the season. Soon after, he will give a recital in Steinert Hall.

BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, MASS., OCTOBER 10, 1903.

The programme of the first concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, on Friday and Saturday, Oct. 16 and 17, will be as follows: Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber; concerto in B minor for piano, Tschaikowsky; Entr'acte from "Messidor," (first time in Boston) Bruneau; Symphony No. 2 in D major, Brahms. Mr. Harold Bauer will be the pianist.

Twenty-two years with always a high ideal is a flattering record for any organization, and another record of every seat in the house sold for the season for both series of concerts at a premium at the annual auction sales ever since the occupancy of the new Symphony Hall in Boston, three years ago, is the most satisfactory evidence of the public appreciation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at home. A generous founder and patron with the courage of his convictions, a conductor with ten years of service, in two terms of five years each, ninety-four performers selected from the best in this country and Europe, and a long list of the most distinguished assisting artists available, are the chief factors which are combined in this success.

Wilhelm Gericke will again be welcomed as the conductor for the eleventh season. The management make their eighteenth annual announcement for the coming season of five Thursday evenings, November 5, December 10, January 14, February 18 and March 17, at 8:15; and five Saturday matinees, November 7, December 12, January 16, February 20 and March 19, at 2:30, at Carnegie Hall.

The list of solo singers is as usual a notable one, and includes Mme. Melba, who returns after an absence of two years, and who will make positively her only appearance in this city this season; Mme. Gadski, Mr. Gilibert, Mr. Busoni, who in his nine years' absence in Europe has made a splendid reputation, Miss Maud MacCarthy, T. Adamowski, Mr. Arbos, the new first violin and concert master; Mr. Krasselt, the new first violoncello, and others to be announced. Already the renewals of last year's subscribers and many new applications for seats indicate that the flattering attendance of last season, when the entire house was sold for nearly every performance, will be duplicated.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Boston again will provide for New York a series of symphony concerts of the sort known here only through the medium of the Symphony Orchestra from the Hub. In beautiful finish and artistic ensemble this orchestra has reached a point of excellence, under the careful guidance of Wilhelm Gericke, never before attained in America. The dates for the concerts in Carnegie Hall are the evenings of November 5, December 10, January 14, February 18 and March 17, and the afternoons of November 7, December 12, January 16, February 20 and March 19. Melba, Gadski, Gilibert, Busoni, Maud MacCarthy and T. Adamowski are a few of the soloists who will appear. Mr. Arbos, the new concert master, and Mr. Krasselt, the new first violoncello, also will appear as soloists.

Jacques Thibaud, the French violinist, will appear for the first time in America in the first of Hermann Hans Wetzler's symphony concerts. He will play the Mozart concerto. Improvement will be noticed in Mr. Wetzler's orchestra. Several prominent violin virtuosi have been engaged, including Leopold Lichtenberg and Michael Banner. Mr. Lichtenberg will be concert master.

N. Y. Times
Oct 11-03.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Announcement of Dates and Soloists for Its Coming Season.

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke will again be welcomed as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for his eleventh season in New York, a record which speaks for itself and in a most convincing way. As a matter of interest to the many patrons who regularly attended the concerts from the beginning, Mr. Henschel conducted for the first three years, and previous to the visits of the orchestra to New York Mr. Gericke for the next five years, then Mr. Nikisch for four years, Mr. Paur following with five years, and last season was the fifth year of Mr. Gericke's second régime.

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra make their eighteenth annual announcement for the coming New York season of five Thursday evenings, Nov. 5, Dec. 10, Jan. 14, Feb. 18, and March 17, at 8:15, and five Saturday matinées, Nov. 7, Dec. 12, Jan. 16, Feb. 20, and March 19, at 2:30, at Carnegie Hall.

The list of soloists is, as usual, a notable one, and includes Mme. Melba, who returns after an absence of two years, and who will make her only appearance in New York this season; Mme. Gadski, Mr. Gilibert, Mr. Busoni, who during his nine years' absence in Europe has made a splendid reputation; Miss Maud MacCarthy, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Arbos, the new first violin and concertmaster; Mr. Krasselt, the new first violoncello, and others to be announced.

Already the renewals of last year's subscribers and a host of new applicants for seats indicate, according to the management, that the large attendance of last season, when the entire house was sold for nearly every performance, will be duplicated.

N. Y. Staats Zeitung
Oct 11-03.

Endlich läßt auch das Bostoner Symphonieorchester von sich hören. Wie zuvor, wird es auch in diesem Winter zehn Symphonie-Konzerte in Carnegie Hall veranstalten, fünf an Donnerstag Abenden und fünf an Samstag-Nachmittagen. Die Daten sind: 5. und 7. November, 10. und 12. Dezember, 14. und 16. Januar, 18. und 20. Februar und 17. und 19. März. Das Orchester und seine Konzerte bedürfen natürlich der besonderen Anpreisung nicht. Wer sich in New York überhaupt für Orchestermusik interessirt, weiß genau, welche Leckerbissen ihm in den Konzerten der Bostoner dargeboten werden. Es wäre also aufdringlich, hier rekapituliren zu wollen, was New Yorker, Philadelphiaer und Baltimorer Zeitungen über die Leistungen des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters gesagt haben. Die Hoffnung, daß dieses Virtuosenorchester durch den Austritt von mehreren hervorragenden Mitgliedern — Kneisel, Löffler, Schröder und Svecensky — nicht gelitten habe, und daß der Ersatz für vollgültig angesehen werden wird, geht hoffentlich gleich am ersten Konzertabend in Erfüllung. Der neue Konzertmeister, Herr Arbos, und der neue Solocellist, Herr Krasselt, werden in den New Yorker Konzerten auch als Solisten auftreten. Außerdem sind als Solisten für diese Konzerte engagirt worden: Melba, Gadski, Gilibert, Busoni, Adamowski und Fräulein Maud MacCarty. Ob die letztere im Laufe von zwölf Monaten diejenige künstlerische Reife erlangt hat, die sie im vorigen Winter bei ihrem hiesigen Auftreten so sehr vermissen ließ, muß natürlich abgewartet werden. Die übrigen Solisten sind so wohl accreditirt, daß sich wahrscheinlich jeder Abonnent über deren Engagement freuen wird. —

N. Y. Triad
Oct 11-03.

Soloists at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Carnegie Hall concerts this winter will include Mme. Melba, who returns after an absence of two years, and who will then make her only appearance in New York this season; Mme. Gadski, Mr. Gilibert, Mr. Busoni, Miss Maud MacCarthy, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Arbos, the new first violin and concert master; Mr. Krasselt, the new first violoncello and others.

The concert dates are Thursday evenings, November 5, December 10, January 14, February 18 and March 17, and Saturday matinees, November 7, December 12, January 16, February 20 and March 19. Each of the ten concerts has a separate programme.

N. Y. Sun.
Oct 11-03.

This Season's Boston Symphony Concerts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces that its soloists for the coming season of ten concerts in Carnegie Hall will be Mmes. Melba, Gadski and Maud MacCarthy and MM. Busoni, Gilibert, T. Adamowski, Arbos, the new concert master of the orchestra, and Krasselt, the new 'cellist. Wilhelm Gericke is again the conductor. The concerts are to be given on five Thursday evenings and five Saturday matinées.

[28]

N. Y. American.
Oct 11'03

Wilhelm Gericke will again be the conductor for the eleventh season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the management for their eighteenth annual announcement this season have selected for their concerts Thursday evening, November 5, December 10, January 14, February 18 and March 17, at 8:15; and five Saturday matinees, November 7, December 12, January 16, February 20, and March 19, at 2:30, at Carnegie Hall.

N. Y. Commercial Advertiser
Oct 10-03.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces its usual series of ten concerts in Carnegie Hall. The dates are the evenings (Thursdays) of Nov. 5, Dec. 10, Jan. 14, Feb. 18, and March 17, and the afternoons (Saturdays) of Nov. 7, Dec. 12, Jan. 16, Feb. 20, and March 19. Among the soloists will be Melba, who then makes her only appearance in New York; Gadski, Gillibert, Busoni, Maud MacCarthy, Adamowski, Arbos, the new concert master, and Krasselt, the new first 'cellist.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

Oct 17-03

Boston Symphony Soloists.

THE soloists for the Boston Symphony concerts in New York will be Busoni, Mrs. Melba, Miss Maud MacCarthy, T. Adamowski, Arbos, Krasselt and others.

BOSTON JOURNAL-

-SATURDAY,

OCTOBER 17, 1903.

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL BRINGS OUT SOCIETY

Many Fine Gowns Displayed at Yesterday's Concert.

Society was well represented yesterday afternoon at the initial public rehearsal at Symphony Hall. Mrs. Timothee Adamowski attended in a modish gown of black cloth with hat to match. She was with Miss Madelaine Boardman, the latter very chic in a dark blue cloth.

Mrs. "Ollie" Ames was with her mother, Mrs. Preston West.

Mr. Francis Wilson, the comedian, was with his wife, whose costume was a white peau de cynge waist and black skirt.

Mrs. Henry L. Higginson had Mrs. Alexander Higginson with her. Mrs. Neal Rantoul was with her sister, Miss Rosamund Saltonstall. Mrs. Rantoul wore a dark gray tailor gown. Miss Saltonstall was in dark blue veiling trimmed in narrow blue satin ribbons. She wore a blue flat hat.

Others present were Mrs. Gorham Hubbard, Mrs. Wilhelm Gericke, looking well in white silk waist and gray tailor gown; Mrs. J. Montgomery Sears, Miss Higginson, Miss Allison Houghton and her mother, Mrs. E. Houghton, Mr. Holker Abbott, president of the Copley Society; his sister, Mrs. William P. Fay, and her daughter, Miss Katherine Fay, Mrs. Fred R. Comee, Mrs. L. H. Mudgett, Miss Sears, Mrs. Alfred T. Waite, Mr. Honore Norris, Mr. Arthur S. Hyde (cousin of Mme. Eames-Story), Mr. Dennis, Mr. J. Wallace Goodrich, Miss Fay, Mr. Lythgow Devens, Mr. Stoddard, Mrs. Aspinwall, Mrs. George Sanger, Mr. R. H. Stearns, Mr. Arthur Foote and his daughter, Miss Katherine Foot, Mrs. Knowlton, Mrs. Motley, Mrs. Harry Pratt McKean, Mrs. John Lowell, Miss Thorndike, Miss Juliet Higginson, Miss Molly Johnson and her sister, Mrs. Jack Lavalle, Mrs. Edward A. Horton, Miss Mary Pecker, Mrs Rudolph Agassiz, the Misses Susie and Annie Milk, Mrs. Wagniere and her sister, Mrs. Arthur W. Blake, Mrs. Arthur Sargent and her sister, Mrs. Thomas Wales, Mrs. Harold D. Corey, Miss Pancoast, Mr. and Mrs. Lee, Miss Amory, Miss Winthrop, Miss Burnham, Miss Susie Howe, Mrs. King, Miss King, Miss Iasigi.

BOSTON TIMES

OCTOBER 17, 1903.

The Boston Symphony orchestra announces its usual series of ten concerts in Carnegie hall, New York. The dates are the evenings (Thursdays) of Nov. 5, Dec. 10, Jan. 14, Feb. 18 and March 17, and the afternoons (Saturdays) of Nov. 7, Dec. 12, Jan. 16, Feb. 20 and March 19. Among the soloists will be Melba, who then makes her only appearance in New York; Gadski, Gillibert, Busoni, Maud MacCarthy, Adamowski, Arbos, the new concert master, and Krasselt, the new first 'cellist.

Mr. Harold Bauer, pianist, will be the soloist at the first Boston Symphony concert of the season. Soon after he will give a recital in Steinert hall.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST, OCTOBER 18, 1903

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA BEGINS 23D SEASON

The first concert of the 23d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Symphony Hall, with this programme:

Overture, "Euryanthe".....Weber
Concerto for pianoforte, op. 23,
.....Tschaikowsky
Entr'acte from "Messidor".....Bruneau
Symphony No. 2, in D.....Brahms

The well-known countenance of Franz Kneisel, for so many years the concert-master, is missed from the orchestra. His successor, Fernandez Arbos, made a pleasing impression, as one who would fill the position acceptably. His abilities as a virtuoso will be in evidence this coming week, as he will be the soloist at the second rehearsal and concert.

The new 'cellist, Mr. Krasselt, was not observed, and it was stated that he was unable to arrive in time for this concert, but will be on hand at the concert to follow.

The work of the orchestra last evening was highly satisfactory, especially as it was the first concert of the series, where the best work can hardly be expected. The "Euryanthe" overture is familiar to all, and calls for no extended comment. It is a work that continues to be a favorite, although inferior in general interest to "Oberon" and "Der Freischutz" overtures.

The entr'acte from Bruneau's opera, "Messidor," was heard last evening for the first time in this city. Its full title is "Entr'acte Symphonique," and it precedes Act IV. in the opera. "Messidor," which was originally given at Paris in 1897, the text by Emile Zola, has had, it is stated, but little success thus far, and has never been given in America as might naturally be surmised.

The entr'acte heard last evening impresses one mainly by some effective scoring of the impressionist sort, and without hearing the opera itself the meaning of the excerpt was practically an unknown quantity. The performance was excellent and the applause perfunctory.

The feature of the concert was the performance by Harold Bauer of Tschaikowsky's concerto for pianoforte, No. 1, in B flat minor, op. 23.

The work is one that grows in interest with each succeeding performance. Purists may probably take exceptions to certain parts of the concerto as not being strictly orthodox in form, but there is no gainsaying the fact that Tschaikowsky's concerto is a work of genius in the best sense, and a colossus among works of its kind.

There is enough melody and inventive power in it to furnish stock in trade to a dozen among present day composers that might be named.

Mr. Bauer, who is now justly considered a member of that glorious and yet exceedingly limited company that constitute the world's great pianists, gave to the concerto an interpretation that was memorable for clearness in outline, technical mastery and authoritative in its mental picture, without affectation or exaggeration.

It was a performance to delight the mind, and one that will remain long within the memory. Mr. Bauer received an immense ovation and numerous recalls, a deserved tribute to an acknowledged master of the pianoforte.

The concert closed with a fine performance of Brahms's second symphony in D, Op. 73, a work now admired by all and once but little understood or appreciated—a fact nowadays hard to realize.

The programme of the second rehearsal and concert this coming week will include a new symphony by Glazounow, Beethoven's overture Op. 115, the "Waldweben" from Wagner's "Siegfried," and violin works by Mendelssohn and Arbos. Mr. Fernandez Arbos will be the soloist.

he Symphony rehearsal Friday afernoon proved another rallying place for society, and the usual representative throng of people listened to the initial programme of the season. As

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, OCT 18, 1903.

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Twenty-Third Season Opens in Symphony Hall—Harold Bauer Soloist —New Faces in the Orchestra.

With the opening of the 23d year of the Boston symphony orchestra, the local musical season may be said to be fairly under way, and for six months at least the outlook presages great activity in the realms of melody, with many famous artists announced to appear in this city and almost innumerable concerts and recitals, vocal and instrumental, scheduled at the various halls. New quartets, prominent orchestras from other cities and grand opera companies will be in evidence during the fall and winter, and no lover of music of the higher class will have any reason to complain either of the quality or quantity of the musical surfeit which is promised by the advance heralding.

This season's symphony orchestra shows some changes in membership. The first desk of the first violins is now allotted to Mr Arbos, the new concert master, and Mr Adamowski. Back of them are seated Mr Birmbaum, a new member, and Mr Roth. Mr Krasselt, the new first cellist, will appear at the second concert. There is a new viola player, Mr Ferir, and the second violins have a new leader, Mr Barleben, formerly of this organization.

One Symphony audience is like another nowadays, and has been for years, and the opening rehearsal and concert were given before the usual large gatherings with the same hearty greetings for Mr Gericke when he first appeared upon the platform. The program introduced Mr Harold Bauer as soloist in Tschaikowsky's first concerto, for piano. The orchestral numbers were the "Euryanthe" overture, Weber; entr'acte from "Messidor," Bruneau, for the first time, and Brahm's D major symphony.

Mr Bauer is very popular in this city, and deservedly so, for his honors have been won by an honest musicianship displayed in the many concerts and recitals in which he has assisted. He is a skilful artist, modest and wtihout affection; an interpreter who does not exploit the abilities of the performer at the expense of the composer. The Tschaikowsky concerto was played beautifully throughout. The octave chords in the opening theme were given with a grandeur and verve that balanced perfectly with the heavy orchestral background; the peculiar rythmic dialogue between the solo instrument and the orchestra went as smoothly as one could wish and in the fortissimo finale the piano maintained its proper relations with the orchestral contingents. The daintier second movement was sung with charming effect, the lullaby, of course, showing Mr Bauer's legato fingering to special advantage. The characteristic Slav melody of the last part was given with delightful abandon and clavity of tone, despite the rapid temoo, and the climax was reached midst applause, for the audience did not wait for the closing measures before beginning its plaudits. Mr Bauer made many journeys from the retiring room to the stage before his delighted auditors allowed him to finally retire.

The orchestral work was of the usual high standard. The novelty number, Bruneau's entr'acte music, is a pleasing descriptive piece in which the various themes are well contrasted, one movement suggesting the "Pilgrim" chorus from "Tannhauser," and the others showing originality in ideas. The piece is admirably scored, the strings having some charming passage work, and the horns showing up well in the earlier part of the movement. There were no difficulties which the orchestra could not readily meet, and the interpretation was thoroughly commendable.

The familiar "Euryanthe" overture by Weber, with the exquisite pianissimo measures for the strings, which were faultlessly played, and ending with a rousing coda given with excellent effect, open the concerts auspiciously and were cordially received. The Brahms symphony went well, and although to some there are many moments which may be described as uninteresting and vague, the performance lacked nothing in merit

This week's program will be as follows: Overture in C, Beethoven; "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," Wagner; Glazounow's fourth symphony, and Mr E. F. Arbos will appear as violin soloist, playing a Mendelssohn concerto and a Spanish morceau of his own composition.

——The first Symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon drew a larger audience than usual at a first performance, and very many patrons came from their seaside and country homes. Every seat was taken, and Mr Gericke received a demonstration of applause as he came upon the stage. Mr Harold Bauer, the soloist, was recalled again and again after his playing of the concerto, and he has lost none of his former prestige. The places formerly filled by Mr Kneisel and Mr Loeffler were taken by Mr Arbos, the new concert master, who will be the soloist at next week's concerts, and Mr Timothee Adamowski. A few in the audience were Mrs James H. Beal, Mr and Mrs Francis H. Peabody, Mr and Mrs Converse (Miss Tudor), Mrs Irving Wood, Miss Heloise Hersey, Mrs Curtis Guild Jr, Miss Mollie Johnson, Mrs Albert Nickerson, Mr E. Pierson Beebe, Judge Charles Allen, Mrs Gericke and her little daughter, Mrs Mudgett, Mrs Arthur H. Sargent, Mrs Hall Curtis, Mrs William P. Fay, Miss Katherine Fay, Miss Margaret Dana, Miss Susie Amory, Mr Wallace Goodrich, Miss Madeline Boardman, Mrs Frederic R. Comee, Mrs George Mann, Mrs Arthur Stanwood, Mr Arthur Foote, Miss Foote, Miss Estelle Kimball, Miss Manning, Mrs Thomas Wales and Mr James P. Stearns. Mrs John L. Gardner was not in her accustomed seat, as she is still in Washington. Mrs Adamowski was looking well in a black cloth costume, with black hat, and wearing a corsage bouquet of violets. Mr Ellis and Mr Comee were both on hand, giving a cordial greeting to many old friends.

SUNDAY HERALD—BOSTON, OCTOBER 18, 1903.

SYMPHONY SEASON OPENS.

The Overture to "Euryanthe," as Usual, Heads the List.

Concerto by Tschaikowsky, Entr'acte by Bruneau and Symphony by Brahms Complete the Programme—Wilhelm Gericke Is the Conductor Again This Year.

The programme of the first concert of the 23d season of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Symphony Hall, last evening, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Overture, "Euryanthe".....Weber
Concerto No. 1 in B-flat minor for piano,
Tschaikowsky
Entr'acte, Symphonique from "Messidor,"
Bruneau
(First time.)
Symphony No. 2 in D major.....Brahms

The overture to "Euryanthe," in Europe, as well as in this country, often serves as opening or closing piece at a first symphony concert of a season. Thirty years or more ago, when negro minstrels were fashionable as well as popular entertainers, the opening chorus, or, to speak by the card, the "opening load," was an arrangement of a chorus from "Ernani," and it was entitled "O Hail Us, Ye Free!" Had not this particular chorus been sung, the audience would have been suspicious of the jests, songs, dances and farces that followed. So, too, there was a time when all popular concerts began with the overture to "Zampa" or the overture to "Massaniello" or the overture to "Poet and Peasant." In concerts of a more dignified nature "Euryanthe" is accepted by many as the fitting announcement of the beginning of another season.

There is a reason other than more caprice for this choice. The overture is not without a certain old-fashioned but veritable pomp; it has the spirit of ceremony which the admirers of Weber call "the chivalric spirit." What Mr. Apthorp was fond of naming the characteristic Weberian upward rush—in other words, the flourish peculiar to Weber, his signature, which was his mannerism—contributes no doubt to the general feeling of pleasurable expectation and promotes what Athenaeus held to be one of the chief ends of music—"a gentlemanlike joy."

It would be perhaps an idle task for an ultra-modern to insist that the only music in this overture that appeals to the men and women of the younger generation is that of the short episode which was originally intended to accompany a pantomimic scene on the stage, a scene of old-fashioned romantic melodrama, with tomb, kneeling heroine, gliding ghost, and an eavesdropping, intriguing woman. In these few mysterious measures Weber thought far beyond his period. The ultra-modern might say that the rest of the music is decorative and that the decorations are substantial till they are cumbrous; that the melodies are like unto a cameo-brooch worn by a faded woman who remembers nights of coquetry and dances long out of fashion; that the few measures of counterpoint show Weber as a plodding amateur. Nevertheless, the conventionally jubilant swing and the impetuous pace make their way in a concert hall even in 1903.

So, too, the choice of a symphony by Brahms was in this instance judicious. The symphony in D is the most genial of the four, the most easily accepted by an audience, for if there are pages of supreme beauty in it, as toward the end of the first movement, so there are pages that are Mendelssohnian in the form and in the rhythm of the easily retained melodic thought. Mendelssohn, a shrewd composer, seldom, if ever, committed the blunder of surprising an audience. As in the theatre, so in the concert hall, an audience does not wish to be left in doubt, and in this symphony, which is in reality a storehouse of truly beautiful things, there is every now and then a passage that is accepted by the hearer as an agreeable commonplace.

The entr'acte from Bruneau's "Messidor" is a prelude to the fourth and last act of that opera, for which Zola wrote the libretto in prose. In the opera house the curtain rises toward the end of the prelude and the final measures are enchained with the music of the scene. The entr'acte is built on five typical themes, for Bruneau invented themes to typify situations or to serve as symbols. An earnest commentator assures us that there are at least 26 of these themes and they must be mastered for the purpose of prompt identification, or the hearer sits in his seat with as foolish a face as that of Parsifal standing during the communion scene in the castle of the Holy Grail. The themes in the entr'acte typify Spring, Sowing, Water, Love and Toil.

In the opera house these themes may suggest what has gone before, serve as a summing up of preceding action, or awaken thoughts concerning the outcome of the story. In a concert hall this entr'acte sandwiched between a concerto and a symphony can be considered only as absolute music. The themes are merely melodies without esoteric significance. As absolute music, the entr'acte is a pleasing work. The themes are fresh; they are introduced with apparent spontaneity; they are not too laboriously combined; and the orchestration is ingenious and sonorous. Bruneau is a composer concerning whom there is a marked difference of opinion even in Paris. A man of decided convictions, a critic who wrote bravely and honestly, he inevitably made enemies. Let us hope that we shall have an opportunity of hearing more of his music and of judging for ourselves. He has composed a symphonic poem, "The Sleeping Beauty," which will soon be played at Chicago, and excerpts from his latest opera, "L'Ouragan," have been warmly applauded in Parisian concert halls.

Tschaikowsky's first piano concerto has been played many times in Boston since it was introduced here and to the world, by von Buelow in 1875. Last night the pianist was Mr. Harold Bauer, and his performance was a memorable one, memorable for rhythm and passion. Tschaikowsky was an oriental in his love of rhythm and color, in his delight in rhythmic iterations, in drum beats or in haunting phrases that repeated do not weary, but take possession of the hearer and fret his nerves till he is mastered by the spell, till he thinks and dreams or would fain act to that compelling rhythm.

It has been said of this great tone-poet of longing, anguish and despair, that he at times is melodically trivial or coarse. His melodies have a direct appeal; pathetic, they stab the heart; but their gayety is not that of the idle dancer. Let the tune be at first ever so sprightly, sadness creeps in, and the sadness is soon poignant in the expression of the melancholy. Tschaikowsky might well have written the dance tunes for the revellers in Poe's wild tale; music that now halted strangely, that shuddered in its measure, knowing the approach of masked Red Death. In this concerto how suddenly the merriment of the French dance tune in the second movement is chilled! And how the dance fades away as at command.

Now Mr. Bauer not only appreciated the essential spirit of this concerto, which is too often misunderstood or belittled by being turned into a mere show piece, but by an intellectual force charged with artistic passion, he interpreted the music and revealed Tschaikowsky's soul, a soul that, as we now know from the composer's correspondence, was full of strange contradictions; the soul of a man shy, now distrustful and now confident of his genius—one yearning for affection, yet suspicious and inclined toward misanthropy; a man of the loftiest and noblest aspirations, vexed by grievous mental ailments.

The concerto is to be taken as Victor Hugo took Shakespeare—in bulk. It is enough to say of Mr. Bauer's performance that never before did the work seem so colossal in proportions, so tenderly beautiful, so rhythmically entrancing and irrisistible, so demoniacally, and yet so nobly, passionate. The long continued and repeated applause was merely the attempt of the audience to show in a measure its profound appreciation of the concerto and Mr. Bauer's artistic worth.

All in all, a concert of unusual interest. Mr. Gericke was warmly greeted, and he conducted with fervent authority. His reading of the first movement of the familiar symphony was perhaps especially admirable in a concert that even at the very beginning of the season was often worthy of the reputation of the orchestra at its zenith. Mr. Arbos, the concert master; Mr. Ferir, the violin player, and other new members were in their respective seats. Mr. Krasselt, the 'cellist, will be present at the next concert.

Symphony Hall was filled Friday afternoon for the first rehearsal. Although weddings bring many people together, the initial Symphony rehearsal is the first large gathering of society, and there are many greetings between friends who have not seen each other all summer. Mr. Gericke and Mr. Bauer, who was the soloist, each received warm personal greetings upon their entrance. Among those there were Mrs. Preston West and her daughter, Mrs. Oliver Ames, Mr. and Mrs. Albert F. Bigelow, who recently returned from their extended honeymoon abroad; Mrs. DeFord Bigelow, Miss Madeleine Boardman, who was with Mrs. Timothee Adamowski, Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, Mrs. George B. Shattuck, Mrs. Greely S. Curtis, Mrs. Gideon Scull, Mrs. William P. Fay and Miss Katharine Fay, Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Miss Rosamond Saltonstall, Mrs. Montgomery Sears, Mrs. George Tyson and Miss Elsie Tyson, Mrs. Harry Pratt McKean, Miss Juliet Higginson and Miss Barbara Higginson, Miss Elizabeth Shattuck, Miss Julia Lawrence, Miss Beatrice Blake, who recently returned from Europe; Miss Mabel Warren, Miss Estelle Kimball, Miss Abby Manning, Miss Katharine Foote, the venerable Mrs. John Lowell, Mrs. Gerike, Miss Susan Amory, Miss Nathalie Matthews, Mrs. William B. Rice, Miss Jane Waldron, Mr. F. S. Converse and Mr. Franz Zerrahn. This week Mr. E. Fernandez-Arbos, the violinist, will be the soloist.

[29]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER,

MONDAY MORNING,

OCTOBER 19, 1903

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Weber.....Overture to "Euryanthe"
Tschaikowsky.....
Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 1, in B-flat minor, Op. 23.
Mr. Harold Bauer, pianist.
Bruneau.....
.....Entr'acte Symphonique from "Messidor" (First time.)
Brahms....Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73

There ought to be no animadversion upon the first symphony concert of any season, for the orchestra have not quite shaken off vacation ease and the critic who has become music-hungry after a four months' fast, would digest, and enjoy, and rhapsodize over a much poorer orchestra and programme than this. "A short retirement urges sweet return," and the homing of our orchestral swallows is always ardently looked forward to.

On Saturday, for the first time in many years, an element of novelty entered into the orchestra itself! A new "concert-meister," and a new violist, were only two of the stranger guests in the band, but these were the most important. We doubt whether there will be any noticeable change in the ensemble, for Mr. Gericke has a habit of making his added material blend, as we have seen some years ago, when changes were far more frequent than they have recently been. Senor Arbos, the new concert-meister, sat at the chief desk, with Adamowski at his side; emphasizing the change in the first violins. Herr Ferir and other newcomers were seen in the ranks, and next Saturday the new leader of the violoncellos, Herr Krasselt, will be in his place. We shall have an opportunity to judge of these men very soon, Senor Arbos being the first to present himself for criticism, in the Mendelssohn concerto (violin), and in one of his own compositions, at the next concert. The good old "Euryanthe" overture, which began the concert, was as effective as ever. Yet it had one point of surprise. The chief theme of this work ends with a resounding crash, in Weber's most theatrical style. We remember the manner in which Berlioz chops off the head of the young lover, in the "Symphonie Fantastique," and the way in which Rubinstein brings down the house in the "Tower of Babel;" but we still regard the explosion with which Weber rounds off (or rather blows off) the end of the chief theme in this overture, as one of the remarkable crushes of music. We were greatly astonished, therefore, when Mr. Gericke caused it to roar as gently as a sucking dove!

The next feature in the interesting game was the playing of the right Bauer. Harold Bauer was certainly the right man in the right place in Tschaikowsky's noble concerto, the concerto that Boston first discovered and appreciated. Often as we have heard the work since its first performance here, in 1875, we doubt if ever it made so strong an impression as upon this occasion. Mr. Bauer is a rival to the great D'Albert in breadth and massive power, and his conception of the concerto was sufficiently individual to give a new interpretation without distortion of any kind. He won a great triumph.

The concerto itself is very long, but not prolix in the slightest degree. It contains enough ideas to fit out the entire modern school of composers with thematic material. Every day we are more impressed with the genius of Tschaikowsky,—a compposer who gives originality without eccentricity, who is modern without being full of vagaries! His chief fault is a lack of symmetry and logical sequence; there is a certain roughness in his work, but this gives a barbaric splendor that in itself has a sort of attraction. And this is the man whom the Russians accused of being too German! Had he but possessed a little more of the Teutonic power of detail he would have been one of the greatest tone-masters.

A novelty in the first concert! A bit of the French music of the present, which somewhat resembles the extreme music of the future. We are glad of this earnest of a progressive spirit in the matter of programme make-up. If Bostonians only knew what Theodore Thomas has given the citizens of Chicago in the recent years (sometimes against their will!) they would feel that the sceptre of catholicism in music does not belong to Boston.

Bruneau's Entr'acte was, however, badly placed. Coming after the great concerto it scarcely had a fighting chance. Heard, let us say, after either a Mozart symphony or a D'Indy jumble, it would charm by its thematic work on the one hand and its comparative clearness on the other. It is an earnest work, and sincerity is worth something in these days of musical affectation. It has some broad climaxes which are effective enough. We should hear Bruneau again soon, and in some of his larger works. The Brahms symphony, which closed the programme, made a peculiar effect after an hour of modern passion. It fully demonstrated the sure touch of the master of figure treatment, but it also emphasized the phlegmatic character of the German composer. Tschaikowsky has left it on record that he held Brahms to be decidedly inferior to himself in composition, and this was but natural, for the two are opposites in almost every particular. If Brahms had more of Tschaikowsky, if Tschaikowsky had more of Brahms, in his make-up, then we should have a musical ideal. The two men seem to supplement each other.

The Scherzo was, as ever, the gem of the symphony, a calmly beautiful movement with something of the tranquillity of the Bach Christmas Oratorio in its measures. The finale was brilliantly performed, and the two last movements were the best given, and the most interesting of the symphony. The more the pity that the concert was so long that there was a decided exodus before these movements were played. Only the faithful Brahmsites stayed to the end.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, OCTOBER 19, 1903

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

On Saturday began the present season of symphony concerts, the twenty-third in succession. Mr. Wilhelm Gericke again conducts, and the make-up of the orchestra is much the same as it was last year, barring the withdrawal of the members of the Kneisel Quartet. This was the programme of the opening concert, Mr. Harold Bauer being the soloist:

Weber: Overture to "Euryanthe."
Tchaikovsky: Concerto for Pianoforte in B-flat minor, No. 1, Op. 23.
Bruneau: Entr'acte Symphonique, from "Messidor." (First time.)
Brahms: Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73.

So early in the season, even a mediocre concert must give pleasure, but, in point of fact, this first of the twenty-four orchestral concerts was distinguished alike for a delightful programme and for remarkably brilliant playing. Of greatest interest, perhaps, was the prelude from Bruneau's opera, "Messidor," for of this famous composer's work we have heard here little, if, indeed, anything. For many years now Bruneau has enjoyed a high reputation in Paris. He has written orchestral music, several operas which have been produced at the Opéra or the Opéra Comique—where, to be sure, they have never permanently held the stage; he has written, in a charming style, at least two volumes of thoroughly interesting musical criticism; and, latterly, he has become a conductor at the Opéra Comique. In his published criticisms, Bruneau has been an impassioned defender of the use of prose in opera librettos. Putting his theory into practice, he set a prose text by Zola, with results that pleased some but displeased more. The prelude from "Messidor" played the other night is based on six typical themes, or motives, of the opera. Regarded as absolute music, it is indeed pleasant to hear, melodious, easily and naturally flowing, and beautifully orchestrated.

As for the Brahms symphony, the one composition of this master which all the world, anti-Brahms people included, unite in admiring, it was given a performance not soon to be forgotten. Never before has the poetry of the exquisite pages at the close of the first movement been brought out more sympathetically, nor the tender charm of the andantino, which no less a personnage than Mr. Runciman compares to a "wild rose." And it is safe to say that rarely, if ever, here, has the finale gone with such amazing brilliancy. The entire symphony, as well as the accompaniment to the concerto, or, indeed, the whole concert, was a triumph of splendid orchestral playing.

In his former appearances here with the orchestra Mr. Bauer has always chosen to play a work that was a rare pleasure to hear, but which has given him little opportunity to display his powers as a virtuoso. By way of a change, probably, on Saturday he played a composition of quite a different complexion, the wild and barbaric B-flat minor concerto of Tchaikovsky, with its tremendous first theme that sweeps listeners off their feet at the start, its moments of frantic passion and of poignant sadness. That Mr. Bauer has added to his great reputation can hardly be claimed. That so absolutely adequate a performance, with so many moments of great brilliancy, with such uniformly beautiful tone, with such musical understanding, could make so little impression is an interesting psychological study. Surely Mr. Bauer played this rhapsodical, demoniacal, fantastic work called a concerto far too much as though it were the Beethoven E-flat concerto. Instead of one long glow of emotion, now passionate, suddenly sad, and then, before one realizes it, gay, its gaiety quickly turning to fury, the concerto, as Mr. Bauer had it, consisted of many sharply contrasted episodes, all stopping neatly and cleanly at the end, with a pause before the next. Mr. Bauer has done far greater playing than this.

At the next concert Mr. E. Fernandez Arbos, new concert master, will play. This is the programme: Beethoven, Overture Op. 115; Mendelssohn, concerto for violin; Wagner, "Waldweben," from "Siegfried"; E. F. Arbos, Morceau de Concert for violin and orchestra, "Tango"; Glazounow, Symphony No. 4, in E-flat (first time).

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 20, 1903

The twenty-third season of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, is announced. Ten concerts will be given as usual, the first on the evening of Oct. 20, and the last on the evening of April 21. The programmes will be arranged by Mr. William Gericke so as to include many of the novelties of the Boston season and introduce the principal standard compositions given in Boston and other cities. Among the soloists already engaged are Miss Maud MacCarthy and Miss Olive Mead and Messrs. Busoni, Arbos and Krasselt; other artists now being negotiated with will be announced later. The concerts will be given on Thursday evening as usual. Subscribers of last season may secure the same seats by mailing a notice of their desire with check to C. W. Sever & Co. today. The seats unclaimed by former subscribers will be put on sale at Sever's University Bookstore, Harvard square, Cambridge, next Saturday morning at eight o'clock.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CXIV., NO. 112.

TUESDAY, OCT. 20, 1903.

SANDERS THEATRE CONCERTS.

The 23d season of the concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, is anonunced. Ten concerts will be given, as usual, the first on the evening of Oct 20 and the last on the evening of April 21. The programme will be arranged by Mr. William Gericke so as to include many of the novelties of the Boston season and introduce the principal standard compositions given in Boston and other cities. Among the soloists engaged are Miss Maud MacCarthy and Miss Olive Mead, and Messrs. Busoni, Arbos and Krasselt, while other artists are now being negotiated. The concerts will be given on Thursday evenings, as usual. Subscribers of last season may secure the same seats by mailing a notice of their desire with check to C. W. Sever & Co. today. The seats unclaimed by former subscribers will be put on sale at Sever's book store, Harvard square, next Saturday morning, at 8 o'clock.

[30]

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Opening of the Season at Boston—Review by Philip Hale in the Boston Herald.

BEFORE reprinting what Philip Hale thought and wrote in last Sunday's Boston Herald on the opening of the twenty third season of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra it may be well to state that for the first time in ten years seats for these concerts were for sale at Symphony Hall, and that at the auction sale of tickets for the season there was a loss of about 25 per cent. on the Friday afternoon sales and of about 10 per cent. on the Saturday evening sales, as compared to the sums received last season.

Two reasons are assigned for this manifestation of a decreasing interest. The one is the absence of attractive solo stars, which is proved by the fact that the prices of the tickets for the concerts when Melba is to appear are advanced by the ticket speculators to figures far ahead of the average concerts, which indicates that Boston musical culture is no lower and no higher than the music culture of this star ridden town.

The second reason assigned for the falling off of income is the self evident fact that Mr. Gericke as a conductor fails to draw. Naturally THE MUSICAL COURIER, like other critical sources, has its theory for this. People very soon tire of academic orchestral conducting, and they will find in this city this approaching season the reason why so many European communities have become interested and fascinated by some of the men who are coming over here to conduct the Philharmonic concerts. Most of these men have graduated and are no longer academicians, but are demonstrators of authority. Mr. Gericke is an amiable time beater. It will be observed that Mr. Hale, who is suffering from the fact that he is writing for a daily paper, which, like all dailies, cannot afford to be independent, cannot afford to print the truth. Mr. Hale, as will be seen by the following, does not enter upon any criticism of Mr. Gericke's conducting. It will be observed by students of these phenomena that the daily music critic can always freely criticise the absent composer and the transient guest, but the local musician, the local musical institution, with their permanent pull, cannot be treated unfavorably by the critic, because the owners of the daily papers, being the slaves of their public opinion, cannot afford to have the truth printed in their columns. They are in a worse box than the critics.

Mr. Hale's review follows:

The program of the first concert of the twenty-third season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall last evening, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Overture, Euryanthe.....Weber
Concerto No. 1, in B flat minor, for piano.....Tschaikowsky
Entr'acte, Symphonique, from Messidor.....Bruneau
(First time.)
Symphony No. 2, in D major.....Brahms

The overture to "Euryanthe," in Europe as well as in this country, often serves as opening or closing piece at a first symphony concert of a season. Thirty years or more ago, when negro minstrels were fashionable as well as popular entertainers, the opening chorus, or, to speak by the card, the "opening load," was an arrangement of a chorus from "Ernani," and it was entitled "O Hail Us, Ye Free!" Had not this particular chorus been sung, the audience would have been suspicious of the jests, songs, dances and farces that followed. So, too, there was a time when all popular concerts began with the overture to "Zampa," or the overture to "Masaniello," or the overture to "Poet and Peasant." In concerts of a more dignified nature "Euryanthe" is accepted by many as the fitting announcement of the beginning of another season.

There is a reason other than mere caprice for this choice. The overture is not without a certain old fashioned but veritable pomp; it has the spirit of ceremony which the admirers of Weber call "the chivalric spirit." What Mr. Apthorp was fond of naming the characterstic Weberian upward rush—in other words, the flourish peculiar to Weber, his signature, which was his mannerism—contributes no doubt to the general feeling of pleasurable expectation, and promotes what Athenæus held to be one of the chief ends of music—"a gentlemanlike joy."

It would be perhaps an idle task for an ultra modern to insist that the only music in this overture that appeals to the men and women of the younger generation is that of the short episode which was originally intended to accompany a pantomimic scene on the stage, a scene of old fashioned romantic melodrama, with tomb, kneeling heroine, gliding ghost and an eavesdropping, intriguing woman. In these few mysterious measures Weber thought far beyond his period. The ultra modern might say that the rest of the music is decorative and that the decorations are substantial till they are cumbrous; that the melodies are like unto a cameo brooch worn by a faded woman who remembers nights of coquetry and dances long out of fashion; that the few measures of counterpoint show Weber as a plodding amateur. Nevertheless, the conventionally jubilant swing and the impetuous pace make their way in a concert hall even in 1903.

So, too, the choice of a symphony by Brahms was in this instance judicious. The Symphony in D is the most genial of the four, the most easily accepted by an audience, for if there are pages of supreme beauty in it, as toward the end of the first movement, so there are pages that are Mendelssohnian in the form and in the rhythm of the easily retained melodic thought. Mendelssohn, a shrewd composer, seldom, if ever, committed the blunder of surprising an audience. As in the theatre, so in the concert hall, an audience does not wish to be left in doubt, and in this symphony, which is in reality a storehouse of truly beautiful things, there is every now and then a passage that is accepted by the hearer as an agreeable commonplace.

The entr'acte from Bruneau's "Messidor" is a prelude to the fourth and last act of that opera, for which Zola wrote the libretto in prose. In the opera house the curtain rises toward the end of the prelude and the final measures are enchained with the music of the scene. The entr'acte is built on five typical themes, for Bruneau invented themes to typify situations or to serve as symbols. An earnest commentator assures us that there are at least twenty-six of these themes, and they must be mastered for the purpose of prompt identification, or the hearer sits in his seat with as foolish a face as that of Parsifal standing during the communion scene in the castle of the Holy Grail. The themes in the entr'acte typify spring, sowing, water, love and toil.

In the opera house these themes may suggest what has gone before, serve as a summing up of preceding action, or awaken thoughts concerning the outcome of the story. In a concert hall this entr'acte sandwiched between a concerto and a symphony can be considered only as absolute music. The themes are merely melodies without esoteric significance. As absolute music the entr'acte is a pleasing work. The themes are fresh; they are introduced with apparent spontaneity; they are not too laboriously combined; and the orchestration is ingenious and sonorous. Bruneau is a composer concerning whom there is a marked difference of opinion even in Paris. A man of decided convictions, a critic who wrote bravely and honestly, he inevitably made enemies. Let us hope that we shall have an opportunity of hearing more of his music and of judging for ourselves. He has composed a symphonic poem, "The Sleeping Beauty," which will soon be played at Chicago, and excerpts from his latest opera, "L'Ouragan," have been warmly applauded in Parisian concert halls.

Tschaikowsky's first piano concerto has been played many times in Boston since it was introduced here and to the world, by Von Bülow in 1875. Last night the pianist was Harold Bauer, and his performance was a memorable one, memorable for rhythm and passion. Tschaikowsky was an Oriental in his love of rhythm and color, in his delight in rhythmic iterations, in drum beats or in haunting phrases that repeated do not weary, but take possession of the hearer and fret his nerves till he is mastered by the spell, till he thinks and dreams or would fain act to that compelling rhythm.

It has been said of this great tone poet of longing, anguish and despair, that he at times is melodically trivial or coarse. His melodies have a direct appeal; pathetic, they stab the heart; but their gayety is not that of the idle dancer. Let the tune be at first ever so sprightly, sadness creeps in, and the sadness is soon poignant in the expression of the melancholy. Tschaikowsky might well have written the dance tunes for the revellers in Poe's wild tale; music that now halted strangely, that shuddered in its measure, knowing the approach of masked Red Death. In this concerto how suddenly the merriment of the French dance tune in the second movement is chilled! And how the dance fades away as at command.

Now Mr. Bauer not only appreciated the essential spirit of this concerto, which is too often misunderstood or belittled by being turned into a mere show piece, but by an intellectual force charged with artistic passion he interpreted the music and revealed Tschaikowsky's soul, a soul that, as we now know from the composer's correspondence, was full of strange contradictions; the soul of a man shy, now distrustful and now confident of his genius—one yearning for affection, yet suspicious and inclined toward misanthropy; a man of the loftiest and noblest aspirations, vexed by grievous mental ailments.

The concerto is to be taken as Victor Hugo took Shakespeare—in bulk. It is enough to say of Mr. Bauer's performance that never before did the work seem so colossal in proportions, so tenderly beautiful, so rhythmically entrancing and irresistible, so demoniacally, and yet so nobly, passionate. The long continued and repeated applause was merely the attempt of the audience to show in a measure its profound appreciation of the concerto and Mr. Bauer's artistic worth.

All in all, a concert of unusual interest. Mr. Gericke was warmly greeted, and he conducted with fervent authority. His reading of the first movement of the familiar symphony was perhaps especially admirable in a concert that even at the very beginning of the season was often worthy of the reputation of the orchestra at its zenith. Mr. Arbos, the concertmaster; Mr. Ferir, the violin player, and other new members were in their respective seats. Mr. Krasselt, the 'cellist, will be present at the next concert.

At the next Symphony Concert Mr. Arbos, the new concertmaster, will be the soloist. He will play a concerto by Mendelssohn and one of his own compositions, "Tango," for violin and orchestra.

SPRINGFIELD SUNDAY REPUBLICAN:

OCTOBER 25, 1903.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra to Play Here in January.

All music lovers in Springfield will be glad to know that the success of last year has encouraged the managers of the Boston symphony orchestra to continue the experiment of including this city in the annual circuit. The date set is Monday evening, January 18, 1904, and that evening should be kept carefully free of conflicting engagements. Those who are really eager and anxious to have these concerts become a fixed institution, and there must be several hundred such persons, should begin in good season an informal personal canvass among their friends. When it comes to concert-going, one word in the ear is worth 10 in the newspaper, and a little personal reminder is often the decisive factor. A few hundred persons of the right sort, who know what is good and take a warm interest in it, can accomplish wonders in the way of keeping musical interest alive. A city of this size, with so large an outside population to draw upon, ought some day to be able to support three concerts each season by the Boston symphony orchestra, and three by the Kneisel string quartet. By that time the community can lay some claim to being musical. In the meantime, if every one makes a little effort, there will be no trouble in getting crowded halls for the single visits of these admirable concert organizations. Of the first Boston concert and the changes in the membership of the orchestra, the Boston Transcript says:—

With the opening of the 23d year of the Boston symphony orchestra, the local musical season may be said to be fairly under way, and for six months at least the outlook presages great activity in the realms of melody, with many famous artists announced to appear in this city and almost innumerable concerts and recitals, vocal and instrumental, scheduled at the various halls. New quartets, prominent orchestras from other cities and grand opera companies will be in evidence during the fall and winter, and no lover of music of the higher class will have any reason to complain either of the quality or quantity of the musical surfeit which is promised by the advance heralding. This season's symphony orchestra shows some changes in membership. The first desk of the first violins is now allotted to Mr Arbos, the new concert master, and Mr Adamowski. Back of them are seated Mr Birnbaum, a new member, and Mr Roth. Mr Krasselt, the new first cellist, will appear at the second concert. There is a new viola player, Mr Ferir, and the second violins have a new leader, Mr Barlehen, formerly of this organization.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Opening of the Season at Boston—Review by Philip Hale in the Boston Herald.

BEFORE reprinting what Philip Hale thought and wrote in last Sunday's Boston Herald on the opening of the twenty-third season of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra it may be well to state that for the first time in ten years seats for these concerts were for sale at Symphony Hall, and that at the auction sale of tickets for the season there was a loss of about 25 per cent. on the Friday afternoon sales and of about 10 per cent. on the Saturday evening sales, as compared to the sums received last season.

Two reasons are assigned for this manifestation of a decreasing interest. The one is the absence of attractive solo stars, which is proved by the fact that the prices of the tickets for the concerts when Melba is to appear are advanced by the ticket speculators to figures far ahead of the average concerts, which indicates that Boston musical culture is no lower and no higher than the music culture of this star ridden town.

The second reason assigned for the falling off of income is the self evident fact that Mr. Gericke as a conductor fails to draw. Naturally THE MUSICAL COURIER, like other critical sources, has its theory for this. People very soon tire of academic orchestral conducting, and they will find in this city this approaching season the reason why so many European communities have become interested and fascinated by some of the men who are coming over here to conduct the Philharmonic concerts. Most of these men have graduated and are no longer academicians, but are demonstrators of aesthetics. Mr. Gericke is an amiable time beater. It will be observed that Mr. Hale, who is suffering from the fact that he is writing for a daily paper, which, like all dailies, cannot afford to be independent, cannot afford to print the truth. Mr. Hale, as will be seen by the following, does not enter upon any criticism of Mr. Gericke's conducting. It will be observed by students of these phenomena that the daily music critic can always freely criticise the absent composer and the transient guest, but the local musician, the local musical institution, with their permanent pull, cannot be treated unfavorably by the critic, because the owners of the daily papers, being the slaves of their public opinion, cannot afford to have the truth printed in their columns. They are in a worse box than the critics.

Mr. Hale's review follows:

The program of the first concert [illegible] twenty-third season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall last evening, Mr. Gericke conducting [illegible]

Overture, "Euryanthe" [illegible]
Concerto No. 1, in B flat minor [illegible]
Entr'acte, Symphonie [illegible]
Symphony No. [illegible] in D minor [illegible]

The overture to "Euryanthe" [illegible] this country, often serves as [illegible] first symphony concert of a season. Fifty years or more ago, when negro minstrels were fashionable as well as popular entertainers, the opening chorus, or, to speak by the card, the "opening load," was an arrangement of a chorus from "Ernani," and it was entitled "O Hail Us, Ye Free!" Had not this particular chorus been sung, the audience would have been suspicious of the jests, songs, dances and farces that followed. So, too, there was a time when all popular concerts began with the overture to "Zampa," or the overture to "Masaniello," or the overture to "Poet and Peasant." In concerts of a more dignified nature "Euryanthe" is accepted by many as the fitting announcement of the beginning of another season.

There is a reason other than mere caprice for this choice. The overture is not without a certain old fashioned but veritable pomp; it has the spirit of ceremony which the admirers of Weber call "the chivalric spirit." What Mr. Apthorp was fond of naming the characteristic Weberian upward rush—in other words, the flourish peculiar to Weber, his signature, which was his mannerism—contributes no doubt to the general feeling of pleasurable expectation, and promotes what Athenæus held to be one of the chief ends of music: "a gentlemanlike joy."

It would be perhaps an idle task for an ultra modern to insist that the only music in this overture that appeals to the men and women of the younger generation is that of the short episode which was originally intended to accompany a pantomimic scene on the stage, a scene of old fashioned romantic melodrama, with tomb, kneeling heroine, gliding ghost and an eavesdropping, intriguing woman. In these few mysterious measures Weber thought far beyond his period. The ultra modern might say that the rest of the music is decorative and that the decorations are substantial till they are cumbrous; that the melodies are like unto a cameo brooch worn by a faded woman who remembers nights of coquetry and dances long out of fashion; that the few measures of counterpoint show Weber as a plodding amateur. Nevertheless, the conventionally jubilant swing and the impetuous pace make their way in a concert hall even in 1903.

So, too, the choice of a symphony by Brahms was in one instance judicious. The Symphony in D is the most genial of the four, the most easily accepted by an audience, for if there are pages of supreme beauty in it, as [illegible] the end of the first movement, so there are pages that are Mendelssohnian in the form and in the rhythm of the easily retained melodic thought. Mendelssohn, a shrewd composer, seldom, if ever, committed the blunder of surprising an audience. As in the theatre, so in the concert hall, an audience does not wish to be left in doubt, and in this symphony, which is in reality a storehouse of truly beautiful things, there is every now and then a passage that is accepted by the hearer as an agreeable commonplace.

The entr'acte from Bruneau's "Messidor" is a prelude to the fourth and last act of that opera, for which Zola wrote the libretto in prose. In the opera house the curtain rises toward the end of the prelude and the final measures are enclosed with the music of the scene. The entr'acte is built on five typical themes, for Bruneau invented themes to typify situation or to serve as symbols. An earnest commentator assures us that there are at least twenty six of these themes, and they must be mastered for the purpose of prompt identification, or the hearer sits in his seat with as foolish a face as that of Parsifal standing during the communion scene in the castle of the Holy Grail. The themes in the entr'acte typify coring, sowing, [illegible] and toil.

In the opera house these themes may suggest what has gone before, serve as a summing up of preceding action, or awaken thoughts concerning the outcome of the story. In a concert hall this entr'acte sandwiched between a concerto and a symphony can be considered only as absolute music. The themes are merely melodies without esoteric significance. As absolute music the entr'acte is a pleasing work. The themes are fresh; they are introduced with apparent spontaneity; they are not too laboriously combined; and the orchestration is ingenious and generous. Bruneau is a composer concerning whom there is a marked difference of opinion even in Paris. A man of decided convictions, a critic who wrote bravely and honestly, he inevitably made enemies. Let us hope that we shall have an opportunity of hearing more of his music and of judging for ourselves. He has composed a symphonic poem, "The Sleeping Beauty," which will soon be played at Chicago, and excerpts from his latest opera, "L'Ouragan," have been warmly applauded in Parisian concert halls.

Tschaikowsky's first piano concerto has been played many times in Boston since it was introduced here and to the world, by Von Bülow in 1875. Last night the pianist was Harold Bauer, and his performance was a memorable one, memorable for rhythm and passion. Tschaikowsky was an Oriental in his love of rhythm and color, in his delight in rhythmic iterations, in drum beats or in haunting phrases that repeated do not weary, but take possession of the hearer and fret his nerves till he is mastered by the spell, till he thinks and dreams or would fain act to that compelling rhythm.

It has been said of this great tone poet of longing, anguish and despair, that he at times is melodically trivial or coarse. His melodies have a direct appeal; pathetic, they stab the heart; but their gayety is not that of the idle dancer. Let the tune be at first ever so sprightly, sadness creeps in, and the sadness is soon poignant in the expression of the melancholy. Tschaikowsky might well have written the dance tunes for the revellers in Poe's wild tale; music that now halted strangely, that shuddered in its measure, knowing the approach of masked Red Death. In this concerto how suddenly the merriment of the French dance tune in the second movement is chilled! And how the dance fades away as at command.

Now Mr. Bauer not only appreciated the essential spirit of this concerto, which is too often misunderstood or belittled by being turned into a mere show piece, but by an intellectual force charged with artistic passion he interpreted the music and revealed Tschaikowsky's soul, a soul that, as we now know from the composer's correspondence, was full of strange contradictions; the soul of a man shy, now distrustful and now confident of his genius—one yearning for affection, yet suspicious and inclined toward misanthropy; a man of the loftiest and noblest aspirations, vexed by grievous mental ailments.

The concerto is to be taken as Victor Hugo took Shakespeare—in bulk. It is enough to say of Mr. Bauer's performance that never before did the work seem so colossal in proportions, so tenderly beautiful, so rhythmically entrancing and irresistible, so demoniacally, and yet so nobly, passionate. The long continued and repeated applause was merely the attempt of the audience to show in a measure its profound appreciation of the concerto and Mr. Bauer's artistic worth.

All in all, a concert of unusual interest. Mr. Gericke was warmly greeted, and he conducted with fervent authority. His reading of the first movement of the familiar symphony was perhaps especially admirable in a concert that even at the very beginning of the season was often worthy of the reputation of the orchestra at its zenith. Mr. Arbos, the concertmaster; Mr. Ferir, the violin player, and other new members were in their respective seats. Mr. Krasselt, the 'cellist, will be present at the next concert.

At the next Symphony Concert Mr. Arbos, the new concertmaster, will be the soloist. He will play a concerto by Mendelssohn and one of his own compositions, "Tango," for violin and orchestra.

SPRINGFIELD SUNDAY REPUBLICAN:

OCTOBER 25, 1903.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra to Play Here in January.

All music lovers in Springfield will be glad to know that the success of last year has encouraged the managers of the Boston symphony orchestra to continue the experiment of including this city in the annual circuit. The date set is Monday evening, January 18, 1904, and that evening should be kept carefully free of conflicting engagements. Those who are really eager and anxious to have these concerts become a fixed institution, and there must be several hundred such persons, should begin in good season an informal personal canvass among their friends. When it comes to concert-going, one word in the ear is worth 10 in the newspaper, and a little personal reminder is often the decisive factor. A few hundred persons of the right sort, who know what is good and take a warm interest in it, can accomplish wonders in the way of keeping musical interest alive. A city of this size, with so large an outside population to draw upon, ought some day to be able to support three concerts each season by the Boston symphony orchestra, and three by the Kneisel string quartet. By that time the community can lay some claim to being musical. In the meantime, if every one makes a little effort, there will be no trouble in getting crowded halls for the single visits of these admirable concert organizations. Of the first Boston concert and the changes in the membership of the orchestra, the Boston Transcript says:—

With the opening of the 23d year of the Boston symphony orchestra, the local musical season may be said to be fairly under way, and for six months at least the outlook presages great activity in the realms of melody, with many famous artists announced to appear in this city and almost innumerable concerts and recitals, vocal and instrumental, scheduled at the various halls. New quartets, prominent orchestras from other cities and grand opera companies will be in evidence during the fall and winter, and no lover of music of the higher class will have any reason to complain either of the quality or quantity of the musical surfeit which is promised by the advance heralding. This season's symphony orchestra shows some changes in membership. The first desk of the first violins is now allotted to Mr Arbos, the new concert master, and Mr Adamowski. Back of them are seated Mr Birmbaum, a new member, and Mr Roth. Mr Krasselt, the new first cellist, will appear at the second concert. There is a new viola player, Mr Ferir, and the second violins have a new leader, Mr Barleben, formerly of this organization.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST, OCTOBER 25, 1903

ARBOS SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

At the second Symphony concert last evening, Conductor Gericke presented the following programme:

Beethoven.....Overture in C major, Op. 115
Mendelssohn.....Concerto for violin, Op. 64
Wagner.....“Waldweben,” from “Siegfried”
Arbos.....“Tango,” concert piece, Op. 6, No. 3
Glazounoff.....Symphony No. 4

Fernandez Arbos was the soloist.

The feature of the orchestral number was the symphony of Glazounoff in E flat, Op. 48, which was heard for the first time in this city.

The work is of only moderate length, in three movements, more or less subdivided, and is brilliantly scored, like most of the latter-day Russian compositions.

The performance was a very fine one, and the symphony is certainly worth another hearing in the near future.

Beethoven's overture in C major, which began the programme, has not been heard at these concerts for many years.

The “Waldweben” from Wagner's “Siegfried” was superbly played and made the usual delightful impression.

The soloist was the new cornet master, Fernandez Arbos, who made his first appearance last evening. His interpretation of the familiar Mendelssohn concerto was without affectation, clean cut and at times most brilliant.

The finale has been given her by some other artists with more virtuosity and brilliancy than was the case last evening, but as a whole the performance was highly artistic and worthy of much commendation.

The programme of the third rehearsal and concert will include Goldmark's popular “Sakuntala” overture, Schumann's fourth symphony, and a symphonic legend, “The Enchanted Forest,” by D'Indy. Mme. Gadski will sing numbers by Mozart and Massenet.

BOSTON TIMES
Oct 24-03

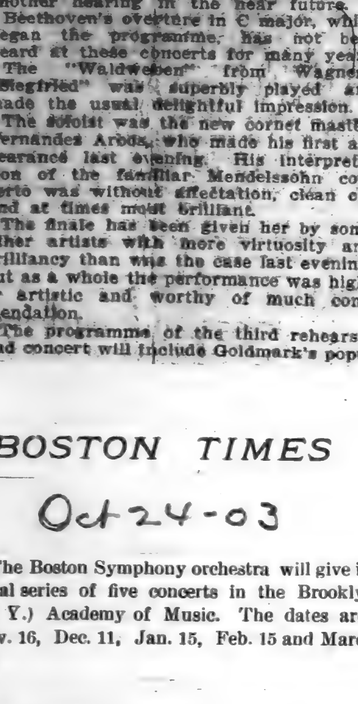
The Boston Symphony orchestra will give its usual series of five concerts in the Brooklyn (N. Y.) Academy of Music. The dates are: Nov. 16, Dec. 11, Jan. 15, Feb. 15 and March 18.

BOSTON POST.
MONDAY.
OCTOBER 26, 1903

RALPH SMALLEY HONORED

Somerville 'Cellist Engaged by Boston Symphony Orchestra

SOMERVILLE, Oct. 25.—Ralph Smalley, the violoncellist, has been engaged as a member of the Boston Symphony Orches-



RALPH SMALLEY,
The Somerville violoncellist, with the Symphony Orchestra.

tra. He joined the orchestra several weeks ago, and took part in the public performance last Saturday night for the first time.

He is a remarkably talented 'cellist, and his successes are being watched by a host of friends. He was graduated from the Luther V. Bell School in 1898, and the high school in 1897.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, OCT 25, 1903.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The second symphony program introduced the new concert master, Mr E. Fernandez-Arbos, for the first time in this country as a soloist. His selections were Mendelssohn's E minor concerto for violin and the Arbos concert piece “Tango,” a kind of Spanish dance. The other program numbers were Beethoven's C major overture, the forest music from Wagner's “Siegfried” and Glazounoff's fourth symphony, the latter piece and the “Tango” by Mr Arbos being new at these concerts. The debut of Mr Arbos as soloist made the concert of special interest, for he challenged comparison with other violinists heard in the city by playing the familiar Mendelssohn concerto, a graceful, brilliant and sentimental work, in which the solo instrument is so prominent that any lack of skill in the performer is readily detected.

At the outset Mr Arbos showed that a quiet elegance and daintiness of tone marked his execution, and if this tone was not very broad it was, nevertheless, of a resonant quality and pure. All the themes in the first part of the concerto were beautifully delivered, the cadenzas and trills were exquisitely given and accomplished with seeming ease, and the arpeggios were handled with the skill of a master. In the second part the breaks in the melodies were played very smoothly, soloist and orchestra being in perfect accord, and the dashing finale, though a bit lacking in vigor, was a splendid example of rapidity in chord fingering and complicated bowing. In execution Mr Arbos left nothing to be desired, for all the work of the left hand was distinguished by a clarity of tone and deftness of fingers that made his performance highly enjoyable and satisfied his auditors that the new artist was admirably equipped for his labors with the great orchestra.

His own composition, “Tango,” a florid, sprightly bit of dance music, was played with an abandon, verve and technical skill that were delightful. At the close of each number Mr Arbos was greeted with immense applause and recalled innumerable times to the platform.

The Glazounoff symphony has but few of the so-called Russian characteristics, dissonant phrases and cross harmonies, and although the heavier instruments are vigorously employed at times the score is generally free from the harshness usually found in the longer works of the Slav composers of the present day. Many of the themes are given alternately to different instruments in brief solos or duets, suggesting rather too much of repetition, specially in the first movement; but the orchestration is as clever as it is complicated, and the instrumental combinations are very effective and usually harmonious. One peculiar arrangement for the instruments makes the violins play a theme in the upper register, while the basses and brasses furnish a robust staccato background. The third part is rather chaotic in tempo and musical matter, until the key is attained, then the close becomes a rushing finale. The orchestra played the score commendably as a whole, if one may judge from a single hearing of the work. The clarinets and flutes in their figurations were in unison, the horns heard to advantage in their more robust phrases and the heavier instruments intoned the rapid passages smoothly. The symphony is hardly one that will please the general ear, though the admirable performance by the orchestra entitled it to respectful consideration, which it received.

The majestic opening in the Beethoven overture was was given with the proper ceremonious treatment and the joyous finale went with splendid swing and dash. In the wonderful forest music from “Siegfried” the orchestra played with its usual spirit and nicety in shades of expression, the familiar excerpt being received with great favor.

This week's program will have Mme Gadski as soloist. She will sing an aria from Mozart's “Il Re Pastore” and an excerpt from Massenet's opera, “The Cid.” The other selections will be the overture from Goldmark's “Sakuntala”; “The Enchanted Forest,” a symphonic poem by D'Indy, and Schumann's fourth symphony.

—The second Symphony rehearsal drew a very large audience to Symphony hall, and Mr E. Fernandez-Arbos, who has taken Mr Kneisel's place as concert-master, was cordially welcomed and rapturously applauded after playing the solo part in a concerto by Mendelssohn, and also after playing in something of his own composition. Mr Arbos was called out again and again, and the audience was evidently well pleased. Among the distinguished attendants were Mr and Mrs Forbes Robertson (Gertrude Eliot), who are playing an engagement at the Hollis-st theatre. Mrs Robertson was unassumingly gowned in a dark cloth costume and black hat. Some others there were Mrs Richard Cary, Miss Cary, Mrs Lester Leland, Miss Edith Stackpole, Miss Marian Peabody, Mrs Charles Head, Miss Head, Mrs Curtis Guild Jr, Mrs William P. Fay, Mr and Mrs Eben D. Jordan, Mrs E. C. Swift, Mrs Seth Sprague, Miss Hooper, Mrs Montgomery Sears, Miss Susie Howe, Dr Hay, Mrs Hall Curtis, Mrs Philip Wheatland, Miss Katherine Foote, Mrs Gericke, Mrs Shattuck, Miss Rosamund Saltonstall, Mrs James H. Beal and Mrs William P. Fay. Mme Gadski will be the soloist at the next concert.

BOSTON SUNDAY JOURNAL
OCTOBER 25, 1903.

ARBOS ESTABLISHED IN HIGH POSITION

Solo Performance at Symphony Concert Splendid One.

“TANGO” HEARD FIRST TIME

Artist's Own Composition Proves Diverting and Full of Abandon in Expression.

Mr. Arbos, by his solo performances at the second symphony, placed himself at once in the caste of true and high artist. In spite of all the ardor, chivalry, passion and abandon of the Spanish nature, there is always in it a fundamental element of gravity. One feels that the mendicant is somehow akin to the hidalgo and wears his torn cap and rags as he might carry a plumed hat and cloak, and even when Don Quixote most moves our laughter or our pity, we recognize regardfully his inherent dignity.

Mr. Arbos lacked neither poetry, vitality nor warmth in the Mendelssohn concerto, of which his playing was elegant, wholesome, symmetrical and well-colored; but still, if one were to characterize it briefly, it would be to consider it as rather reflective and restful in its general temper.

There was none of the half pathetic languor of Camilla Urso, nor yet of that most intemperate rush and outcry of De Seve. The opening allegro glowed with the lambent light of a happy content that might well range with the pleasing, bland melancholy of Jacques, which indeed it might have served to illustrate, while the finale rejoiced lightsomely with a spirit of such fairy frolic, as breathes life into so many of the “Midsummer Night's Dream” scenes, only intensified and enforced by a man's energy and activity. It was a rendering that appealed alike to intellecet, fancy and taste and contented all.

“Tango” for First Time.

Mr. Arbos' own “Tango” concert dance now heard in public for the first time was diverting and animating, but seemed rather a ballabile to dance with then by, marking rather say spirits than regular steps and figures. Being of a light and lively nature, rising to eager and active exhilaration as it proceeds toward its climax, it gave more opportunity for virtuosity in technique and abandon in expression. But while that virtuosity was ample, easy and affluent, it was always as the means to an end, and not displayed for itself alone, and behind the abandon there was always a light sense of reserve to qualify and dignify it.

The definite impression derived then from the hearing of his two numbers confirmed Mr. Arbos as an artist whose mastery of his instrument is complete in strength and fulness—for his tone is large and rich—as well as in facility of execution, variety of color and finesse of detail, whose mind is clear, whose judgment sound, and whose sentiment is honest, delicate and persuasive. A single debut only serves to fix a few gaugepoints, however, and one must wait for the advance of the season to draw all the outline and fill the whole body of his disposition, ability and artistry, from which much good will be expected.

Beethoven Overture.

The Beethoven overture, broad, stately and strong at first, and then nobly gay and festive, began the evening well, and the ever-delightful pictorial poetry of Weber's “Waldweben” made a refreshing interlude.

The Glazounoff fourth symphony, new to Boston, shows in its idealism and in the limning thereof in orchestral colors that known sympathy of its author for the romantic, the legendary and the mysterious, and hinted at the predilection which he still preserves for the ballet—the real ballet, with its continuous story, its definite personages, its truthful, pantomimic action and its constant blending of the poetry of motion with that of sound. It has but three movements, and in their subdivisions the andante seems to be both the favorite and the prevailing tempo.

The tones are sometimes languorously sentimental, or again dreamy and lulling; but they are always romantic and winning. The scherzo of the second movement, which leaves the quieter tonality of the first movement, centering closely about the grave tranquility of E flat, and passes at once into the vigorous vitality of B flat, is full of hearty happiness told in phrases that ring and roll as with merry cordial laughter. It thus brings a strong contrast, but is not too antiphanic in sentiment or shape.

Suave Amatory Theme.

The last movement opens with a suave amatory theme, but as the treatment enlarges with episodes for trumpets and strong wood winds, and assertive though not vehement contrapuntal elaboration, it becomes emphatic and almost declamatory. The instrumentation becomes richer and more diversified, and the variety of thematic treatment is more insisted upon. It justifies the composer's place as eminent among Russian professors of orchestration; but it is neither pedantic, tedious nor heavy, although scholarly, authoritative and forcible.

The orchestra did excellently by the work, which made so favorable an impression that the mass of the audience would evidently enjoy a repetition while it is still bright in mind.

The next program does not offer novelties, but it holds out the pleasing promise of arias from Mozart and Massenet, to be sung by Mme. Gadski.

Oct 26-03.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Overture in C major, op. 115.....Beethoven
Concerto for violin in E minor, op. 64.....
.....Mendelssohn
Mr. Arbos, violinist.
“Walderweben,” from “Siegfried”.....Wagner
“Tango,” Morceau de Concert op. 6, No. 3
(First performance) .....E. F. Arbos
Mr. Arbos, violinist.
Symphony No. 4, in E flat, op. 48.....Glazounoff

A programme full of interest and of novelty. But it began rather tamely. Beethoven's C major overture may have been a picture of a festivity in the early years of the 19th century, but it by no means thrills the modern pulses. It received a sedate and conservative reading, as befitted its Sir Charles Grandison style.

Why Mr. Arbos should have chosen Mendelssohn's violin concerto as his visiting card is difficult to understand. There are many violinists who can play this work well, and it is not a revelation of high muscianship to achieve a flawless interpretation of it. Even the Bruch G minor concerto would have given as much of technique and revealed more of individuality and of expression. When Mr. Kneisel, 18 years ago (less one week) presented his credentials, he played Beethoven's great concerto,—a crucial test.

Mr. Arbos played the Mendelssohn work very finely, if a trifle nervous in the first movement. The interpretation of the slow movement was very delicate and refined. Of course the intonation was always perfect and there was no blurring, although the finale was taken at a break-neck speed. The cadenza of the first allegro, oddly placed by the composer in the middle of the movement, was also perfect. Much applause followed the performance and Mr. Arbos was recalled three times. Yet the work was not a convincing one to the reviewer and the points of technique, even, were not of sufficiently exacting character whereby to judge a virtuoso.

These, however, came later in a composition by Mr. Arbos himself. In the Tango Mr. Arbos' foot was upon his native heath (if there are any heaths in Spain) and he displayed a most brilliant virtuosity. The work itself was but a popular trifle, with variations of a theme in an easily-grasped manner, but the tricks of execution which garnished it made it piquant enough. There were harmonics galore, and double stopping; pizzicato effects and combinations of pizzicato and arco (bow); skips, runs, chords and G string display. In short, Mr. Arbos in this composition showed that he is a virtuoso of high rank. He reminded one of Sarasate in this school of execution.

The gem of the programme was Wagner's “Waldesweben”. One can enjoy this fully as well in Symphony Hall as in Boston Theatre. On the operatic stage one has several adjuncts that draw the mind away from the glorious music. There is a bird that will not fly, a dragon with a face like an apothecary shop-window on a dark night, Siegfried piping on a reed which often speaks in the orchestra a few seconds after he blows, and a canvass forest that does not help the mental picture in any degree. Here we are spared these handicaps and have besides, an orchestra such as one does not hear in American Wagner performances in any opera house. The interpretation was altogether beautiful, the manifold voices of the strings being well-balanced and the intricate score being made as clear as it ever can be.

Glazounoff's fourth symphony has a fault that leans very far over to Virtue's side. It is too melodic! It opens with two chords, in the style of Beethoven's Heroic symphony, but this preamble leads to a Russian pastorale rather than to anything sterner. The chief theme is lyrical and gentle, after the manner of a subordinate theme, and, as a consequence, the themes of the first movement lack contrast. The development is rather confused, but exposition and recapitulation are very sweet and so clear that the movement ought to become popular at once.

The Scherzo is a melodic gem, and here the tuneful character can only be regarded as a merit. There are carollings and pipings in great profusion and even a drone bass adds to the pastoral character. The composer displays a great affection for the woodwind (all the Russians seem masters of this department of the orchestra) and he gives a chord accompaniment of wind instruments that is novel and effective. There is a strongly rhythmic undertone that saves the movement from becoming too effeminate. The trio is, however, as saccharine as a Mendelssohn Song without Words, and the muted strings carry on a most tuneful theme.

In the finale the composer uses a slow introduction (he omits a slow movement, altogether) and then plunges into the most complicated counterpoint, as if to make up for the prettiness of the first two movements. There is more than a suggestion of Tschaikowsky in this movement, and a waltz-like theme accentuates the resemblance, for Tschaikowsky and Berlioz are the only two great composers who have used the waltz in a symphony. There was some beautiful oboe playing in this finale, but the horns were not as secure as usual.

The symphony is short, melodious, popular, and should not be shelved. It would be well to hear it again, if only to prove that there are a few composers living who still write tunes.

Louis C. Elson.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST, OCTOBER 25, 1903

ARBOS SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

At the second Symphony concert last evening, Conductor Gericke presented the following programme:

Beethoven.....Overture in C major, Op. 115
Mendelssohn.....Concerto for violin, Op. 64
Wagner.....“Waldweben,” from “Siegfried”
Arbos.....“Tango,” concert piece, Op. 6, No. 3
Glazounoff.....Symphony No. 4

Fernandez Arbos was the soloist.

The feature of the orchestral number was the symphony of Glazounoff in E flat, Op. 48, which was heard for the first time in this city.

The work is of only moderate length, in three movements, more or less subdivided, and is brilliantly scored, like most of the latter-day Russian compositions.

The performance was a very fine one, and the symphony is certainly worth another hearing in the near future.

Beethoven's overture in C major, which began the programme, has not been heard at these concerts for many years.

The “Waldweben” from Wagner's “Siegfried” was superbly played and made the usual delightful impression.

The soloist was the new cornet master, Fernandez Arbos, who made his first appearance last evening. His interpretation of the familiar Mendelssohn concerto was without affectation, clean cut and at times most brilliant.

The finale has been given her by some other artists with more virtuosity and brilliancy than was the case last evening, but as a whole the performance was highly artistic and worthy of much commendation.

The programme of the third rehearsal and concert will include Goldmark's popular “Sakuntala” overture, Schumann's fourth symphony, and a symphonic legend, “The Enchanted Forest,” by D'Indy. Mme. Gadski will sing numbers by Mozart and Massenet.

BOSTON TIMES

Oct 24-03

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give its usual series of five concerts in the Brooklyn (N. Y.) Academy of Music. The dates are: Nov. 16, Dec. 11, Jan. 15, Feb. 15 and March 18.

BOSTON POST.

MONDAY.

OCTOBER 26, 1903

RALPH SMALLEY HONORED

Somerville 'Cellist Engaged by Boston Symphony Orchestra

SOMERVILLE, Oct. 25.—Ralph Smalley, the violoncellist, has been engaged as a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He joined the orchestra several weeks ago, and took part in the public performance last Saturday night for the first time.

RALPH SMALLEY,
The Somerville violoncellist, with the Symphony Orchestra.

He is a remarkably talented 'cellist, and his successes are being watched by a host of friends. He was graduated from the Luther V. Bell School in 1893, and the high school in 1897.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, OCT 25, 1903.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The second symphony program introduced the new concert master, Mr E. Fernandez-Arbos, for the first time in this country as a soloist. His selections were Mendelssohn's E minor concerto for violin and the Arbos concert piece “Tango,” a kind of Spanish dance. The other program numbers were Beethoven's C major overture, the forest music from Wagner's “Siegfried” and Glazounoff's fourth symphony, the latter piece and the “Tango” by Mr Arbos being new at these concerts. The debut of Mr Arbos as soloist made the concert of special interest, for he challenged comparison with other violinists heard in the city by playing the familiar Mendelssohn concerto, a graceful, brilliant and sentimental work, in which the solo instrument is so prominent that any lack of skill in the performer is readily detected.

At the outset Mr Arbos showed that a quiet elegance and daintiness of tone marked his execution, and if this tone was not very broad it was, nevertheless, of a resonant quality and pure. All the themes in the first part of the concerto were beautifully delivered, the cadenzas and trills were exquisitely given and accomplished with seeming ease, and the arpeggios were handled with the skill of a master. In the second part the breaks in the melodies were played very smoothly, soloist and orchestra being in perfect accord, and the dashing finale, though a bit lacking in vigor, was a splendid example of rapidity in chord fingering and complicated bowing. In execution Mr Arbos left nothing to be desired, for all the work of the left hand was distinguished by a clarity of tone and deftness of fingers that made his performance highly enjoyable and satisfied his auditors that the new artist was admirably equipped for his labors with the great orchestra.

His own composition, “Tango,” a florid, sprightly bit of dance music, was played with an abandon, verve and technical skill that were delightful. At the close of each number Mr Arbos was greeted with immense applause and recalled innumerable times to the platform.

The Glazounoff symphony has but few of the so-called Russian characteristics, dissonant phrases and cross harmonies, and although the heavier instruments are vigorously employed at times the score is generally free from the harshness usually found in the longer works of the Slav composers of the present day. Many of the themes are given alternately to different instruments in brief solos or duets, suggesting rather too much of repetition, specially in the first movement; but the orchestration is as clever as it is complicated, and the instrumental combinations are very effective and usually harmonious. One peculiar arrangement for the instruments makes the violins play a theme in the upper register, while the basses and brasses furnish a robust staccato background. The third part is rather chaotic in tempo and musical matter, until the key is attained, then the close becomes a rushing finale. The orchestra played the score commendably as a whole, if one may judge from a single hearing of the work. The clarinets and flutes in their figurations were in unison, the horns heard to advantage in their more robust phrases and the heavier instruments intoned the rapid passages smoothly. The symphony is hardly one that will please the general ear, though the admirable performance by the orchestra entitled it to respectful consideration, which it received.

The majestic opening in the Beethoven overture was was given with the proper ceremonious treatment and the joyous finale went with splendid swing and dash. In the wonderful forest music from “Siegfried” the orchestra played with its usual spirit and nicety in shades of expression, the familiar excerpt being received with great favor.

This week's program will have Mme Gadski as soloist. She will sing an aria from Mozart's “Il Re Pastore” and an excerpt from Massenet's opera “The Cid.” The other selections will be the overture from Goldmark's “Sakuntala”; “The Enchanted Forest,” a symphonic poem by D'Indy, and Schumann's fourth symphony.

—The second Symphony rehearsal drew a very large audience to Symphony hall, and Mr E. Fernandez-Arbos, who has taken Mr Kneisel's place as concert-master, was cordially welcomed and rapturously applauded after playing the solo part in a concerto by Mendelssohn, and also after playing in something of his own composition. Mr Arbos was called out again and again, and the audience was evidently well pleased. Among the distinguished attendants were Mr and Mrs Forbes Robertson (Gertrude Elliot), who are playing an engagement at the Hollis-st theatre. Mrs Robertson was unassumingly gowned in a dark cloth costume and black hat. Some others there were Mrs Richard Cary, Miss Cary, Mrs Lester Leland, Miss Edith Stackpole, Miss Marian Peabody, Mrs Charles Head, Miss Head, Mrs Curtis Guild Jr, Mrs William P. Fay, Mr and Mrs Eben D. Jordan, Mrs E. C. Swift, Mrs Seth Sprague, Miss Hooper, Mrs Montgomery Sears, Miss Susie Howe, Dr Hay, Mrs Hall Curtis, Mrs Philip Wheatland, Miss Katherine Foote, Mrs Gericke, Mrs Shattuck, Miss Rosamund Saltonstall, Mrs James H. Beal and Mrs William P. Fay. Mme Gadski will be the soloist at the next concert.

BOSTON SUNDAY JOURNAL—OCTOBER 25, 1903.

ARBOS ESTABLISHED IN HIGH POSITION

Solo Performance at Symphony Concert Splendid One.

“TANGO” HEARD FIRST TIME

Artist's Own Composition Proves Diverting and Full of Abandon in Expression.

Mr. Arbos, by his solo performances at the second symphony, placed himself at once in the caste of true and high artist. In spite of all the ardor, chivalry, passion and abandon of the Spanish nature, there is always in it a fundamental element of gravity. One feels that the mendicant is somehow akin to the hidalgo and wears his torn cap and rags as he might carry a plumed hat and cloak, and even when Don Quixote most moves our laughter or our pity, we recognize regardfully his inherent dignity.

Mr. Arbos lacked neither poetry, vitality nor warmth in the Mendelssohn concerto, of which his playing was elegant, wholesome, symmetrical and well-colored; but still, if one were to characterize it briefly, it would be to consider it as rather reflective and restful in its general temper.

There was none of the half pathetic languor of Camilla Urso, nor yet of that most intemperate rush and outcry of De Seve. The opening allegro glowed with the lambent light of a happy content that might well range with the pleasing, bland melancholy of Jacques, which indeed it might have served to illustrate, while the finale rejoiced lightsomely with a spirit of such fairy frolic, as breathes life into so many of the “Midsummer Night's Dream” scenes, only intensified and enforced by a man's energy and activity. It was a rendering that appealed alike to intellecet, fancy and taste and contented all.

“Tango” for First Time.

Mr. Arbos' own “Tango” concert dance now heard in public for the first time was diverting and animating, but seemed rather a ballabile to dance with then by, marking rather say spirits than regular steps and figures. Being of a light and lively nature, rising to eager and active exhilaration as it proceeds toward its climax, it gave more opportunity for virtuosity in technique and abandon in expression. But while that virtuosity was ample, easy and affluent, it was always as the means to an end, and not displayed for itself alone, and behind the abandon there was always a light sense of reserve to qualify and dignify it.

The definite impression derived then from the hearing of his two numbers confirmed Mr. Arbos as an artist whose mastery of his instrument is complete in strength and fulness—for his tone is large and rich—as well as in facility of execution, variety of color and finesse of detail, whose mind is clear, whose judgment sound, and whose sentiment is honest, delicate and persuasive. A single debut only serves to fix a few gauge-points, however, and one must wait for the advance of the season to draw all the outline and fill the whole body of his disposition, ability and artistry, from which much good will be expected.

Beethoven Overture.

The Beethoven overture, broad, stately and strong at first, and then nobly gay and festive, began the evening well, and the ever-delightful pictorial poetry of Weber's “Waldweben” made a refreshing interlude.

The Glazounoff fourth symphony, new to Boston, shows in its idealism and in the limning thereof in orchestral colors that known sympathy of its author for the romantic, the legendary and the mysterious, and hinted at the predilection which he still preserves for the ballet—the real ballet, with its continuous story, its definite personages, its truthful, pantomimic action and its constant blending of the poetry of motion with that of sound. It has but three movements, and in their subdivisions the andante seems to be both the favorite and the prevailing tempo.

The tones are sometimes languorously sentimental, or again dreamy and lulling; but they are always romantic and winning. The scherzo of the second movement, which leaves the quieter tonality of the first movement, centering closely about the grave tranquility of E flat, and passes at once into the vigorous vitality of B flat, is full of hearty happiness told in phrases that ring and roll as with merry cordial laughter. It thus brings a strong contrast, but is not too antiphanic in sentiment or shape.

Suave Amatory Theme.

The last movement opens with a suave amatory theme, but as the treatment enlarges with episodes for trumpets and strong wood winds, and assertive though not vehement contrapuntal elaboration, it becomes emphatic and almost declamatory. The instrumentation becomes richer and more diversified, and the variety of thematic treatment is more insisted upon. It justifies the composer's place as eminent among Russian professors of orchestration; but it is neither pedantic, tedious nor heavy, although scholarly, authoritative and forcible.

The orchestra did excellently by the work, which made so favorable an impression that the mass of the audience would evidently enjoy a repetition while it is still bright in mind.

The next program does not offer novelties, but it holds out the pleasing promise of arias from Mozart and Massenet, to be sung by Mme. Gadski.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Oct 26-03.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Overture in C major, op. 115.....Beethoven
Concerto for violin in E minor, op. 64.....
..... Mendelssohn
Mr. Arbos, violinist.
“Walderweben,” from “Siegfried”.....Wagner
“Tango,” Morceau de Concert op. 6, No. 3
(First performance) .....E. F. Arbos
Mr. Arbos, violinist.
Symphony No. 4, in E flat, op. 48.....Glazounoff

A programme full of interest and of novelty. But it began rather tamely. Beethoven's C major overture may have been a picture of a festivity in the early years of the 19th century, but it by no means thrills the modern pulses. It received a sedate and conservative reading, as befitted its Sir Charles Grandison style.

Why Mr. Arbos should have chosen Mendelssohn's violin concerto as his visiting card is difficult to understand. There are many violinists who can play this work well, and it is not a revelation of high muscianship to achieve a flawless interpretation of it. Even the Bruch G minor concerto would have given as much of technique and revealed more of individuality and of expression. When Mr. Kneisel, 18 years ago (less one week) presented his credentials, he played Beethoven's great concerto,—a crucial test.

Mr. Arbos played the Mendelssohn work very finely, if a trifle nervous in the first movement. The interpretation of the slow movement was very delicate and refined. Of course the intonation was always perfect and there was no blurring, although the finale was taken at a break-neck speed. The cadenza of the first allegro, oddly placed by the composer in the middle of the movement, was also perfect. Much applause followed the performance and Mr. Arbos was recalled three times. Yet the work was not a convincing one to the reviewer and the points of technique, even, were not of sufficiently exacting character whereby to judge a virtuoso.

These, however, came later in a composition by Mr. Arbos himself. In the Tango Mr. Arbos' foot was upon his native heath (if there are any heaths in Spain) and he displayed a most brilliant virtuosity. The work itself was but a popular trifle, with variations of a theme in an easily-grasped manner, but the tricks of execution which garnished it made it piquant enough. There were harmonics galore, and double stopping; pizzicato effects and combinations of pizzicato and arco (bow); skips, runs, chords and G string display. In short, Mr. Arbos in this composition showed that he is a virtuoso of high rank. He reminded one of Sarasate in this school of execution.

The gem of the programme was Wagner's “Waldesweben”. One can enjoy this fully as well in Symphony Hall as in Boston Theatre. On the operatic stage one has several adjuncts that draw the mind away from the glorious music. There is a bird that will not fly, a dragon with a face like an apothecary shop-window on a dark night, Siegfried piping on a reed which often speaks in the orchestra a few seconds after he blows, and a canvass forest that does not help the mental picture in any degree. Here we are spared these handicaps and have besides, an orchestra such as one does not hear in American Wagner performances in any opera house. The interpretation was altogether beautiful, the manifold voices of the strings being well-balanced and the intricate score being made as clear as it ever can be.

Glazounoff's fourth symphony has a fault that leans very far over to Virtue's side. It is too melodic! ! It opens with two chords, in the style of Beethoven's Heroic symphony, but this preamble leads to a Russian pastorale rather than to anything sterner. The chief theme is lyrical and gentle, after the manner of a subordinate theme, and, as a consequence, the themes of the first movement lack contrast. The development is rather confused, but exposition and recapitulation are very sweet and so clear that the movement ought to become popular at once.

The Scherzo is a melodic gem, and here the tuneful character can only be regarded as a merit. There are carollings and pipings in great profusion and even a drone bass adds to the pastoral character. The composer displays a great affection for the woodwind (all the Russians seem masters of this department of the orchestra) and he gives a chord accompaniment of wind instruments that is novel and effective. There is a strongly rhythmic undertone that saves the movement from becoming too effeminate. The trio is, however, as saccharine as a Mendelssohn Song without Words, and the muted strings carry on a most tuneful theme.

In the finale the composer uses a slow introduction (he omits a slow movement, altogether) and then plunges into the most complicated counterpoint, as if to make up for the prettiness of the first two movements. There is more than a suggestion of Tschaikowsky in this movement, and a waltz-like theme accentuates the resemblance, for Tschaikowsky and Berlioz are the only two great composers who have used the waltz in a symphony. There was some beautiful oboe playing in this finale, but the horns were not as secure as usual.

The symphony is short, melodious, popular, and should not be shelved. It would be well to hear it again, if only to prove that there are a few composers living who still write tunes.

Louis C. Elson.

[32]

THE SUNDAY HERALD—BOSTON, OCTOBER 25, 1903.

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Glazounoff's Fourth Symphony a Novelty for Boston.

Mr. Arbos, the Concert Master, Makes His First Appearance as a Violinist, Playing "Tango" One of His Own Compositions—A Glance Backward.

The programme of the second concert of the Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, given last evening in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

Overture in C major, op 115.....Beethoven
Concerto for violin.....Mendelssohn
"Waldweben," from "Siegfried".....Wagner
"Tango," concert piece for violin.....Arbos
(First performance.)
Symphony No. 4, in E-flat major....Glazounoff
(First time.)

Beethoven's overture, which is seldom played, was composed, some say, for the "name-day" of the Emperor Francis II. As Beethoven was a violent republican in his political views, he could hardly have approached the task save in a perfunctory spirit. Others say that the overture was the result of sketches which found fuller and nobler expression in the finale of the ninth symphony. Whether the work was "occasional" or one intended for all time, it is merely a piece in the complete works of Beethoven, and few true amateurs of music or books sigh for the complete works of any largely productive composer or author. To roll the eyes and to stammer in praise over each page signed by Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, Wagner, Tschaikowsky is rank fetishism. Homer did more than nod occasionally; he slept profoundly.

It is a good thing to hear now and then an inferior work by a great man, for the hearer is reminded that even the great man was mortal. Played last night with the utmost care, the overture seemed hopelessly antiquated and boresome.

Glazounoff's symphony No. 4, composed in 1893, and performed in several cities of Germany, as well as of Russia, was played for the first time in Boston. The composer is now in his 39th year, and his life as a teacher and conductor has been a busy one of late, yet he has written seven symphonies, symphonic poems of large dimensions, many other orchestral pieces, ballets for the opera house, and he has found time to orchestrate the works of friends and colleagues. He studied under Rimsky-Korsakoff, who has his pedantic as well as his romantic side, and he thereby gained, no doubt, a great technical facility. When he wishes to indulge in contrapuntal hours he does not write as one experimenting. He also has an appreciation of glowing colors; his instrumentation is rich and of brilliance that at times dazzles. This modern Russian instrumentation, by the way, is founded on that of Berlioz and of Liszt. The facility which Glazounoff displays, the fertility of the man, have worked him injury, for many of his compositions are of only superficial brilliance, and his sentiment, too, often is parlor sentimentalism; sentimentalism which, designed for the concert hall, nevertheless smells of the hot and perfumed air of the parlor and exhales the sighs of easily palpitating women.

But this symphony in E flat is much more interesting than some of the music of Glazounoff that has been made known to us. It is not so striking a work as the sixth symphony, but how high it towers above the "Raymonda" suite and the "Solemn" overture in spontaneity, originality and imagination. The symphony is in three movements. The first begins with an introduction in the minor, and the chief theme is of an exotic nature, of oriental suggestion. The themes of the main body of this movement are not of especial distinction, but they are expressive and they are well clothed. Episodes of contrasting character are as a succession of finely colored tone pictures, which are seen only for a moment, and leave a pleasant but somewhat vague recollection, so that the hearer would fain hear each again.

The second movement is a brilliant and fascinating scherzo; it is alive with gayety, and the expression is refined, whereas the themes themselves might easily fall into the commonplace were it not for the piquancy of rhythm and harmonies, and the singular charm of the instrumentation. There is no slow movement. The finale begins, however, with an andante. The finale allegro shows the technical skill of the composer. At a first hearing the movement seemed episodic, and one might fairly wish for a less interrupted flow of musical thought. The themes are for the most part insignificant, but they are elaborated with more than ordinary skill.

With the exception of a few themes, the music of this symphony is not characteristically Russian; it is more the work of a latter-day and thoroughly equipped German, who has given his days and nights to Schumann, and who has studied instrumentation with Rimsky-Korsakoff. There is, it is true, the oriental delight in marked rhythm and gorgeous color, but the musical thought and the harmonic expression are of western lands. There is little or no depth to the music; there is no elemental emotion, no fierce, barbaric passion, no strange fancies are awakened, and no wild, sensuous or gloomy mood is firmly established; but the music often charms, and the workmanship commands respect. The symphony, which was read with due appreciation and played as a virtuoso piece, was well worth producing.

The familiar "Waldweben" gave much pleasure.

There was natural curiosity to hear Mr. Arbos. It was in 1885 (Oct. 31) that Mr. Kneisel played for the first time as a soloist at these concerts. His engagement as first concertmaster had provoked much comment, and the newspapers had published letters of indignant protest; for Mr. Listemann had then many friends who were grieved because he had been removed from the position. Mr. Gericke had brought with him young players from Vienna, and the invasion was considered by the more sensitive as a deliberate attack on American institutions. There were appeals to the patriotic spirit of every Bostonian, nor was any attention paid to the fact that Mr. Listemann was born at Schlotheim, that, as concertmaster, he had breathed the enervating air of a foreign court, and that he himself was an importation. Nevertheless, Mr. Kneisel played the Beethoven concerto, and he was not torn to pieces on the stage, nor was he the next day sawn asunder on the Common; on the contrary, if the contemporaneous newspaper may be believed, he was applauded most enthusiastically. Nor did the orchestra sink into obscurity, as some wisely predicted. Mr. Arbos was not made the subject of such attacks. He was welcomed heartily on his arrival, and again last night when he stepped forward to play. Thus should it ever be.

It may be said of Mr. Arbos that he displayed an agreeable tone and that he played as a rule with taste and true feeling. In the first movement of the concerto he was inclined toward undue haste, and the performance was somewhat nervous. This nervousness was natural and to be expected, and it may well account for certain features of this performance. Mr. Arbos played the other movements with greater self-control, and he often revealed himself as an accomplished violinist. The concerto itself, admirably made as it is, is not a work to call forth the stronger qualities of a great artist. The sentiment is sandpapered, and the passion is that of a Sir Charles Grandison in the presence of ladies. The music is salon music raised to its highest power. But Mr. Arbos played it as a serious musician, not as a sentimentalist, nor as a thoughtless virtuoso. He was heartily applauded after the concerto and after his own "Tango," which is in effect a set of variations on a Spanish or colonial dance tune with introduction and postlude. This piece has a certain piquancy, but it is one better suited to a Promenade than to a Symphony concert, for its intrinsic worth is slight.

HE second Symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon was a crush, for there was a strong desire to hear Mr. Arbos, the new concert master upon his first appearance as a soloist. He was warmly applauded both upon his entrance and after his playing. One could not help noting the strong resemblance of the young violinist to Mr. Gericke, a sort of younger brother indeed. He has the same coloring and figure and wears his beard similarly. It had at first sight really an odd effect, as if Mr. Gericke of 1892 was leading the violins and Mr. Gericke of 1903 the orchestra. Mr. Arbos made a wonderfully good impression, and his modesty was not the least of his charm.

Some of those at the rehearsal were Mrs. Boylston Beal and her sister, Mrs. S. Van Rensselaer Crosby, Mrs. John Fairchild, who was with Mrs. Montgomery Sears, Miss Susan Thayer, Mrs. George C. Lee, Jr., Mrs. Frederick R. Sears, Mrs. Bryce Allan, Mrs. Preston West and her daughter Mrs. Oliver Ames, Mr. and Mrs. Albert F. Bigelow, Mrs. DeFord Bigelow, Mrs. Dudley Fay and Miss Alice Fay, Mrs. T. Adamowski, who had Mr. Forbes Robertson and Miss Gertrude Elliott with her; Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Mrs. Matthew Luce, Mrs. William P. Fay, Mr. and Mrs. Eben Jordan, Miss Barbara Higginson, Miss Minna Lyman, with Miss Mea Bowditch, Miss Edith Stackpole, Mrs. Charles Head and Miss Margaret Head, Miss May Kenney, Mrs. John Lowell, Sr., Miss Mabel Warren, Miss Rosamond Peabody, Miss Abby Manning and her niece, Miss Margaret Manning; Miss Rachel Brooks, Miss Susan Amory, Miss Estelle Kimball, Miss Elizabeth Devens, Miss Dorothy Forbes, Miss Rosamond Saltonstall, Miss Katherine Foote, Mrs. C. W. Barron and her daughter, Miss Jane Waldron; Mrs. John E. Hudson, Mrs. F. L. Emerson and Mrs. George Cushing and her sister, Miss Alice Littleton.

Miss Gertrude Elliott (Mrs. Robertson) attracted much admiring attention. She wore a simple but effective costume of dark-tinted cloth, brightened with red, and a large picture hat. Mrs. Gardner has changed her rehearsal places which she has always had heretofore in the front row of the right balcony to the back seats against the wall, as she says the lights are less trying there. Mme. Gadski will be the soloist this week.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, OCTOBER 26, 1903

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

The second symphony concert, held Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, was made interesting by the first appearance in Boston of the new concert-master, Mr. Arbos, and, in lesser degree, by the first hearing of a new symphony by Glazounoff. This was the programme:

Beethoven: Overture in C major, op. 115.
Mendelssohn: Concerto for Violin in E minor, op. 64.
Wagner: "Waldweben," from "Siegfried."
E. F. Arbos: "Tango." Morceau de Concert, op. 6, No. 3.
(First performance.)
Glazounoff: Symphony No. 4, in E flat, op. 48.
(First time.)

All the world, naturally, was agog to hear Mr. Arbos play. It is unfortunate, therefore, that the new violinist should have appeared for the first time here on an evening when inspiration and enthusiasm were, for the most part, conspicuously lacking. The Beethoven overture in C major, very correctly played, aroused feelings only of wonder that Beethoven, in his later years, should have written so dry and academical a work; also that any conductor, in this year of 1903, should choose to produce it.

It was after this depressing introduction that Mr. Arbos played. Evidently a musician of solid worth and an accomplished violinist, he showed throughout the Mendelssohn concerto an agitation and a disquiet that plainly bespoke painful nervousness. He was more at his ease in his own pretty trifle, the set of Spanish dances called "Tango," but still it would be discourteous to Mr. Arbos to opine that on Saturday he was at his best. One point, however, is from many signs clear: the nervousness that to some extent marred his solo performance in no wise affects Mr. Arbos' manifest ability as concert-master.

Between the two solo pieces came the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried," rather dryly and prosaically played till the end, when the entire orchestra swept up to a magnificent climax.

The main offering of the concert was the first performance in Boston of a symphony, No. 4, by Glazounoff. Although this composer is but thirty-eight or nine years old, he has found time, in the intervals of teaching instrumentation and of conducting symphony concerts, to write seven symphonies, several symphonic poems, long ballets, and other orchestral works. Whatever else may be thought of this symphony No. 4, in E-flat, it by no means savors of labor and of frantic search after ideas, for it is absolutely spontaneous and glows with life. There are only three movements, the necessary contrast, however, being furnished by slow introductions to the first and third movements. While the symphony was constantly a pleasure to hear, from the Oriental richness and the sparkling brilliancy of its orchestration, and the piquancy and the variety of its rhythms, once heard it leaves little impression beyond that of a charming fantasia, in which pretty themes (the first, by the way, sounding as though the composer had borrowed it from Dvorak, after the doctor's researches in America) appear, are tossed about in varying forms, and then disappear. Of the three movements, the gay scherzo, really delightful, seems strongest, although the finale works up to a high point of brilliancy. On the whole, it is the gorgeous raiment rather than the body of the symphony that makes its hearing so well worth while. It is indeed on quite a different level from the first movement of the composer's sixth symphony, played here a few seasons ago. The performance was admirable.

This week Mme. Johanna Gadski purposes singing with the orchestra. This will be the programme: Goldmark, Overture to "Sakuntala"; Mozart, Aria, "Il Re Pastore"; D'Indy, "La Fort Enchantée," Legende-Symphonie (d'après une Ballade de Uhland); Massenet, Aria from "The Cid"; Schumann, Symphony in D Minor, No. 4. R. R. G.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Second Concert—Review by Philip Hale in the Boston Herald.

THE program of the second concert of the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, given last evening in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

Overture in C major, op. 115.....Beethoven
Concerto for Violin.....Mendelssohn
Waldweben, from Siegfried.....Wagner
Tango, concert piece for violin.....Arbos
(First performance.)
Symphony No. 4, in E flat major.....Glazounoff
(First time.)

Beethoven's Overture, which is seldom played, was composed, some say, for the "name day" of the Emperor Francis II. As Beethoven was a violent republican in his political views, he could hardly have approached the task save in a perfunctory spirit. Others say that the overture was the result of sketches which found fuller and nobler expression in the finale of the Ninth Symphony. Whether the work was "occasional" or one intended for all time, it is merely a piece in the complete works of Beethoven, and few true amateurs of music or books sigh for the complete works of any largely productive composer or author. To roll the eyes and to stammer in praise over each page signed by Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, Wagner, Tschaikowsky is rank fetichism. Homer did more than nod occasionally; he slept profoundly.

It is a good thing to hear now and then an inferior work by a great man, for the hearer is reminded that even the great man was mortal. Played last night with the utmost care, the overture seemed hopelessly antiquated and boresome.

Glazounoff's Symphony No. 4, composed in 1893, and performed in several cities of Germany, as well as of Russia, was played for the first time in Boston. The composer is now in his thirty-ninth year, and his life as a teacher and conductor has been a busy one of late, yet he has written seven symphonies, symphonic poems of large dimensions, many other orchestral pieces, ballets for the opera house, and he has found time to orchestrate the works of friends and colleagues. He studied under Rimsky-Korsakoff, who has his pedantic as well as his romantic side, and he thereby gained, no doubt, a great technical facility. When he wishes to indulge in contrapuntal hours he does not write as one experimenting. He also has an appreciation of glowing colors; his instrumentation is rich and of brilliance that at times dazzles. This modern Russian instrumentation, by the way, is founded on that of Berlioz and of Liszt. The facility which Glazounoff displays, the fertility of the man, have worked him injury, for many of his compositions are of only superficial brilliance, and his sentiment, too, often is parlor sentimentalism; sentimentalism which, designed for the concert hall, nevertheless smells of the hot and perfumed air of the parlor and exhales the sighs of easily palpitating women.

But this Symphony in E flat is much more interesting than some of the music of Glazounoff that has been made known to us. It is not so striking a work as the Sixth Symphony, but how high it towers above the "Raymonda" Suite and the "Solemn" Overture in spontaneity, originality and imagination! The symphony is in three movements. The first begins with an introduction in the minor, and the chief theme is of an exotic nature, of Oriental suggestion. The themes of the main body of this movement are hot of especial distinction, but they are expressive and they are well clothed. Episodes of contrasting character are as a succession of finely colored tone pictures, which are seen only for a moment, and leave a pleasant but somewhat vague recollection, so that the hearer would fain hear each again.

The second movement is a brilliant and fascinating scherzo; it is alive with gaiety, and the expression is refined, whereas the themes themselves might easily fall into the commonplace were it not for the piquancy of rhythm and harmonies, and the singular charm of the instrumentation. There is no slow movement. The finale begins, however, with an andante. The finale allegro shows the technical skill of the composer. At a first hearing the movement seemed episodic, and one might fairly wish for a less interrupted flow of musical thought. The themes are for the most part insignificant, but they are elaborated with more than ordinary skill.

With the exception of a few themes, the music of this symphony is not characteristically Russian; it is more the work of a latter day and thoroughly equipped German, who has given his days and nights to Schumann, and who has studied instrumentation with Rimsky-Korsakoff. There is, it is true, the Oriental delight in marked rhythm and gorgeous color, but the musical thought and the harmonic expression are of western lands. There is little or no depth to the music; there is no elemental emotion, no fierce, barbaric passion, no strange fancies are awakened, and no wild, sensuous or gloomy mood is firmly established; but the music often charms, and the workmanship commands respect. The symphony, which was read with due appreciation and played as a virtuoso piece, was well worth producing.

The familiar "Waldweben" gave much pleasure.

There was natural curiosity to hear Mr. Arbos. It was in 1885 (October 31) that Mr. Kneisel played for the first time as a soloist at these concerts. His engagement as first concertmaster had provoked much comment, and the newspapers had published letters of indignant protest; for Mr. Listemann had then many friends who were grieved because he had been removed from the position. Mr. Gericke had brought with him young players from Vienna, and the invasion was considered by the more sensitive as a deliberate attack on American institutions. There were appeals to the patriotic spirit of every Bostonian, nor was any attention paid to the fact that Mr. Listemann was born at Schlotheim, that, as concertmaster, he had breathed the enervating air of a foreign court, and that he himself was an importation. Nevertheless, Mr. Kneisel played the Beethoven concerto, and he was not torn to pieces on the stage, nor was he the next day sawn asunder on the Common; on the contrary, if the contemporaneous newspaper may be believed, he was applauded most enthusiastically. Nor did the orchestra sink into obscurtiy, as some wisely predicted. Mr. Arbos was not made the subject of such attacks. He was welcomed heartily on his arrival, and again last night when he stepped forward to play. Thus should it ever be.

It may be said of Mr. Arbos that he displayed an agreeable tone and that he played as a rule with taste and true feeling. In the first movement of the concerto he was inclined toward undue haste, and the performance was somewhat nervous. This nervousness was natural and to be expected, and it may well account for certain features of this performance. Mr. Arbos played the other movements with greater self control, and he often revealed himself as an accomplished violinist. The concerto itself, admirably made as it is, is not a work to call forth the stronger qualities of a great artist. The sentiment is sandpapered, and the passion is that of a Sir Charles Grandison in the presence of ladies. The music is salon music raised to its highest power. But Mr. Arbos played it as a serious musician, not as a sentimentalist, nor as a thoughtless virtuoso. He was heartily applauded after the concerto and after his own "Tango," which is in effect a set of variations on a Spanish or Colonial dance tune with introduction and postlude. This piece has a certain piquancy, but it is one better suited to a promenade than to a Symphony concert, for its intrinsic worth is slight.

Under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute and the Brooklyn Philharmonic the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first visit to Brooklyn this season, Friday evening, November 6.

PHILADELPHIA, Pa., October 26, 1903.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its season in this city on Monday, November 2, which will be its 112th concert in this city. An attractive program has been prepared for the occasion. The symphony will be Glazounow's No. 4, in E flat, a work which has not yet been performed in this city. The other orchestral numbers for the concert will be the "Euryanthe" overture of Weber, and an "Entr'acte Symphonique" from Bruneau's "Messidor," which is also new here. Harold Bauer, the pianist, is to be the soloist, and he will play Tschaikowsky's great piano concerto in B flat minor, op. 23, one of the most effective and oppressive things ever written for the piano. On Wednesday evening, November 4, the orchestra will give its first concert in the second series, the season being divided into two series, Monday and Wednesday night concerts.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CXIV., NO. 122.
FRIDAY, OCT. 30, 1903.

GADSKI TO SING AT THE SYMPHONY

Aria from "Der Freischuetz" and Two Schubert Songs Her Choice for Today.

ORCHESTRA PLAYS D'INDY'S BALLAD.

"The Enchanted Forest" to Be Heard First Time in Boston—Felix Mottl Arrives in New York.

The solo singer at the third public rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra this afternoon and at the concert tomorrow night will be Mme. Johanna Gadski. It will be her second appearance at these concerts. Her first was on Oct. 29, 1898, when she sang in German "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster!" from "Oberon," and Elisabeth's Greeting from "Tannhaeuser." She will not sing today the arias announced, viz.: One from Mozart's "Il Re Pastore," which Melba sang some years ago, and "Pleurez, Mes, Yeux," from Massenet's "Cid," which Emma Eames sang here at a Symphony concert in 1893. After Mme. Gadski's arrival in New York Wednesday she spent some time in weighing the comparative advantages of this aria and that one, and yesterday she finally decided to sing Agathe's familiar recitative and aria from "Der Freischuetz," and two songs by Schubert: "Gretchen at the Spinning Wheel" and "The Erlking."

Mme. Gadski, born at Auklam in Pomerania, June 15, 1872, studied at Stettin and made her first operatic appearance at Kroll's, Berlin, in May, 1891, as Pamina in the "Magic Flute." In 1894 she became a member of the Bremen opera company. Her first appearance in Boston was as Elsa, April 2, 1895, when she was a member of the Damrosch German opera company. She married in 1892 Mr. Hans Tauscher, who was then an army officer.

The orchestral pieces will be Goldmark's well known "Sakuntala" overture, Vincent d'Indy's "The Enchanted Forest" and Schumann's romantic symphony in D minor, which was a favorite with Mr. Nikisch. D'Indy's "Enchanted Forest," op. 8, will be performed in Boston for the first time, yet it is an early work of this talented and fastidious composer. It was written in 1878 and it was played for the first time at a "Concert Populaire," conducted by Pasdeloup at Paris March 24 of that year. The music, a legendary ballad for orchestra, is in illustration of Uhland's ballad, "Harald," which he wrote for a drama, "Tamlan and Jane." The drama, founded on an old Scotch ballad—it is in many collections, as in Scott's "Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border"—was never completed; the poem was published in 1813. Harald and his knights ride through the forest. The knights are pelted with roses by elves; they are wooed and caressed, then dragged from their horses, and borne away to Fairyland. Harald's armor of steel protects him from the blandishments and wiles of the elves, but, lonely, he wanders and at last drinks of a spring and falls asleep. He is still sleeping, and around him, as he sits, gray-haired and gray-bearded, the elves by moonlight circle slowly about him; but when the storm roars, he stirs uneasily and reaches for his sword.

D'Indy wrote this music when, a pupil of Cesar Franck, he was a warm admirer of the German romantic school. He made pilgrimages to Weimar, Beyreuth, and even to Vienna, where he hoped to see Brahms, and not finding him he tracked him to his lair at Tutzing, where Brahms was anything but amiable. The Ballade has been played in Chicago by Mr. Thomas' orchestra.

The soloist at the Symphony concerts a fortnight from today and tomorrow will be Miss Adele aus der Ohe, who will play a piano concerto by H. H. Huss of New York. There are few distinguished virtuosos who are willing to play a wholly unfamiliar work, especially when it is by an American. Teresa Carreno has played MacDowell's second concerto in Europe as well as in this country, but the virtuoso as a rule prefers to do with a sure applause-winner. And after all, even a virtuoso may in certain respects be human.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Second Concert—Review by Philip Hale in the Boston Herald.

THE program of the second concert of the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, given last evening in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

Overture in C major, op. 115.....Beethoven
Concerto for Violin.....Mendelssohn
Waldweben, from Siegfried.....Wagner
Tango, concert piece for violin.....Arbos
(First performance.)
Symphony No. 4, in E flat major.....Glazounoff
(First time.)

Beethoven's Overture, which is seldom played, was composed, some say, for the "name day" of the Emperor Francis II. As Beethoven was a violent republican in his political views, he could hardly have approached the task save in a perfunctory spirit. Others say that the overture was the result of sketches which found fuller and nobler expression in the finale of the Ninth Symphony. Whether the work was "occasional" or one intended for all time, it is merely a piece in the complete works of Beethoven, and few true amateurs of music or books sigh for the complete works of any largely productive composer or author. To roll the eyes and to stammer in praise over each page signed by Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, Wagner, Tschaikowsky is rank fetichism. Homer did more than nod occasionally; he slept profoundly.

It is a good thing to hear now and then an inferior work by a great man, for the hearer is reminded that even the great man was mortal. Played last night with the utmost care, the overture seemed hopelessly antiquated and boresome.

Glazounoff's Symphony No. 4, composed in 1893, and performed in several cities of Germany, as well as of Russia, was played for the first time in Boston. The composer is now in his thirty-ninth year, and his life as a teacher and conductor has been a busy one of late, yet he has written seven symphonies, symphonic poems of large dimensions, many other orchestral pieces, ballets for the opera house, and he has found time to orchestrate the works of friends and colleagues. He studied under Rimsky-Korsakoff, who has his pedantic as well as his romantic side, and he thereby gained, no doubt, a great technical facility. When he wishes to indulge in contrapuntal hours he does not write as one experimenting. He also has an appreciation of glowing colors; his instrumentation is rich and of brilliance that at times dazzles. This modern Russian instrumentation, by the way, is founded on that of Berlioz and of Liszt. The facility which Glazounoff displays, the fertility of the man, have worked him injury, for many of his compositions are of only superficial brilliancy, and his sentiment, too, often is parlor sentimentalism, sentimentalism which, designed for the concert hall, nevertheless smells of the hot and perfumed air of the parlor and echoes the sighs of easily palpitating women.

But this Symphony in E flat is much more interesting than some of the music of Glazounoff that has been made known to us. It is not so striking a work as the Sixth Symphony, but how high it towers above the "Karelia" Suite and the "Solemn" Overture in spontaneity, originality and imagination! The symphony is in three movements. The first begins with an introduction in the minor, and the chief theme is of an exotic nature, of Oriental suggestion. The themes of the main body of this movement are not of especial distinction, but they are expressive and they are well clothed. Episodes of contrasting character are as a succession of finely colored tone pictures, which are seen only for a moment, and leave a pleasant but somewhat vague recollection, so that the hearer would fain hear each again.

The second movement is a brilliant and fascinating scherzo; it is alive with gaiety, and the expression is refined, whereas the themes themselves might easily fall into the commonplace were it not for the poignancy of rhythm and harmonies, and the singular charm of the instrumentation. There is no slow movement. The finale begins, however, with an andante. The finale allegro shows the technical skill of the composer. At a first hearing the movement seemed episodic, and one might fairly wish for a less interrupted flow of musical thought. The themes are for the most part insignificant, but they are elaborated with more than ordinary skill.

With the exception of a few themes, the music of this symphony is not characteristically Russian; it is more the work of a latter day and thoroughly equipped German, who has given his days and nights to Schumann, and who has studied instrumentation with Rimsky-Korsakoff. There is, it is true, the Oriental delight in marked rhythm and gorgeous color, but the musical thought and the harmonic expression are of western lands. There is little or no depth to the music; there is no elemental emotion, no fierce, barbaric passion, no strange fancies are awakened, and no wild, sensuous or gloomy mood is firmly established; but the music often charms, and the workmanship commands respect. The symphony, which was read with due appreciation and played as a virtuoso piece, was well worth producing.

The familiar "Waldweben" gave much pleasure.

There was natural curiosity to hear Mr. Arbos. It was in 1885 (October 31) that Mr. Kneisel played for the first time as a soloist at these concerts. His engagement as first concertmaster had provoked much comment, and the newspapers had published letters of indignant protest; for Mr. Listemann had then many friends who were grieved because he had been removed from the position. Mr. Gericke had brought with him young players from Vienna, and the invasion was considered by the more sensitive as a deliberate attack on American institutions. There were appeals to the patriotic spirit of every Bostonian, nor was any attention paid to the fact that Mr. Listemann was born at Schlotheim, that, as concertmaster, he had breathed the enervating air of a foreign court, and that he himself was an importation. Nevertheless, Mr. Kneisel played the Beethoven concerto, and he was not torn to pieces on the stage, nor was he the next day sawn asunder on the Common; on the contrary, if the contemporaneous newspaper may be believed, he was applauded most enthusiastically. Nor did the orchestra sink into obscurtiy, as some wisely predicted. Mr. Arbos was not made the subject of such attacks. He was welcomed heartily on his arrival, and again last night when he stepped forward to play. Thus should it ever be.

It may be said of Mr. Arbos that he displayed an agreeable tone and that he played as a rule with taste and true feeling. In the first movement of the concerto he was inclined toward undue haste, and the performance was somewhat nervous. This nervousness was natural and to be expected, and it may well account for certain features of this performance. Mr. Arbos played the other movements with greater self control, and he often revealed himself as an accomplished violinist. The concerto itself, admirably made as it is, is not a work to call forth the stronger qualities of a great artist. The sentiment is sandpapered, and the passion is that of a Sir Charles Grandison in the presence of ladies. The music is salon music raised to its highest power. But Mr. Arbos played it as a serious musician, not as a sentimentalist, nor as a thoughtless virtuoso. He was heartily applauded after the concerto and after his own "Tango," which is in effect a set of variations on a Spanish or Colonial dance tune with introduction and postlude. This piece has a certain piquancy, but it is one better suited to a promenade than to a Symphony concert, for its intrinsic worth is slight.

Under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute and the Brooklyn Philharmonic the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first visit to Brooklyn this season, Friday evening, November 6.

PHILADELPHIA, Pa., October 29, 1903.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its season in this city on Monday, November 2, which will be its 112th concert in this city. An attractive program has been prepared for the occasion. The symphony will be Glazounow's No. 4, in E flat, a work which has not yet been performed in this city. The other orchestral numbers for the concert will be the "Euryanthe" overture of Weber, and an "Entr'acte Symphonique" from Bruneau's "Messidor," which is also new here. Harold Bauer, the pianist, is to be the soloist, and he will play Tschaikowsky's great piano concerto in B flat minor, op. 23, one of the most effective and oppressive things ever written for the piano. On Wednesday evening, November 4, the orchestra will give its first concert in the second series, the season being divided into two series, Monday and Wednesday night concerts.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CXIV., NO. 122.
FRIDAY, OCT. 30, 1903.

GADSKI TO SING AT THE SYMPHONY

Aria from "Der Freischuetz" and Two Schubert Songs Her Choice for Today.

ORCHESTRA PLAYS D'INDY'S BALLAD.

"The Enchanted Forest" to Be Heard First Time in Boston—Felix Mottl Arrives in New York.

The solo singer at the third public rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra this afternoon and at the concert tomorrow night will be Mme. Johanna Gadski. It will be her second appearance at these concerts. Her first was on Oct. 29, 1898, when she sang in German "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster!" from "Oberon," and Elisabeth's Greeting from "Tannhaeuser." She will not sing today the arias announced, viz.: One from Mozart's "Il Re Pastore," which Melba sang some years ago, and "Pleurez, Mes, Yeux," from Massenet's "Cid," which Emma Eames sang here at a Symphony concert in 1893. After Mme. Gadski's arrival in New York Wednesday she spent some time in weighing the comparative advantages of this aria and that one, and yesterday she finally decided to sing Agathe's familiar recitative and aria from "Der Freischuetz," and two songs by Schubert: "Gretchen at the Spinning Wheel" and "The Erlking."

Mme. Gadski, born at Auklam in Pomerania, June 15, 1872, studied at Stettin and made her first operatic appearance at Kroll's, Berlin, in May, 1891, as Pamina in the "Magic Flute." In 1894 she became a member of the Bremen opera company. Her first appearance in Boston was as Elsa, April 2, 1895, when she was a member of the Damrosch German opera company. She married in 1892 Mr. Hans Tauscher, who was then an army officer.

The orchestral pieces will be Goldmark's well known "Sakuntala" overture, Vincent d'Indy's "The Enchanted Forest" and Schumann's romantic symphony in D minor, which was a favorite with Mr. Nikisch. D'Indy's "Enchanted Forest," op. 8, will be performed in Boston for the first time, yet it is an early work of this talented and fastidious composer. It was written in 1878 and it was played for the first time at a "Concert Populaire," conducted by Pasdeloup at Paris March 24 of that year. The music, a legendary ballad for orchestra, is in illustration of Uhland's ballad, "Harald," which he wrote for a drama, "Tamlan und Jane." The drama, founded on an old Scotch ballad—it is in many collections, as in Scott's "Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border"—was never completed; the poem was published in 1813. Harald and his knights ride through the forest. The knights are pelted with roses by elves; they are wooed and caressed, then dragged from their horses, and borne away to Fairyland. Harald's armor of steel protects him from the blandishments and wiles of the elves, but, lonely, he wanders and at last drinks of a spring and falls asleep. He is still sleeping, and around him, as he sits, gray-haired and gray-bearded, the elves by moonlight circle slowly about him; but when the storm roars, he stirs uneasily and reaches for his sword.

D'Indy wrote this music when, a pupil of Cesar Franck, he was a warm admirer of the German romantic school. He made pilgrimages to Weimar, Beyreuth, and even to Vienna, where he hoped to see Brahms, and not finding him he tracked him to his lair at Tutzing, where Brahms was anything but amiable. The Ballade has been played in Chicago by Mr. Thomas' orchestra.

The soloist at the Symphony concerts a fortnight from today and tomorrow will be Miss Adele aus der Ohe, who will play a piano concerto by H. H. Huss of New York. There are few distinguished virtuosos who are willing to play a wholly unfamiliar work, especially when it is by an American. Teresa Carreno has played MacDowell's second concerto in Europe as well as in this country, but the virtuoso as a rule prefers to do with a sure applause-winner. And after all, even a virtuoso may in certain respects be human.

SUNDAY JOURNAL,
NOVEMBER 1, 1903.

TONE POEM GIVEN BY SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

D'Indy's Illustration of Uhland's Fairy Ballad Is Novelty Produced With Acceptance at Third Concert of Season, and Madame Gadski Sings.

That odd little story of Edward Everett Hale's, "How Mr. Fry Would Have Preached It," would come to mind while Mr. Gericke's men were playing the novelty of last night's concert. How would Richard Strauss have treated that Upland ballad, "The Tnchanted Wood," of which Vincent d'Indy's illustration was then on hearing? Yet there was no fault to find with this musical poem. D'Indy has surely as fomantic a strain in him as Strauss, though he cannot be so strong or heroic, and he has a deeper founded of love for old fantasies and for the picturesque, the wild and the enchanting in nature. And one thought again, how might the two men possibly have collaborated, as the Flemish painters did when one put the figures into another's landscape or Rachel Ruysch surrounded with her matchless flowers a head limned by a great portraitist. How if D'Indy has made the music for the murmuring forest, the gurgling streams, the amorous fairy fascinations and that enchanted sleep whose peace was only broken by dreams of war, while Strauss had depicted the march of the bold knights, their songs of battle, and their contest with tamptations?

Yet D'Indy's poem was delightful, befitting and persuasive. Such a simple story! The forest rustles in the band's hushed wood winds and shimmering violins, while the muted horns hint of the distant approach of the bold Harald and his men. "Louder and louder the war horns ring," the hoof beats hurry and rattle, and the troop is already drawing by, when lighter figures and instrumentation come alluringly with sweeter songs and the touch of harps. The elfin maidens surround the knights with beauty and blandishment; the martial thoughts and sounds melt away, and with a recurrence of the braver moods Harald rides on alone. His momentary outburst of new courage and determination dies down, and again the orchestra's softer voices suggest the tranquillizing influence of the fairy spring and his sinking into the endless slumber with the bands of elves ringing him about.

Gracious to the Ear.

It was delicate music, crossed occasionally by larger strains, and while it asked no serious consideration or academic analysis, it was gracious to the ear, suggestive to the fancy and commendable for accomplishing just what it set out to do. From the very beginning it less implied vigor, self-assertion and resistance than languor, dalliance, charm and compliance. One had little need to read the ballad to feel that music was full of spells, present and to come.

The orchestra played the poem in the right spirit as they also did the "Sakuntala" overture, in which the strings and the middle wood wind were notably rich and accordant. The symphony, Schumann's fourth, that in D minor, was also well handled according to Schumann's work for a connected rendering, only a momentary and half involuntary suspension at the end of the first movement making any check in its progress. The lovely romance gave a brief chance for observing in the entrance of its theme the full and satisfying tone of the new first 'cello.

Mme. Gadski.

It is not wise for artists who have to come hither over seas to make their appearance follow too closely upon their debarkation. Mme. Gadski, who had wavered as to her choice of numbers, finally settled down upon Agatha's scene from "Der Freischutz" and two Schubert songs, "Margaret at Her Spinning" and "The Erl King." Her singing was, as always, correct and sincere, but it lacked in ease and elegance. Both Margaret and Agatha are but young women, "as yet unsifted in the perilous matters" of life; their passions are poignant, but not narrow. But Mme. Gadski's weight of emphasis made them appear elder and more experienced than they were, and the executive passages in the Weber scene had more honest effort than elasticity. The "Erl King" was something too hard and declamatory in its narrative stanzas, and the last two words were—as is too often the case—assertive, rather than thrilling; but the goblin's lines were beautifully true. Mme. Gadski was most cordially received, but she won less than her usual and anticipated applause after her numbers.

This being the orchestra's absent week there will be no rehearsal and concert until Nov. 13 and 14, when Miss Ausder Ohe will play.

BOSTON COURIER,
OCTOBER 31, 1903.

——Society had a splendid representation at the Symphony rehearsal on Friday, when Mme. Gadski was the soloist. The great singer was in excellent voice, and created a most favorable impression. She was looking particularly well in a trailing gown of black, trimmed with richest ecru lace in fischu effect, and wore a black picture hat with plumes, having roses tucked under the brim. Among those so fortunate as to be present were Mrs. Bryce J. Allan, who was in black cloth, the coat opening to display a white lace bodice,—and a flat hat of white and blue. She wore a slender gold chain, studded with turquoise. Miss Rosamond Saltonstall was in navy blue voile, with yoke of white lace, and a large black hat with plumes. Her sister, Mrs. Neal Rantoul, was similarly attired. Miss Mary Vaughn wore a chic tailor gown of gray cloth, and bright red hat, and Miss Rosamond Allen was in brown cloth with a purple hat. Miss Aubrey Stanwood also donned a purple hat, with a cloth tailor suit worn over a white bodice. Others present were Miss Katherine Foote, Miss Elizabeth Devens, Mrs. Frederick R. Comee, Mrs. F. L. Higginson, Miss Barbara Higginson, Mrs. Hall Curtis, Miss Estelle Kimball, Mrs. William P. Fay, Miss Katherine Fay, Mrs. J. W. Kenney and her daughter, Miss May Kenney, Mrs. Oliver Ames with her mother, Mrs. West, Mrs. J. Montgomery Sears, Mrs. Thomas Thacher, Miss Mabel Bayard Warren, Mrs. Dudley Fay and Miss Alice Fay, Mrs. John Osborn, Miss Jane Waldron, Mrs. J. J. Storrow, Miss Bessie Tower, Miss Gertrude Edmunds, Miss Susie Howe and her mother, Mrs. John Lowell, Sr., Miss Priscilla Stackpole (one of this season's debutantes) in brown, Mrs. George Littleton, Miss Margaret Manning, Miss Clara Shattuck, Mrs. Edwin P. Stone, Miss Ethel Stone, Miss Hannah Stevenson, Miss Anna Thayer, Col. Stevenson, Mrs. James Jackson, Mrs. Krassel, the Misses Laurence, and Mr. Tauscher, Mme. Gadski's husband, whose devotion to his wife's great talent it is a pleasure to witness.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, NOV 1, 1903.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Mme Gadski, the soloist at the third symphony rehearsal and concert, made a change in her program as originally announced, and instead of selections from Mozart and Massenet, sang a recitative and aria from Weber's "Der Freischutz," with orchestra, and Schubert's "Gretchen am Spinnvade" and "Erlkonig," Mr Max Zach playing the Schubert accompaniments. The orchestra played D'Indy's legend, "The Enchanted Forest," first time at these concerts; the overture to Goldmark's "Sakuntald" and Schumann's fourth symphony. Mme Gadski's contributions were delightful examples of that great singer's art, which has steadily developed during the past eight seasons of opera and concert work, and she returned to the city in which she has gained thousands of admirers with her voice unimpaired and her personality even more attractive than before.

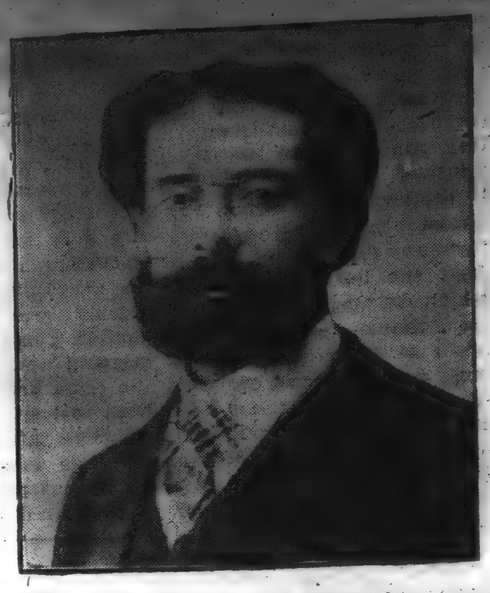
The familiar excerpts from "Der Freischutz" were given with the splendid expression and opulence of voice which denotes the artist of grand opera, and her performance of Agathe's scene was in every way satisfying. The Schubert selections also deserve praise for superb interpretation. In the "Erlkonig" Mme Gadski made the vocal contrasts somewhat more marked than is usual with singers by using the mezzo voice very effectively and sweetly. The popular artist was greeted with tumultuous plaudits and numerous recalls.

The romantic legend, "The Enchanted Forest," is a charming musical pastoral, imbued with bits of martial and mystic suggestiveness, some in chromatic form and some in harmonies more pleasing to the general ear. The brasses and percussion instruments proclaimed in sonorous measures the heroic and storm episodes, the violins sang the daintier phrases of the dancing pixies in exquisite unison, and the woodwinds gave forth their mysterious and somber music with due precision and weirdness of effect. The composition is very interesting, and the orchestral work was fully up to the usual high standard, though there was no stumbling blocks sufficiently formidable to bother Mr Gericke or his men.

Goldmark's "Sakuntad" overture was splendidly played, each theme showing up in perfect form among the different instrumental contingents, the quaint melodies given to the horns and oboes being specially piquant. The cadenzas for wind instruments were admirably played, and the brilliant finale was all that the term implies. The well-known Schumann symphony, which closed the program, and was performed without a division into parts, was interpreted in an impressive and sympathetic manner.

There will be no rehearsal and concert this week. Adele Aus der Ohe will be the soloist next week, playing a piano concerto by Huss, the American composer. The other numbers on the program will be Raff's overture, "Eine Feste Burg;" a symphonic poem by Smetand, and Beethoven's second symphony.

NEW YORK DAILY TRIBUNE,
SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 1, 1903.



FERNANDEZ-ARBOS.
He will play at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Thursday.

The New Concert Master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The solo performer at the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening will be E. Fernandez Arbos, Mr. Kneisel's successor as concert master of the band. He is a Spaniard, and was born in Madrid on Christmas Day, 1863, his father being a military bandmaster. A few of his childhood years were spent in Galicia, but war sent the family back to the Spanish capital, and there the boy began his studies at the Conservatory. At twelve years of age he took first prizes for violin, harmony and theory. His teacher, Monasterio, was a court musician, who introduced him to the Princess Isabel, aunt of the King of Spain, who took sufficient interest in him to give him an allowance to enable him to continue his studies in foreign lands. First he went to the Conservatory at Brussels, where he studied with Vieuxtemps and Gevaert and carried off a prize in 1879. Despite his exclusive training in the French school, he conceived an admiration for the German method exemplified in Joachim's playing, and went to Berlin, where he studied three years with that master, afterward playing with the Philharmonic Orchestra, and for two years more travelling as a virtuoso in Germany, France, Holland, Belgium, Spain, Portugal and Poland. The next few years were spent in teaching the violin first at Hamburg, then at Madrid, and in 1890 he went to London, where he has since lived, travelling on concert tours with men like Lloyd and Santley and doing the work of violin professor at the Royal College of Music. His name reached America last year in notices of Miss Maud MacCarthy, who is one of his pupils and will this season make a tour with the Boston Orchestra.

Following is the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in Brooklyn next Friday evening:

Overture, "Euryantho".....Weber
Air from "Il re pastore".....Mozart
Mme. Gadski.
Entr'acte from "Messidor".....Bruneau
"Waldweben".....Wagner
Air from "Le Cid".....Massenet
Mme. Gadski.
Symphony in D, No. 2.....Brahms

THE SPRINGFIELD SUNDAY REPUBLICAN:
NOVEMBER 1, 1903.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts.

As has already been announced, the Boston symphony orchestra is booked for a concert in Court Square theater Monday evening, January 18, 1904, and if the attendance is as good as it was last year the concert will probably become a regular annual feature. It is really much too small an allowance for a city of this size, with so large a population within trolly radius to draw upon. Hartford, which in the matter of choral music is rather inferior to this city, has forged far ahead in orchestral music. Not only has Hartford for several years sustained a promising symphony orchestra with something like 60 players, but it supports three yearly concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra. The dates are Monday evening, November 9, Tuesday evening, January 19, and Monday evening, March 21. Harold Bauer is to play at the first, and the other solo artists will be announced later. In the course of a few years, if music lovers here use their full influence, Springfield should do as well as this; till then a good many enthusiasts will be glad to go down the river and enjoy the benefit of Hartford's enterprise. Season tickets for the three concerts, with reserved seats, are sold for $4, and may be ordered of John M. Gallup & Co's music store, 201 Asylum street, Hartford, where they are now on sale. The concerts will be held in Foot Guard hall, an auditorium of excellent acoustic quality.

The New First Violin.

An interesting feature of the second symphony orchestra concert in Boston was the first appearance of the new concert master, Mr Arbos, in solo work. He played Mendelssohn's concerto and a new concert piece of his own composition. Music lovers everywhere are interested in Mr Kneisel's successor, and Philip Hale in the Boston Herald praises his work, though not in extreme terms of eulogy:—

There was natural curiosity to hear Mr Arbos. It was in 1885 (October 31) that Mr Kneisel played for the first time as a soloist at these concerts. His engagement as first concertmaster had provoked much comment, and the newspapers had published letters of indignant protest; for Mr Listemann had then many friends who were grieved because he had been removed from the position. Mr Gericke had brought with him young players from Vienna, and the invasion was considered by the more sensitive as a deliberate attack on American institutions. There were appeals to the patriotic spirit of every Bostonian, nor was any attention paid to the fact that Mr Listemann was born at Schlotheim, that, as concertmaster, he had breathed the enervating air of a foreign court, and that he himself was an importation. Nevertheless, Mr Kneisel played the Beethoven concerto, and he was not torn to pieces on the stage, nor was he the next day sawn asunder on the Common; on the contrary, if the contemporaneous newspaper may be believed, he was applauded most enthusiastically. Nor did the orchestra sink into obscurity, as some wisely predicted. Mr Arbos was not made the subject of such attacks. He was welcomed heartily on his arrival, and again last night when he stepped forward to play. Thus should it ever be.

It may be said of Mr Arbos that he displayed an agreeable tone and that he played as a rule with taste and true feeling. In the first movement of the concerto he was inclined toward undue haste, and the performance was somewhat nervous. This nervousness was natural and to be expected, and it may well account for certain features of this performance. Mr Arbos played the other movements with greater self-control, and he often revealed himself as an accomplished violinist. The concerto itself, admirably made as itis, is not a work to call forth the stronger qualities of a great artist. The sentiment is sandpapered, and the passion is that of a Sir Charles Grandison in the presence of ladies. The music is salon music raised to its highest power. But Mr Arbos played it as a serious musician, not as a sentimentalist, nor as a thoughtless virtuoso. He was heartily applauded after the concerto and after his own "Tango," which is in effect a set of variations on a Spanish or Colonial dance tune, with introduction and postlude. This piece has a certain piquancy, but it is one better suited to a promenade than to a symphony concert, for its intrinsic worth is slight.

SUNDAY JOURNAL—NOVEMBER 1, 1903.

TONE POEM GIVEN BY SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

D'Indy's Illustration of Uhland's Fairy Ballad Is Novelty Produced With Acceptance at Third Concert of Season, and Madame Gadski Sings.

That odd little story of Edward Everett Hale's, "How Mr. Fry Would Have Preached It," would come to mind while Mr. Gericke's men were playing the novelty of last night's concert. How would Richard Strauss have treated that Upland ballad, "The Enchanted Wood," of which Vincent d'Indy's illustration was then on hearing? Yet there was no fault to find with this musical poem. D'Indy has surely as romantic a strain in him as Strauss, though he cannot be so strong or heroic, and he has a deeper founded of love for old fantasies and for the picturesque, the wild and the enchanting in nature. And one thought again, how might the two men possibly have collaborated, as the Flemish painters did when one put the figures into another's landscape or Rachel Ruysch surrounded with her matchless flowers a head limned by a great portraitist. How if D'Indy has made the music for the murmuring forest, the gurgling streams, the amorous fairy fascinations and that enchanted sleep whose peace was only broken by dreams of war, while Strauss had depicted the march of the bold knights, their songs of battle, and their contest with temptations?

Yet D'Indy's poem was delightful, befitting and persuasive. Such a simple story! The forest rustles in the band's hushed wood winds and shimmering violins, while the muted horns hint of the distant approach of the bold Harald and his men. "Louder and louder the war horns ring," the hoof beats hurry and rattle, and the troop is already drawing by, when lighter figures and instrumentation come alluringly with sweeter songs and the touch of harps. The elfin maidens surround the knights with beauty and blandishment; the martial thoughts and sounds melt away, and with a recurrence of the braver moods Harald rides on alone. His momentary outburst of new courage and determination dies down, and again the orchestra's softer voices suggest the tranquillizing influence of the fairy spring and his sinking into the endless slumber with the bands of elves ringing him about.

Gracious to the Ear.

It was delicate music, crossed occasionally by larger strains, and while it asked no serious consideration or academic analysis, it was gracious to the ear, suggestive to the fancy and commendable for accomplishing just what it set out to do. From the very beginning it less implied vigor, self-assertion and resistance than languor, dalliance, charm and compliance. One had little need to read the ballad to feel that music was full of spells, present and to come.

The orchestra played the poem in the right spirit as they also did the "Sakuntala" overture, in which the strings and the middle wood wind were notably rich and accordant. The symphony, Schumann's fourth, that in D minor, was also well handled according to Schumann's work for a connected rendering, only a momentary and half involuntary suspension at the end of the first movement making any check in its progress. The lovely romance gave a brief chance for observing in the entrance of its theme the full and satisfying tone of the new first 'cello.

Mme. Gadski.

It is not wise for artists who have to come hither over seas to make their appearance follow too closely upon their debarkation. Mme. Gadski, who had wavered as to her choice of numbers, finally settled down upon Agatha's scene from "Der Freischutz" and two Schubert songs, "Margaret at Her Spinning" and "The Erl King." Her singing was, as always, correct and sincere, but it lacked in ease and elegance. Both Margaret and Agatha are but young women, "as yet unsifted in the perilous matters" of life; their passions are poignant, but not narrow. But Mme. Gadski's weight of emphasis made them appear elder and more experienced than they were, and the executive passages in the Weber scene had more honest effort than elasticity. The "Erl King" was something too hard and declamatory in its narrative stanzas, and the last two words were—as is too often the case—assertive, rather than thrilling; but the goblin's lines were beautifully true. Mme. Gadski was most cordially received, but she won less than her usual and anticipated applause after her numbers.

This being the orchestra's absent week there will be no rehearsal and concert until Nov. 13 and 14, when Miss Ausder Ohe will play.

BOSTON COURIER, OCTOBER 31, 1903.

——Society had a splendid representation at the Symphony rehearsal on Friday, when Mme. Gadski was the soloist. The great singer was in excellent voice, and created a most favorable impression. She was looking particularly well in a trailing gown of black, trimmed with richest ecru lace in fischu effect, and wore a black picture hat with plumes, having roses tucked under the brim. Among those so fortunate as to be present were Mrs. Bayard J. Allan, who was in black cloth, the coat opening to display a white lace bodice,— and a flat hat of white and blue. She wore a slender gold chain, studded with turquoise. Miss Rosamond Saltonstall was in navy blue voile, with yoke of white lace, and a large black hat with plumes. Her sister, Mrs. Neal [illegible] was similarly attired. Miss Mary [illegible] wore a chic tailor gown of [illegible] cloth. [illegible] and Miss Rose [illegible] with a purple hat. [illegible] also decided a [illegible] worn over a [illegible] Others present were Miss [illegible], Miss Elizabeth Devens, Mrs. [illegible], Mrs. C. L. Hutchinson, [illegible]inson, Mrs. Hall Curtis, [illegible], Mrs. William P. Ely, [illegible], Mrs. J. W. Keeney and [illegible], Mrs. [illegible] Keeney, Mrs. Oliver [illegible], [illegible] West, Mrs. J. [illegible], [illegible] Thacher, [illegible], Mrs. Dudley Fay [illegible], Mrs. John Osborn, Miss [illegible], Mrs. [illegible] Storrow, Miss [illegible], Mrs. [illegible] de Edmonds, Miss [illegible], Mrs. John [illegible], [illegible] Coffin of [illegible], Mrs. [illegible], Miss [illegible], Miss [illegible], Miss

BOSTON SUNDAY POST, NOVEMBER 1, 1903

GADSKI SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

The programme of the third Symphony concert last evening was as follows:

Goldmark.....Overture, "Sakuntala"
Weber.....Aria from "Freischutz"
D'Indy....."The Enchanted Forest"
Legende-Symphonie.
Schubert—
(a) "Gretchen at the Spinning Wheel"
(b) Erl-King.
Schumann...Symphony in D minor, No. 4

Mme. Johanna Gadski was the soloist.

Of modern orchestral overtures there are none that hold popular appreciation more than Goldmark's "Sakuntala," excepting perhaps the "Tannhauser" of Richard Wagner. And in all these 40 years since "Sakuntala" was written Goldmark has created nothing that in strength of thought, spontaneity and beauty of orchestral coloring will equal this early work, while admitting the many beauties of "Sapho," the "Rustic Wedding" symphony and the like. The overture was superbly played and made the usual popular impression.

D'Indy's symphonic legend or, more properly, symphonic ballad, is an early work, written in 1878, was heard in this city for the first time. Its first American performance was by the Chicago orchestra under Theodore Thomas, in that city, early in December, 1901.

Vincent D'Indy, one of the "impressionists" in music and a leader of the modern French school, has been a fairly prolific composer, and some of his works are more or less known here. This symphonic legend was suggested by Uhland's ballad, "The Enchanted Forest," the story of which offers much scope to the musician of imaginative temperament for a most romantic orchestral picture.

As to whether D'Indy portrayed the scenes of the ballad effectively by his score must be largely left to the imagination of the listener, but on a first hearing it can be said that the composer has shown, even in an early work, a mastery of orchestral technic, inventive power and a genuinely romantic spirit.

There is much to interest one in this symphonic legend, and the performance was a most finished one. The work, however, made but little impression on the audience.

The Schumann symphony, a general favorite, was much enjoyed and admirably given.

Mme. Gadski, who has appeared only once before at these concerts—Oct. 29, 1898—was in good voice, and sang the aria from "Der Freischutz" with that artistic excellence that has invariably characterized her work on previous occasions in this city. Even more enjoyable, however, was her singing of the two Schubert songs, with pianoforte accompaniment. Both are familiar, but seldom, if ever, have they made a better impression than they did last evening. Mme. Gadski was enthusiastically applauded and several times recalled.

As the orchestra will be absent from the city this coming week, the fourth rehearsal and concert will be Nov. 13 and 14. Miss Adele Aus der Ohe will be the soloist in a concerto by Henry Holden Huss, and the other numbers of the programme include Raff's overture "Eine Feste Burg," Smetana's symphonic poem No. 1 of the cycle "My Country" and Beethoven's symphony No. 2 in D.

SOCIETY ATTENDS SYMPHONY

Society had a splendid representation at the Symphony rehearsal on Friday, when Mme. Gadski was the soloist. The great singer was in excellent voice and created a most favorable impression. She was looking particularly well in a trailing gown of black, trimmed with richest ecru lace in fichu effect, and wore a black picture hat with plumes, having roses tucked under the brim. Among those so fortunate as to be present were Mrs. Bryce J. Allan, who was in black cloth, the coat opening to display a white lace bodice, and a flat hat of white and blue. She wore a slender gold chain, studded with turquoise. Miss Rosamond Saltonstall was in navy blue, with yoke of white lace, and a large black hat with plumes. Her sister, Mrs. Neal Rantoul, was similarly attired. Miss Mary Vaughan wore a chic tailor gown of gray cloth and bright red hat, and Miss Rosamond Allen was in brown cloth with a purple hat. Miss Aubrey Stanwood also donned a purple hat, with a cloth tailor suit, worn with a white bodice. Others present were Miss Katharine Foote, Miss Elizabeth Devens, Mrs. Frederick R. Comee, Mrs. F. L. Higginson, Miss Barbara Higginson, Mrs. Hall Curtis, Miss Estelle Kimball, Mrs. William P. Fay, Miss Katharine Fay, Mrs. J. W. Kenney and her daughter, Miss May Kenney; Mrs. Oliver Ames, with her mother, Mrs. West; Mrs. J. Montgomery Sears, Mrs. Thomas Thacher, Miss Mabel Bayard Warren, Mrs. Dudley Fay and Miss Alice Fay, Mrs. John Osborn, Miss Jane Waldron, Mrs. J. J. Storrow, Miss Bessie Tower, Miss Gertrude Edmunds, Miss Susie Howe and her mother, Mrs. John Lowell, Sr.; Miss Priscilla Stackpole (one of this season's debutantes), in brown; Mrs. George Littleton, Miss Margaret Manning, Miss Clara Shattuck, Mrs. Edwin P. Stone, Miss Ethel Stone, Miss Hannah Stevenson, Miss Anna Thayer, Colonel Stevenson, Mrs. James Jackson, Miss Alice Sargent, Miss Alice Stackpole, Mrs. Krassel, the Misses Lawrence and Mr. Tauscher. Mme. Gadski's husband, whose devotion to his wife's talent it is a pleasure to witness.

SUNDAY HERALD—BOSTON, NOVEMBER 1, 1903.

THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.

First Performance of D'Indy's "Enchanted Forest" Here.

An Imaginative Work with Original Harmonic Thought and Exquisite Invention—Mme. Gadski Sings Aria from "Der Freischuetz."

The programme of the third Symphony concert, given last evening in Symphony Hall, Mr. Gericke, conductor, was as follows:

Overture to "Sakuntala".....Goldmark
Recitative and aria from "Der Freischuetz".....Weber
"The Enchanted Forest," op. 8.....D'Indy
Songs: "Gretchen at the Spinning Wheel" and "Erlking".....Schubert
Symphony in D minor, No. 4.....Schumann

D'Indy's orchestral ballad, based on a poem, "Harald," by Uhland, was played here for the first time, yet it is one of the composer's earliest works and it was produced by Pasdeloup at Paris in 1878. Mr. Thomas acquainted Chicago with it in 1901.

Uhland's poem tells of Harald and his warriors riding through the forest. The elves woo his knights, pelt them with roses, and finally drag them from their horses and bear them away to fairyland. Harald's armor of steel is proof against the spells, but the hero, weary and alone, rests by a spring and drinks of its water. He falls asleep and there he sleeps forever; and in the moonlight the elves circle around him; but when the storm howls through the forest and thunder crashes and lightning glares, the hero stirs a little and reaches for his sword. Loewe set music to this ballad.

The American is inclined to consider the forest with a commercial rather than poetic eye. Even in the earlier and simpler years, there were no forest dwellers in New England save a stray witch or the awful shape of the Black Man with his directory. The Redskins had their forest legends and curious forest lore, but the Yankee child was not intimate with fairies of wood or meadow, hill or stream. Today a forest is so much lumber, and the first thought is the price for cutting and transportation. Picnickers have little respect for a beautiful or a wild stretch of woods; they make their chattering way, and during a halt provoke the wonder and scorn of the observing trees, and leave a trail of paper bags and tin cans. Man marks the earth with ruin. But to Germans and even Frenchmen the forest is still romantic, and the fairy lore they learned in childhood clings to them even when they are professional materialists. To such D'Indy's orchestral ballad would make necessarily a stronger appeal.

D'Indy wrote it at a time when he was influenced by German composers, by Schumann and Brahms, as well as by Wagner. He was otherwise handicapped—for he was rich and an aristocrat, and it is so easy for such to write music and to win parlor and snobbish applause. Yet even in this early work there is the same avoidance of the commonplace that characterizes his more mature compositions, there is the same loftiness of thought. This music is something more than panoramic. There is no too deliberate attempt to portray a forest and its moonlit mystery. There is no attempt to label each episode so that the hearer who finds delight in identification can safely say: "Now the warriors succumb; now Harald is drinking the magic water; now he falls asleep." A composer who strains every effort to mimic sleep runs the risk of disposing of his audience as well as of his hero.

D'Indy composed music that is poetic, imaginative; music that confirms and enlarges the mood suggested by his programme-paraphrase of the ballad, and in this paraphrase there is no reference to Harold hearing as in a dream the storm. There is not, perhaps, the firm grasp noticeable in d'Indy's later works, the repression that is often more effective than expansion; but there is romantic feeling, there is individuality of expression, there are pages of true beauty. The most effective portion of the ballad is the close, which is highly original, both in harmonic thought, orchestral expression, and is, indeed, of exquisite invention. It is a pleasure to add that the ballad was finely played and warmly received.

Mme. Gadski is well known here as an indefatigable singer in opera. She has often been a great help in time of managerial trouble. She has constantly added to her repertory, and, while she seldom, if ever, rises to any great imaginative height in the interpretation, she is earnest, painstaking and generally satisfactory. Her emotional gamut is slight; her face is not mobile; her action is safely conventional; but she sings much better than the majority of her German sisters, and she acts with greater discretion than many of the favorites in German opera houses. Last night she was more effective in Agatha's scene and aria from "Der Freischuetz" than in the songs of Schubert with orchestral accompaniment.

Mr. Hermann Klein, in his self-appreciative memoirs published lately, is sure that as a boy he saw Jenny Lind in this scene kneel while she sang the prayer, although she was on a concert stage. Mme. Gadski is to be praised for not attempting to sing the scene as she would in opera. She avoided this pitfall for the dramatic singer. When she made effects it was by the legitimate use of her voice. Nor was it her fault that the allegro of the scene was not more effective, for the music is abominably written for the voice; it is almost as stiff and ungainly as the song that Tannhaeuser sings to Venus and afterwards repeats at a most inopportune moment before the Landgrave, his merry men, and the well conducted Elizabeth, who was not in the mood for such a ribald strain—at least in public.

Mme. Gadski did comparatively little with Gretchen's song. The crescendo of passion was not irresistible, and the recollection of Faust's kiss was not last night the climax of her woe. Nor do we care to hear any woman sing the "Erlking," which is a man's song, and was first sung by men. The more dramatic the woman, with her imitation of a gruff and then terrified father, of the piping child and of the seducing elf, the more does she remind us of the gifted ventriloquist who sits gloriously between the bearded lady and the Circassian girl. Mme. Gadski was moderate in her mimicry; nevertheless, there was the suggestion.

The "Sakuntal" overture, with its swooning languor, its reminder of lush vegetation, sultry atmosphere, and the mysterious Orient—the India and its women described so sympathetically by Pierre Loti—is always welcome. Auber, wearied of Felicien David's orientalism in music, exclaimed: "If he would only get down from his camel"; but Goldmark's strength was renewed each time he touched the burnt and sacred soil. After he abandoned the East, his music grew less characteristic, nor did his excursion into Greece save him. Sakuntala was far kinder to him than Prometheus, and even Sappho, a little woman with raven black hair and a strange smile, did not woo from him the tribute he paid the superb Balkis, Queen of Sheba, who asked hard questions of Solomon, and, according to the Rabbins, loved him passionately.

So too the symphony of Schumann, with its restless and vague melancholy, is always welcome. There might have been more elasticity in the performance of the trio in the Schero—that trio of haunting rhythm and ineffable regret—but on the whole, the symphony was played with poetic appreciation.

There will be no concerts this week. The programme of the concerts No. 13 and 14 will include Rabb's overture, "Eine Feste Burg"; Huss' piano concerto (Miss Aus der Ohe, pianist); Smetana's symphonic poem "Vysehrad," and Beethoven's symphony, No. 2.

HERE was another crush at the Symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon. Every seat was taken and for the rush places, the crowd gathered hours before outside the hall. Mme. Gadski, who arrived on Wednesday in New York on the Kronprinz Wilhelm, had a very hearty reception and was looking extremely well. She wore a black silk costume. The coat opening over a white bodice, had collar and revers of white lace and was fastened by heavy white cord. Her large black hat was done in white rosettes. Some of those there were Mrs. George B. Shattuck and her daughter, Mrs. F. L. Higginson; Miss Barbara Higginson, with her aunt, Mrs. James Jackson; Mrs. Robert H. Halloweil (Rebecca Jackson), and her sister, Mrs. George C. Lee, Jr.; Mrs. Hall Curtis, Mrs. Frederick R. Sears, Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick S. Converse, Mr. and Mrs. Albert F. Bigelow, Miss Anna Thayer, with Miss Hannah Stevenson, Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Miss Rosamond Saltonstall, Mrs. William P. Fay and Miss Katherine Fay, Mrs. Bryce Allan and Mrs. Frederick C. Shattuck and Miss Clara Shattuck; also Mrs. R. D. Evans, Mrs. Dudley Fay and Miss Lily and Miss Alice Fay, Mrs. Henry S. Howe and Miss Susan Howe, Mrs. J. M. Sears, Mrs. Preston West and her daughter, Mrs. Oliver Ames, Mrs. John Lowell, Sr., Mrs. Thomas Thacher, Mrs. James W. Kenney and Miss May Kenney, Mrs. J. J. Storrow, Miss Mary Vaughan, Miss Margaret Manning, Miss Elizabeth Devens, Mrs. John B. Osborn, Miss Molly Coolidge, Miss Priscilla Stackpole and Miss Edith Stackpole, Miss Estelle Kimball, Mrs. John C. Baird and Mr. Stewart Baird, Miss Katherine Foote, Miss Mea Bowditch, Miss Mabel Warren, Miss Rosamond Allen, Miss Beatrice Blake, Mrs. Eben Stone and Miss Ethel Stone, Miss Alice Gardiner, Miss Jane Waldron, Miss Gertrude Edmands, Mrs. George Cushing, Col. R. H. Stevenson, Mr. H. M. Ticknor and Mr. Hans Tauscher, Mme. Gadski's husband. Last night the hall was again crowded. Mme. Gadski was handsome in a Paris gown of Brussels net with lace. There will be no concert this week. Miss Adele Aus der Ohe, the pianist, will be the soloist for the next concert.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

MONDAY MORNING,

NOVEMBER 2 1903.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Overture, to "Sakuntala," in F major, op. 13.....Goldmark.
Aria from "Freischuetz".....Weber
Mme. Gadski.
"La Foret Enchantee," Legende-Symphonie (d'apres une Ballade de Uhland,) op. 8..... D'Indy
(First time.)
(a) "Gretchen am Spinnrade." (b) Erlkonig..... Schubert
Mme. Gadski.
Symphony in D minor, No. 4, op. 120..... Schumann

Matters began with a splendid performance of Goldmark's overture. We have never heard the orchestra do better work. It was as if Mr. Gericke desired to give a practical demonstration that changes in the ranks do not mean retrogression. There is, of course, nothing new to be said about the work itself; it is an exciting piece of sensuous beauty, ending with most ingenious counterpoint which, however, has not the slightest touch of austerity.

Madame Gadski is always a delight. She intones perfectly and does not often go to extremes. On this occasion even the B in alt was broadly sung and without much effort. But there was too much of dalliance with the tempo. To take the opening recitative so slowly is to kill the effect of the Prayer which follows. For once the great singer exaggerated the effects, not only in the beginning but in other parts of the scene. Some of the text is most difficult to sing clearly. When a singer comes to a line like,—"Taeuscht das Licht des Mond's mich nicht"—the conductor ought to be allowed an umbrella!

The two Schubert songs were given with much sincerity. We would have liked the first with a piano accompaniment. If the subject is to be orchestrally treated we prefer Berlioz to Schubert. The brooding Marguerite in the "Damnation de Faust" is a real orchestral picture, with the melancholy English horn against the dejected vocal strain, and the street tumult, the jostling rhythms of the Soldier's chorus and the Student's chorus, the hurly-burly of busy life, in vivid contrast against the forsaken girl in her solitude.

The "Erl-king" we prefer to hear as a tenor song, spite of the fact that Mme. Schroeder-Devrient was famous in the interpretation of the work. Mme. Gadski sang it well, but again rushed to extremes of tempo. The final speech of the monarch.—"So brauch ich Gewalt!"—was weak, but the last words of the song,—"Das Kind war todt!"—were melodramatically spoken.

We were glad that the song was given in the original language. We well recall a performance of this song in the old Music Hall, in English, where poor Schubert was butchered to make a translator's holiday, in the dialogue between the father and child, the composer has of course imitated the pitch of the voices.

Father. (deep voice) Mein Sohn, was birgst du so bang dein Gesicht?

Son. (higher notes) Siehst, Vater du den Erl-koenig nicht?"

Which was overset into English as follows,—

Son (in bass tones) Oh father, see yonder, see yonder,—he says.

Father. (in sweet treble.) My son, upon what dost thou fearfully gaze?

And afterwards there came a most sudden change of weather in a single verse, as follows:—

"Oh father, my father, and saw you not plain,
The Erlking's pale daughter glide fast through the rain?
Oh, no, my heart's treasure, I knew it full soon,
It was the grey willows that danced to the moon."

An alternation of rain and moonlight which could scarcely have taken place even in our New England climate. Those who wish can find this gem of literature in Augener's edition, edited by Pauer.

"Revenons a nos concerts!" Mme Gadski was recalled many times, with much enthusiasm after her numbers.

Mr. Gericke gave us our weekly novelty in the shape of a slumbering warrior, a la Barbarossa, set by the dissonant D'Indy, who, in this early work reveals much of beauty and spontaneous poetry. Association of ideas can sometimes spoil the best work, and the strongly marked rhythm of "The Cork Leg" (as Barnabee used to sing it) prevented our entering into the spirit of the beginning. But the subsequent dreaminess, the elfin charm of the orchestration, soon made us a very willing captive. The evil-toned muted horns contrasted well with the subsequent ecstasies. There was a good deal of lightness of the Berlioz "Danse des Sylphes" order, and the performance was altogether excellent. It was an especial wood-wind night and in this work, in the Goldmark overture, and in the Romanza of the Symphony, the players (especially the oboists) were commendably excellent.

The Schumann symphony was a good test of the first violins, and they met the requirements bravely, both in the dashing figure of the opening of the allegro (omnipresent afterwards, even in the finale) and in the brilliant coda to the Scherzo. It was a noble work nobly played. We do not remember a better interpretation; it was a triumph for Mr. Gericke and for his men.

Where is there a better melodist than Schumann? Where a deeper poet? Liszt called him the best music-thinker after Beethoven! Only when he turns to studied counterpoint do we find him less than great. Thus, in his wonderful "Manfred," he ends with a very ugly and artificial double canon; and in this work the contrapuntal touches near the end of the finale, only detract from its beauty. But a great symphony nevertheless.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 2, 1903.

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

The third symphony concert, like the second, was a somewhat depressing occasion, although the programme, on paper, with Mme. Gadski as soloist, looked unusually attractive. This, by the way, was the musical feast offered:

Goldmark: Overture to "Sakuntala," F major, op. 13.
Weber: Recitative and Aria from "Der Freischütz."
D'Indy: "La Foret Enchantée," Legende-Symphonie (d'après une Ballade de Uhland), op. 8. (First time.)
Schubert:
a. "Gretchen am Spinnrade."
b. "Erlkönig."
Schumann: Symphony in D minor, No. 4, op. 120.

In the past few years we have been growing tolerably familiar with the genius of Vincent d'Indy—the genius of a man singularly endowed with musical and poetic gifts. The inheritor of an ample fortune, d'Indy was possessed by an enthusiasm for music that led him to employ his opportunities for work as diligently as though his very life depended on the outcome of his labors. After studying the organ for two years at the conservatory with César Franck, he became a private pupil of the master in composition, later going to Weimar for the benefit of Liszt's influence. Wishing to become thoroughly familiar with the inner workings of the orchestra, for some time he was second drummer under Colonne, in the Chatelet orchestra.

"La Foret Enchantée," Legende Symphonie, after a ballad by Uhland, is an early work of d'Indy's, being written in 1878, when the composer was twenty-six years old; it was brought out the same year at a "Concert Populaire," under Pasdeloup. The verses relate the experiences of one Harald, riding with his warriors, of a moon-lit night, through a wild, mysterious forest. Elves "come down from the clouds and start from the torrent's foam," enticing, by their harmonious tones and voluptuous kisses, all the followers away to Elfland. Harald, left alone, drinks from a spring—a magical spring—whose waters send him into a deep sleep from which he has never awakened. To this day he rests on a black rock close by the bubbling waters, where the elves, every moonlight night, flit silently about him.

The d'Indy of later years, inspired by this romantic subject, would surely have enriched the musical literature of the world by a tone poem of surpassing loveliness, in which listeners might feel the darkness of the night, relieved only by the pale light of the moon; the strange sense of mystery that always broods over a forest; the shimmer of leaves in the moonlight; the majestic motion of clouds from which elves float down to earth; the plashing of waters; the seductive charm of the elves, that so irresistibly overpowered the frail warriors; the stern strength of Harald; the sense of deep repose as he sleeps on the rock, forever and ever. No composer of music, living or dead, can, more sympathetically and delicately, yet unmistakably, suggest the moods of nature, with her clouds and sky, wind, rain, than Vincent d'Indy; witness his wonderful symphony on a mountain air and his fantasia for oboe and piano. In this legend, however, there is little suggestion of nature or of the supernatural. The work, indeed, is so little imaginative and poetical that it seems as though d'Indy had paid but slight attention to his text, preferring to write "absolute" music. Considering the legend, then, as absolute music, it is not easy to find in it much that is lofty and great, or even strikingly melodious. Barring many fascinating flashes of color in the orchestration, the close of the poem alone leaves a vivid impression of beauty. As an early work by a composer of extraordinary talent, "La Foret Enchantée" was, none the less, highly interesting to hear. Its performance, too, was beautiful and sympathetic.

The exquisite Schumann symphony, unfortunately, went heavily and rigidly, all its poetry, from lack of well-felt rhythm, turning to prose. The playing of the "Sakuntala" overture was far better.

Mme. Gadski disappointed many people by her change of programme, singing Agathe's aria, "Leise, leise," from "Der Freischütz," and two Schubert songs instead of an air from "Il RePastore" and "Pleurez mes yeux," from "Le Cid." Mme. Gadski's final selections were exceedingly ill-judged, for this aria "Leise, leise," is all but impossible to sing properly, requiring a soprano with a great dramatic voice that has been trained to bel canto. In the Schubert songs, which are quite out of place on a symphony concert programme, Mme. Gadski was still less successful.

This week there will be no symphony concert. Miss aus der Ohe will play the week after, this being the programme: "Eine Feste Burg," overture, Raff; concerto for pianoforte, Huss; "Vysehrad" (No. 1 of the Cyclus, "My Country"), symphonic poem, Smetana; symphony No. 2, Beethoven.

R. R. G.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CXIV., NO. 136.

FRIDAY, NOV. 13, 1903.

The programme of the fourth public rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra this afternoon in Symphony Hall includes an overture, "Ein feste Burg," Smetana's symphonic poem, "Vysehrad," and Beethoven's symphony No. 2. Raff's overture, which is seldom played—it was performed here at a Philharmonic concert in 1882—was composed originally as a prelude to Wilhem Genast's tragedy, "Bernhard von Weimar," and was first played at a performance of the tragedy at the Grand Ducal Theatre, Weimar, in 1855. Raff rewrote the overture in 1865 at Wiesbaden, and it was performed for the first time in its revised form at Carlsruhe in 1866. The familiar melody, set, as it was long believed by Luther, to the 46th Psalm, is freely used, as it was by Meyerbeer, Nicolai, Mendelssohn, Wagner and many others. The present form of the melody, however, was shaped by Bach and differs from the original.

Smetana's "Vysehrad" has been already played twice at these concerts. It is the first poem of his cycle "My Country." The Vysehrad is a fortified hill in the southern part of Prague. Centuries ago this hill was crowned with the castle of the semi-legendary Libussa, a remarkable woman, who by her marriage to Premysl, a ploughman, founded a powerful dynasty. The old castle and other buildings were destroyed in the Hussite wars. Smetana fancies Lumir, an ancient bard, looking at the ruins and recounting the past glories, the wondrous sights, and then the passing of the glory. The work is highly imaginative, a true orchestral rhapsody.

Miss Adele Aus der Ohe will play with the orchestra Henry H. Huss' piano concerto in B major. The work was performed for the first time at a Symphony concert in Boston some years ago when the composer was the pianist. Mr. Huss revised the concerto, which is dedicated to Miss Aus der Ohe, who, by the way, will play at these concerts in Boston for the eighth time. A pupil of Kullak and Liszt, she first visited the United States in the late fall of 1886.

The programme of the concert next week will include Brahms' tragic overture, Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Ideal," and Dvorak's symphony in F. Mr. Krasselt, the new first 'cellist, will appear as a soloist for the first time in the United States, and he will play a concerto by Saint-Saens.

BOSTON JOURNAL--FRIDAY,

NOVEMBER 13, 1903.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM AN OPPORTUNITY FOR MISS OHE

Re-entry Is in Pianoforte Concerto of Henry Holden Huss, Which Was Dedicated to Her—Overture Will Be Raff's "Eine Feste Burg"—Other Numbers.

The personal interest of this week's Symphony program centers in the re-entry of Miss Adele aus der Ohe, after a long absence. She has chosen the pianoforte concert of Henry Holden Huss, dedicated to her, but originally introduced by himself at a New York Philharmonic concert. It is a composition well suited to her style and temperament, of which sustained vigor and a certain splendor in display are prominent element. It is the work of a young writer, eager to speak out what is on his mind, and not pausing long to argue or elaborate.

The nominal key is the bold, brilliant and exciting B major, and the casting is into the usual three movements. The themes are short and strongly set out, and the regulation cadenza is placed near the middle of the first movement, instead of being held back until time for the coda to be shaped.

The overture will be Raff's "Eine feste Burg," written to accompany a drama of the Thirty Years' War, and passing from a majestically martial presentation of the solemn theme to a high-strung and hurried allegro.

One of Smetana's cyclus of patriotic tone poems will follow the concerto. This is the "Vyschrad," wherein the composer stands in fancy before Bohemia's historic fortress and reviews its life. First he portrays the dignity, glory and triumph of its proud early years; then come dissension, conflict, crash and downfall; and at last the ruined castle remains alone, sad, desolate and gloomy, a theme for mourning, despair and oblivion.

The wild genius of Smetana, which at last broke into the madness whereof he died, is to be felt in the high tides of emotion and eloquence which swell in the poem and its intense coloring.

The symphony, put at the end, will be Beethoven's second.

[37]

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Third Concert—Review by Philip Hale, in the Boston Herald.

THE program of the third Symphony concert, given last evening in Symphony Hall, Mr. Gericke, conductor, was as follows:

Overture to Sakuntala.....Goldmark
Recitative and aria from Der Freischütz.....Weber
The Enchanted Forest, op. 8.....D'Indy
Songs—
Gretchen at the Spinning Wheel.....Schubert
Erlking .....Schubert
Symphony in D minor, No. 4.....Schumann

D'Indy's orchestral ballad, based on a poem, "Harald," by Uhland, was played here for the first time, yet it is one of the composer's earliest works, and it was produced by Pasdeloup at Paris in 1878. Mr. Thomas acquainted Chicago with it in 1901.

Uhland's poem tells of Harald and his warriors riding through the forest. The elves woo his knights, pelt them with roses, and finally drag them from their horses and bear them away to fairyland. Harald's armor of steel is proof against the spells, but the hero, weary and alone, rests by a spring and drinks of its water. He falls asleep, and there he sleeps forever, and in the moonlight the elves circle around him, but when the storm howls through the forest and thunder crashes and lightning glares, the hero stirs a little and reaches for his sword. Loewe set music to this ballad.

The American is inclined to consider the forest with a commercial rather than poetic eye. Even in the earlier and simpler years there were no forest dwellers in New England save a stray witch or the awful shape of the Black Man with his directory. The Redskins had their forest legends and curious forest lore, but the Yankee child was not intimate with fairies of wood or meadow, hill or stream. Today a forest is so much lumber, and the first thought is the price for cutting and transportation. Picnickers have little respect for a beautiful or a wild stretch of woods; they make their chattering way, and during a halt provoke the wonder and scorn of the observing trees, and leave a trail of paper bags and tin cans. Man marks the earth with ruin. But to Germans and even Frenchmen the forest is still romantic, and the fairy lore they learned in childhood clings to them even when they are professional materialists. To such D'Indy's orchestral ballad would make necessarily a stronger appeal.

D'Indy wrote it at a time when he was influenced by German composers, by Schumann and Brahms, as well as by Wagner. He was otherwise handicapped—for he was rich and an aristocrat, and it is so easy for such to write music and to win parlor and snobbish applause. Yet even in this early work there is the same avoidance of the commonplace that characterizes his more mature compositions, there is the same loftiness of thought. This music is something more than panoramic. There is no too deliberate attempt to portray a forest and its moonlit mystery. There is no attempt to label each episode so that the hearer who finds delight in identification can saiely say: "Now the warriors succumb; now Harald is drinking the magic water; now he falls asleep." A composer who strains every effort to mimic sleep runs the risk of disposing of his audience as well as of his hero.

D'Indy composed music that is poetic, imaginative; music that confirms and enlarges the mood suggested by his program paraphrase of the ballad, and in this paraphrase there is no reference to Harald hearing as in a dream the storm. There is not, perhaps, the firm grasp noticeable in D'Indy's later works, the repression that is often more effective than expansion; but there is romantic feeling, there is individuality of expression, there are pages of true beauty. The most effective portion of the ballad is the close, which is highly original, both in harmonic thought, orchestral expression, and is, indeed, of exquisite invention. It is a pleasure to add that the ballad was finely played and warmly received.

Madame Gadski is well known here as an indefatigable singer in opera. She has often been a great help in time of managerial trouble. She has constantly added to her repertory, and while she seldom, if ever, rises to any great imaginative height in the interpretation, she is earnest, painstaking and generally satisfactory. Her emotional gamut is slight; her face is not mobile; her action is safely conventional; but she sings much better than the majority of her German sisters, and she acts with greater discretion than many of the favorites in German opera houses. Last night she was more effective in Agatha's scene and aria from "Der Freischütz" than in the songs of Schubert with orchestral accompaniment.

Hermann Klein, in his self appreciative memoirs published lately, is sure that as a boy he saw Jenny Lind in this scene kneel while she sang the prayer, although she was on a concert stage. Madame Gadski is to be praised for not attempting to sing the scene as she would in opera. She avoided this pitfall for the dramatic singer. When she made effects it was by the legitimate use of her voice. Nor was it her fault that the allegro of the scene was not more effective, for the music is abominably written for the voice; it is almost as stiff and ungainly as the song that Tannhäuser sings to Venus and afterward repeats at a most inopportune moment before the Landgrave, his merry men, and the well conducted Elizabeth, who was not in the mood for such a ribald strain—at least in public.

Madame Gadski did comparatively little with Gretchen's song. The crescendo of passion was not irresistible, and the recollection of Faust's kiss was not last night the climax of her woe. Nor do we care to hear any woman sing the "Erlking," which is a man's song, and was first sung by men. The more dramatic the woman, with her imitation of a gruff and then terrified father, of the piping child and the seducing elf, the more does she remind us of the gifted ventriloquist who sits gloriously between the bearded lady and the Circassian girl. Madame Gadski was moderate in her mimicry; nevertheless, there was the suggestion.

The "Sakuntala" overture, with its swooning languor, its reminder of lush vegetation, sultry atmosphere and the mysterious Orient—the India and its women described so sympathetically by Pierre Loti—is always welcome. Auber, wearied of Felicien David's Orientalism in music, exclaimed: "If he would only get down from his camel"; but Goldmark's strength was renewed each time he touched the burnt and sacred soil. After he abandoned the East his music grew less characteristic, nor did his excursion into Greece save him. Sakuntala was far kinder to him than Prometheus, and even Sappho, a little woman with raven black hair and a strange smile, did not woo from him the tribute he paid the superb Balkis, Queen of Sheba, who asked hard questions of Solomon, and, according to the rabbins, loved him passionately.

So, too, the symphony of Schumann, with its restless and vague melancholy, is always welcome. There might have been more elasticity in the performance of the trio in the Scherzo—that trio of haunting rhythm and ineffable regret—but on the whole the symphony was played with poetic appreciation.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

CARNEGIE HALL, THURSDAY EVENING.

Overture to Euryanthe.....Weber
Concerto for violin.....Mendelssohn
Waldweben, from Siegfried.....Wagner
Tango, Morceau de Concert, op. 6, No. 3 (first time) .....Arbos
Symphony No. 2 in D major, op. 73.....Brahms
Soloist, E. Fernandez-Arbos.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

Overture, Sakuntala.....Goldmark
Aria from Freischütz.....Weber
La Forêt Enchantée, Légende Symphonie (d'apres une Ballade de Uhland (first time).....d'Indy
Songs—
Gretchen am Spinnrade.....Schubert
Erlkönig .....Schubert
Symphony No. 4, in E flat, op. 48 (first time)..Glazounoff

There will be no concerts this week. The program of the concerts Nos. 13 and 14 will include Rabb's overture, "Eine Feste Burg"; Huss' piano concerto (Miss Aus der Ohe, pianist); Smetana's symphonic poem, "Vysehrad," and Beethoven's Symphony, No. 2.

Mr. Arbos and the Mendelssohn Concerto.

MANY critical listeners were greatly disappointed in the playing of Mr. Arbos, the new concertmaster of the Boston Orchestra, when he made his début in Boston with Mendelssohn's Concerto, concerning which performance the reviewer of the Boston Herald says that in the first movement the playing "was inclined toward undue haste and the performance was somewhat nervous. This nervousness was natural and to be expected and it may well account for certain features of this performance"; adding that "greater self control marked the other movements, and that the player often revealed himself as an accomplished violinist."

To me this nervousness proceeded to the extent that the rhythm suffered, the time was unsteady, the phrasing not well delivered, the intonation impure, and the execution, which must be acute in its piquancy, was not well defined, conditions that prevailed throughout the performance, the player thereby failing to impart distinction to the composition and to hold the attention of the critical listener.

The playing, however, evoked from the Herald's reviewer the compliment to Mr. Arbos that "he displayed an agreeable tone, and that he played as a rule with taste and true feeling."

And then the reviewer, as if to mitigate a feeble performance, refers to the composition as "not a work to call forth the stronger qualities of a great artist"; adding also that the concerto is "salon music raised to its highest degree."

Now, here is a composition that has ever held a distinguished place in the repertory of all the great artists; a masterpiece of classic purity, melodious beauty and harmonic simplicity; a composition that presents the opportunity for legitimate playing in its highest and most refined forms.

It has commanded the approbation and attention of such great artists as Joachim, Wieniawski, Wilhelmj, Ysaye, Sarasate and all other players of renown and distinction.

It is today as fresh, as absorbing, as interesting, as commanding of the complete attention of the critical listener as the day its masterly proportions were first displayed before the world. Of course, it has no place as a piece of dazzling virtuosity; on the contrary, defying the ability of the superficial player to imbue its classic measures with the lofty sentiment that marks the opportunities offered when the hand of a great and spontaneous artist is laid upon it.

If great nobility and depth of feeling do not mark its inspired characteristics, its purity and melodious beauty are perennial, and it stands side by side in its intrinsic value with the concertos of Bach and Mozart, the noble Beethoven, the admirable Bruch and that of Saint-Saëns, &c.

Who has not sat entranced in the presence of Wieniawski, Wilhelmj or Ysaye when these Titans of violin art, these inspired and spontaneous interpreters of the highest forms of classical compositions, have revealed the beauties of Mendelssohn's genius as displayed in this concerto?

For the listener it is a misfortune that such a refined inspiration as is this work should fall to the task of being played by one without sufficient appreciation and technical ability to grasp and reveal it in its just proportions.

It is the duty of the competent critic, when such a misfortune overtakes the work of any composer of real value, to uphold the composer and not to let a feeble or an incompetent presentation of the music militate against it.

Everyone has a right to his opinion, even if a want of unbiased judgment is an accompanying item in the conclusions drawn.

In this case the array of great artists who have employed this concerto of Mendelssohn's as a medium for the presentation of their noblest and most inspired efforts furnish an endorsement of its intrinsic value that must serve in rendering the conclusions of the Herald's reviewer of less moment as a critical exposition than if this great obstacle to his judgment did not exist. Here is food for the contemplation of the student and the layman in the mysteries of the art of critical review. WARREN DAVENPORT.

BOSTON COURIER

NOVEMBER 14 1903

——There was an eminently brilliant audience for the fourth in the series of Symphony rehearsals, Friday afternoon, when Miss Aus der Ohe was the soloist, and fully sustained the favorable impression she has created on former occasions here. The great pianist was simply attired in a rich gown of white silk, on the bodice of which glittered the magnificent jewelled brooch presented her by the Empress of Germany. Among those who enjoyed the unusually excellent program were Miss Aus der Ohe's sister and constant companion, who was attired in black silk and jets, Miss Louise Drew, who was escorted by Mr. Guy Stanley, looking very pretty in golden brown velvet, a hat of brown beaver, with plumes, and an immense white boa; Mrs. F. L. Higginson, Miss Juliet Higginson, Miss Barbara Higginson, Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, Mrs. Geo M. Cushing, Mrs. Henry S. Howe, Miss May Kenney, Mrs. George C. Lee, jr., Mrs. Albert Harding, Mrs. Frederick R. Comee, Mrs. Guy Lowell, Miss Beatrice Blake, Miss Mary Vaughan, Miss Rachel Brooks, Mrs. Francis Peabody, jr., her daughter, Miss Rosamond Peabody, Mrs. Oliver Ames and her mother, Mrs. West, Miss Edith Stackpole, Miss Katharine Foote, Mrs. George Shattuck, Miss Mabel Bayard Warren, Miss Alice Perry, Miss Alice Stackpole, Mrs. Agassiz, Mrs. Thomas Matthews, Miss Mea Bowditch, Miss Elizabeth Shattuck, Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Mrs. William P Fay, Mrs. William Burnham, Miss Ethel Gibson, Miss Rosamond Saltonstall and innumerable others. Two immense floral offerings went over the footlights to Miss Aus der Ohe, one of American Beauty roses and the other a cluster of glorious white roses, just tinged with pink, which were a greeting from Mrs. James Field.

[38]

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 1903.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

FIRST CONCERT, THURSDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 5.

Overture to Euryanthe.....Weber
Concerto in E minor, for violin, op. 64.....Mendelssohn
Waldweben, from Siegfried.....Wagner
Symphony No. 2, in D major, op. 73.....Brahms

SECOND CONCERT, SATURDAY AFTERNOON, NOVEMBER 7.

Overture, Sakuntala.....Goldmark
Recitative and aria from Der Freischütz.....Weber
La Forêt Enchantée, Legende-Symphonie (d'après une Ballade d'Uhland .....D'Indy
(First time in New York.)

Songs—
Gretchen am Spinnrade.....Schubert
Erlkönig .....Schubert
Symphony No. 4, in E flat, op. 48.....Glazounoff
(First time in America.)

These annual New York concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have in time come to be regarded as among the most important musical events of our metropolitan season. It has long been customary to class this splendid organization with the best orchestras in the world, and it is a custom which seems justified in almost every respect. A large and representative following attends the concerts here of the men from Boston, and on Thursday and Saturday of last week Carnegie Hall saw all the old familiar faces and a goodly sprinkling of new. The attendance must have cheered both the players and the manager.

There is at this late day no special reason for going very deeply or analytically into the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This body was long ago letter perfect in everything that pertains to orchestral routine, and there was no cause to suppose from the playing at the concerts last week that the leader has lessened his vigilance or the orchestra its earnestness. We have heard the Boston Symphony in nearly all the classical works, and we have many times bestowed on them the large measure of praise and the small share of adverse criticism their work warrants. It remains but to say that the widely advertised changes in the personnel of the body were without any audible effect on its playing. There were the same suavity, the same elegance, the same even balance of tone, that have always distinguished the Boston Orchestra from our local organizations. The first violins played with more elasticity and with better bowing under the new concertmaster, but that is a question of temperament rather than of musicianship. The first 'cellist had little opportunity to display any individual prowess, but his tone was sympathetic, even if small.

The Weber, Wagner and Brahms numbers of the first concert need only general comment. Mr. Gericke's merits and demerits are familiar to all readers of THE MUSICAL COURIER and they are familiar, too, to the persons who year in and year out have heard Mr. Gericke's readings of the standard score. It seems superfluous therefore to state that the Weber number was done con amore, that the "Waldweben," though a technical delight, lacked freedom and warmth, and that the Brahms Symphony was austere and correct. It is not the Hamburg master's greatest creation, by the way.

The soloist of the Thursday concert, E. Fernandez-Arbos, made a favorable impression on the whole, though following so closely on the heels of Thibaud it was inevitable that the Spaniard should suffer by comparison. Such violin playing as Thibaud's is not heard often in a decade, and it was certainly not heard in the performance of Mr. Arbos. It is not quite just to pass a final opinion at this moment on his solo playing. Mr. Arbos was plainly so nervous that he could not do himself justice. His intonation was lamentable and his phrasing unnatural for such a good musician as we know him to be. His tone wavered and wanted in warmth. His left hand is speedy, but erratic. However, as was remarked before, this criticism must be taken with reservations, and it is to be hoped that it may be revised when Mr. Arbos plays in New York again, later in the season.

At the Saturday matinee Mr. Gericke read the Goldmark Overture without spilling any surplus passion. He got color from the score, but it was not the purple and gold of Goldmark. It was rather the gray of Gericke. It is this lack of temperament which prevents the Boston leader from ranking with the great ones of his craft, and makes of him an artisan where other men are artists. It is this lack of temperament, too, which prevented Mr. Gericke from getting an engagement in Europe after he left Boston some years ago and went to try his luck abroad.

D'Indy's symphonic legend was analyzed in these columns on the occasion of its first Berlin production by Richard Strauss. THE MUSICAL COURIER then called the work well made, melodious, and pretty. It is all that now, but nothing more. The story of the enchanted forest and the sleeping hero is old in literature and in music. D'Indy has found no new formula of expression, but he has traveled in the worn grooves with grace and distinction.

Glazounoff is not a Russian of the untamed bear variety. His paw is shod in velvet and he dances to every tune but the Tartar. His name is Calmuck but his music is French. The delicacy and discretion of the orchestration suggest Saint-Saëns, and the treatment of the brass and strings in combination more than once recall memories of Massenet. Glazounoff has enough learning to mix all this limpid sweetness with a sufficiency of counterpoint, and the result is not only pleasant but also interesting. One is grateful for a relief from the usual symphonic hubbub. The first movement shows the most sustained effort, but the scherzo caught the fancy of the listeners. It was played with marvelous finish and daintiness, and the first violins, under Arbos, covered themselves with glory. The Glazounoff work is in three movements, a slow introduction to the third part taking the place of the customary andante.

BALTIMORE MORNING HERALD,

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1903.

Plays and Players.

The first of this year's series of Boston Symphony concerts was given last night at the Lyric (late Music Hall) before a splendid audience and proved a thorough success as regards the soloist, the orchestral work and the program. Mr. Gericke, the conductor, is not noted for the excellence of his program making, but upon this occasion he was particularly happy in his selections. It is a mistake to place the symphony, which is naturally the longest and heaviest work, at the end, as the audience cannot give their wrapt and undivided attention at the close of a concert as well as at the commencement, and the only excuse for so placing the symphony of last evening is that the series opened with an overture.

Madame Gadski, the soloist for the occasion, is upon all occasions a true artist, singing only for art's sake, and this she proved by her performance. Her original program was for some reason or other changed, and too late for the alteration to appear in the printed programs. The aria "Wie Nahte Mir der Schlummer," from Weber's "Der Freischuetz," was retained, and two Schubert songs, with orchestral accompaniment, "Gretchen am Spinnrade" and "Erlkoenig," substituted for the Mozart aria. While the Weber composition was well and artistically sung, the artist's singing of it did not give such entire satisfaction as did her performance of the two Schubert numbers. At the commencement Madame Gadski's intonation was not true, although she remedied that fault later. But striking an incorrect pitch invariably militates against the true enjoyment of any work, no matter how otherwise artistically it be sung. However, the rendering of the Schubert songs, especially the "Spinnrade," was delightful and fully compensated for any shortcomings in the aria. The effect of the orchestral accompaniment materially heightened the effect of the "spinning song."

MADAME GADSKI.

Although the personnel of the orchestra has undergone some changes since last it was heard in Baltimore, its worth does not appear to have suffered in any way. Mr. Franz Kneisel, the former concert master, has been replaced by Mr. F. Fernandez-Arbos, who has had many years' experience in London, and, therefore, comes to his work with a mature understanding of the requirements of his position.

The overture "Sakuntala," by Goldmark; "La Foret Enchantee," Legende; Symphonie by D'Indy and Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D major comprised the orchestral numbers. The two former are splendid examples of rich orchestral coloring and are particularly suitable for such a magnificently equipped orchestra as the Boston organization. The Brahms' symphony was, however, the piece de resistance. While Mr. Gericke is not invariably happy in his reading of symphonic works by such romantic composers as Schumann, he always gives a thoroughly artistic conception of Brahms. This master, who is nothing if not scholarly in his writing, appeals peculiarly to Mr. Gericke's temperament and the result is a fine reading of Brahms. This symphony is of the four the least imbued with pure erudition, and in it the composer gives freer vent to his imagination and to a great extent casts off the scholastic shackles that bind him down in so many of his works. This symphony is more tuneful and comprehensible, the themes in many instances being delightful little inspirations.

Additional interest was lent to the entire performance of last night by the fact that Mr. Gericke brought out his orchestral climaxes with greater power and force, instead of subduing them, as he too often has formerly done.

THE SUN, BALTIMORE,

WEDNESDAY MORNING,

NOVEMBER 4, 1903.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA OPENS

Mme. Gadski The Soloist At The First Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its series of concerts last night at the Lyric with perhaps the largest audience that has ever before assembled in Baltimore to welcome its advent.

Not only were all the prominent musical folk of the city in attendance, but an especially large contingent of the ultra-fashionable circle more often seen at grand opera than upon occasions where a purely musical program is rendered. Perhaps the appearance of Mme. Gadski as the soloist in a measure commanded a grand-opera audience. Never did she sing in better voice. The familiar theme in the aria "L'Amiro from "Il Rè Pastore" (The Shepherd King) was well chosen in that beyond its own beauty of composition it displayed the tenderness, the liquid qualities, sweetness and purity of Mme. Gadski's voice to fullest advantage. The second aria, from "Der Freischütz," by Weber, although more dramatic, was not less pleasing. The soloist's charming personality and grace was a general theme of remark.

The overture to "Sakuntala," by Carl Goldmark, was splendidly rendered by the orchestra, and its poetic charm was well appreciated. The Brahms Symphony No. 2 in D major was rendered with equal perfection, but it was too monotonous, too lacking in emotional qualities. It was soothing rather than stimulating.

The program follows:

Overture, "Sakuntala".....Goldmark
Aria, "L'Amerò," from "Il Rè Pastore.....Mozart
"La Forêt Enchantée," Legende-Symphonie (d'après une Ballade de Uhland).....D'Indy
Aria from "Der Freischütz".....Weber
Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73.....Brahms
I—Allegro non troppo.
II—Adagio non troppo.
III—Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino.
IV—Allegro con spirito.

BALTIMORE AMERICAN,

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1903.

LARGE AUDIENCE AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

A Program Decidedly Halloween in Character Rendered by Clever Artists.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert for this season last evening at the Lyric before a large audience. The following was the program announced:

Overture, "Sakuntala".....Goldmark
Aria, "L'Amero," from "Il Re Pastore".....Mozart
"La Foret Enchantee," Legende-Symphonie (d'apres une Ballade de Uhland).....D'Indy
Aria from "Der Freischutz".....Weber
Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73..Brahms
1 Allegro non troppo.
2 Adagio non troppo.
3 Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino.
4 Allegro con spirito.
Soloist—Madame Gadski.

The program was decidedly halloween in character, most of the literary subjects involved dealing with fairies, sprites and elves. The Sakuntala overture is a tone-picture of one of the best Hindu dramas, which was first brought to the knowledge of Europe by Sir William Jones, the British scholar-governor of India, a century ago. It is not Wagnerian, but aims to present musically the picturesque events of the old drama.

The musical gem of the evening was the "Enchanted Forest," by D'Indry, after the beautiful poem of Uhland.

The Brahms Symphony No. 2 is a lighter and more melodious work than his No. 1, and is suggestive of the works both of Beethoven and Schubert. It is far away from the Wagner theory, and aims to present beautiful music for its sake, as Schubert did.

Madame Gadski did not sing the Mozart aria set down for her, but substituted the aria from Der Freischutz, thereby puzzling many of the listeners amazingly. For her second number she substituted two Schubert songs, "Margaret at the Spinning Wheel" and the "Erl-King." She was heartily recalled, but, in deference to Mr. Gerick's fixed rule, did not add another number to his full-length program.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 1903.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

FIRST CONCERT, THURSDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 5.

Overture to Euryanthe.....Weber
Concerto in E minor, for violin, op. 64.....Mendelssohn
Waldweben, from Siegfried.....Wagner
Symphony No. 2, in D major, op. 73.....Brahms

SECOND CONCERT, SATURDAY AFTERNOON, NOVEMBER 7.

Overture, Sakuntala.....Goldmark
Recitative and aria from Der Freischutz.....Weber
La Forêt Enchantée, Legende-Symphonie (d'après une Ballade d'Uhland.....D'Indy
(First time in New York.)

Songs—
Gretchen am Spinnrade.....Schubert
Er'konig.....Schubert
Symphony No. 4, in E flat, op. 48.....Glazounoff
(First time in America.)

These annual New York concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have in time come to be regarded as among the most important musical events of our metropolitan season. It has long been customary to class this splendid organization with the best orchestras in the world, and it is a custom which seems justified in almost every respect. A large and representative following attends the concerts here of the men from Boston, and on Thursday and Saturday of last week Carnegie Hall saw all the old familiar faces and a goodly sprinkling of new. The attendance must have cheered both the players and the manager.

There is at this late day no special reason for going very deeply or analytically into the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This body was long ago letter perfect in everything that pertains to orchestral routine, and there was no cause to suppose from the playing at the concerts last week that the leader has lessened his vigilance or the orchestra its earnestness. We have heard the Boston Symphony in nearly all the classical works, and we have many times bestowed on them the large measure of praise and the small share of adverse criticism their work warrants. It remains but to say that the widely advertised changes in the personnel of the body were without any audible effect on its playing. There were the same suavity, the same elegance, the same even balance of tone, that have always distinguished the Boston Orchestra from our local organizations. The first violins played with more elasticity and with better bowing under the new concertmaster, but that is a question of temperament rather than of performance. The first 'cellist had little opportunity to display any individual prowess, but his tone was sympathetic, even if small.

The Weber, Wagner and Brahms numbers of the first concert need only general comment. Mr. Gericke's merits and demerits are familiar to all readers of THE MUSICAL COURIER and they are familiar, too, to the persons who year in and year out have heard Mr. Gericke's readings of the standard score. It seems superfluous therefore to state that the Weber number was done con amore, that the "Waldweben," though a technical delight, lacked freedom and warmth, and that the Brahms Symphony was austere and correct. It is not the Hamburg master's greatest creation, by the way.

The soloist of the Thursday concert, F. Fernandez Arbos, made a favorable impression on the whole, though following so closely on the heels of Thibaud it was inevitable that the Spaniard should suffer by comparison. Such violin playing as Thibaud's is not heard often in a decade, and it was certainly not heard in the performance of Mr. Arbos. It is not quite just to pass a final opinion at this moment on his solo playing. Mr. Arbos was plainly so nervous that he could not do himself justice. His intonation was lamentable and his phrasing unnatural for such a good musician as we know him to be. His tone wavered and wanted in warmth. His left hand is speedy, but erratic. However, as was remarked before, this criticism must be taken with reservations, and it is to be hoped that it may be revised when Mr. Arbos plays in New York again, later in the season.

At the Saturday matinee Mr. Gericke read the Goldmark Overture without spilling any surplus passion. He got color from the score, but it was not the purple and gold of Goldmark. It was rather the gray of Gericke. It is this lack of temperament which prevents the Boston leader from ranking with the great ones of his craft, and makes of him an artisan where other men are artists. It is this lack of temperament, too, which prevented Mr. Gericke from getting an engagement in Europe after he left Boston some years ago and went to try his luck abroad.

D'Indy's symphonic legend was analyzed in these columns on the occasion of its first Berlin production by Richard Strauss. THE MUSICAL COURIER then called the work well made, melodious, and pretty. It is all that now, but nothing more. The story of the enchanted forest and the sleeping hero is old in literature and in music. D'Indy has found no new formula of expression, but he has traveled in the worn grooves with grace and distinction.

Glazounoff is not a Russian of the untamed bear variety. His paw is shod in velvet and he dances to every tune but the Tartar. His name is Calmuck but his music is French. The delicacy and discretion of the orchestration suggest Saint-Saëns, and the treatment of the brass and strings in combination more than once recall memories of Massenet. Glazounoff has enough learning to mix all this limpid sweetness with a sufficiency of counterpoint, and the result is not only pleasant but also interesting. One is grateful for a relief from the usual symphonic hubbub. The first movement shows the most sustained effort, but the scherzo caught the fancy of the listeners. It was played with marvelous finish and daintiness, and the first violins, under Arbos, covered themselves with glory. The Glazounoff work is in three movements, a slow introduction to the third part taking the place of the customary andante.

BALTIMORE MORNING HERALD,

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1903.

Plays and Players.

The first of this year's series of Boston Symphony concerts was given last night at the Lyric (late Music Hall) before a splendid audience and proved a thorough success as regards the soloist, the orchestral work and the program. Mr. Gericke, the conductor, is not noted for the excellence of his program making, but upon this occasion he was particularly happy in his selections. It is a mistake to place the symphony, which is naturally the longest and heaviest work, at the end, as the audience cannot give their wrapt and undivided attention at the close of a concert as well as at the commencement, and the only excuse for so placing the symphony of last evening is that the series opened with an overture.

Madame Gadski, the soloist for the occasion, is upon all occasions a true artist, singing only for art's sake, and this she proved by her performance. Her original program was for some reason or other changed, and too late for the alteration to appear in the printed programs. The aria "Wie Nahte Mir der Schlummer," from Weber's "Der Freischuetz," was retained, and two Schubert songs, with orchestral accompaniment, "Gretchen am Spinnrade" and "Erlkoenig," substituted for the Mozart aria. While the Weber composition was well and artistically sung, the artist's singing of it did not give such entire satisfaction as did her performance of the two Schubert numbers. At the commencement Madame Gadski's intonation was not true, although she remedied that fault later. But striking an incorrect pitch invariably militates against the true enjoyment of any work, no matter how otherwise artistically it be sung. However, the rendering of the Schubert songs, especially the "Spinnrade," was delightful and fully compensated for any shortcomings in the aria. The effect of the orchestral accompaniment materially heightened the effect of the "spinning song."

MADAME GADSKI.

Although the personnel of the orchestra has undergone some changes since last it was heard in Baltimore, its worth does not appear to have suffered in any way. Mr. Franz Kneisel, the former concert master, has been replaced by Mr. F. Fernandez-Arbos, who has had many years' experience in London, and, therefore, comes to his work with a mature understanding of the requirements of his position.

The overture "Sakuntala," by Goldmark; "La Foret Enchantee," Legende; Symphonie by D'Indy and Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D major comprised the orchestral numbers. The two former are splendid examples of rich orchestral coloring and are particularly suitable for such a magnificently equipped orchestra as the Boston organization. The Brahms' symphony was, however, the piece de resistance. While Mr. Gericke is not invariably happy in his reading of symphonic works by such romantic composers as Schumann, he always gives a thoroughly artistic conception of Brahms. This master, who is nothing if not scholarly in his writing, appeals peculiarly to Mr. Gericke's temperament and the result is a fine reading of Brahms. This symphony is of the four the least imbued with pure erudition, and in it the composer gives freer vent to his imagination and to a great extent casts off the scholastic shackles that bind him down in so many of his works. This symphony is more tuneful and comprehensible, the themes in many instances being delightful little inspirations.

Additional interest was lent to the entire performance of last night by the fact that Mr. Gericke brought out his orchestral climaxes with greater power and force, instead of subduing them, as he too often has formerly done.

THE SUN, BALTIMORE,

WEDNESDAY MORNING,

NOVEMBER 4, 1903.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA OPENS

Mme. Gadski The Soloist At The First Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its series of concerts last night at the Lyric with perhaps the largest audience that has ever before assembled in Baltimore to welcome its advent.

Not only were all the prominent musical folk of the city in attendance, but an especially large contingent of the ultra-fashionable circle more often seen at grand opera than upon occasions where a purely musical program is rendered. Perhaps the appearance of Mme. Gadski as the soloist in a measure commanded a grand-opera audience. Never did she sing in better voice. The familiar theme in the aria "L'Amiro from "Il Rè Pastore" (The Shepherd King) was well chosen in that beyond its own beauty of composition it displayed the tenderness, the liquid qualities, sweetness and purity of Mme. Gadski's voice to fullest advantage. The second aria, from "Der Freischütz," by Weber, although more dramatic, was not less pleasing. The soloist's charming personality and grace was a general theme of remark.

The overture to "Sakuntala," by Carl Goldmark, was splendidly rendered by the orchestra, and its poetic charm was well appreciated. The Brahms Symphony No. 2 in D major was rendered with equal perfection, but it was too monotonous, too lacking in emotional qualities. It was soothing rather than stimulating.

The program follows:

Overture, "Sakuntala".....Goldmark
Aria, "L'Amerò," from "Il Rò Pastore".....Mozart
"La Forêt Enchantée," Legende-Symphonie (d'après une Ballade de Uhland).....D'Indy
Aria from "Der Freischütz".....Weber
Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73.....Brahms
I—Allegro non troppo.
II—Adagio non troppo.
III—Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino.
IV—Allegro con spirito.

BALTIMORE AMERICAN.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1903.

LARGE AUDIENCE AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

A Program Decidedly Halloween in Character Rendered by Clever Artists.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert for this season last evening at the Lyric before a large audience. The following was the program announced:

Overture, "Sakuntala".....Goldmark
Aria, "L'Amero," from "Il Re Pastore".....Mozart
"La Foret Enchantee," Legende-Symphonie (d'apres une Ballade de Uhland).....D'Indy
Aria from "Der Freischutz".....Weber
Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73..Brahms
1 Allegro non troppo.
2 Adagio non troppo.
3 Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino.
4 Allegro con spirito.
Soloist—Madame Gadski.

The program was decidedly halloween in character, most of the literary subjects involved dealing with fairies, sprites and elves. The Sakuntala overture is a tone picture of one of the best Hindu dramas, which was first brought to the knowledge of Europe by Sir William Jones, the British scholar-governor of India, a century ago. It is not Wagnerian, but aims to present musically the picturesque events of the old drama.

The musical gem of the evening was the "Enchanted Forest," by D'Indry, after the beautiful poem of Uhland.

The Brahms Symphony No. 2 is a lighter and more melodious work than his No. 1, and is suggestive of the works both of Beethoven and Schubert. It is far away from the Wagner theory, and aims to present beautiful music for its sake, as Schubert did.

Madame Gadski did not sing the Mozart aria set down for her, but substituted the aria from Der Freischutz, thereby puzzling many of the listeners amazingly. For her second number she substituted two Schubert songs, "Margaret at the Spinning Wheel" and the "Erl-King." She was heartily recalled, but, in deference to Mr. Gerick's fixed rule, did not add another number to his full-length program.

AMERICAN, PHILADELPHIA, TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 3, 1903.

BOSTON'S ORCHESTRA GREETED BY FASHION

Symphony Organization Welcomed Enthusiastically at First Concert of Season.

LIKE A MUSICAL REUNION

Conductor Gericke, Adamowski and Kneisel Are Applauded Most Cordially.

Like old and well-loved friends returning after a long absence, the Boston Symphony Orchestra renewed last evening at the Academy of Music their acquaintance with Philadelphia music-lovers—serried ranks of fashionable folk, confidently expectant at the outset, delighted and enthusiastic at the close.

On the programme were: Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, a brilliant and impetuous tone poem, like some inspired prototype of modern "programme music;" Tschaikowsky's first concerto for piano, with Harold Bauer as soloist; an entr'acte from Alfred Brunean's lyric drama, "Messidor," for which Emile Zola wrote a prose libretto, and Alex. Glazounoff's fourth symphony, in E-flat major.

The two latter numbers are recent additions to the Boston band's vast repertory, and the Russian composer's work has not been heard here before in symphonic form.

Concert an Event of Fashion.

This concert was distinctively a fashionable event, with the world of fashion fully represented in the boxes and stalls. Far up around the great horseshoe clustered thickly the artistic spirits who never miss one of Mr. Gericke's tonal symposiums. A packed house, in box office phrase.

How different from this same orchestra's initial symphonic venture here, nearly twenty years ago, when band and audience were fairly balanced numerically!

Now, however, it seemed like a musical reunion, with mutual friendly recognition assuring artistic sympathy between performers and auditors.

For the violin virtuosi, Adamowski and Kneisel, there was a cordial and especial welcome, while the tempestuous greeting to Conductor Gericke banished for a moment even his traditional and imperturbable gravity.

A critical survey of the performance disclosed little beyond the accustomed demonstration of amazing proficiency and perfect tonal balance, which renders these concerts a recurrent source of keenest delight to a music-loving populace.

In the disposition of the instrumental forces the double basses were thrust too far into the background, so that from time to time there was a lack of tonal support for brasses and wood; yet the diffusion only served to accentuate the superb quality of tone in these important departments.

The strings, as heretofore, were matchless in technique, range and nuances of expression, and the rare singing quality usually reserved for performances by solo artists. There was no hesitation nor uncertainty, even in the most powerful fortissimo passages.

Glazounoff Symphony Chief Feature.

In point of interest, of course, the Glazounoff symphony, with its florid score, wealth of cantabile passages and affluent melodic invention, proved to be the chief musical event of the evening.

It is a pleasing pastoral, with andante introductions to the first and third movements, and a vivacious scherzo—genuine jig time—in the second movement, for which the clarinets and bassoons chant a melos in interminable roundelay, with pizzicato strings in contrast—a most effective departure from conventionality.

The final movement, with its powerful tutti passages, is a splendid disclosure of the pomp and ceremony of characteristic Slavic music, and more than compensated for the imitative banality of the first allegro.

Mr. Bruneau's "Messidor" music is colorless and without inspiration—a characterization applicable to Mr. Bauer's interpretation of the Tschaikowsky concerto—grandly played by the orchestra.

PHILADELPHIA RECORD, THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 5, 1903.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Gadski the Soloist at Opening Concert of Second Series.

A concert that was thoroughly delightful, if not especially inspiring, inaugurated the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second local series last evening at the Academy of Music. Intellectually, the performance gave unqualified pleasure, but of a kind from which any note of emotionalism was almost wholly absent. It was in fact the kind of evening in which our New England brethren are said to delight—sane, calm, eminently enjoyable, but far from strenuous. Compared with Monday evening's concert and the ones given last week by the Philadelphia Orchestra, in which the very serious ultra-modern Russian composers predominated, last evening's entertainment was in a way a refreshing change. Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, which came first, with its colorful climaxes and magnificent finale, and D'Indy's "La Foret Enchantee" are, of course, essentially present-day music, but most of the program was vastly different in character. The symphony was Schumann's No. 4, in D minor, which was given a most careful and scholarly reading by Mr. Gericke, while the soloist was Madame Gadski. In keeping with the general tone of the concert she sang an aria from Weber's "Der Freischuetz" and Schubert's "Gretchen Am Spinnrade" and "Der Erlkoenig"—all music of the early part of the last century. This fine lyric artist, who is said to be ambitious to essay what are known as the "heavier" Wagnerian roles, appeared thoroughly at home in the old fashioned atmosphere, and sang with charming ease and delicacy. The Weber aria was particularly well given.

PHILADELPHIA RECORD, TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 3, 1903.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

New Season Opened in Notably Auspicious Fashion.

Russian music predominated at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first concert of the season, which was given at the Academy of Music last evening. With only four numbers on the program, and two of them—the most important at that—credited to Tschaikowsky and Glazonnow respectively it will be seen that the Slavonic composers had pretty much everything their own way. The gem of the evening was the Tschaikowsky Concerto in B-flat minor, a beautiful composition, the piano part of which was exquisitely played by Harold Bauer, whose work was so appreciated by the audience that he was recalled again and again. It seems almost incredible that this concerto of the Russian composer, with its masterly insistence upon the principal theme, its sprightly second movement and its exquisite finale, is the work which was stigmatized by Rubinstein as absolutely worthless, and which was never performed in public until it was given by von Buelow on this side of the Atlantic and received with enthusiasm. In justice to the memory of Rubinstein it must be said that he afterward confessed his error of judgment. Glazonnow is a young Russian composer, whose symphony in E-flat, played last evening, has not been heard here before. The symphony in question bears evidence of the youthfulness of the composer. Rather free in form, its music belongs to the modern romantic school. It is full of beautiful passages, yet is burdened with the commonplace and impresses one at times as lacking variety. Despite the display of contrapuntal technic in the finale, the ending of that portion seems very ordinary. As Glazonnow was born in 1865 and this symphony was composed in 1894 we may expect better things from the same source.

The personnel of the orchestra has undergone a number of changes; there is a new concert-meister in the person of M. Arbos, succeeding Herr Kneisel, and there is a new first 'cellist in the person of M. Krasselt, succeeding Herr Schroeder; but the ensemble efficiency, polish and brilliancy is not impaired by any means—as was amply evidenced by last evening's sterling performance.

PHILADELPHIA PRESS, THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 5, 1903

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Mme. Gadski Welcomed as the Soloist—Schumann's D Minor Read.

The Boston Orchestra, at the Academy of Music, last night gave the first of the second series, or Wednesday night concerts. While the attendance is always somewhat less than on Monday nights, still there was no abatement in interest and attention, as compared with past years, and Mr. Gericke found ready ears and warm appreciation in the rendering of a program that was accentuated in no small degree by the always delightful and finished art of Madam Gadski. The numbers read were as follows:—

Goldmark's .....Overture, "Sakuntala"
Weber .....Aria from "Der Freischutz"
D'Indy.....'La Foret Enchantee," Legende-Symphonic (d'apres une Ballade de Uhland)
Schubert... (a) "Gretchen am Spinnrade" (b) "Erlkonig"
Schumann Symphony in D minor, No. 4, Op. 120

The Oriental splendor of the "Sakuntala" never seemed so overwhelming in color effect as it did last night, from the suave harmonies in the violas and 'celli in the opening bars, suggestive of purling waters, the tender love-melody of the clarinet and 'celli, to the long-drawn-out crescendo of the finale. One and all were replete with a glow of true tone-chromatics, music that brought round after round of applause as Mr. Gericke laid down his baton to make way for Madam Gadski who was given a warm welcome and who substituted for the Mozart number the aria from "Der Freischutz" and sang it inimitably with womanly grace and that perfect intonation and lovely voice production and simple dignity of style that makes so much the singer does take on a new beauty. The applause was long continued, and in her second numbers, the Schubert, the singer revealed her versatility, though the "Erlkonig" was a doubtful experiment.

An independent fortune, a predilection for fourteenth century art, coupled to the instinct and training of a composer would describe Vincent D'Indy, whose susceptibility to the fascination of the occult and mysterious made Uhland's romantic poem more than attractive for music treatment. Unfortunately, the work is an expression of his youthful attempts in the field of composition, and by no means possesses the solidity, though full of great delicacy, of his later compositions; compositions the rich fruit of Cesar Franck's clarifying criticisms. D'Indy meant "Le Foret Enchantee" to be considered as program music, but it certainly fails as an interpretation of the varying moods of nature as set forth in the poem, the forest murmurs, the shimmering moonlight, etc. It must be regarded as absolute music, and as such it is admirable, and found adequate expression in the superb orchestral rendering of the conductor's discriminating reading.

Many critics look upon the D minor symphony as the least interesting of Schumann's symphonic works. If so the fact may be ascribed in a large measure to the unhappy nature of some of the subjects treated. Then, again, there is an evident striving for originality, a striving that robs the work of the true fire of spontaneity, due, perhaps, to a lack of fixed conception. However, the symphony is resplendent with great beauty, particularly in the romance in A minor.

The orchestral work was especially fine in the passage about half way through the trio in B flat, where there is a wavering and decrescendo part before the sharp return to the tempo by the wind as if nothing out of the way had occurred. It may be well to note in passing that Mr. Arbos, the new concert-meister, gave some hint of the fine quality of his tone and grace in bowing in the phrases that immediately precede the scherzo.

The concert as a whole was most enjoyable, notwithstanding a lack of strong contrast other than the contrast between individual composer's point of view in the field of romanticism. Then Mr. Gericke never offers more than enough for proper digestion and assimilation.

[40]

EVENING BULLETIN—PHILADELPHIA TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 3, 1903.

Music and Drama

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Opens Its Winter Series of Concerts at the Academy of Music—The Week at the Theatres.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its first series of concerts at the Academy of Music last evening with a program which roused to enthusiasm the large audience that never fails to listen to this fine band. Mr. Gericke was again the conductor, using his baton with the reserve and telling effect which are characteristic of his leadership. The personnel of the orchestra is somewhat changed from last year, Messrs. Kneisel, who was the concertmeister, and Schroeder, the violincellist, having resigned to devote themselves more fully to the Kneisel Quartet, and Mr. Loeffler also being absent. Mr. Arbos is the new concertmeister.

The program had the element of novelty in the presentation, as its principal numbers, of the work of two Russian composers, Tschaikowsky and Glazounoff. Modern in his methods, bizarre in many of his effects and often with the glarish coloring of the Russian musical school, Tschaikowsky weaves into his compositions an irresistible charm and proves his right to a place among the great composers. He was represented last night by his Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 1, in B flat minor, which, while it purports to give to the pianist the best of its opportunities, nevertheless demands of the orchestra an equal share of attention and technical proficiency. Much more than in the average piano concerto, does the orchestra, in this composition, shine forth with a brilliancy quite its own, and without robbing the pianist, Harold Bauer, of any of the credit due him for his fine interpretation, there must be the acknowledgment that to the other players belongs no inconsiderable amount of praise for the success of the interpretation. Mr. Bauer, at the piano, repeated the excellent impression made here on former appearances. He is a stolidly built young man, with a full, German countenance, and a mop of bushy hair, with little that is poetical in his appearance; yet once his fingers touch the keys one feels that there is enough of sentiment and poetry in his nature. This, in fact, is what made his rendition of last night most notable. It was not in the grand climaxes of the composition that he won his audience so much as in the placid, song-like simplicity of the second movement, andantino semplice. In this Mr. Bauer's playing was charming. The runs rippled from his fingers like pearls of sound, and always with the sweetest of tone, utmost delicacy and the illumination of poetic feeling. In the stronger passages his power was not extraordinary nor his command of the instrument particularly noteworthy, though he held himself to a high standard of technical ability throughout.

The orchestral numbers were the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe," which was exquisitely played; the Entr'acte Symphonique from "Messidor," Bruneau, and Glazounoff's Symphony, No. 4, in E flat. The Bruneau composition, which, like that of Glazounoff, was given for the first time at these concerts, is of the operatic style, with the interwoven melodies that introduce the fourth act of the work. The music was written to accompany a libretto by Zola, which was the subject of earnest discussion, because he put it into prose instead of verse and instilled into it his inherent realism. But we have only the music to judge, and that shows a masterly hand, with much that is melodious, though striking originality may at times be lacking. The Glazounoff Symphony which closed the program, has but three movements, and of these the second, scherzo, allegro vivace, was felt to be most attractive by last night's listeners. Exquisitely beautiful was the rendering of the lovely melody of this part, where the clarinet and violas sing against the throbbing accompaniment of the strings. Onward from this placidity develops a florid embellishment into an allegro that demands the full force of the orchestra and which Mr. Gericke brought out with majestic power. Powerful it was, yet never blatant, never with a crash of brasses that annoyed the ear. The finale of the composition—its most important part—again swelled into force after a brief time of quiet, in which a pleasing dancelike melody came to light, only to yield to the insistent fortissimo which brought the climax. The composition, as a whole, is a noble one, and its rendition was in line with the best work of this magnificent orchestra. The first concert of the second series will be held to-morrow evening, when Madame Gadski will be the soloist.

PUBLIC LEDGER—PHILADELPHIA THURSDAY MORNING. NOVEMBER 5, 1903.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

The First of the Season's Wednesday Concerts, with Mme. Gadski as Soloist

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Wilhelm Gericke, gave the first of this season's Wednesday evening concerts in the Academy of Music yesterday, presenting the following programme:

"Sakuntala" Overture.....Goldmark
Recitative and Aria from "Der Freischuetz," Weber
"La Foret Enchantee".....d'Indy
"Gretchen am Spinnrade" and "Erlkoenig," Schubert
Symphony in D minor, No. 4.....Schumann

The "Sakuntala" overture, with its poetic charm and fascinating rhythmic movement, is one of the most delightful of all concert overtures, and is one of the things which the Boston Orchestra, with its fineness and precision of execution, plays with great beauty, although last evening it rather failed in its impression on account of the very poetic treatment which Mr. Gericke gives it. The suggestion of the elemental lover yearning for his mate, and the tremendous passion of the grief stricken king, were lacking in the interpretation which, as a whole, made the great work seem unusually colorless. To a certain extent this was true of the d'Indy composition. This is another bit of the so-called "programme" music, for the understanding of which it is necessary to know about Harald the Hero, who is riding through a forest with his warriors. The Elves appear and allure them all but Harald himself to Elfland. The Hero rides alone until, drinking of an enchanted spring, he falls asleep, and there lies dreaming, year after year. This essentially French work is full of the most delightful mysticism, with its suggestion of rustling leaves, moonlight, running streams, beings of another world, very eerie and exceedingly dainty, but hardly a composition that one would care to hear very often. It was not really until the performance of the symphony that one felt at all moved. It would be hard to imagine anything more thoroughly delightful than the playing of this romantic fourth symphony. It is one of the most lovely of all of them, full of color, and with some wonderful passages for the violins, that make such a distinct impression. The great band was heard at its best in this work, which was the last number on a very pleasing programme.

The real interest of the evening centered in Madame Gadski, who has not been heard here in concert for some time, and whose rendition of "Agatha's Prayer" is always a delight. Last night she was in fine voice, her pure notes ringing out over the orchestra in a way that made one long to hear the opera given in its entirety. At the close of the aria she was recalled again and again, and later in the evening she renewed the impression by her rendition of the two lieder, with orchestral accompaniment, by Schubert, "Gretchen am Spinnrade" and the familiar "Erlkoenig," both of which she sang with effect.

PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER,
THURSDAY MORNING,
NOVEMBER 5, 1903

THE MUSICAL SEASON

Second Concert at the Academy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard at the Academy of Music again last evening, when it confirmed and deepened the impression which it produced by its performance last Monday evening, that it is playing this season with a greater splendor of tone, a larger freedom of movement and a more eloquent and strenuous intensity of expression than ever. Its work, without losing any of the delicacy and refinement, of the extraordinary finish and impeccable accuracy, which have long distinguished it, has distinctly gained in plasticity and power, and in addition to the aesthetic enjoyment of which it has always been the occasion, the emotional effect impression which it now produces is very deep.

Something of all this is not impossibly due to the change which has taken place at the desk of the concert-master. Franz Kneisel is an admirable musician; no one will question that. His sound and sure technique is equal to any emergency. He is in every respect and altogether trustworthy, and he must have been of great assistance to Mr. Gericke and to the other conductors with whom he was associated in bringing up the orchestra to the high standard of executive efficiency to which it has attained. But Mr. Kneisel has his limitations. He has a beautiful tone but no temperament, no passion, no individuality, no emotional communicativeness. His disposition is to refine his work beyond the point at which refinement ceases to be a virtue, and to efface his personality until little is left but a fiddling machine.

This must have had its influence upon the orchestra, and the influence could not have been wholly good. It must at least have emphasized that tendency to refine the life out of the score which it interpreted, which was a good deal more strongly emphasized a few seasons ago than it is to-day. Mr. Arbos, who has taken Mr. Kneisel's place as concert master, seems to be a different kind of man. He may not pay as much attention to detail as did his predecessor, and, indeed, there is an irregularity in the bowing of the violins which never existed before, but apparently there is about him a magnetism which Mr. Kneisel did not possess and which after all is indispensable to the achievement of really satisfactory and satisfying results. Certainly the orchestra never played with so much force and fire and fervor as have marked the interpretation of the two programs in which it has thus far been heard.

Its performance of the Schumann symphony in D minor No. 4 last night, in its lucidity, its symmetry, its eloquence and its power, was comparable with its glorious rendering of the orchestral part of the Tschaikowsky concerto on Monday, and nothing could have been finer than its reading of Goldmark's gorgeous "Sakuntala" overture or its fluent and poetic presentation of D'Indy's tone poem, "The Enchanted Forest." It was all exquisite and admirable and it entitles Mr. Gericke and his associates to the highest praise.

The orchestra was assisted by Mme. Gadski, who sang the well-known air from "Freischutz," Schubert's "Spinning Wheel" song and the same composer's "Erlkonig," with an abundance of voice, of art, of intelligence and of sentiment. As usual there were a lot of people who wanted more. The audience was large and there was plenty of applause.

THE EVENING POST:
NEW YORK, FRIDAY,
NOVEMBER 6, 1903.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The musical season begins earlier in Boston than in New York, which explains why the two Boston organizations that regularly visit this town are always among the earliest in the field. The Kneisel Quartet played here on Tuesday, and last night the Symphony Orchestra was heard at Carnegie Hall. Both drew large audiences, which is as it should be. Mr. Gericke had arranged an interesting programme, including Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, Mendelssohn's violin concerto, Wagner's "Waldweben," and Brahms's second symphony. All this music was played with precision and refinement, but with little emotional warmth. The soloist was Mr. Fernandez Arbos, the orchestra's new concert master. His performance of the Mendelssohn concerto did not break any records of excellence. It was that of a clever orchestral player, rather than of a born virtuoso, and indicated that he was more in place as a leader of violins than as a soloist. He got plenty of applause and was recalled several times. The next concert of the Boston orchestra will take place at Carnegie Hall to-morrow afternoon, Mme. Gadski being the soloist. This evening the orchestra plays at the Brooklyn Academy of Music with the same soloist.

NEW YORK AMERICAN
FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1903.

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES A COLD PERFORMANCE.

Brings a New Concertmeister for the First of Its Series of Winter Concerts. Mr. Gericke the Director

BY WILLIAM ARMSTRONG.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra came to town last night for the first of its series of concerts this season, bringing as solo'st the new concertmeister Fernandez-Arbos. The several performances of the orchestra under Mr. Gericke's direction were as hard, cold and brilliant as a block of ice. This same icy effect was accentuated by the soloist's interpretation of Mendelssohn's concerto in E minor for violin.

In point of congeniality Fernandez Arbos should be peculiarly acceptable to Mr. Gericke, for his temperament is nearly allied to that of a sedan chair. When the two appear in the same programme as soloist and conductor the result demands courage to support.

Strong Contrast to Kneisel.

No stronger contrast could readily be imagined than that which the newcomer makes to his predecessor, Mr. Kneisel, whose resignation at the close of last season fluttered Boston into a mildly hysterical state. But no man is indispensable, however strongly he may deem himself so, and while his successor may not excell in his own especial qualities, he may have some other valuable ones in another direction that make him of service.

The artistic development of Mr. Kneisel is warmly in recollection. Fernandez-Arbos is troubled by no such possession. He has a fine technique, is energetic and enthusiastic, but never remotely impassioned, and interprets in the iron-bound style of the hardened orchestral player. Under the mechanical soulfulness of Mr. Gericke's conducting he is the right man for the post which he has been elected to hold.

Had the Assurance of an Artist.

If a little of the sentimentality of some of his predecessor's interpretations of the Mendelssohn had fallen to the violinist's lot last night, it would have been happier for his audience; as it was he played the work brilliantly, with manly repose and the assurance, if not the temperament, of an artist. The orchestral numbers consisted of Weber's "Euryanthe," the most acceptable item in the programme, as far as its reading was concerned; the "Waldweben," from Wagner's "Siegfried," and Brahm's Symphony No. 2.

THE MAIL AND EXPRESS
FRIDAY EVENING,
NOVEMBER 6, 1903

Boston Symphony Orchestra Opens Its New York Season Before a Fine Audience. Brahms, Gericke and the New Violinist, Arbos.

By the time Wilhelm Gericke, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under his direction, reached the swinging second theme of the Brahms D major symphony's opening movement, at Carnegie Hall last night, he had expiated the sins, if sins they may be called, of his earlier doings.

In Brahms Mr. Gericke delights, as, indeed, do most unprejudiced lovers of music nowadays, and this symphony, particularly, has brought out some of his happiest gifts of interpretation, much as has the great C major symphony of Schubert. So the splendid audience last evening listened to a well-nigh perfect performance of this symphonic master work, one that kept clearly marked the intertwined instrumental paths and that left no opaque spots in a vision of transparent beauty. Played as the Boston orchestra gives it, this Brahms music reveals at every repetition some new claim to respect and some previously unperceived effect of tone color. There is nothing of the austere here, but always a quality of dignified lovableness. And to the conductor must be expressed full thanks.

But why does Mr. Gericke become the martinet, one had almost said the schoolmaster, in such music as the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried"? Not all the shimmering charm of delicately rasped strings, nor the admirable tones of the first oboe, clarinet and horn could dispel the sense of rigid measurement and uninspired accuracy of tempo. The Weber "Euryanthe" overture, which began this, the Boston orchestra's first New York concert of the season, was again more in Mr. Gericke's vein, but there was merciless precision in his Mendelssohn concerto accompaniment.

To the familiar Mendelssohn violin work concert goers looked forward with curiosity for the debut as soloist of Fernandez Arbos, the new Spanish first violinist of the orchestra, who replaces Franz Kneisel. Mr. Arbos may not have been at his best last night, but he made no very deep impression.

His tone is large, but not markedly sympathetic, though it was varied intelligently, as a clear brain might have dictated. His facility is very marked, but he utilized it to hurry through the music faster, even, than Mr. Gericke liked to let him, and to clip phrases and cut corners in a highly unemotional way, to say the least. Furthermore, Mr. Arbos played out of tune so frequently that one could not escape it.

The audience applauded the newcomer courteously, and doubtless hoped for better work in the future. Mr. Arbos may yet prove a man of high value as first violin.

The orchestra will give its first matinee to-morrow, with Mme. Gadski as soloist.

COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,
NEW YORK, FRIDAY,
NOVEMBER 6, 1903.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mildly and gently the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its season at Carnegie Hall last evening. Mr. Gericke was in one of his most unexciting moods, both as to programme and performance, and the large audience left the hall without the slightest increase in the throbbing of its pulse. It was such a concert as we are sure to get from the Boston organization once or twice in a season—but, to tell the truth, it is more welcome later on when music is less of a novelty. It began with Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, excellently played, but not too thrillingly. Then came Mendelssohn's violin concerto, the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried," and finally Brahms's symphony in D major, No. 2.

It always takes a little time to get used to Mr. Gericke. At the beginning of the season all his stiffness and angularity seem doubly evident, and one looks forward to the rest of the concerts with a feeling more or less of dismay. Then nature steps in and does her part, and before March has come one is quite reconciled to all his little peculiarities and can enjoy to the full the wondrous tonal beauty of his band. This year, however, it may be different. There will be so many conductors of renown and the usual mediocrity will be at such a discount that it is possible the Boston leader will have more than his usual struggle to hold his own. Certainly better work must be done than that which characterized the concert last evening. More red blood must be infused into such works as Weber's overture. More poetry and imagination must be revealed in such writings as the "Waldweben," and even Brahms can be lifted to a higher plane, although Mr. Gericke is strong in Brahms. Decidedly we have had better performances and better programmes than last night's.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. Fernandez-Arbos, the new concert master, and it would be stretching the truth to say that he added much to the pleasure of the concert. Doubtless he was very nervous, and much allowance may be made on that score. He has a more difficult task before him than the general public realizes, and it was, moreover, a severe test of the violinist's nerve to compel him to make his début here as a soloist at the very first concert.

The general impression made by him was that of a violinist of only moderate ability. He has a large tone, but one which is neither particularly brilliant nor particularly sweet. It is rather coarse and unrefined. He has a facile but uncertain technique. His intonation left much to be desired, for while more or less playing out of tune is by common consent forgiven in rapid passage work, it is difficult to reconcile oneself to such a sin in the slow movement of the Mendelssohn concerto, where Mr. Arbos was really at his worst. When one must add to this that he was unsteady in his rhythms and very choppy in his phrasing, it is easy to see that his work was disappointing. Mr. Arbos may be an admirable concert master, but as a soloist he does not excite much interest.

The usual matinée concert will be given to-morrow afternoon. The programme comprises Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, D'Indy's "Le Forêt Enchantée," and Glazounoff's fourth symphony in E flat, the last two being new to New York. Mme Gadski will be the soloist, singing "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer," from "Der Freischütz," and "Gretchen am Spinnrad," and "Der Erlkönig," with orchestral accompaniment.

THE WORLD: FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1903.

Conductor Gericke's Selections Not of Great Distinction, but They Are Rendered with All the Old-Time Skill.

As a maker of concert programmes, Conductor William Gericke, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has achieved neither distinction nor originality, and the fact was strongly impressed on the distinguished audience which greeted the famous Boston organization at the initial concert of its New York season in Carnegie Hall last evening. For so important an occasion Mr. Gericke might have found material less hackneyed than Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, the Wagner transcription of the scene before Fafner's cavern, and Mendelssohn's violin concerto as a foretaste to Brahms's symphony in D major.

True, the Mendelssohn concerto was played by Mr. E. Fernandez-Arbos, the organization's new concert master, but unfortunately the soloist of whom much was expected as the successor to Frank Kneisel, was a disappointment. Arbos may improve on acquaintance. His training and his reputation abroad justify that anticipation, and nervousness may be urged in explanation of his failure last evening.

Mr. Arbos has ample tone, but his technique was an uncertain quantity, and his interpretation of so familiar a work as the Mendelssohn concerto without distinction.

A great deal of contrary opinion has been vented on Brahms's second symphony, but the commentators are agreed on its lack of abstruseness and its abundant and genial melody. The work affords ample scope for temperamental interpretation, which, of course it did not receive from Mr. Gericke. The work of the orchestra was technically flawless. The absence of Messrs. Kneisel, Schroeder, Loeffler and others who have separated from the orchestra since last season was not felt.

The old-time power, balance and clearness of tone were there; so, too, was the metronomic precision with which the orchestra has been afflicted since the retirement of Mr. Nickish. Mme. Gadski will be the soloist at Saturday afternoon's concert.

THE MASTER ORCHESTRA.

Boston's Musicians Give Their First New York Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first concert of its eighteenth New York season at Carnegie Hall last evening. The usual interest which pervades the cultured clientele of this master orchestra was enhanced on this occasion by the fact that a number of strangers were making their bows. They were the successors of Kneisel, Loeffler, Svecenski, Schroeder and others, whose association with the orchestra had lasted so long that their absence seemed to be the first step in an art distintegration.

But orchestras like the one over which William Gericke presides, is not the creation of a person. It is an institution of slow growth, gathering as it progresses traditions as well as perfections, esprit de corps as well as technical skill, and is beyond the immediate effect of mutability in its individual elements.

It will do, therefore, to say that last evening Weber's "Euryanthe" overture—romantic, full of fantasy and melodic beauty; that exquisite page of Wagner's "Siegfried," the "Sounds from the Forest," with its idealization of nature's elemental moods, and Brahms's Second Symphony, "peaceful, tender and serene," as it has been described, were all admirably played, with an exposition of everything that makes for perfection in orchestral playing.

In the debut of the new concert-master, Mr. E. Fernandex-Arbos, there was keen interest. He occupied his proper office at the first desk in the symphony only, absenting himself in the other numbers in view of his work as a solo violinist in the first half of the programme. A better understanding of his capacity to occupy the important place of executive will be obtainable after further hearings.

It must be said, though, that the quality of his solo playing was not promising for his other work. The newcomer was very disappointng. He has an ample tone, substantial and penetrating, and in difficult passages he plays with a professor's care and solicitude, but his intonation, judging by last night's effort, is incredibly impure, his rhythmic sense is weak and there is little variety to his expressiveness. The fact that all this was made manifest in Mendelssohn's Concerto—a composition which is most hackneyed and is within the abilities of average violinists—made the disappointment all the more marked.

NEW-YORK DAILY TRIBUNE,
FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1903

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The change in the personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, caused by the withdrawal from that organization of the members of the Kneisel Quartet, was emphasized at the first concert of this season, given at Carnegie Hall last night, by the appearance of Mr. Kneisel's successor, Mr. Fernandez Arbos, in the capacity of solo performer as well as leader of the violins of the band. The first announcement of the programme had promised to present him also as a composer, but the promise was withdrawn and the programme curtailed of the number. Thus curtailed, the list of pieces lost its only contemplative novelty, and became an oft told tale—Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," Mendelssohn's concerto in E minor, played by Mr. Arbos, Wagner's "Waldweben" and Brahms's symphony in D major.

It would not be comforting to the admirers of the superb organization from Boston if they were obliged to believe that Mr. Arbos disclosed the full measure of his artistic qualities in his performance of the well worn work which he chose for his introductory medium. It was a very unsatisfactory performance indeed, full of strange and unaccountable vagaries in its rhythms, restless in tempo, frequently slipshod in execution, and, in the slow movement especially, wofully impure in intonation. Rather than dwell on the thoughts which it compelled, we prefer to believe that it was only a temporary aberration from the standard which the occupant of so dignified a position must represent. In all its numbers the orchestra was in fine fettle, and Mr. Gericke achieved a masterly reading, especially of the symphony. It is an old love, and his service in its honor is that of a devoted and chivalric virtuoseship. A numerous and delighted audience heard the concert.

[41]

There was almost as great a difference of opinion expressed about E. Fernandez-Arbos, the new concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Some persons declared that his intonation was excellent, and others that it was painfully bad. Now this question of intonation is very uncertain. What one man hears in one part of an auditorium is not always that which another man hears in a different part. Acoustics play weird tricks on hearers. Sometimes at the opera people in different parts of the house cannot agree at all as to the quality and power of certain voices.

The truth is that tone colors are affected by varying conditions of acoustics and there has never been any question that pitch is very susceptible to them. Carnegie Hall rejoices in the possession of notoriously bad acoustics. The writer of this department heard Mr. Arbos play sadly out of tune in certain passages of the Mendelssohn concerto, but in others he heard the gentleman play with absolutely perfect intonation. Mr. Arbos was so painfully nervous that the writer thought this must be the cause of the numerous slips, while he judged that extended passages which were played in accurate tune represented the normal performance of the artist. Is it possible that he was in his normal state when he played out of tune and that he was overcome temporarily by nervousness when he played in tune?

There would be a condition for a melomaniac author! A story in which a great singer could never sing in tune unless filled to the lips with some disturber of nervous composure, and who, on occasion, lost the bottle, had to go on the stage absolutely calm and had a frightful fiasco through singing a whole opera out of tune, like a second-rate German!

It was generally conceded that the style of Mr. Arbos was academic, that he displayed a plentiful lack of temperament, that he played like a teacher, and that there was absolutely nothing in his interpretation to stir up the passions.

But is not this the reason he was chosen to be the concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra? Would it have been wise of Mr. Gericke to hurl a flaming meteor into that vast area of complacency known as Boston? How would Mr. Gericke have liked it himself to have his left shoulder constantly overheated by the propinquity of a highly temperamental player? Was it not enough to have the insinuating Timotheus Adamowski moved up to the first desk to take the place of the elegant and scholarly Loeffler? A conductor must take some care of his health.

Mr. Arbos seems to be the right man in the right place. He has a big-toned fiddle, which is a good thing for the post of concertmaster. It is a fiddle that will be heard. It is like Patti—She-that-Must-be-Heard. Furthermore, that professorial bowing has its merits. The bowing of the first strings on Thursday night had traits of precision and unanimity that may fairly be credited to the concertmaster. At any rate they belonged to his department.

Again were heard some of the familiar complaints of Mr. Gericke's want of impulsiveness. It is quite true that the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not a director of intense warmth. Never under his baton has the vorspiel to "Tristan und Isolde" sounded like the beaming line of Tennyson:

"Our spirits rushed together at the touching of the lips."

Mr. Gericke believes in restraint. He is a seeker after beautiful and perfect polish. He searches continually for solid, clear, opulent tone. He gets it. Such a tone as that of the Boston orchestra is not heard from any other organization in this country. With it goes a finish of attack, phrasing and nuance so high as to be little short of wonderful.

Mr. Gericke is a past master of balance. There is no preponderating element in his tonal compound. To be sure one sometimes wishes that the clarion voices of the brass would peal just a trifle more vigorously, but if they did we should probably all perceive at once that a lovely artistic plan had been distorted.

Mr. Gericke's style has its field. It is not in the wild riot of Wagner, nor in the wind-swept northern grandeur of Tschaikowsky. It is in the serene and introspective musical contemplations of Johannes Brahms. Here Mr. Gericke is altogether at home. Here he roams with delight among the starry dreams of a profound and self-contained spirit. Here he communes with a nature altogether sympathetic to him. His interpretation of such works as the D major symphony, heard at Thursday night's concert, is that of a master laboring in a congenial field.

That Brahms can be read otherwise and with effective results used to be thoroughly demonstrated by Emil Paur. On the other hand, such a thoroughly temperamental conductor as Anton Seidl was furthest from his forte in the music of Brahms. Perhaps that was because Seidl was a confirmed Wagnerian. If Mr. Gericke were one, he too might fail to penetrate to the secrets of Brahms. But Paur, who was a fiery fellow, was also an analyst. He could probe the depths of Beethoven as successfully as he could skim the shining shallows of Liszt. He has had much success in London, where they have not yet discovered that he had an American career. They think he had just left the wilds of Germany when he went to London.

In Germany there is a conductor who has never been induced to return to us. His name is Nikisch. He was a compound of all the qualities which should go to make a great musical director. He had—he still has—brains, musicianship, passion and a certain poetic elegance which spread an artistic polish over everything he attempted. Some day—but that is another story.

Among the conductors who are coming is Richard Strauss. A few nights ago an instructor of music in one of the leading universities sat in a club and described the effect of a performance of "Tristan und Isolde" under Richard Strauss. The singers were bad. The hero and the heroine were the worst imaginable. They never sang a note in tune. The scenery was cheap. The accessories were bald. The orchestra was commonplace.

But Richard Strauss, without any attempt at the emphasis of details, poured into the score such a wealth of agonizing expression that at the end of the third act men walked home in utter silence. Some even shed tears. That is temperament. It is something more. It is deep and passionate insight. This man Strauss knows the significance of that stupendous score. Would it not be a treat to hear a performance of that kind in the Metropolitan Opera House? We have the Isolde, an Isolde who can tear heartstrings with the best Strauss of them all. Perhaps we have not the ideal Tristan; he is not coming here again. But we have one who can sing better than the one above described.

There is a man named Mottl. Who knows? Possibly he may at some time in the course of the coming season conduct "Tristan und Isolde." Perhaps then we may hear something.

W. J. HENDERSON.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Its New Concertmaster the Season's First Solo Player.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its eighteenth season in this city with a delightful concert at Carnegie Hall last evening. The programme consisted of Weber's "Euranthe" overture, the Mendelssohn violin concerto, the "Waldweben" from Wagner's "Siegfried" and the D major symphony of Brahms. The solo performer in the concerto was E. Fernandez-Arbos, the new concertmaster of the orchestra, engaged to take the important position left vacant by the resignation of Franz Kneisel.

The début of Mr. Fernandez-Arbos, who will undoubtedly be known for the sake of comfort and convenience as Mr. Arbos, was naturally the feature of interest in a concert of this nature. Undoubtedly there will be occasions in the future when this newcomer will be heard to greater advantage. London is indeed a big city and has a monstrous opinion of itself, when it is at home; but the resident of that capital, journeying a little into the world and facing with artistic offerings the public of this cosmopolitan and musically, as well as politically, independent metropolis, is sure to arrive with swiftness and certainty at the nerve racking realization that he is over against a sea of troubles.

Mr. Arbos was so plainly nervous last night that it was impossible to mistake the cause of some defects in his playing. Its merits were therefore none the less notable and all the more deserving of mention. The newcomer has a good, substantial tone, of excellent quality and sufficient power. It seemed last night to lack that indefinable magnetism which gives a personal and influential character to tone in the abstract. But this might have been due in some measure to the effect of nervousness on the bow arm. We shall have opportunities to judge of that later in the season.

Mr. Arbos disclosed a command of the fingerboard altogether admirable. His intonation was almost invariably correct. There were a few slips, but on the whole it was accurate, and exquisitely so. In rapid passages the finger work was clean and the enunciation clear. In short, Mr. Arbos is a well schooled violinist, who plays in tune and with a fluent technique.

He was so anxious about his phrasing last night that he made many little breaks in the sequence of tones which marred the symmetry of his style. He seemed to be afraid to attack things with freedom. His treatment of the slow movement, in particular, suffered from this constant betrayal of over carefulness. The movement was played with too much apparent calculation. It reminded one of young Gabrilowitsch in his first season here. But on the whole Mr. Arbos, without displaying any of the traits of mastery, without proclaiming himself a violinist of high rank, showed that he was an accomplished performer and an agreeable acquisition to the solo forces of the orchestra.

As for the orchestra itself, it remains the same notable organization as it has always been. Violinists may come, and violinists may go, but the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a permanent orchestra. It was in the Wagner music that its glories were most fully displayed last night. Mr. Gericke is a devotee of tone, and what a tone he gets out of that orchestra! The clarity, warmth and splendor of it make one think of sunlight. The listener fairly bathes in it and his soul expands in the glow of it.

In that "Waldweben" last night the marvelous play of all the myriad whisperings of the musical forest was brought out with a clearness little short of wonderful. It was the perfection of balance and purity. Such a piece of orchestral virtuosity was worth a day's journey to hear.

Nevertheless there was something left to be done in the symphony of Brahms, which was played with such suave expression, with such repose of style and withal with so much insight that the intelligent hearer must have left the hall feeling under a substantial debt of gratitude to Mr. Gericke.

Das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester.

Mit Weber's „Euryanthe"-Ouverture leiteten gestern Abend in Carnegie Hall die Bostoner ihr erstes New Yorker Konzert der fast noch ganz jungfräulichen Saison ein. Man ist gewohnt, sich auf die Leistungsfähigkeit dieser Orchester-Organisation als auf etwas absolut Stabiles zu verlassen, aber dieses Mal mochten doch einige musikalische Feinschmecker ihre Ohren ganz besonders spitzen, denn es waren ja einige bedeutungsvolle Personalsveränderungen an verschiedenen Pulten vorgegangen. Aber die erste Nummer des Programms mußte allen Zweifel an jener Stabilität verscheuchen. Nicht nur die bekannte Klarheit war da, sondern auch üppige Farbe, und Herr Gericke, der Dirigent, gestattete den Musikern sogar ein gewisses Draufgehen.

Aber nachher kam es Alles ganz anders. Ob es mit dem erwähnten Personalwechsel irgend etwas oder garnichts zu thun hat: Thatsache ist, daß gestern Abend die übrigen Programmnummern vom Bostoner Orchester nicht mit jener technischen Vorzüglichkeit gespielt wurden, wie man sie seit Jahren der Organisation nachgerühmt hat. Sogar im ersten Satz der Brahms'schen D-dur Symphonie, die doch dem Dirigenten und dem Orchester gerade die willkommenste Arbeit giebt — es sitzen viele Brahmsianer im Orchester! — gab es viel Unvollkommenes, vor Allem ganz unerwartete Unsicherheiten der Intonation. Und die war doch sonst immer so präzise! Immerhin konnte die Wiedergabe der Symphonie noch manchem anderen Orchester als Muster vorgehalten werden. Nicht so aber diejenige des Waldwebens aus „Siegfried." Da zeigte sich leider gar zu deutlich, wie wenig Herr Gericke in Wagner's Geist eingedrungen ist. Die Motive genau abzuzirkeln und so starr im Tempo spielen zu lassen, als stände ein Metronom hinter'm Pult, — das wird's nie und nimmer thun. In diesem Waldweben war auch nicht eine Spur vom echten Waldaroma zu spüren. Das Aroma war wie dasjenige des getrockneten und in Blechbüchsen verpackten Waldmeisters: es erinnerte an ästhetischen Thee.

Nun, seinen weniger guten Tag kann ein Jeder einmal haben, und daß die Bostoner des meisterhaften Orchesterspiels noch fähig sind, ging ja auch aus dem exzellenten Vortrage der „Euryanthe"-Ouverture hervor. Man warte also ruhig das zweite Konzert ab, ehe man sich der morbiden Vermuthung hingibt, daß am Ende der vorhin erwähnte Personalwechsel eine Verminderung der Leistungsfähigkeit des Orchesters herbeigeführt habe.

Allerdings muß über ein neues Mitglied des Orchesters, den Konzertmeister Fernandez-Arbos, schon heute abgeurtheilt werden, denn er trat gestern zugleich als Solist auf, und zwar mit dem Mendelssohn'schen Konzerte. Man kann nach seiner Leistung ganz unmöglich die Verwunderung darüber unterdrücken, wie der Herr zu dem angesehenen Posten gekommen ist. Der Dirigent und jeder einzelne Musiker des Bostoner Meister-Orchesters muß gestern Abend empfunden haben, daß der Solist weit unter dem Niveau blieb, auf dem sich die Darbietungen dieser Organisation zu halten pflegen. Arbos spielte mit peinlich unzuverlässiger Intonation und legte einen beängstigenden Mangel an rythmischem Gefühl an den Tag. Und da es an diesen unerläßlichen Eigenschaften fehlte, ist es ganz überflüssig, noch über die Stillosigkeit der Auffassung zu reden. Herr Arbos ist Spanier von Geburt und Erziehung, hat aber eine Reihe von Jahren in London als Violinlehrer gewirkt. Wenn er gestern seinen allerschlechtesten Tag gehabt hat, wird man sich doch kaum vorstellen können, daß selbst sein allerbester Tag gut genug für die Anforderungen sein möchte, die man in New York an Violin-Solisten stellt.

Am Samstag Nachmittag giebt das Bostoner Symphonieorchester sein zweites Konzert. Frau Johanna Gadski ist die Solistin.

THE NEW YORK TIMES.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1903.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Its First Concert in Carnegie Hall Last Evening.

A Great Audience's Friendly Greeting—Mr. Fernandez Arbos, the New Concert Master, as Soloist.

The deepening regard and appreciation in which New York holds the Boston Symphony Orchestra is shown in the steadily increasing attendance at the concerts of that organization that are given here. The first one of the season, which took place last evening in Carnegie Hall, was heard by an audience not only of very large numbers, but of the best that New York can muster in gentleness and refinement, in knowledge and understanding; an audience of friendliest sympathy that greeted Mr. Gericke and his men with demonstrations of welcome, as among the most highly valued contributors to the enjoyments of the musical season now at hand. It was not so much as if they were visiting as returning to a place rightfully theirs, to an artistic community of which they form a part; and, indeed, in the seventeen years of their recurrent visits they have become an essential factor in the musical activities of the season.

The orchestra was the same orchestra that has made this place for itself; yet there were new faces in it. The new concert master, Mr. Fernandez Arbos, was at his desk at the head of the violins; there were well-known figures in new places, Mr. Adamowski occupying the concert master's place before the appearance of Mr. Arbos as soloist; Mr. Krasselt was in his place at the head of the violoncellos, and there were other newcomers.

Mr. Gericke gave a programme modern in spirit yet conservative in form, containing nothing that was not a tale many times told, though always new. All the pieces upon it had been heard repeatedly from the Boston orchestra. Weber's "Euryanthe" overture is one that its conductors have always had a predilection for because of the effect that the violins can make in it with their leonine sweep and brilliancy in the opening theme; the mystery and tenderness of their pianissimo in the wonderful Largo passage in the middle; the brass and wood wind with their mellowness and richness. These were splendidly in evidence last evening in a performance that was stupendously vigorous and charged with color.

In the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried" there was not quite all the intimate poesy of the thing nor all the wild fragrance of the forest with which Wagner so marvelously fraught the music; the feeling was more of a well-ordered grove than of the real wildwood in which Siegfried had his adventures. Brahms's second symphony is one for which Mr. Gericke has always shown a special sympathy. His reading was warm in feeling and was a lucid exposition of its structure and symmetry, as well as of the spirit of lyric beauty in which Brahms conceived it.

Mr. Fernandez Arbos was the soloist; he played Mendelssohn's concerto. He was cordially welcomed, but the conclusion could not be avoided that his performance was a disappointment. He was in a position trying to the equanimity of any artist, and no doubt this had its effect upon his playing. But that the temperament that guided and informed that performance was not a deeply musical one, that the technical power it expressed was not an ample and far-reaching one, seemed plain. Mr. Arbos has a clear and penetrating tone, and bows with power if not with great freedom and flexibility.

It was disquieting, however, to hear him frequently lapse from the pitch, and still more so to hear in his playing a considerable lack of rhythmic instinct, of breadth of style, and of poetry and warmth of feeling. Mr. Arbos singularly failed to impress himself as a musician of authority and style. He appeared to have skill of a certain order and a command of the routine of his instrument; but, with all the friendly disposition that his audience had toward him, they expected more—more, at least, than he gave last evening. Whether he was then at his best and did the fullest justice to himself in the high position to which he has been appointed may remain to be seen.

EVENING TELEGRAM—NEW YORK,

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1903.

Boston Symphony Delights Large Crowd.

The first of the season's Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts filled Carnegie Hall last night with enthusiastic admirers of this sterling organization of musicians. Mr. Wilhelm Gericke conducted and handled his force most admirably. The first number was Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," a production written by the composer after the opera of that name had been completed. Weber was most enthusiastically received when the overture was played for the first time in Vienna, and the music particularly warrants it. The orchestra under Mr. Gericke's direction so delighted the auditors last night that they would gladly have welcomed a repetition. The "Waldweben," from Wagner's "Siegfried," a rippling melody of the life and stir of the forest, was most delicately played, the reed parts being handled with skill and precision, bringing the theme ever prominent before the eager listeners.

Brahms' symphony No. 2 in D major, opus 73, was the concluding selection of the orchestra. Mr. Gericke has been ever successful in bringing forth the hidden beauties of Brahms and interpreting the music so that it may be readily understood by those who find Brahms a problem of unknown quantities. He was most successful last night and retired from the stage with the plaudits of the crowd still ringing in his ears.

The soloist was Mr. E. Fernandez-Arbos, who played Mendelssohn's concerto in E minor for violin, with wonderfully brilliant execution and a clear, pleasant tone that charmed his audience. So flattering was his reception that he was called back four times, and the crowd would gladly have had the rule of no encores remitted for once.

It is always a pleasure to listen to the Boston Symphony. It is one of the principal delights of the winter musical season, and it seems this year as if the work of this sterling organization is better than ever.

[42]

NEW YORK HERALD,

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1903.

FIRST CONCERT OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

One of the Largest Musical Audiences of Season Gathers for Event at Carnegie Hall.

A NOTABLE PERFORMANCE

Senor Fernandez-Arbos Is Disclosed as a Musician of Much Skill and Finish.

At Carnegie Hall last night the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of the season before one of the largest gatherings of its patrons which has ever assembled there. It has become trite to accord this organization the position of greatest importance among the factors which make a New York musical season, but if Mr. Gericke and his men had not already earned title to such consideration their performances of last night might have done so.

Mr. Gerick's programme was well put together. Its atmosphere was vernal, buoyant, optimistic. Beginning with Weber's overture to "Euryanthe,' it included the Mendelssohn violin concerto and the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried," and was concluded by the second symphony of Brahms,' that in D major, opus 73. The soloist was the Spanish violinist Senor E. Fernandez Arbos, the recently appointed concert meister of the orchestra, whom the concert served as a local début.

There is no special need at this time to tell how the Boston Orchestra plays the second Brahms' symphony. Mr. Gericke's readings of it here have always constituted memorable musical moments, and that of ast night was fit to bear company with any of its predecessors.

Judged merely as a technical exposition of the scores contents the performance was remarkable, but above and beyond this there was vitalization of phrase, eloquence of accent, a vocal quality in the singing of the melodies and a poetic atmosphere suffused throughout the whole work. In this department of musical literature the band is at its best.

Not so wholly satisfactory was the "Waldweben," although played at once with microscopic care for detail and with large sweep. It lacked the "point" which perhaps ruder treatment might have given it, when, toward the close, motif piles upon motif to make that one short thrilling climax. The solo voices of this orchestra, it must be said, nevertheless gave it a distinction and refinement that it may never find in the opera house.

As the Mendelssohn violin concerto disclosed him, Señor Fernandez-Arbos would seem to be an able successor to the desk of Franz Kneisel rather than a valuable addition to the ranks of concert violinists. His tone is good, but slender, rather colorless and unelastic. His style is classic, precise, unemotional; his technique—particularly that of the left hand—is admirable.

But he impressed one constantly as an impeccable orchestral player, rather than as a musician burdened with an artistic message. In rapid passage work, noticeably in the upper positions, he was at his best, stopping very accurately, bowing with the utmost precision. The concerto's last movement was, therefore, his most effect piece of work, its second movement the least satisfying.

DAILY EVENING TELEGRAPH

—PHILADELPHIA,

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 3, 1903.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Opening of Their Season at the Academy of Music.

For the nineteenth time a season of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts has been opened at the Academy of Music in this town, and familiar faces were in evidence last night all over the house, in the well-known and well-loved company of musicians, and in the audience gathered to welcome their reappearance among us. Larger audiences have been seen to greet these same players than was there last night, although the house was very well filled indeed, especially down stairs, but the packing of the upper galleries that has sometimes occurred was not the case this time. Despite the many faces familiar to us that still remain in the orchestra, there are marked changes that make the body look strange. The withdrawal of the Kneisel Quartette from the orchestra to start forth as an independent body changes the appearance of the larger organization considerably. Most conspicuous by his absence is, of course, Kneisel himself, whose post of concert master has been filled by Mr. Arbos, a cosmopolitan Spaniard, of distinguished appearance and wide experience. Mr. Loeffler has been succeeded by Mr. Adamowski, and Mr. Schroeder is missed from the front row of 'cellos. That the standard of perfection required by Mr. Gericke in his orchestra is maintained despite thesechanges goes without saying.

Last night's programme opened with Weber's Euryanthe Overture, followed by Tschaikowsky's beautiful concerto for piano in B flat minor. Mr. Harold Bauer interpreted the work with great force and feeling, especially the passages of poetic delicacy. If it were not a sacrilege to apply the term "rag-time" to so classic and really noble a work, one could say that certain syncopated passages were of that disjointed order; and in those the perfect precision of piano and orchestra was not invariably accurate, but in the main the work was admirably rendered.

Two works then followed that are new to us, being presented last night for the first time here. Brumeau's Entr'acte to "Messidor," an opera which he wrote in collaboration with Zola, shows a French conception of the Wagnerian spirit. A whole opera on that basis might become tedious, but the brief bit given in last night's selection was very beautiful. The other novelty was a Russian symphony by Glazounoff, in E flat, a remarkable work of great interest. Very modern in spirit, it is original in conception and characteristic of national feeling in treatment.

NEW YORK PRESS, FRIDAY

NOVEMBER 6, 1903.

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S FIRST GREAT NIGHT

Greeted by Thousands of Music Lovers in Carnegie Hall.

ARBOS AS SOLOIST NOT FANCIED

Orchestral Numbers, as Usual with Mr. Gericke, Were Wagner and Brahms in One Evening.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes to town there is always rejoicing in the musical camp, and justly, for this organization of musicians, superbly trained, brings New York an orchestral ensemble which we have never been able even to approach at home. And so Carnegie Hall was filled last night with a great gathering of music lovers, and Mr. Gericke and his men were welcomed at their first concert of the season with enthusiasm. Yet it was decidedly an off night for the Boston orchestra. Its playing in every number, save the first, Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, was disappointing. Moreover, E. Fernandez-Arbos, the new concert master and the soloist of the evening, proved himself in no way worthy of his predecessor's (Kneisel's) place. Seldom has the Mendelssohn concerto, that test piece of all violinists, been played in so slovenly a manner on the New York concert stage. Mr. Arbos has a wiry tone; but that is not all. He plays often out of tune; his rhythm is unsteady; his bowing has no breadth and swing. Some of his faults may have been due to nervousness; all of them impossibly so. In the last movement, where there is little chance for sentiment, the violinist was heard more advantageously.

In orchestral numbers the programme offered, besides Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, Wagner's "Waldweben" from "Siegfried" and in accordance with Mr. Gericke's predilection of presenting Wagner and Brahms in one evening, the beautiful second symphony, in D major, opus 73. Weber's joyous overture was given with spirit. But the Wagner excerpt was played in so cut-and-dried a manner that the music was divested of every suggestion of poetry. Mr. Gericke beat the air relentlessly, gave his men no quarter and paid no attention to dynamical values.

With Brahms Mr. Gericke is always more successful, and the ennobling music of the German master was played last night with the clarity of tone and distinctness of outline for which he and his orchestra are famous. But even here the Boston musicians were not at their best. The first movement went with leaden feet; the second was at the start adagio, not "adagio non troppo," as specified in the music, and in its second part showed no gracefulness, though marked "grazioso"; the third went andante, but should have been "quasi andantino"; the last, though it ended brilliantly, began lazily. Much better was the Philharmonic Society's interpretation of this work last year.

NORTH AMERICAN,

PHILADELPHIA,

THURSDAY,

NOVEMBER 5, 1903.

SYMPHONY AND GADSKI CHARM MANY HEARERS

Gifted Singer and Splendid Orchestra Share Honors at the Academy.

GREAT MUSICAL NIGHT

Mme, Johanna Gadski, the Wagnerian soprano, was the soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening at the Academy, and she shared with that splendid musical organization the applause which was most liberally and worthily bestowed.

Her entrance followed the rendition of Goldmark's Sakuntala, her first vocal number being C. M. V. Weber's recitative and air from "Der Freischutz." She was in fine voice, and the demands of the music gave an excellent opportunity for the display of great vocal range. Symppathy and clearness made her singing an artistic treat. She was recalled six times by the most vociferous applause, but responded each time with bows.

The other two numbers allotted to her were Schubert's well-known "Gretchen am Spinnrale" (Margaret at the Spinning Wheel) and "Der Elkoenig." The latter is simple as to melody, but requires some dramatic force in its singing. Many recalls again followed.

Splendid Work in the Symphony.

The orchestral position of the programme was one worthy of the great organization. The numbers consisted of an overture, an aria and a symphony, of which the latter was the piece de resistance. It was D'Indy's "The Enchanted Forest," a rare bit of composition, full of natural tones and fine color.

Owing to the simplicity of its themes, it is a most remarkable example of the power of music writing. It is modestly heroic in its conception and it breathes of the woods and elfin life. In each of its four parts the different leit motifs are lost and found many times. The melodies stray into realms so far away that one wonders how the basic theme will ever again be reached, but by splendid tonal arrangement and almost musical jugglery the original theme again greets the ear.

Of the entire composition the third and fourth movements are by far the most pleasing. The third part begins with a minor on the part of the woodwinds, which is very effective. The strings follow, sustaining the obligato to the theme. Twinkling music succeeds and the story of the warrior reaching elfland is told.

Violins begin the fourth part with altered tempo, which becomes decidedly mixed. Altos on the violas and the most fantastic effects by the brasses mark a dance of the sprites around the hero of the tone story. The third recurrence to the guiding theme comes in fortissimo and the tempo becomes almost syncopated in its queer measures. The French horns are in evidence for few bars and the symphony draws to a majestic close.

Overture and Aria Finely Played.

The overture to "Sakuntala," in F major," by Carl Goldmark, is an old friend in Philadelphia. In its quiet simplicity the brasses have little to do. The harp is used to accentuate a beautiful minor passage. The clarionets, flutes and oboes contribute towardl fine harmony in the changes from major to minor qualities and thefinale was a perfect piece of concerted work.

"Mozart's "L'Amero," an aria from "The Shepherd King," was rather exalted in its character. Oriental color is discerned and the kettle drum has something to do. The composition showed the effectiveness of the orchestra in the sharpness of attack and finish.

The audience was large in numbers and most generous in its appreciation of a great musical night.

PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER,

TUESDAY MORNING,

NOVEMBER 3, 1903

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Bauer the Soloist—A Russian Symphony Feature of the Evening.

The first concert, first series, of the twenty-third Philadelphia season of the Boston Orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, was given at the Academy of Music last night,and proved in no way disappointing to the familiar first-night "Boston Symphony" audience. The program was one of pleasant contrast and exemplified in three of the numbers characteristics of the advanced Slavic and Gaelic schools in composition and with Mr. Harold Bauer as the soloist read as follows:—

Weber.....Overture to "Euryanthe"
Tschaikowsky....Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 1, in B flat minor, Op. 23
Bruneau.....Entr'acte Symphonique from "Messidor" (first time at these concerts)
Glazounoff..Symphony No. 4, in E flat, Op. 48 (First time at these concerts.)

The personnel of the orchestra, aside from the withdrawal of the brilliant Kneisel Quartet group and Loeffler, remains unchanged. Senor Arbos, the distinguished Spanish violinist, presides at the concertmeister's desk, and Mr. Klassert, though but barely 24 years of age, comes to America highly indorsed and takes Mr. Schroeder's place as the leader of the 'celli. These excellent musicians will be heard in solo later in the season.

The program as a whole was marked by that distinction in style, purity of intonation and reserve, elements that for long have made the name of the orchestra synonymous with all that makes for perfection in orchestral work, and were plainly in evidence in the opening number, Weber's ever-beautiful overture; the spirit of the work being well rendered by the orchestra through the illuminative reading of Mr. Gericke, who is certainly the master of his men and whose methods represent the highest form of conducting along academic lines.

Had not the Glazounoff overshadowed it naturally the focal point of interest would have been Mr. Bauer's rendering of the gigantic B-flat minor concerto. That the great pianist gave a fine rendering of the work is to be taken for granted, as Mr. Bauer commands attention and awakens interest in all that he offers. But the spirit of the Tschaikowsky concerto can best be understood by one who is racially allied to the nationality of the composer, and he, granting technique and temperament, can alone make plain the tremendous onslaught of the chords of the opening theme, chords reminding one of white-hot iron sending out showers of scintillating sparks under the massy blows of a Berkserker in his fury.

It is just that abandon in execution that Mr. Bauer lacked in his interpretation of the concerto's storm and stress, with its intermittent lulls of suggestive repose. One takes it that the spirit of the concerto is not in harmony with the nicely adjusted and delicate, artistic make-up of Mr. Bauer, as there was nothing in his rendering of the composition that carried one away on the whirlwind of passionate intensity—the one and great quality of the work. Without such emphasis the concerto was rather "flat," although one would hardly go so far as to finish the quotation and say in Mr. Bauer's hands it was "stale and unprofitable."

The entr'acte music from Bruneau's "Messidor" can be looked upon as absolute music, as the five themes form a poem symphonique of flowing tide of beautifully related tone-colors, and by no means necessitates an acquaintance with the opera for an understanding of its musical import. The delicacy of the "Spring" and "Love" themes were keenly felt by Mr. Gericke, and beautifully rendered by the orchestra.

But, after all, the symphony was the complete expression of the program, both in interest and rendering. The work is without that note of gloom that is so often in evidence in the work of the Russian school. It is resplendent in spontaneity of idea and instinct with the glow of life—the rich red blood of a healthy musical conscience. The languorous melody of the first movement was charmingly given by the English horn, and the scherzo and the brilliant finale superbly sustained the interest of the first movement. One feels that the work, however, is suggestive of a fantasy woven around beautiful themes, and is a magnified suite or a symphonic poem rather than the accepted symphony, but as a closing number its rendering was a real joy.

PHILADELPHIA PRESS

TUESDAY,

NOVEMBER 3, 1903

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY

First Concert for the Season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, gave its first concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening in the presence of one of those large and brilliant audiences which these always welcome occasions never fail to attract. It rendered with somewhat more than even its wonted splendor of tone, lucidity of statement, eloquence of utterance and accuracy of execution a program which began with Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, which included the B flat minor pianoforte concerto of Tschaikowsky and an entr'acte from Bruneau's opera of "Messidor," and which closed with what was its most noteworthy feature, the fourth or E flat symphony of the distinguished Russian composer, Glazounoff, a work which had not previously been heard in this city.

Perhaps there was some regrettable lack of contrast and variety in this arrangement. It consisted exclusively, as the reader will observe, of what is known as romantic music. The Weber overture was the nearest approach to the classics which it comprised, and as a result of this uniformity some sense of monotony was felt before the end was reached. Yet it was a good concert, too, and it was followed with a close attention and applauded with a discriminating judgment which attested alike the interest and the intelligent appreciation of the audience. Its chief feature was, of course, the Glazounoff symphony, which is not a composition of which it is possible to form an enlightened estimate or to express an illuminative opinion on a single hearing. Its score is complex, its sentiment is poetic and elusive, its thematic material is graceful, melodious and impressive, and altogether it may be set down as a bright, spontaneous and pleasing work with which one would like to form a more intimate acquaintance. It is not so strenuous or so characteristically Slavonic as most of the music young Russia writes, but it is not the less enjoyable for that. Not everyone can safely take the liberties which are permissible in a Tschaikowsky.

The assisting artist was Mr. Harold Bauer, a rising and accomplished young pianist, who is well and favorably known here, and whose selection was the beautiful B flat minor concerto of Tschaikowsky. This is a work of the most unsparing difficulty, which makes every kind of exaction upon its executant and must be played with power and freedom to be effective, and it is high praise to say of Mr. Bauer's performance that it was adequate and satisfying and that it conveyed a clear idea of the significance and of the loveliness of the music. Mr. Bauer's tone is a little hard, but he plays with force and brilliancy, with plenty of feeling and yet with an admirable diginy, and the enthusiastic applause which he elicited was well deserved. People ought to understand, however, that no encores are allowed at these concerts, and that it is mere waste of time to insist upon their being granted. This insistence last night on the part of a few was the source of annoyance and inconvenience to the large proportion of those present.

The orchestra will give another concert to-morrow evening, when Madam Gadski will sing and when the symphony will be that by Schumann in D minor No. 4.

N. Y. [illegible]
Nov 5 03

TWO MUSICAL NOVELTIES

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Works by D'Indy and Glazounoff.

Two novelties were performed at the second Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon. They were D'Indy's "La Foret Enchantée," a symphonic description of Uhland's ballad, "Harald," and Glazounoff's Symphony No. 4, in E flat, opus 48. Neither composition proved in any way a great addition to modern musical literature; each lacked that original force which makes itself felt even at a first hearing. The Russian's work, however, combining much hthat came from Wagner with thematic material of Slavonic flavor tinged with Tschaikowskian colors, was distinctly the more interesting.

Glazounoff is an accomplished composer, a clever contrapuntist. He has the exuberant melodic sweep of the East, the painstaking workmanship of Western Europe, the command of orchestration characteristic of the moderns. The scherzo, with its tinkling pizzicato effects in the woodwind and its substratum of rhythmical twists and turns, was delightful. The finale, begining andante, quickening to an allegro and scurrying through various modulations and contrapuntal effects to a triumphant close, was impressive, however much it reminded one of Wagner's "Meistersinger."

D'Indy's tone poem, rich in its orchestration and poetically worked out, was pleasant to the ear. But the Wagnerian inspiration was at all times so obvious it could not but detract from the work. The most that can be said is that D'Indy has caught well the atmosphere of Uhland's poem and has given to it an appropriate Wagnerian setting.

By far the best feature of the concert was Mme. Gadski's sympathetic singing of Agathe's recitative and aria from the second act of Weber's "Freischütz." Much less satisfying was her singing of Schubert's "Gretchen am Spinnrade" and "Erlkonig." They were divested of feeling and dramatic power. But part of the fault may have been due to Mr. Gericke's relentlessly rigid orchestral accompaniments. This conductor's metronomical progress through Goldmark's overture "Sakuntala," the first number on the programme, made that piece a mere display of orchestral virtuosity.

[43]

Staats Zeitung
Nov 9-03

Ganz so glatt und unfehlbar, wie man es Dank gewohnt gewesen, ging's im gestrigen zweiten Konzert des Bostoner Symphonieorchesters nicht her, obgleich die Orchesterleistungen, als Ganzes betrachtet, noch immer den in New York üblichen Aufführungen als Muster vorgehalten werden können. Die Bostoner haben uns verwöhnt, und da merkt man's um so eher, wenn einmal das erste Horn oder das Englischhorn nicht ganz ihre Schuldigkeit thun. Was den Streichkörper des Orchesters betrifft, so strahlte er gestern in seiner ganzen wohlaccreditirten Glorie, und so darf man sich immerhin der Hoffnung hingeben, daß die neuesten Personalveränderungen im Orchester dessen Leistungsfähigkeit nicht beeinträchtigt haben. Aber daß der neue Konzertmeister das Einstimmen vor dem Konzert auf der Plattform besorgt, daß er zu den verschiedenen Geigerpulten geht und sein A giebt, ist keine erfreuliche Neuerung. Das Einstimmen kann vorher geschehen, und wenn ein Nachstimmen nöthig ist, sollte so wenig wie möglich Aufhebens davon gemacht werden. Das Publikum kommt, um Musik zu hören und nicht die Vorbereitungen zum Musikmachen.

Das Programm war gestern ein recht modernes. In Goldmark's „Sakuntala"-Ouvertüre gab es orientalische Farbenpracht zu hören, nicht zu sehen. Dann kam „Der verzauberte Forst" von Vincent d'Judy, eine „orchestrale Legende", Programmmusik nach französischer Auffassung. Selbst in ihren Orchesterwerken können die modernen Franzosen die Salon-Atmosphäre nicht los werden. D'Judy ist zweifellos ein ernster und gewissenhafter Musiker, und was er in dieser Legende darbietet, ist zum mindesten anhörenswerth. Aber viel musikalisches Rückgrat ist nicht darin, wohl aber eine reichliche Anzahl Wagner'scher Reminiscenzen. D'Judy hat gelernt, die Orchesterfarben nach den Regeln der modernen Instrumentations-Kunst zu mischen, aber hinter der Farbenentfaltung steckt nicht viel Geist. Auch kann man von diesem „verzauberten Forst" nicht behaupten, daß er einem das beigegebene Programm unabänderlich klar mache. Immerhin, es war eine dankenswerthe Bekanntschaft, die man in diesem Produkt der jung-französischen Schule machte. Den Schluß des Programms machte die vierte Symphonie von Alexander Glazonnoff, die in New York zuvor noch nicht gehört worden war. Glänzend instrumentirt, wie so ziemlich alle Erzeugnisse der modernen russischen Komponisten, erzählt sie Einem wenig Neues, und das Neue ist durchaus nicht bedeutend. Am meisten gefiel, und mit Recht, der zweite scherzose Satz, der recht originelle Orchestrationseffekte darbringt, und dabei doch nicht gesucht klingt. Der letzte Satz ist aber wohl der musikalisch-kraftvollste, auch bringt er etwas russische Steppenluft. Gespielt wurde die Symphonie mit großer Virtuosität.

Zu dem orientalisch-französisch-russischen Orchesterprogramm bildeten die urdeutschen Salonnummern der Frau Gadski einen höchst wohlthätigen Gegensatz. Die Agathen-Arie aus Weber's „Freischütz" ist eine immerhin etwas gefährliche Konzertnummer. Aber Frau Gadski darf sie schon risktren. Im „Leise, leise" klang ihre Stimme geradezu berauschend schön und weich, und den recitativischen Theil gab sie mit gerade so viel Reserve, als die Konzertsaals-atmosphäre nöthig macht. Dagegen hielt im Finale Dirigent Gericke den Jubel doch ein wenig zu sehr zurück. Auch in den beiden Liedern „Gretchen am Spinnrade" und „Erlkönig" von Schubert, schien der Dirigent fortwährend auf Mäßigung des Tempos bedacht zu sein. Beide Lieder wurden zu der Liszt'schen Instrumentation gesungen. Daß aber Frau Gadski dramatische Leidenschaft in hohem Maße besitzt, weiß ja das Publikum längst von der Oper her; so war es also geradezu interessant, sie auch einmal im reservirteren Konzertstil zu hören. Im „Erlkönig" gab sie ohnehin ein packendes dramatisches Bild, die vier verschiedenen Stimmen — des Erzählers, des Vaters, des Erlkönigs und des Kindes — prächtig charakterisirend. Jawohl, Frau Gadski versteht sich nicht nur auf das Dramatische, sondern auch auf das, was man im engeren Sinne Kunstgesang nennt. Ihre Stimme klang gestern in allen Lagen und in allen Schattirungen ganz herrlich frisch und üppig.

N.Y. Life
Nov 19-03.

THE musical season may be said to have opened on November 4th with the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There is always a cordial welcome in New York for Mr. Gericke and his chosen artists. Why Boston—far away, arctic, conventional, timid, cut-and-dried Boston—should produce an orchestra so immeasurably superior to anything in New York is a conundrum too mortifying to answer.

TRIBUNE. SUNDAY,
NOVEMBER 8, 1903.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Gericke enlivened the first of this season's afternoon concerts at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon with two works never before heard in New-York. They were a symphonic legend (to quote the composer's definition), entitled "La Forêt Enchantée," by Vincent d'Indy, and a symphony in E flat, the composer's fourth work of its kind, by Glazounow. The solo features were contributed by Mme. Gadski, who sang the familiar dramatic scena from Weber's "Freischütz" and two songs by Schubert: "Gretchen am Spinnrade," with the original pianoforte accompaniments transcribed for orchestra. The singer was in fine voice and spirits and sang extremely well, pouring out her voice most generously and filling the operatic air and the songs with warm feeling. Here were youth, freshness, unselfish zeal and a plenitude of power, and their effect was bracing and stimulating. Both songs have been sung here with greater dramatic power and variety of expression (the qualities which they invite), but not often with more purely musical beauty or vocal opulence.

M. D'Indy's composition is one of the descriptive pieces in which the French musicians who grow up under the influence of César Franck delight. Its poetical foundation is Uhland's "Harold," a ballad which gives one of many versions of an old legend which has entered into the stories of Odin, Arthur, Charlemagne, Ogier Danske, Olaf Tryggvessen, Don Sebastian, Boabdil, Merlin, Barbarossa and other ancient heroes:—a knight falls under a spell of enchantment and sleeps for ages, surrounded by the scenes and creatures of supernaturalism. Its nearest companion in modern French music is Chausson's "Viviane," which is also in Mr. Gericke's list. In their treatment of themes of this character composers are generally fascinated by the romantic theatre of the story and the mood which it and its fairy denizens conjure up, and so D'Indy. Modern harmonies and orchestral effects are capital delineative mediums, and with skill in characterization charming results are easily attainable. D'Indy's music depicts the externals entrancingly, but leaves the poetical depths, the real kernel of the old myth, untouched, and therefore suffers from monotony. The strong man bound is forgotten in the depiction of the magic of the woods, the woven paces and the waving arms of the enchanters. But it is moody music, pleasant to the ear and stimulating to the imagination.

The symphony recalled memories of Glazounow's fifth in B flat, which was brought forward by the Philharmonic Society in March, 1898, rather than that in C minor, which has won greater popularity. Like the work in B flat, it suggests (in its introduction more particularly) that Orientalism which the composer either imbibed from his master, Rimsky-Korsakow, or acquired by racial inheritance. It does not show the claws of the bearlike music of Borodine, which has been heard here. It is persuasive, not rudely compelling.

There is such ample provision for the approvedly great things in orchestral music in the season's promises that novelties like those provided by Mr. Gericke can be accepted in a profoundly grateful spirit, even though they do not seem likely to enter permanently into our concert lists. One thing is certain—they could not be more invitingly and ingratiatingly presented than they were yesterday. Like the "Sakuntala" overture, by Goldmark, which opened the concert, they glowed with color and pulsated with eager life.

SUNDAY,
NOVEMBER 8, 1903.

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S FIRST MATINEE

Orchestra Heard by Large Audience in Carnegie Hall in Excellent Programme.

MME. GADSKI HEARD AGAIN

The Prima Donna Returns with Full Measure of Her Vocal Powers.

At the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first matinee at Carnegie Hall yesterday, Mr. Gericke challenged attention with a programme of remarkable interest. It was heard by an audience of notable size and of unusual discriminative powers.

In mood consistently romantic, the list was in effect a most instructive purview of the tendencies of three distinct national schools of current musical thought, and it illuminated their curious convergence toward a single goal.

These were severally represented by Carl Goldmark's overture, "Sakuntala;" Vincent d'Indy's symphonic-legende "La Forêt Enchantée" and Alexander Glazonnoff's symphony in E flat, No. 4, opus 48, the last two works being played for the first time in New York.

The association with these of Agatha's recitative and aria, "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer," from "Der Freischütz" and two Schubert songs, "Gretchen am Spinnrade" and "Erl-König," was especially judicious as furnishing both a classic foil for the modern numbers, and an interesting study in the history of cause and effect. Mme. Gadski was the soloist.

D'Indy's "La Forêt Enchantée" is a work somewhat difficult to place properly in the tone poem perspective which began at Liszt and is now dominated by Richard Strauss.

New York has already been made acquainted with M. D'Indy's orchestral utterance. It knows him for a man whose instrumentation was, so to speak, learned at the knee of Berlioz, whose manner of thought is spontaneous and unconventional.

This work, a comparatively early one, epitomizes charmingly the composer's salient traits, contains some matter of melodic value and some moments of delicious harmonic flavor. D'Indy contrives at the out of door atmosphere with an ingenious shuttle of instrumentalization, forever shifting, and he vitalizes it with fascinating rhythmical patterns.

The Glazorinoff Symphony, it is to be hoped, will be heard again. Although the first of its three movments seems somewhat lacking in unity of purpose, the work as a whole contains much that is valuable.

The spirit of the last two movements is distinctively Russian—the scherzo especially smacks of the soil—and its jolly good nature was yesterday infectious. The orchestra read it superbly.

Mme. Gadski returns in the possession of a full measure of her vocal powers. Her treatment of the "Freischütz" aria, in particular, supplied one of the chief features of a memorable afternoon.

NEW YORK AMERICAN AND JOURNAL,
SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1903.

Gadski Heard With the Boston Symphony.

Mme. Gadski, in the best of health, was the first of the Metropolitan singers to make a New York appearance this season, assisting as soloist in the second concert of the week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. She appeared a radiant type of German beauty, in her white gown and hat, with long drooping feathers, and received flowers and four recalls after her first number, and again four recalls after the group of Schubert songs which came later in the programme.

Always sincere and earnest in her work, Mme. Gadski, through unsteady mezzo voce marred the delivery of her first selection, Agathe's scene from Weber's "Der Freischutz," which otherwise went effectively, and subsequently displayed a lack of conception of the contrasts in Schubert's "Erl Koenig." In the same composer's "Gretchen at the Spinning Wheel" she was heard to decidedly better advantage, a trifle over dramatic in style, but in interpretation full of appreciation of the text. The orchestra which supported Mme. Gadski in all of her numbers played under Mr. Gericke's direction the "Sakuntala" overture by Goldmark; D'Indy's "The Enchanted Forest" and Glazounow's Fourth Symphony.

THE WORLD: SUNDAY,
NOVEMBER 8, 1903.

RETURN OF GADSKI.

Popular Prima Donna Sings at Boston Orchestra's Matinee.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first matinee concert at Carnegie Hall yesterday, with two new orchestral compositions and the return of Johanna Gadski as attractions.

The popular prima donna was in splendid form. Her voice was big and full, frash and sweet, and her singing had all of the breadth and buyancy, the vigor and femininity withal which are the characteristics of her art. She phrased the aria from Weber's "Freischuetz" with dramatic emphasis; she endowed with delicate sentiment Schubert's "Gretchen at the Spinning Wheel." Less successful was her interpretation of the "Erl King." She gave to it a lyric smoothness which robbed it of its intensely tragic character. Only in the final line was the gruesome motive made forcible. Mr. Gericke's inflexible accompaniment, angular and unimaginative, did not help matters.

A symphonic legend, "The Enchanted Forest," composed by Vincent D'Indy, and based upon Uhland's ballad "Harold," was the first novelty. The ballad is romantic, the composition is a rhapsody. It is a fanciful bit of writing—delicate, dreamy, poetic, with pretty weavings of harmonies, clever in elaboration—but its matter is thin and lacking in melodic originality.

Glazounoff's fourth symphony, the second novelty, is not a work of positive merit. Wagner peeps throughout and Tschaikowsky—in an undigested state—pervades it. It has some striking passages, and though lacking clearness in workmanship, shows a complete command of orchestral color. It is not so thoroughly Slavic in character as one other and known work of the same writer.

The orchestra played most brilliantly.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, as far as itself was concerned, renewed its hold on the musical affections of the New York public last week. The performance it gave of "Waldweben" on Thursday evening leads one to write in rhapsody. Mr. Gericke's reading of the Brahms symphony—the second—was one of his most creditable achievements in a couple of seasons.

NOVEMBER 8, 1903.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS.

FRENCH AND RUSSIAN MUSIC PRODUCED.

Two Novelties at the First Matinee of the Season—Works by Vincent d'Indy and Alexander Glazounoff—Mme. Gadski the Solo Singer—Patti's Farewell.

The first afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall yesterday caused the voice of the opera singer to be heard in the land. The solo star of the occasion was the earnest and industrious Johanna Gadski, who came before the public as the avant courier of the Conried administration at the Metropolitan Opera House. Strange, was it not, that there seemed to be a familiar sound in the air? The management was the management of Conried, but the voice was the voice of the Grau seasons.

But let that pass. Mme. Gadski, she who never slights her art, we shall have with us all the winter. The Boston orchestra and its pleasing novelties garnered by Mr. Gericke from the Russian steppes and the sunny vales of France we hear only occasionally. Let us think of them. The programme of yesterday afternoon contained two new things under the ceiling of Carnegie Hall.

These were Vincent d'Indy's symphonic legend after a ballad of Uhland, entitled "La Forêt Enchantée" and Glazounoff's E flat symphony, No. 4, op. 48. The other orchestral number was Goldmark's overture, "Sakuntala." Interspersed among all these was the conscientious Mme. Gadski with her reminiscences.

The ballad of "Harald," by Uhland, on which the D'Indy number is founded, tells of an enchanted forest in which the elves surround Harald and his warriors. The warriors ride away, but Harald falls into a long, long slumber, with the elves dancing around him for years. It is a pretty conceit, belonging to the Rip Van Winkle category, and it is not difficult to foretell how any musician of ordinary capacity will treat it. Having done that, you have told how Mr. D'Indy has treated it.

Prelude, some long drawn notes for low-toned wood and horns—music talk for empty forest. Then "Zitti, zitti, piano, piano," a scherzando movement—the ride and the dance mingled. Diminuendo, ritardando, poco à poco, till everything dies away in long drawn tones again, and behold! the aged Harald asleep in the Forest Enchanted. Too easy! But it is very prettily written and exquisitely scored.

Glazounoff's symphony is less pretentious music, but more interesting to hear. It is a three movement symphony, the introduction to the finale being the substitute for the customary slow movement. The conception of the work is as clear as crystal, though the composer offers no programme. But he has given his composition a distinctly descriptive character, and has written with such unaffected freedom that it is impossible to mistake his meaning.

The first movement is a deliciously graceful allegro of purely pastoral character; the second is a rustic dance in scherzo style, and the final allegro is surely a picture of a village festival, such as might follow an important local marriage. In fact the whole work reminds one of Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony, though there is no similarity in melodic ideas or treatment.

There is no profundity at all in the first two movements of the symphony. They flow along with sweet and simple tunefulness and with a lovely orchestral voicing, which delight the ear and rest the mind. It is good, sane music and comforting to listen to in these days of problem composition. The last movement is more pretentious than the other two in respect of contrapuntal technic.

It shows high skill in the elaboration of the thematic material, and it is pictorially quite as effective as either of the two other movements. On the whole, this is a most pleasing little work, not a great creation, but one which ought to bear repetition, and which was certainly worth an introduction to a New York audience.

Of Mr. Gericke's reading of these two works nothing can be said but that it showed careful study and the most excellent intentions. It is possible that a more liberal display of warmth would have helped the D'Indy composition, but the finish of the performance was so high, the enunciation of the sparkling details so exquisitely clear, that any faintness of praise seems cruel. The Glazounoff symphony was superbly played. Its gracious moods were offered to the audience in all their sweetness and amiability and its orchestral colors were transmitted into the spacious chamber in the fullest bloom of their beauty and delicacy.

It is a pity that Mr. Gericke is so afraid of appearing to seek for ad captandum effects that he will not articulate certain passages of the "Sakuntala" overture. They always seem to clamor for the cæsural pause, but that is something with which the austere Mr. Gericke will have naught to do. He accepts the letter of the bond as it is written in the score and with that the audience must rest content. But the "Sakuntala" overture can be made to flame with a fiercer passion than that which is pictured in the serene fancy of an admirable conductor from Boston.

Of Mme. Gadski let the stereotyped operatic formula be recorded. She was in good voice. She sang her dear old "Freischuetz" air in her dear old way, and afterward she put forth "Gretchen am Spinnrade" and "Erlkoenig." She was happier in the first of these two, which she sang with much charm of voice and with feeling. The "Erlkoenig" she sang intelligently and with some skill in the vocal coloring, but the song is not one of her best. She had orchestral accompaniments for both numbers. They are better with piano.

[47]

Staats Zeitung
NY Nov 8-03.

Das Boston Symphonie-Orchester.

Ganz so glatt und untadelig, wie man es bislang gewohnt gewesen, ging's im gestrigen zweiten Konzert des Bostoner Symphonieorchesters nicht her, obgleich die Orchesterleistungen, als Ganzes betrachtet, noch immer den in New York üblichen Aufführungen als Muster vorgehalten werden können. Die Bostoner haben uns verwöhnt, und da merkt man's um so eher, wenn einmal das erste Horn oder das Englischhorn nicht ganz ihre Schuldigkeit thun. Was den Streichkörper des Orchesters betrifft, so strahlte er gestern in seiner ganzen wohlaccreditirten Glorie, und so darf man sich immerhin der Hoffnung hingeben, daß die neuesten Personalveränderungen im Orchester dessen Leistungsfähigkeit nicht beeinträchtigt haben. Aber daß der neue Konzertmeister das Einstimmen vor dem Konzert auf der Plattform besorgt, daß er zu den verschiedenen Geigerpulten geht und sein A giebt, ist keine erfreuliche Neuerung. Das Einstimmen kann vorher geschehen, und wenn ein Nachstimmen nöthig ist, sollte so wenig wie möglich Aufhebens davon gemacht werden. Das Publikum kommt, um Musik zu hören und nicht die Vorbereitungen zum Musikmachen.

Das Programm war gestern ein recht modernes. In Goldmark's „Sakuntala"-Ouvertüre gab es orientalische Farbenpracht zu hören, nicht zu sehen. Dann kam „Der verzauberte Forst" von Vincent d'Judy, eine „orchestrale Legende", Programmmusik nach französischer Auffassung. Selbst in ihren Orchesterwerken können die modernen Franzosen die Salon-Atmosphäre nicht los werden. D'Judy ist zweifellos ein ernster und gewissenhafter Musiker, und was er in dieser Legende darbietet, ist zum mindesten anhörenswerth. Aber viel musikalisches Rückgrat ist nicht darin, wohl aber eine reichliche Anzahl Wagner'scher Reminiscenzen. D'Judy hat gelernt, die Orchesterfarben nach den Regeln der modernen Instrumentations-Kunst zu mischen, aber hinter der Farbenentfaltung steckt nicht viel Geist. Auch kann man von diesem „verzauberten Forst" nicht behaupten, daß er einem das beigegebene Programm unabweislich klar mache. Immerhin, es war eine dankenswerthe Bekanntschaft, die man in diesem Produkt der jung-französischen Schule machte. Den Schluß des Programms machte die vierte Symphonie von Alexander Glazonnoff, die in New York zuvor noch nicht gehört worden war. Glänzend instrumentirt, wie so ziemlich alle Erzeugnisse der modernen russischen Komponisten, erzählt sie Einem wenig Neues, und das Neue ist durchaus nicht bedeutend. Am meisten gefiel, und mit Recht, der zweite scherzose Satz, der recht originelle Orchestrationseffekte darbringt, und dabei doch nicht gesucht klingt. Der letzte Satz ist aber wohl der musikalisch-kraftvollste, auch bringt er etwas russische Steppenluft. Gespielt wurde die Symphonie mit großer Virtuosität.

Zu dem orientalisch-französisch-russischen Orchesterprogramm bildeten die urdeutschen Salonummern der Frau Gadski einen höchst wohlthätigen Gegensatz. Die Agathen-Arie aus Weber's „Freischütz" ist eine immerhin etwas gefährliche Konzertnummer. Aber Frau Gadski darf sie schon risiren. Im „Leise, leise" klang ihre Stimme geradezu berauschend schön und weich, und den recitativischen Theil gab sie mit gerade so viel Reserve, als die Konzertsaalsatmosphäre nöthig macht. Dagegen hielt im Finale Dirigent Gericke den Jubel doch ein wenig zu sehr zurück. Auch in den beiden Liedern „Gretchen am Spinnrade" und „Erlkönig" von Schubert, schien der Dirigent fortwährend auf Mäßigung des Tempos bedacht zu sein. Beide Lieder wurden zu der Liszt'schen Instrumentation gesungen. Daß aber Frau Gadski dramatische Leidenschaft in hohem Maße besitzt, weiß ja das Publikum längst von der Oper her; so war es also geradezu interessant, sie auch einmal im reserbirteren Konzertstil zu hören. Im „Erlkönig" gab sie ohnehin ein packendes dramatisches Bild, die vier verschiedenen Stimmen — des Erzählers, des Vaters, des Erlkönigs und des Kindes — prächtig charakterisirend. Jawohl, Frau Gadski versteht sich nicht nur auf das Dramatische, sondern auch auf das, was man im engeren Sinne Kunstgesang nennt. Ihre Stimme klang gestern in allen Lagen und in allen Schattirungen ganz herrlich frisch und üppig.

N.Y. Sun
Nov 9-03.

THE musical season may be said to have opened on November 4th with the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There is always a cordial welcome in New York for Mr. Gericke and his chosen artists. Why Boston—far away, arctic, conventional, timid, cut-and-dried Boston—should produce an orchestra so immeasurably superior to anything in New York is a conundrum too mortifying to answer.

NEW-YORK DAILY TRIBUNE, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1903.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Gericke enlivened the first of this season's afternoon concerts at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon with two works never before heard in New-York. They were a symphonic legend (to quote the composer's definition), entitled "La Forêt Enchantée," by Vincent d'Indy, and a symphony in E flat, the composer's fourth work of its kind, by Glazounow. The solo features were contributed by Mme. Gadski, who sang the familiar dramatic scena from Weber's "Freischütz" and two songs by Schubert: "Gretchen am Spinnrade," with the original pianoforte accompaniments transcribed for orchestra. The singer was in fine voice and spirits and sang extremely well, pouring out her voice most generously and filling the operatic air and the songs with warm feeling. Here were youth, freshness, unselfish zeal and a plenitude of power, and their effect was bracing and stimulating. Both songs have been sung here with greater dramatic power and variety of expression (the qualities which they invite), but not often with more purely musical beauty or vocal opulence.

M. D'Indy's composition is one of the descriptive pieces in which the French musicians who grow up under the influence of César Franck delight. Its poetical foundation is Uhland's "Harold," a ballad which gives one of many versions of an old legend which has entered into the stories of Odin, Arthur, Charlemagne, Ogier Danske, Olaf Tryggvessen, Don Sebastian, Boabdil, Merlin, Barbarossa and other ancient heroes:—a knight falls under a spell of enchantment and sleeps for ages, surrounded by the scenes and creatures of supernaturalism. Its nearest companion in modern French music is Chausson's "Viviane," which is also in Mr. Gericke's list. In their treatment of themes of this character composers are generally fascinated by the romantic theatre of the story and the mood which it and its fairy denizens conjure up, and so D'Indy. Modern harmonies and orchestral effects are capital delineative mediums, and with skill in characterization charming results are easily attainable. D'Indy's music depicts the externals entrancingly, but leaves the poetical depths, the real kernel of the old myth, untouched, and therefore suffers from monotony. The strong man bound is forgotten in the depiction of the magic of the woods, the woven paces and the waving arms of the enchanters. But it is moody music, pleasant to the ear and stimulating to the imagination.

The symphony recalled memories of Glazounow's fifth in B flat, which was brought forward by the Philharmonic Society in March, 1898, rather than that in C minor, which has won greater popularity. Like the work in B flat, it suggests (in its introduction more particularly) that Orientalism which the composer either imbibed from his master, Rimsky-Korsakow, or acquired by racial inheritance. It does not show the claws of the bearlike music of Borodine, which has been heard here. It is persuasive, not rudely compelling.

There is such ample provision for the approvedly great things in orchestral music in the season's promises that novelties like those provided by Mr. Gericke can be accepted in a profoundly grateful spirit, even though they do not seem likely to enter permanently into our concert lists. One thing is certain—they could not be more invitingly and ingratiatingly presented than they were yesterday. Like the "Sakuntala" overture, by Goldmark, which opened the concert, they glowed with color and pulsated with eager life.

NEW YORK AMERICAN AND JOURNAL, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1903.

Gadski Heard With the Boston Symphony.

Mme. Gadski, in the best of health, was the first of the Metropolitan singers to make a New York appearance this season, assisting as soloist in the second concert of the week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. She appeared a radiant type of German beauty, in her white gown and hat, with long drooping feathers, and received flowers and four recalls after her first number, and again four recalls after the group of Schubert songs which came later in the programme.

Always sincere and earnest in her work, Mme. Gadski, through unsteady mezzo voce marred the delivery of her first selection, Agathe's scene from Weber's "Der Freischutz," which otherwise went effectively, and subsequently displayed a lack of conception of the contrasts in Schubert's "Erl Koenig." In the same composer's "Gretchen at the Spinning Wheel" she was heard to decidedly better advantage, a trifle over dramatic in style, but in interpretation full of appreciation of the text. The orchestra which supported Mme. Gadski in all of her numbers played under Mr. Gericke's direction the "Sakuntala" overture by Goldmark; D'Indy's "The Enchanted Forest" and Glazounow's Fourth Symphony.

NEW YORK HERALD, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1903.

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S FIRST MATINEE

Orchestra Heard by Large Audience in Carnegie Hall in Excellent Programme.

MME. GADSKI HEARD AGAIN

The Prima Donna Returns with Full Measure of Her Vocal Powers.

At the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first matinee at Carnegie Hall yesterday, Mr. Gericke challenged attention with a programme of remarkable interest. It was heard by an audience of notable size and of unusual discriminative powers.

In mood consistently romantic, the list was in effect a most instructive purview of the tendencies of three distinct national schools of current musical thought, and it illuminated their curious convergence toward a single goal.

These were severally represented by Carl Goldmark's overture, "Sakuntala;" Vincent d'Indy's symphonic-legende "La Forêt Enchantée" and Alexander Glazonnoff's symphony in E flat, No. 4, opus 48, the last two works being played for the first time in New York.

The association with these of Agatha's recitative and aria, "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer," from "Der Freischütz" and two Schubert songs, "Gretchen am Spinnrade" and "Erl-König," was especially judicious as furnishing both a classic foil for the modern numbers, and an interesting study in the history of cause and effect. Mme. Gadski was the soloist.

D'Indy's "La Forêt Enchantée" is a work somewhat difficult to place properly in the tone poem perspective which began at Liszt and is now dominated by Richard Strauss.

New York has already been made acquainted with M. D'Indy's orchestral utterance. It knows him for a man whose instrumentation was, so to speak, learned at the knee of Berlioz, whose manner of thought is spontaneous and unconventional.

This work, a comparatively early one, epitomizes charmingly the composer's salient traits, contains some matter of melodic value and some moments of delicious harmonic flavor. D'Indy contrives at the out of door atmosphere with an ingenious shuttle of instrumentalization, forever shifting, and he vitalizes it with fascinating rhythmical patterns.

The Glazorinoff Symphony, it is to be hoped, will be heard again. Although the first of its three movments seems somewhat lacking in unity of purpose, the work as a whole contains much that is valuable.

The spirit of the last two movements is distinctively Russian—the scherzo especially smacks of the soil—and its jolly good nature was yesterday infectious. The orchestra read it superbly.

Mme. Gadski returns in the possession of a full measure of her vocal powers. Her treatment of the "Freischütz" aria, in particular, supplied one of the chief features of a memorable afternoon.

THE WORLD: SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1903.

RETURN OF GADSKI.

Popular Prima Donna Sings at Boston Orchestra's Matinee.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first matinee concert at Carnegie Hall yesterday, with two new orchestral compositions and the return of Johanna Gadski as attractions.

The popular prima donna was in splendid form. Her voice was big and full, frash and sweet, and her singing had all of the breadth and buyancy, the vigor and femininity withal which are the characteristics of her art. She phrased the aria from Weber's "Freischuetz" with dramatic emphasis; she endowed with delicate sentiment Schubert's "Gretchen at the Spinning Wheel." Less successful was her interpretation of the "Erl King." She gave to it a lyric smoothness which robbed it of its intensely tragic character. Only in the final line was the gruesome motive made forcible. Mr. Gericke's inflexible accompaniment, angular and unimaginative, did not help matters.

A symphonic legend, "The Enchanted Forest," composd by Vincent D'Indy, and based upon Uhland's ballad "Harold," was the first novelty. The ballad is romantic, the composition is a rhapsody. It is a fanciful bit of writing—delicate, dreamy, poetic, with pretty weavings of harmonies, clever in elaboration—but its matter is thin and lacking in melodic originality.

Glazounoff's fourth symphony, the second novelty, is not a work of positive merit. Wagner peeps throughout and Tschaikowsky—in an undigested state—pervades it. It has some striking passages, and though lacking clearness in workmanship, shows a complete command of orchestral color. It is not so thoroughly Slavic in character as one other and known work of the same writer.

The orchestra played most brilliantly.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, as far as itself was concerned, renewed its hold on the musical affections of the New York public last week. The performance it gave of "Waldweben" on Thursday evening leads one to write in rhapsody. Mr. Gericke's reading of the Brahms symphony—the second—was one of his most creditable achievements in a couple of seasons.

THE SUN, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1903.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS.

FRENCH AND RUSSIAN MUSIC PRODUCED.

Two Novelties at the First Matinee of the Season—Works by Vincent d'Indy and Alexander Glazounoff—Mme. Gadski the Solo Singer—Patti's Farewell.

The first afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall yesterday caused the voice of the opera singer to be heard in the land. The solo star of the occasion was the earnest and industrious Johanna Gadski, who came before the public as the avant courier of the Conried administration at the Metropolitan Opera House. Strange, was it not, that there seemed to be a familiar sound in the air? The management was the management of Conried, but the voice was the voice of the Grau seasons.

But let that pass. Mme. Gadski, she who never slights her art, we shall have with us all the winter. The Boston orchestra and its pleasing novelties garnered by Mr. Gericke from the Russian steppes and the sunny vales of France we hear only occasionally. Let us think of them. The programme of yesterday afternoon contained two new things under the ceiling of Carnegie Hall.

These were Vincent d'Indy's symphonic legend after a ballad of Uhland, entitled "La Forêt Enchantée" and Glazounoff's E flat symphony, No. 4, op. 48. The other orchestral number was Goldmark's overture, "Sakuntala." Interspersed among all these was the conscientious Mme. Gadski with her reminiscences.

The ballad of "Harald," by Uhland, on which the D'Indy number is founded, tells of an enchanted forest in which the elves surround Harald and his warriors. The warriors ride away, but Harald falls into a long, long slumber, with the elves dancing around him for years. It is a pretty conceit, belonging to the Rip Van Winkle category, and it is not difficult to foretell how any musician of ordinary capacity will treat it. Having done that, you have told how Mr. D'Indy has treated it.

Prelude, some long drawn notes for low-toned wood and horns—music talk for empty forest. Then "Zitti, zitti, piano, piano," a scherzando movement—the ride and the dance mingled. Diminuendo, ritardando, poco à poco, till everything dies away in long drawn tones again, and behold! the aged Harald asleep in the Forest Enchanted. Too easy! But it is very prettily written and exquisitely scored.

Glazounoff's symphony is less pretentious music, but more interesting to hear. It is a three movement symphony, the introduction to the finale being the substitute for the customary slow movement. The conception of the work is as clear as crystal, though the composer offers no programme. But he has given his composition a distinctly descriptive character, and has written with such unaffected freedom that it is impossible to mistake his meaning.

The first movement is a deliciously graceful allegro of purely pastoral character; the second is a rustic dance in scherzo style, and the final allegro is surely a picture of a village festival, such as might follow an important local marriage. In fact the whole work reminds one of Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony, though there is no similarity in melodic ideas or treatment.

There is no profundity at all in the first two movements of the symphony. They flow along with sweet and simple tunefulness and with a lovely orchestral voicing, which delight the ear and rest the mind. It is good, sane music and comforting to listen to in these days of problem composition. The last movement is more pretentious than the other two in respect of contrapuntal technic.

It shows high skill in the elaboration of the thematic material, and it is pictorially quite as effective as either of the two other movements. On the whole, this is a most pleasing little work, not a great creation, but one which ought to bear repetition, and which was certainly worth an introduction to a New York audience.

Of Mr. Gericke's reading of these two works nothing can be said but that it showed careful study and the most excellent intentions. It is possible that a more liberal display of warmth would have helped the D'Indy composition, but the finish of the performance was so high, the enunciation of the sparkling details so exquisitely clear, that any faintness of praise seems cruel. The Glazounoff symphony was superbly played. Its gracious moods were offered to the audience in all their sweetness and amiability and its orchestral colors were transmitted into the spacious chamber in the fullest bloom of their beauty and delicacy.

It is a pity that Mr. Gericke is so afraid of appearing to seek for ad captandum effects that he will not articulate certain passages of the "Sakuntala" overture. They always seem to clamor for the caesural pause, but that is something with which the austere Mr. Gericke will have naught to do. He accepts the letter of the bond as it is written in the score and with that the audience must rest content. But the "Sakuntala" overture can be made to flame with a fiercer passion than that which is pictured in the serene fancy of an admirable conductor from Boston.

Of Mme. Gadski let the stereotyped operatic formula be recorded. She was in good voice. She sang her dear old "Freischuez" air in her dear old way, and afterward she put forth "Gretchen am Spinnrade" and "Erlkoenig." She was happier in the first of these two, which she sang with much charm of voice and with feeling. The "Erlkoenig" she sang intelligently and with some skill in the vocal coloring, but the song is not one of her best. She had orchestral accompaniments for both numbers. They are better with piano.

NEW YORK TIMES,
SUNDAY,
NOVEMBER 8, 1903.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

New Works by d'Indy and Glazounoff at the Second Concert.

Mme. Gadski the Soloist in an Air from "Der Freischuetz" and Two Songs.

Another great audience greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the second of its first pair of concerts given yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, and showed again the high appreciation of the uncommon beauty of the performances of Mr. Gericke's men. The programme contained two works played for the first time in New York, though neither of them is a new composition, and one of them, d'Indy's symphonic ballad, "La Forêt Enchantée," dates from its composer's earliest period. The other was Glazounoff's fourth symphony in E flat. D'Indy's piece is frankly programme music in its entire purpose and substance, a musical illustration of Uhland's ballad, "Harald." It is, indeed, scarcely intelligible without its programme, for upon it the form is entirely based, and the music as music is so closely dependent upon it as to forestall any very great appeal upon its listeners for its own sake. Direct delineation rather than the evocation of a mood is what the composer has sought, and so it was almost inevitable that imaginative power in a higher sense should be sacrificed. There is heard the tramp of horsemen through the wood—that is a kind of episode for which music has unmistakable symbols, and Mr. d'Indy used them in very much the same way as others have done. There is the passionate wooing of the troop of fairies, and there is the stillness of Harald's sleep upon the rock, and the moonlit assemblage of the elves about him for which the composer has found plausible musical expression. They are but dimly outlined, however, and of poetic atmosphere there is not much. The treatment of the orchestra is skillful, and there are innumerable charming effects that Mr. Gericke made to count for their utmost. But as a whole, the composer seemed to lack certainty of touch in "La Forêt Enchantée," and the piece as a whole leaves little definite impression.

Glazounoff's symphony was the third of his works in this form that have been heard here, and it was interesting to become further acquainted with the music of one regarded as among the strongest and most influential of the "young Russians" who have in recent years stirred the musical waters so deeply, and whose powers have been proclaimed so loudly as among the modern potencies in music. But there is always a certain amount of wonderment after a hearing of their music as to just where their power is supposed to reside. Scratch a "young Russian" and you will rarely find a tartar, but rather a skillful expounder of agreeably melodious and not always very original ideas in a most brilliant orchestral setting. They have ruled out Tschaikowsky as too much of a cosmopolitan for their number, but Tschaikowsky is manyfold more of a Russian in his greatest symphonies and overtures than, for instance, Mr. Glazounoff in this fourth symphony of his; and, as a musician, of infinitely greater power. The symphony is, in its way, full of charming music, but it is of a superficial sort. Its themes are pretty, but never deeply significant, and the development of them does not strongly engage the attention. There is only a mild utterance of anything that reflects the Russian spirit, and, indeed, there are not lacking reminiscences of other men in other lands. The orchestration is throughout brilliant, clear, transparent, and admirably in keeping with the thematic substance of the music. The ingenuity with which themes from the first two movements are brought together in the last, with various contrapuntal refinements, was interesting. Mr. Gericke read the work with much spirit, and the performance was of scintillating brilliancy.

Goldmark's glowing "Sakuntala" overture opened the concert, played with a somewhat more rapid pace than the passages of Oriental languor seemed to suggest. Mme. Gadski was the soloist. She was in splendid voice and sang the elaborate recitative and aria for Agathe in the second act of "Der Freischütz" with exquisite poetry and charm, rising to a superb pitch of exaltation at the climax—though here it seemed as if the singer's intentions were kept from full realization by Mr. Gericke's conservative idea of the tempo at the jubilant close. Later she sang two of Schubert's songs, "Gretchen am Spinnrade" and the "Erlkönig," with their pianoforte accompaniments transcribed for orchestra. She sang them well, but they lose greatly by being changed from the setting for which the composed intended them.

Commercial Advertiser
N.Y. Nov 9-03.

Second Boston Concert.

From almost every point of view the Boston Symphony's matinée on Saturday was more interesting than Thursday's concert. Perhaps the music itself did not reach such loftiness of design and inspiration, but it was new to us, at least the two important numbers, and New York has never concealed its love for novelties in music or anything else. The programme opened with Goldmark's charming "Sakuntala" overture, perhaps the most typical example of that composer's rich fancy, and a work which Mr. Gericke always plays con amore. The other two orchestral numbers were D'Indy's symphonic poem, "La Forêt Enchantée," and Glazounoff's fourth symphony in E-flat.

Vincent D'Indy, now a man well on toward middle age, is reckoned among the leaders of the "younger Frenchmen," younger in distinction from the generation of Gounod, Franck, and Thomas. More nearly akin to Franck, whose disciple he was, than to the others, he is still, musically speaking, closer to Wagner. It has been said, for example, of his opera, "Fervaal," that it is more Wagnerish than anything that Wagner ever wrote. And so with this "La Forêt Enchantée," one is hearing more than an echo of the great German. The work itself is a musical illustration of Uhland's ballad "Harald," which repeats the oft-told medieval legend of the hero, who, his men taken away by the fairies, sinks into an enchanted sleep, in which he remains for centuries awaiting the great awakening. So the composer takes us with a band of horsemen into a deep and mysterious wood. The clang of hunting horns gives way to the witching strains of Elfland music. The men are lured away, leaving the hero alone, and at last he is lost in a deep and magical sleep. It is not hard to guess how a composer will go to work to do such a thing as this, and D'Indy does it. He has learned how to show us the woodland because Wagner did it in "Siegfried." The rest is comparatively easy. Although D'Indy wrote this long before he composed his most interesting "Istar" variations, even at that time he was a master of the orchestra. The work is beautifully done, rich in color and delicate in texture. It is not big, nor particularly strong, but it is decidedly interesting.

Of Glazounoff's music we have already had several examples, including two of his symphonies, both of which are more pretentious than the one in E-flat, which was played on Saturday. This one is rustic in character. The composer, as usual, makes much use of typical Russian themes which of themselves, being of unusual contour, add interest to a work. Beyond this Glazounoff is a good musician, a resourceful writer, and a master of orchestral composition. The symphony placed near the really great works will not rank very high as an important contribution to musical literature, but we cannot always be scaling the snow-capped summits of genius. There is pleasure to be found in the foothills. Such men as D'Indy and Glazounoff are to be found there, and it is well to hear of them from time to time. The orchestra played much better than on Thursday evening.

Mme Gadski, the soloist, received a warm welcome from the large audience. A summer's rest has banished all signs of her hard season here a year ago, and she was in admirable voice. For her numbers she did not stray from the beaten path. Her first was Agathe's aria from "Der Freischütz," which is sung as well by very few women, and her second was Schubert's songs "Gretchen am Spinnrad" and "Erlkönig," with Liszt's setting for the orchestra. The first goes admirably, but the second is not so successful, and neither sounds so well as it does with the piano.

N.Y. Tribune
Nov 9-03

Two novelties and the presence of Mme. Johanna Gadski, in an impressive white gown and hat, differentiated Saturday's Boston Symphony concert from that of last Thursday. Mr. Gericke's mood of determined rectitude, maintained obstinately through the Mendelssohn concerto at the earlier affair, was again in evidence, and dictated an unemotional orchestral accompaniment to the aria from Der Freischuetz and to the Schubert "Gretchen am Spinnrade" and "Erlkonig," against which Mme. Gadski warred successfully in the first two numbers. She sang the Weber music with superb breadth, but the "Erlkonig" is not in her style, and it is spoiled by the substitution of orchestra for piano.

The novelties were Vincent d'Indy's symphonic legend, "The Enchanted Forest," after Uhland's ballad, and Glazounoff's fourth symphony, in E flat, opus 48. The d'Indy music showed Cesar Franck's influence in its vagueness, but had its interesting moments—the perverse ending was exasperating—while the symphony fairly weltered in sweetness. Is the muscle and sinew of the young Russian school to be turned to sugar like this?

N.Y. Post
Nov 9-03.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In view of Mr. Gericke's conservative tendencies, his programme on Saturday afternoon had a remarkably modern aspect. Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, D'Indy's "La Forêt Enchantée," and Glazounoff's fourth symphony were the orchestral numbers, and Frau Gadski contributed an aria by Weber and two songs by Schubert—two composers who, though older, were the originators of the modern romantic school. Like most opera singers, Mme. Gadski needs the glamour of the dramatic stage to be at her best; yet it was on the dramatic side that "Margaret at the Spinning Wheel" and "The Erlking" failed of their full effect on this occasion. Agathe's recitative and aria from the second act of "Der Freischütz" suited her better, and the final high notes ensured abundant applause. The Schubert songs were given with orchestral accompaniment.

Vincent D'Indy is a composer who has been unduly neglected in New York. His orchestral legend, "The Enchanted Forest," is based on a ballad by Uhland. It skilfully reproduces the mood and atmosphere of the poem, and there are exquisite patches of orchestral coloring. It is an early work, and lacks individual physiognomy. The composer is said to be an ardent admirer of Wagner; his score confirms the rumor. The performance of this piece by Mr. Gericke and his players was much more satisfactory than that of the "Sakuntala" overture, in which the Oriental glow of color that constitutes the chief charm of that piece was strangely missing. But it was in the Russian symphony that the Bostonians showed their skill to best advantage. The intricate and difficult last movement of the Glazounoff symphony was played with exciting virtuosity. The first movement of this work, which had never before been played here, is interesting rather for its coloring than for what it tells thematically; but the scherzo is based on a new and quaint conceit which is prettily, we might almost say wittily, expressed by the woodwind instruments in a variety of combinations.

Journal Tribune - Nov 17 - 1903

Linked with the first of this season's Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts here was considerable curiosity. When Franz Kneisel hung up his orchestral fiddle and his bow, Mr. Gericke first lost some sleep; then he went to Europe to find a new concertmaster. Exactly how troublesome a way that is to spend one's Summer vacation need not be emphasized here; nor need any other details be rehearsed, save that he engaged a Spaniard, named E. Fernandez Arbos, to sit at his orchestral left hand. Mr. Arbos appeared not only as concertmaster but also as soloist, playing Mendelssohn's Concerto. He has the reputation of growing as nervous as seven cats when called upon to play in public, and his appearance the other night justified his claim to this neurotic distinction. Nervousness may cover a multitude of fiddling sins, but it scarcely puts the listener in good humor. Arbos's playing of this ultra-sentimental work was actually a sad performance. His intonation should never have passed Ellis Island, while his incredible lack of rhythm gave the accompanying conductor a very bad quarter of an hour. Altogether it was a performance so many times removed from the artistic that it should not have been done at all. The balance of the evening was devoted to the "Euryanthe" overture, "Waldweben" from Wagner's "Siegfried" and Brahms's Second Symphony. The orchestra played the overture with a superb splurge of fire, and the old work sounded so new that it might have been written the day before, save for the fact that there was no one alive the day before who possibly could have written it. The "Waldweben" was heartily disappointing. For all that the uninitiated knew it might have been a gentle Boston breeze sighing frigidly about Cod Fish Hall; certainly all of Wagner was refined out of it. Mr. Gericke read the Brahms Symphony as though he loved it more in detail than he did en bloc. It was all sanely, icily beautiful, sounding like an Emerson essay set to music.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—NOVEMBER 15, 1903.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe was the soloist at the fourth symphony rehearsal and concert, playing the B major concerto for piano and orchestra, by Henry Holden Huss, the American composer. The work was given in its revised form. The other numbers of the program were Raff's overture, "Ein feste Burg;" Smetana's symphonic poem, "Vysehrad," and Beethoven's D major symphony. The Huss concerto is one that appeals especially to the musician or the advanced student of music, for its constantly varying progressions, its abrupt changes of modulations in different keys and the almost restless and irregular forms of its instrumental combinations, makes the piece too complicated and abstruse for the enjoyment of the general public.

The instrumentation is elaborate and the solo instrument is very prominent in each movement. The first part is so full of fortissimo passages that the physical tax for the soloist is very great, and that Miss Aus Der Ohe was able to maintain the proper proportion in her piano work against the heavy orchestral background, shows the artist possessed of a strength of arms and fingers not usually found in a woman. Her chords, arpeggios and runs, singly and in doubles, were wonderfully vigorous and clear, and in all her fortissimo work she appeared to be easily able to cope with the orchestra. In the second movement she produced a beautiful cantabel tone where required, showing a fine intelligence in her reading and a consummate skill in execution. She gave the two themes of the third movement with splendid contrasting effects, closing the concerto with a brilliant and dashing performance of the crashing finale. The large audience appreciated her performance very highly, and she was recalled several times and received some huge floral tributes.

The orchestra as a rule did its work admirably, though the "conversations" in the third movement seemed to be a trifle uncertain at times. The Raff overture proved to be a pleasing composition of its kind, and the principal theme showed to advantage the efficiency of the different wind contingents. Smetana's symphonic poem was given in a stirring and sympathetic manner, the brasses sounding their phrases in excellent harmony and the contrasts of the festival music and the joyless, sad refrain of the finale being beautiful in their impressive and mournful cadences. The Beethoven symphony calls for naught but praise, the larghetto and the delightful scherzo each being received with the usual manifestations of pleasure by the auditors.

The program of the concerts this week will include Brahms' tragic overture, Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Ideal," and Dvorak's symphony in F. Mr Krasselt, the new first 'cellist, will appear as a soloist for the first time in America, and he will play a concerto by Saint-Saens.

[45]

NEW YORK TIMES, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1903.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

New Works by d'Indy and Glazounoff at the Second Concert.

Mme. Gadski the Soloist in an Air from "Der Freischuetz" and Two Songs.

Another great audience greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the second of its first pair of concerts given yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, and showed again the high appreciation of the uncommon beauty of the performances of Mr. Gericke's men. The programme contained two works played for the first time in New York, though neither of them is a new composition, and one of them, d'Indy's symphonic ballad, "La Forêt Enchantée," dates from its composer's earliest period. The other was Glazounoff's fourth symphony in E flat. D'Indy's piece is frankly programme music in its entire purpose and substance, a musical illustration of Uhland's ballad, "Harald." It is, indeed, scarcely intelligible without its programme, for upon it the form is entirely based, and the music as music is so closely dependent upon it as to forestall any very great appeal upon its listeners for its own sake. Direct delineation rather than the evocation of a mood is what the composer has sought, and so it was almost inevitable that imaginative power in a higher sense should be sacrificed. There is heard the tramp of horsemen through the wood—that is a kind of episode for which music has unmistakable symbols, and Mr. d'Indy used them in very much the same way as others have done. There is the passionate wooing of the troop of fairies, and there is the stillness of Harald's sleep upon the rock, and the moonlit assemblage of the elves about him for which the composer has found plausible musical expression. They are but dimly outlined, however, and of poetic atmosphere there is not much. The treatment of the orchestra is skillful, and there are innumerable charming effects that Mr. Gericke made to count for their utmost. But as a whole, the composer seemed to lack certainty of touch in "La Forêt Enchantée," and the piece as a whole leaves little definite impression.

Glazounoff's symphony was the third of his works in this form that have been heard here, and it was interesting to become further acquainted with the music of one regarded as among the strongest and most influential of the "young Russians" who have in recent years stirred the musical waters so deeply, and whose powers have been proclaimed so loudly as among the modern potencies in music. But there is always a certain amount of wonderment after a hearing of their music as to just where their power is supposed to reside. Scratch a "young Russian" and you will rarely find a tartar, but rather a skillful expounder of agreeably melodious and not always very original ideas in a most brilliant orchestral setting. They have ruled out Tschaikowsky as too much of a cosmopolitan for their number, but Tschaikowsky is manyfold more of a Russian in his greatest symphonies and overtures than, for instance, Mr. Glazounoff in this fourth symphony of his; and, as a musician, of infinitely greater power. The symphony is, in its way, full of charming music, but it is of a superficial sort. Its themes are pretty, but never deeply significant, and the development of them does not strongly engage the attention. There is only a mild utterance of anything that reflects the Russian spirit, and, indeed, there are not lacking reminiscences of other men in other lands. The orchestration is throughout brilliant, clear, transparent, and admirably in keeping with the thematic substance of the music. The ingenuity with which themes from the first two movements are brought together in the last, with various contrapuntal refinements, was interesting. Mr. Gericke read the work with much spirit, and the performance was of scintillating brilliancy.

Goldmark's glowing "Sakuntala" overture opened the concert, played with a somewhat more rapid pace than the passages of Oriental languor seemed to suggest. Mme. Gadski was the soloist. She was in splendid voice and sang the elaborate recitative and aria for Agathe in the second act of "Der Freischütz" with exquisite poetry and charm, rising to a superb pitch of exaltation at the climax—though here it seemed as if the singer's intentions were kept from full realization by Mr. Gericke's conservative idea of the tempo at the jubilant close. Later she sang two of Schubert's songs, "Gretchen am Spinnrade" and the "Erlkönig," with their pianoforte accompaniments transcribed for orchestra. She sang them well, but they lose greatly by being changed from the setting for which the composed intended them.

Two novelties and the presence of Mme. Johanna Gadski, in an impressive white gown and hat, differentiated Saturday's Boston Symphony concert from that of last Thursday. Mr. Gericke's mood of determined rectitude, maintained obstinately through the Mendelssohn concerto at the earlier affair, was again in evidence, and dictated an unemotional orchestral accompaniment to the aria from Der Freischuetz and to the Schubert "Gretchen am Spinnrade" and "Erlkonig," against which Mme. Gadski warred successfully in the first two numbers. She sang the Weber music with superb breadth, but the "Erlkonig" is not in her style, and it is spoiled by the substitution of orchestra for piano.

The novelties were Vincent d'Indy's symphonic legend, "The Enchanted Forest," after Uhland's ballad, and Glazounoff's fourth symphony, in E flat, opus 48. The d'Indy music showed Cesar Franck's influence in its vagueness, but had its interesting moments—the perverse ending was exasperating—while the symphony fairly weltered in sweetness. Is the muscle and sinew of the young Russian school to be turned to sugar like this?

Commercial Advertiser 9-03.

Second Boston Concert.

From almost every point of view the Boston Symphony's matinée on Saturday was more interesting than Thursday's concert. Perhaps the music itself did not reach such loftiness of design and inspiration, but it was new to us, at least the two important numbers, and New York has never concealed its love for novelties in music or anything else. The programme opened with Goldmark's charming "Sakuntala" overture, perhaps the most typical example of that composer's rich fancy, and a work which Mr. Gericke always plays con amore. The other two orchestral numbers were D'Indy's symphonic poem, "La Forêt Enchantée," and Glazounoff's fourth symphony in E-flat.

Vincent D'Indy, now a man well on toward middle age, is reckoned among the leaders of the "younger Frenchmen," younger in distinction from the generation of Gounod, Franck, and Thomas. More nearly akin to Franck, whose disciple he was, than to the others, he is still, musically speaking, closer to Wagner. It has been said, for example, of his opera, "Fervaal," that it is more Wagnerish than anything that Wagner ever wrote. And so with this "La Forêt Enchantée," one is hearing more than an echo of the great German. The work itself is a musical illustration of Uhland's ballad "Harald," which repeats the oft-told medieval legend of the hero, who, his men taken away by the fairies, sinks into an enchanted sleep, in which he remains for centuries awaiting the great awakening. So the composer takes us with a band of horsemen into a deep and mysterious wood. The clang of hunting horns gives way to the witching strains of Elfland music. The men are lured away, leaving the hero alone, and at last he is lost in a deep and magical sleep. It is not hard to guess how a composer will go to work to do such a thing as this, and D'Indy does it. He has learned how to show us the woodland because Wagner did it in "Siegfried." The rest is comparatively easy. Although D'Indy wrote this long before he composed his most interesting "Istar" variations, even at that time he was a master of the orchestra. The work is beautifully done, rich in color and delicate in texture. It is not big, nor particularly strong, but it is decidedly interesting.

Of Glazounoff's music we have already had several examples, including two of his symphonies, both of which are more pretentious than the one in E-flat, which was played on Saturday. This one is rustic in character. The composer, as usual, makes much use of typical Russian themes which of themselves, being of unusual contour, add interest to a work. Beyond this Glazounoff is a good musician, a resourceful writer, and a master of orchestral composition. The symphony placed near the really great works will not rank very high as an important contribution to musical literature, but we cannot always be scaling the snow-capped summits of genius. There is pleasure to be found in the foothills. Such men as D'Indy and Glazounoff are to be found there, and it is well to hear of them from time to time. The orchestra played much better than on Thursday evening.

Mme Gadski, the soloist, received a warm welcome from the large audience. A summer's rest has banished all signs of her hard season here a year ago, and she was in admirable voice. For her numbers she did not stray from the beaten path. Her first was Agathe's aria from "Der Freischütz," which is sung as well by very few women, and her second was Schubert's songs "Gretchen am Spinnrad" and "Erlkönig," with Liszt's setting for the orchestra. The first goes admirably, but the second is not so successful, and neither sounds so well as it does with the piano.

N.Y. Post Nov 9-03.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In view of Mr. Gericke's conservative tendencies, his programme on Saturday afternoon had a remarkably modern aspect. Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, D'Indy's "La Forêt Enchantée," and Glazounoff's fourth symphony were the orchestral numbers, and Frau Gadski contributed an aria by Weber and two songs by Schubert—two composers who, though older, were the originators of the modern romantic school. Like most opera singers, Mme. Gadski needs the glamour of the dramatic stage to be at her best; yet it was on the dramatic side that "Margaret at the Spinning Wheel" and "The Erlking" failed of their full effect on this occasion. Agathe's recitative and aria from the second act of "Der Freischütz" suited her better, and the final high notes ensured abundant applause. The Schubert songs were given with orchestral accompaniment.

Vincent D'Indy is a composer who has been unduly neglected in New York. His orchestral legend, "The Enchanted Forest," is based on a ballad by Uhland. It skilfully reproduces the mood and atmosphere of the poem, and there are exquisite patches of orchestral coloring. It is an early work, and lacks individual physiognomy. The composer is said to be an ardent admirer of Wagner; his score confirms the rumor. The performance of this piece by Mr. Gericke and his players was much more satisfactory than that of the "Sakuntala" overture, in which the Oriental glow of color that constitutes the chief charm of that piece was strangely missing. But it was in the Russian symphony that the Bostonians showed their skill to best advantage. The intricate and difficult last movement of the Glazounoff symphony was played with exciting virtuosity. The first movement of this work, which had never before been played here, is interesting rather for its coloring than for what it tells thematically; but the scherzo is based on a new and quaint conceit which is prettily, we might almost say wittily, expressed by the woodwind instruments in a variety of combinations.

Linked with the first of this season's Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts here was considerable curiosity. When Franz Kneisel hung up his orchestral fiddle and his bow, Mr. Gericke first lost some sleep; then he went to Europe to find a new concertmaster. Exactly how troublesome a way that is to spend one's Summer vacation need not be emphasized here; nor need any other details be rehearsed, save that he engaged a Spaniard, named E. Fernandez Arbos, to sit at his orchestral left hand. Mr. Arbos appeared not only as concertmaster but also as soloist, playing Mendelssohn's Concerto. He has the reputation of growing as nervous as seven cats when called upon to play in public, and his appearance the other night justified his claim to this neurotic distinction. Nervousness may cover a multitude of fiddling sins, but it scarcely puts the listener in good humor. Arbos's playing of this ultra-sentimental work was actually a sad performance. His intonation should never have passed Ellis Island, while his incredible lack of rhythm gave the accompanying conductor a very bad quarter of an hour. Altogether it was a performance so many times removed from the artistic that it should not have been done at all. The balance of the evening was devoted to the "Euryanthe" overture, "Waldweben" from Wagner's "Siegfried" and Brahms's Second Symphony. The orchestra played the overture with a superb splurge of fire, and the old work sounded so new that it might have been written the day before, save for the fact that there was no one alive the day before who possibly could have written it. The "Waldweben" was heartily disappointing. For all that the uninitiated knew it might have been a gentle Boston breeze sighing frigidly about Cod Fish Hall; certainly all of Wagner was refined out of it. Mr. Gericke read the Brahms Symphony as though he loved it more in detail than he did en bloc. It was all sanely, icily beautiful, sounding like an Emerson essay set to music.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—NOVEMBER 15, 1903.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe was the soloist at the fourth symphony rehearsal and concert, playing the B major concerto for piano and orchestra, by Henry Holden Huss, the American composer. The work was given in its revised form. The other numbers of the program were Raff's overture, "Ein feste Burg;" Smetana's symphonic poem, "Vysehrad," and Beethoven's D major symphony. The Huss concerto is one that appeals especially to the musician or the advanced student of music, for its constantly varying progressions, its abrupt changes of modulations in different keys and the almost restless and irregular forms of its instrumental combinations, makes the piece too complicated and abstruse for the enjoyment of the general public.

The instrumentation is elaborate and the solo instrument is very prominent in each movement. The first part is so full of fortissimo passages that the physical tax for the soloist is very great, and that Miss Aus Der Ohe was able to maintain the proper proportion in her piano work against the heavy orchestral background, shows the artist possessed of a strength of arms and fingers not usually found in a woman. Her chords, arpeggios and runs, singly and in doubles, were wonderfully vigorous and clear, and in all her fortissimo work she appeared to be easily able to cope with the orchestra. In the second movement she produced a beautiful cantabel tone where required, showing a fine intelligence in her reading and a consummate skill in execution. She gave the two themes of the third movement with splendid contrasting effects, closing the concerto with a brilliant and dashing performance of the crashing finale. The large audience appreciated her performance very highly, and she was recalled several times and received some huge floral tributes.

The orchestra as a rule did its work admirably, though the "conversations" in the third movement seemed to be a trifle uncertain at times. The Raff overture proved to be a pleasing composition of its kind, and the principal theme showed to advantage the efficiency of the different wind contingents. Smetana's symphonic poem was given in a stirring and sympathetic manner, the brasses sounding their phrases in excellent harmony and the contrasts of the festival music and the joyless, sad refrain of the finale being beautiful in their impressive and mournful cadences. The Beethoven symphony calls for naught but praise, the larghetto and the delightful scherzo each being received with the usual manifestations of pleasure by the auditors.

The program of the concerts this week will include Brahms' tragic overture, Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Ideal," and Dvorak's symphony in F. Mr Krasselt, the new first 'cellist, will appear as a soloist for the first time in America, and he will play a concerto by Saint-Saens.

[45]

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Fourth Concert—Review by Philip Hale in the Boston Herald.

THE program for the fourth Symphony concert, given last night in Symphony Hall, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Overture, Ein feste Burg.....Raff
(First time at these concerts.)
Concerto in B major, for piano.....Huss
Symphonic poem, Vysehrad.....Smetana
Symphony in D major, No. 2.....Beethoven

Raff's overture, "Ein feste Burg," was played in Boston at a concert of the Philharmonic Society in 1882. We believe there was a still earlier performance, possibly by Theodore Thomas, but we have not been able to verify this belief. The overture was composed originally as a prelude to Wilhelm Genast's tragedy, "Bernhard von Weimar," and it was performed for the first time in 1855 as a prelude to the play. Then Raff rewrote it for concert use. The chief theme is the familiar tune that, long attributed to Martin Luther, is the melody for his version of the Forty-sixth Psalm, but the form of this melody as it is now known was shaped by Bach.

The overture is not among the more distinguished works of Raff, who, although he was of a romantic nature and of poetic aspirations, was obliged through poverty to write innumerable pot boilers. His extraordinary facility in counterpoint lightened this task, and was in the long run fatal to his abiding reputation; for some of his most striking contrapuntal feats are buried in otherwise empty and futile music. It was not that he did not have the faculty of self examination and consequent and glorifying rejection; he did not have the time or money was always needed, and there were the publishers clamorous for salon music.

This overture is of a kind that was once popular. A well known theme suggested a musical composition, and the aim of the composer was to introduce this theme in as many singular ways as possible. The introduction was both expected and unexpected. There were passages that were written to lead up inevitably to the theme, so that the audience might say with delight, "Now it's coming"; and again, when there was the least expectation, the theme suddenly appeared and the audience started, sat up, rubbed eyes and strained ears: "Why, here it is!" Think, for a moment, of Luther's first lines as Englished by Thomas Carlyle:

A safe stronghold our God is still,
A trusty shield and weapon.

And how does Raff first introduce the melody? With full orchestra and with thunderous brass and roll of drums? No; for in such a case what would he have for a climax? This tune, which is so intimately associated with aggressive Protestantism; this tune, which was a battle hymn in the war against all devils and principalities and powers, is introduced suavely by amiable wind instruments. Then, of course, follows treatment of the melody, and in the main body of the overture, the tune serves in various more or less ingenious ways. But ingenuity is not necessarily a saving grace in a musical composition; and in this instance the ingenuity is that of accomplished routine. The overture is a singularly uninspired composition. No momentary breath of imagination gives it the semblance of life. Put a looking glass before the score, and the glass remains untarnished.

Mr. Huss was the pianist when his concerto was first played in Boston at a Symphony concert late in 1894. The concerto then seemed stuffed with so many thoughts and devices that hardly anything definite was left in the mind of the hearer. After this performance Mr. Huss shortened the work and revised it in other ways. He changed the development in the first movement, broadened the second theme of the finale and "touched up," as he himself says, the instrumentation. Last night the composer was fortunate in his pianist, who did all within her power to make the music an authoritative message. Mr. Huss played his own work, as we remember, after the manner of the average composer. He made no pretense of being a commanding virtuoso. Mr. Gericke last night read the work with the most painstaking care and with appreciation of the best characteristics of the score, so that the audience undoubtedly had full opportunity to form a judgment concerning the merits of the concerto itself.

This work does not seem to us one of high imagination or of marked distinction. Mr. Huss is a musician who has studied deeply and earnestly; a musician to be respected for certain solid acquirements, for industry, and for commendable ambition; he is to be respected just as he respects his profession; but this does not enable him with all his technical resources to create a concerto of true beauty and strength, nor to display a pronounced individuality. He was an excellent student of harmony at Munich; but in this concerto his harmonic knowledge does not tell. It is not that he is afraid of effects; on the contrary, he is adventurous; but the concerto is so crowded with matter that nothing stands out in simple and bold relief.

There are a great many notes, and Miss Aus der Ohe and the orchestra played them. There were agreeable moments, but there were quarter hours of monotony, when, to use a homely phrase, everything was going at once, and without any effect save that of exasperating the hearer. There were pleasant bits of orchestral color, but as a rule the orchestral painting was mono-chromatic. Force was more than once bombast, as in the first movement, and in the orchestral repetition of the chief theme of the finale. Miss Aus der Ohe, to whom the concerto is dedicated, displayed the conscientiousness, the power, the brilliance, the intelligence, that have long characterized her, but not infrequently the piano part seemed as long spun out and tiresome chatter. She was recalled several times.

In Smetana's "Vysehrad" imaginative force is recognized at once. With apparently simple means the composer succeeds in musical scene painting; and there is something more than panoramic success; for the idea of former glory and departed grandeur is firmly established. The simplicity of Smetana is honest, while the naïveté of Dvorák suggests artful and deliberate childishness as an important part of musical stock in trade. The lamentation over the ruins of Libussa's castle is not sentimental; it is bardic and heroic; it suggests the period, and in the whole symphonic poem there is no incongruous or belittling thought or expression.

Beethoven's early symphony brought the end.

Gericke Plays an American Composition.

To the Musical Courier:

MR. GERICKE has confined himself so exclusively to the compositions which he learned in the Fatherland, before taking up his residence in the New World that his production of the Concerto in B major for piano, by Huss, at the fourth Symphony concert last night is a procedure requiring some explanation. And I hasten to state that it was not in accordance with the wishes of Mr. Gericke that his sacred and classic programs should be defiled with an American compositon, but rather because of the obstinacy of Miss Aus der Ohe, the assisting piano artist. Bad taste this Miss Aus der Ohe must have, from the Gericke viewpoint; for the Gericke viewpoint regards the work of serious composition the exclusive function of the Germans and one or two other Continental races, and it holds that American creative genius is fit only for gospel hymns and ragtime.

DISSENTER.

BOSTON, Mass., November 15, 1903.

FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Novelty for the Series Is the Overture by Raff.

Miss Aus der Ohe's Performance of Huss' Piano Concerto—An Unfamiliar Overture by Ruff and Pieces by Smetana and Beethoven.

The programme for the Fourth Symphony concert, given last night in Symphony Hall, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Overture, "Ein feste Burg".....Raff
(First time at these concerts).
Concerto in B major for piano.....Huss
Symphonic poem, "Vysehrad".....Smetana
Symphony in D major, No. 2.....Beethoven

Raff's overture, "Ein feste Burg," was played in Boston at a concert of the Philharmonic Society in 1882. We believe there was a still earlier performance, possibly by Theodore Thomas, but we have not been able to verify this belief. The overture was composed originally as a prelude to Wilhelm Genast's tragedy, "Bernhard von Weimar," and it was performed for the first time in 1855 as a prelude to the play. Then Raff rewrote it for concert use. The chief theme is the familiar tune that, long attributed to Martin Luther, is the melody for his version of the 46th Psalm, but the form of this melody as it is now known was shaped by Bach.

The overture is not among the more distinguished works of Raff, who, although he was of a romantic nature and of poetic aspirations, was obliged through poverty to write innumerable pot-boilers. His extraordinary facility in counterpoint lightened this task, and was in the long run fatal to his abiding reputation; for some of his most striking contrapuntal feats are buried in otherwise empty and futile music. It was not that he did not have the faculty of self-examination and consequent and glorifying rejection; he did not have the time or money was always needed, and there were the publishers clamorous for salon music.

This overture is of a kind that was once popular. A well known theme suggested a musical composition, and the aim of the composer was to introduce this theme in as many singular ways as possible. The introduction was both expected and unexpected. There were passages that were written to lead up inevitably to the theme, so that the audience might say with delight, "now it's coming"; and again, when there was the least expectation, the theme suddenly appeared and the audience started, sat up, rubbed eyes and strained ears: "Why, here it is!" Think, for a moment, of Luther's first lines as Englished by Thomas Carlyle:

"A safe stronghold our God is still,
A trusty shield and weapon."

And how does Raff first introduce the melody? With full orchestra and with thunderous brass and roll of drums? No: for in such a case what would he have for a climax? This tune, which is so intimately associated with aggressive Protestantism; this tune, which was a battle hymn in the war against all devils and principalities and powers, is introduced suavely by amiable wind instruments. Then, of course, follows treatment of the melody, and in the main body of the overture, the tune serves in various more or less ingenius ways. But ingenuity is not necessarily a saving grace in a musical composition; and in this instance the ingenuity is that of accomplished routine. The overture is a singularly uninspired composition. No momentary breath of imagination gives it the semblance of life. Put a looking-glass before the score, and the glass remains untarnished.

Mr. Huss was the pianist when his concerto was first played in Boston at a Symphony concert late in 1894. The concerto then seemed stuffed with so many thoughts and devices that hardly anything definite was left in the mind of the hearer. After this performance Mr. Huss shortened the work and revised it in other ways. He changed the development in the first movement, broadened the second theme of the finale and "touched up," as he himself says, the instrumentation. Last night the composer was fortunate in his pianist, who did all within her power to make the music an authoritative message. Mr. Huss played his own work, as we remember, after the manner of the average composer. He made no pretence of being a commanding virtuoso. Mr. Gericke last night read the work with the most painstaking care and with appreciation of the best characteristics of the score, so that the audience undoubtedly had full opportunity to form a judgment concerning the merits of the concerto itself.

This work does not seem to us one of high imagination or of marked distinction. Mr. Huss is a musician who has studied deeply and earnestly; a musician to be respected for certain solid acquirements, for industry, and for commendable ambition; he is to be respected just as he respects his profession; but this does not enable him with all his technical resources to create a concerto of true beauty and strength, nor to display a pronounced individuality. He was an excellent student of harmony at Munich; but in this concerto his harmonic knowledge does not tell. It is not that he is afraid of effects; on the contrary, he is adventurous; but the concerto is so crowded with matter that nothing stands out in simple and bold relief.

There are a great many notes, and Miss Aus der Ohe and the orchestra played them. There were agreeable moments, but there were quarter-hours of monotony, when, to use a homely phrase, everything was going at once, and without any effect save that of exasperating the hearer. There were pleasant bits of orchestral color, but as a rule the orchestral painting was monochromatic. Force was more than once bombast, as in the first movement, and in the orchestral repetition of the chief theme of the finale. Miss Aus der Ohe, to whom the concerto is dedicated, displayed the conscientiousness, the power, the brilliance, the intelligence, that have long characterized her, but not infrequently the piano part seemed as long spun out and tiresome chatter. She was recalled several times.

In Smetana's "Vysehrad" imaginative force is recognized at once. With apparently simple means the composer succeeds in musical scene painting; and there is something more than panoramic success; for the idea of former glory and departed grandeur is firmly established. The simplicity of Smetana is honest, while the naïveté of Dvorak suggests artful and deliberate childishness as an important part of musical stock in trade. The lamentation over the ruins of Libussa's castle is not sentimental; it is bardic and heroic; it suggests the period, and in the whole symphonic poem there is no incongruous or belittling thought or expression.

Beethoven's early symphony brought the end.

FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Adele Aus Der Ohe Plays a Concerto by Henry Holden Huss—Orchestral Numbers by Raff, Smetana and Beethoven.

The programme of the fourth Symphony concert last evening was as follows:
Overture, "Ein Feste Burg".....Raff
Concerto for pianoforte.....Huss
Symphonic poem, "Vysehrad" (No. 1 of the Cyclus, "My Country").....Smetana
Symphony No. 2.....Beethoven
Soloist, Adele Aus Der Ohe.

This programme was the least interesting of any in the series thus far, the best number being the symphonic poem by Smetana. It has been heard at these concerts before, and is not a novelty, but it is a work well worth hearing, not only for the inherent charm of the orchestral scoring but also for its strength and originality of thought, which make it prominent among modern works of its kind.

It was finely played and made a delightful impression.

The Raff overture, in which the theme of Luther's familiar chorale, "Eine Feste Burg," figures prominently, has not been heard in this city for many years. It is not among the composer's greatest achievements, but shows much inventive power, contrapuntal skill and effective scoring. The Beethoven symphony, with its especially interesting and melodious slow movement, was the closing number.

Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe made her reappearance in this city after nearly three years' absence, and she played Henry Holden Huss's concerto in B major in a revised version, the original having been played by the composer at a symphony concert about nine years ago under Emil Paur's direction.

When first heard it impressed one as a work tediously long and barren for the most part of musical interest.

In the revised and shortened version heard last evening the work is improved somewhat, but even now it fails to create more than a passing interest. There are pleasing moments for the solo instrument, together with much that is "padding" and, useless except for private piano practice, and the orchestral accompaniment is unequal, for there is a mixture of good, bad and indifferent scoring that is not impressive to the listener.

The finale appears to be the best portion of the concerto, and if the composer could make a short work in one movement, embodying the best portions, in the manner of Liszt's A major concerto, a sort of fantasie, as it were, to take not over 20 or 25 minutes for performance, he would then have a composition of interest and one that would be sought after by pianists. As it now stands the concerto is without distinction, although Miss Aus Der Ohe played it superbly and no doubt made all there was in it show to the best advantage. The pianist was enthusiastically applauded and several times recalled.

SOCIETY ATTENDS SYMPHONY

There was an eminently brilliant audience for the fourth in the series of Symphony rehearsals Friday afternoon, when Miss Aus der Ohe was the soloist, and fully sustained the favorable impression she has created on former occasions here. The great pianiste was simply attired in a rich gown of white silk, on the bodice of which glittered the magnificent jewelled brooch presented her by the Empress of Germany. Among those who enjoyed the unusually excellent programme were Miss Aus der Ohe's sister, and constant companion, who was attired in black silk and jets; Miss Louise Drew (who was escorted by Mr. Guy Stanley), looking very pretty in golden brown velvet, a hat of brown beaver, with plumes, and an immense white boa; Mrs. F. L. Higginson, Miss Juliet Higginson, Miss Barbara Higginson, Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, Mrs. George M. Cushing, Mrs. Henry S. Howe, Miss May Kenney, Mrs. George C. Lee, Jr., Mrs. Albert Harding, Mrs. Frederick R. Comee, Mrs. Guy Lowell, Miss Beatrice Blake, Miss Mary Vaughan, Miss Rachel Brooks, Mrs. Francis Peabody, Jr., and her daughter, Miss Rosamond Peabody, Mrs. Oliver Ames and her mother, Mrs. West, Miss Edith Stackpole, Miss Katharine Foote, Mrs. George Shattuck, Miss Mabel Bayard Warren, Miss Alice Perry, Miss Alice Stackpole, Mrs. Agassiz, Mrs. Thomas Matthews, Miss Mea Bowditch, Miss Elizabeth Shattuck, Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Mrs. William P. Fay, Mrs. William Burnham, Miss Ethel Gibson, Miss Rosamond Saltonstall and innumerable others. Two immense floral offerings went over the footlights to Miss Aus der Ohe—one of American Beauty roses and the other a cluster of glorious white roses, just tinged with pink—which were a greeting from Mrs. James Fields.

Boston Herald
Sunday Nov 15-03

There was the usual large and smart audience for the rehearsal Friday afternoon. Miss Aus der Ohe, who is always a drawing card, had a hearty welcome. She wore white silk, with lace, her only ornament the brooch which was presented to her by the Emperor of Germany. She received a bunch of white roses from Mrs. James T. Eldredge and a huge bunch of long stemmed American Beauties, tied with red ribbons. Some of the many at the rehearsal were Mrs. William Burnham, with her sister-in-law, Mrs. Charles Fry; Mrs. Francis Peabody, Jr., and Miss Rosamond Peabody, Mrs. George C. Lee, Jr., Mrs. Guy Lowell, Mrs. Henry L. Higginson and Mme. Agassiz, Mrs. F. L. Higginson and Miss Juliet and Miss Barbara Higginson, Mrs. Preston West and her daughter, Mrs. Oliver Ames; Mrs. Hall Curtis, Mrs. George B. Shattuck, Mrs. Neal Rantoul with Miss Lena Stevenson, Mrs. Matthew Luce, Sr., Mrs. William P. Fay, Miss Marion Peabody, Mrs. William Lindsey, Miss Edith Stackpole, Miss Mabel Warren, Mrs. Henry S. Howe, Miss Ethel Gibson, Miss Alice Stackpole, Miss May Kenney, Miss Beatrice Blake, Miss Rachel Brooks, Mrs. Albert E. Harding, Mr. and Mrs. Albert F. Bigelow, Miss Rosamond Saltonstall, Miss Elizabeth Shattuck, Miss Mea Bowditch, Mrs. John E. Hudson, Miss Mary Vaughan, Miss Alice Perry, Miss Katherine Foote, Mrs. George M. Cushing and Miss Louise Drew, who was with Mr. Guy Standing, both of the Empire company. Miss Drew, who is the daughter of Mr. John Drew, was looking very well in a princess gown of brown corduroy, with pipings of pale yellow satin, a large brown velvet hat, with brown plumes, and a muff and boa of white fox. Mr. Rudolf Krasselt, the new 'cellist, will be the soloist this week.

[46]

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Fourth Concert—Review by Philip Hale in the Boston Herald.

THE program for the fourth Symphony concert, given last night in Symphony Hall, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Overture, Ein feste Burg.....Raff
(First time at these concerts.)
Concerto in B major, for piano.....Huss
Symphonic poem, Vysehrad.....Smetana
Symphony in D major, No. 2.....Beethoven

Raff's overture, "Ein feste Burg," was played in Boston at a concert of the Philharmonic Society in 1882. We believe there was a still earlier performance, possibly by Theodore Thomas, but we have not been able to verify this belief. The overture was composed originally as a prelude to Wilhelm Genast's tragedy, "Bernhard von Weimar," and it was performed for the first time in 1855 as a prelude to the play. Then Raff rewrote it for concert use. The chief theme is the familiar tune that, long attributed to Martin Luther, is the melody for his version of the Forty-sixth Psalm, but the form of this melody as it is now known was shaped by Bach.

The overture is not among the more distinguished works of Raff, who, although he was of a romantic nature and of poetic aspirations, was obliged through poverty to write innumerable pot boilers. His extraordinary facility in counterpoint lightened this task, and was in the long run fatal to his abiding reputation; for some of his most striking contrapuntal feats are buried in otherwise empty and futile music. It was not that he did not have the faculty of self examination and consequent and glorifying rejection; he did not have the time or money was always needed, and there were the publishers clamorous for salon music.

This overture is of a kind that was once popular. A well known theme suggested a musical composition, and the aim of the composer was to introduce this theme in as many singular ways as possible. The introduction was both expected and unexpected. There were passages that were written to lead up inevitably to the theme, so that the audience might say with delight, "Now it's coming"; and again, when there was the least expectation, the theme suddenly appeared and the audience started, sat up, rubbed eyes and strained ears: "Why, here it is!" Think, for a moment, of Luther's first lines as Englished by Thomas Carlyle:

> A safe stronghold our God is still,
> A trusty shield and weapon.

And how does Raff first introduce the melody? With full orchestra and with thunderous brass and roll of drums? No: for in such a case what would he have for a climax? This tune, which is so intimately associated with aggressive Protestantism; this tune, which was a battle hymn in the war against all devils and principalities and powers, is introduced suavely by amiable wind instruments. Then, of course, follows treatment of the melody, and in the main body of the overture, the tune serves in various more or less ingenious ways. But ingenuity is not necessarily a saving grace in a musical composition; and in this instance the ingenuity is that of accomplished routine. The overture is a singularly uninspired composition. No momentary breath of imagination gives it the semblance of life. Put a looking glass before the score, and the glass remains untarnished.

Mr. Huss was the pianist when his concerto was first played in Boston at a Symphony concert late in 1894. The concerto then seemed stuffed with so many thoughts and devices that hardly anything definite was left in the mind of the hearer. After this performance Mr. Huss shortened the work and revised it in other ways. He changed the development in the first movement, broadened the second theme of the finale and "touched up," as he himself says, the instrumentation. Last night the composer was fortunate in his pianist, who did all within her power to make the music an authoritative message. Mr. Huss played his own work, as we remember, after the manner of the average composer. He made no pretense of being a commanding virtuoso. Mr. Gericke last night read the work with the most painstaking care and with appreciation of the best characteristics of the score, so that the audience undoubtedly had full opportunity to form a judgment concerning the merits of the concerto itself.

This work does not seem to us one of high imagination or of marked distinction. Mr. Huss is a musician who has studied deeply and earnestly; a musician to be respected for certain solid acquirements, for industry, and for commendable ambition; he is to be respected just as he respects his profession; but this does not enable him with all his technical resources to create a concerto of true beauty and strength, nor to display a pronounced individuality. He was an excellent student of harmony at Munich; but in this concerto his harmonic knowledge does not tell. It is not that he is afraid of effects; on the contrary, he is adventurous; but the concerto is so crowded with matter that nothing stands out in simple and bold relief.

There are a great many notes, and Miss Aus der Ohe and the orchestra played them. There were agreeable moments, but there were quarter hours of monotony, when, to use a homely phrase, everything was going at once, and without any effect save that of exasperating the hearer. There were pleasant bits of orchestral color, but as a rule the orchestral painting was mono-chromatic. Force was more than once bombast, as in the first movement, and in the orchestral repetition of the chief theme of the finale. Miss Aus der Ohe, to whom the concerto is dedicated, displayed the conscientiousness, the power, the brilliance, the intelligence, that have long characterized her, but not infrequently the piano part seemed as long spun out and tiresome chatter. She was recalled several times.

In Smetana's "Vysehrad" imaginative force is recognized at once. With apparently simple means the composer succeeds in musical scene painting; and there is something more than panoramic success; for the idea of former glory and departed grandeur is firmly established. The simplicity of Smetana is honest, while the naïveté of Dvorák suggests artful and deliberate childishness as an important part of musical stock in trade. The lamentation over the ruins of Libussa's castle is not sentimental; it is bardic and heroic; it suggests the period, and in the whole symphonic poem there is no incongruous or belittling thought or expression.

Beethoven's early symphony brought the end.

Gericke Plays an American Composition.

To the Musical Courier:

MR. GERICKE has confined himself so exclusively to the compositions which he learned in the Fatherland, before taking up his residence in the New World that his production of the Concerto in B major for piano, by Huss, at the fourth Symphony concert last night is a procedure requiring some explanation. And I hasten to state that it was not in accordance with the wishes of Mr. Gericke that his sacred and classic programs should be defiled with an American compositon, but rather because of the obstinacy of Miss Aus der Ohe, the assisting piano artist. Bad taste this Miss Aus der Ohe must have, from the Gericke viewpoint; for the Gericke viewpoint regards the work of serious composition the exclusive function of the Germans and one or two other Continental races, and it holds that American creative genius is fit only for gospel hymns and ragtime.

DISSENTER.

BOSTON, Mass., November 15, 1903.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST.
NOVEMBER 15, 1903

FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Adele Aus Der Ohe Plays a Concerto by Henry Holden Huss—Orchestral Numbers by Raff, Smetana and Beethoven

The programme of the fourth Symphony concert last evening was as follows:
Overture, "Eine Feste Burg".....Raff
Concerto for pianoforte.....Huss
Symphonic poem, "Vysehrad" (No. 1 of the Cyclus, "My Country")..Smetana
Symphony No. 2.....Beethoven
Soloist, Adele Aus Der Ohe.

This programme was the least interesting of any in the series thus far, the best number being the symphonic poem by Smetana. It has been heard at these concerts before, and is not a novelty, but it is a work well worth hearing, not only for the inherent charm of the orchestral scoring but also for its strength and originality of thought, which make it prominent among modern works of its kind.

It was finely played and made a delightful impression.

The Raff overture, in which the theme of Luther's familiar chorale, "Eine Feste Burg," figures prominently, has not been heard in this city for many years. It is not among the composer's greatest achievements, but shows much inventive power, contrapuntal skill and effective scoring. The Beethoven symphony, with its especially interesting and melodious slow movement, was the closing number.

Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe made her reappearance in this city after nearly three years' absence, and she played Henry Holden Huss's concerto in B major in a revised version, the original having been played by the composer at a symphony concert about nine years ago under Emil Paur's direction.

When first heard it impressed one as a work tediously long and barren for the most part of musical interest.

In the revised and shortened version heard last evening the work is improved somewhat, but even now it fails to create more than a passing interest. There are pleasing moments for the solo instrument, together with much that is "padding" and, useless except for private piano practice, and the orchestral accompaniment is unequal, for there is a mixture of good, bad and indifferent scoring that is not impressive to the listener.

The finale appears to be the best portion of the concerto, and if the composer could make a short work in one movement, embodying the best portions, in the manner of Liszt's A major concerto, a sort of fantasie, as it were, to take not over 20 or 25 minutes for performance, he would then have a composition of interest and one that would be sought after by pianists. As it now stands the concerto is without distinction, although Miss Aus Der Ohe played it superbly and no doubt made all there was in it show to the best advantage. The pianist was enthusiastically applauded and several times recalled.

SOCIETY ATTENDS SYMPHONY

There was an eminently brilliant audience for the fourth in the series of Symphony rehearsals Friday afternoon, when Miss Aus der Ohe was the soloist, and fully sustained the favorable impression she has created on former occasions here. The great pianiste was simply attired in a rich gown of white silk, on the bodice of which glittered the magnificent jewelled brooch presented her by the Empress of Germany. Among those who enjoyed the unusually excellent programme were Miss Aus der Ohe's sister, and constant companion, who was attired in black silk and jets; Miss Louise Drew (who was escorted by Mr. Guy Stanley), looking very pretty in golden brown velvet, a hat of brown beaver, with plumes, and an immense white boa; Mrs. F. L. Higginson, Miss Juliet Higginson, Miss Barbara Higginson, Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, Mrs. George M. Cushing, Mrs. Henry S. Howe, Miss May Kenney, Mrs. George C. Lee, Jr., Mrs. Albert Harding, Mrs. Frederick R. Comee, Mrs. Guy Lowell, Miss Beatrice Blake, Miss Mary Vaughan, Miss Rachel Brooks, Mrs. Francis Peabody, Jr., and her daughter, Miss Rosamond Peabody, Mrs. Oliver Ames and her mother, Mrs. West, Miss Edith Stackpole, Miss Katharine Foote, Mrs. George Shattuck, Miss Mabel Bayard Warren, Miss Alice Perry, Miss Alice Stackpole, Mrs. Agassiz, Mrs. Thomas Matthews, Miss Mea Bowditch, Miss Elizabeth Shattuck, Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Mrs. William P. Fay, Mrs. William Burnham, Miss Ethel Gibson, Miss Rosamond Saltonstall and innumerable others. Two immense floral offerings went over the footlights to Miss Aus der Ohe—one of American Beauty roses and the other a cluster of glorious white roses, just tinged with pink—which were a greeting from Mrs. James Fields.

[illegible]

There was the usual large and smart audience for the rehearsal Friday afternoon. Miss Aus der Ohe, who is always a drawing card, had a hearty welcome. She wore white silk, with lace, her only ornament the brooch which was presented to her by the Emperor of Germany. She received a bunch of white roses from Mrs. James T. Eldredge and a huge bunch of long stemmed American Beauties, tied with red ribbons. Some of the many at the rehearsal were Mrs. William Burnham, with her sister-in-law, Mrs. Charles Fry; Mrs. Francis Peabody, Jr., and Miss Rosamond Peabody, Mrs. George C. Lee, Jr., Mrs. Guy Lowell, Mrs. Henry L. Higginson and Mme. Agassiz, Mrs. F. L. Higginson and Miss Juliet and Miss Barbara Higginson, Mrs. Preston West and her daughter, Mrs. Oliver Ames; Mrs. Hall Curtis, Mrs. George B. Shattuck, Mrs. Neal Rantoul with Miss Lena Stevenson, Mrs. Matthew Luce, Sr., Mrs. William P. Fay, Miss Marion Peabody, Mrs. William Lindsey, Miss Edith Stackpole, Miss Mabel Warren, Mrs. Henry S. Howe, Miss Ethel Gibson, Miss Alice Stackpole, Miss May Kenney, Miss Beatrice Blake, Miss Rachel Brooks, Mrs. Albert E. Harding, Mr. and Mrs. Albert F. Bigelow, Miss Rosamond Saltonstall, Miss Elizabeth Shattuck, Miss Mea Bowditch, Mrs. John E. Hudson, Miss Mary Vaughan, Miss Alice Perry, Miss Katherine Foote, Mrs. George M. Cushing and Miss Louise Drew, who was with Mr. Guy Standing, both of the Empire company. Miss Drew, who is the daughter of Mr. John Drew, was looking very well in a princess gown of brown corduroy, with pipings of pale yellow satin, a large brown velvet hat, with brown plumes, and a muff and boa of white fox. Mr. Rudolf Krasselt, the new 'cellist, will be the soloist this week.

SUNDAY HERALD—BOSTON, NOVEMBER 15, 1903.

FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Novelty for the Series Is the Overture by Raff.

Miss Aus der Ohe's Performance of Huss' Piano Concerto—An Unfamiliar Overture by Ruff and Pieces by Smetana and Beethoven.

The programme for the Fourth Symphony concert, given last night in Symphony Hall, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Overture, "Ein feste Burg".....Raff
(First time at these concerts).
Concerto in B major for piano.....Huss
Symphonic poem, "Vysehrad".....Smetana
Symphony in D major, No. 2.....Beethoven

Raff's overture, "Ein feste Burg," was played in Boston at a concert of the Philharmonic Society in 1882. We believe there was a still earlier performance, possibly by Theodore Thomas, but we have not been able to verify this belief. The overture was composed originally as a prelude to Wilhelm Genast's tragedy, "Bernhard von Weimar," and it was performed for the first time in 1855 as a prelude to the play. Then Raff rewrote it for concert use. The chief theme is the familiar tune that, long attributed to Martin Luther, is the melody for his version of the 46th Psalm, but the form of this melody as it is now known was shaped by Bach.

The overture is not among the more distinguished works of Raff, who, although he was of a romantic nature and of poetic aspirations, was obliged through poverty to write innumerable pot-boilers. His extraordinary facility in counterpoint lightened this task, and was in the long run fatal to his abiding reputation; for some of his most striking contrapuntal feats are buried in otherwise empty and futile music. It was not that he did not have the faculty of self-examination and consequent and glorifying rejection; he did not have the time or money was always needed, and there were the publishers clamorous for salon music.

This overture is of a kind that was once popular. A well known theme suggested a musical composition, and the aim of the composer was to introduce this theme in as many singular ways as possible. The introduction was both expected and unexpected. There were passages that were written to lead up inevitably to the theme, so that the audience might say with delight, "now it's coming"; and again, when there was the least expectation, the theme suddenly appeared and the audience started, sat up, rubbed eyes and strained ears: "Why, here it is!" Think, for a moment, of Luther's first lines as Englished by Thomas Carlyle:

> "A safe stronghold our God is still,
> A trusty shield and weapon."

And how does Raff first introduce the melody? With full orchestra and with thunderous brass and roll of drums? No: for in such a case what would he have for a climax? This tune, which is so intimately associated with aggressive Protestantism; this tune, which was a battle hymn in the war against all devils and principalities and powers, is introduced suavely by amiable wind instruments. Then, of course, follows treatment of the melody, and in the main body of the overture, the tune serves in various more or less ingenious ways. But ingenuity is not necessarily a saving grace in a musical composition; and in this instance the ingenuity is that of accomplished routine. The overture is a singularly uninspired composition. No momentary breath of imagination gives it the semblance of life. Put a looking-glass before the score, and the glass remains untarnished.

Mr. Huss was the pianist when his concerto was first played in Boston at a Symphony concert late in 1894. The concerto then seemed stuffed with so many thoughts and devices that hardly anything definite was left in the mind of the hearer. After this performance Mr. Huss shortened the work and revised it in other ways. He changed the development in the first movement, broadened the second theme of the finale and "touched up," as he himself says, the instrumentation. Last night the composer was fortunate in his pianist, who did all within her power to make the music an authoritative message. Mr. Huss played his own work, as we remember, after the manner of the average composer. He made no pretence of being a commanding virtuoso. Mr. Gericke last night read the work with the most painstaking care and with appreciation of the best characteristics of the score, so that the audience undoubtedly had full opportunity to form a judgment concerning the merits of the concerto itself.

This work does not seem to us one of high imagination or of marked distinction. Mr. Huss is a musician who has studied deeply and earnestly; a musician to be respected for certain solid acquirements, for industry, and for commendable ambition; he is to be respected just as he respects his profession; but this does not enable him with all his technical resources to create a concerto of true beauty and strength, nor to display a pronounced individuality. He was an excellent student of harmony at Munich; but in this concerto his harmonic knowledge does not tell. It is not that he is afraid of effects; on the contrary, he is adventurous; but the concerto is so crowded with matter that nothing stands out in simple and bold relief.

There are a great many notes, and Miss Aus der Ohe and the orchestra played them. There were agreeable moments, but there were quarter-hours of monotony, when, to use a homely phrase, everything was going at once, and without any effect save that of exasperating the hearer. There were pleasant bits of orchestral color, but as a rule the orchestral painting was monochromatic. Force was more than once bombast, as in the first movement, and in the orchestral repetition of the chief theme of the finale. Miss Aus der Ohe, to whom the concerto is dedicated, displayed the conscientiousness, the power, the brilliance, the intelligence, that have long characterized her, but not infrequently the piano part seemed as long spun out and tiresome chatter. She was recalled several times.

In Smetana's "Vysehrad" imaginative force is recognized at once. With apparently simple means the composer succeeds in musical scene painting; and there is something more than panoramic success; for the idea of former glory and departed grandeur is firmly established. The simplicity of Smetana is honest, while the naïvete of Dvorak suggests artful and deliberate childishness as an important part of musical stock in trade. The lamentation over the ruins of Libussa's castle is not sentimental; it is bardic and heroic; it suggests the period, and in the whole symphonic poem there is no incongruous or belittling thought or expression.

Beethoven's early symphony brought the end.

[46]

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1903

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

Miss Adele aus der Ohe was the soloist at the fourth symphony concert, and this is the programme presented by Mr. Gericke:

Raff: Overture, "Ein feste Burg," Op. 127. (First time.)
Huss: Concerto in B major, for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 10.
Smetana: Symphonic Poem, "Vysehrad" (No. 1 of the Cycle, "My Country").
Beethoven: Symphony in D major, No. 2, Op. 36.

Mr. Gericke, if an admirer of Raff, was unkind to the composer in producing his overture "Ein feste Burg." At best not a man of the highest genius, Raff nevertheless possessed a genuine gift of melody, a sense of orchestral color, a sound musicianship, and a certain vein of imaginativeness that enabled him, when his unfortunate money circumstances allowed him sufficient leisure, to produce a few works of undying beauty. With these compositions always ready to the conductor's hand, it was an odd conceit of Mr. Gericke's to prowl among dusty music shelves, and finally to drag to light a long forgotten work that even in its palmiest days could not have been regarded as a worthy example of the master's talents. Raff wrote this overture as a prelude to a tragedy, "Bernhard von Weimar," by one Karl Albert Wilhelm Genast, surely a relation-in-law, for Raff married an actress, by name Doris Genast. Although afterwards revised for concert performance, the overture must still be classed as an occasional piece, written to order or else to oblige a friend. In any case, it is a feeble, old-fashioned composition, which would give an inexperienced concert-goer a cruelly unjust conception of Raff's claim to fame.

Immediately after the overture came a pianoforte concerto by Mr. Henry Holden Huss, which was played here, for the first time anywhere, in 1894, with the composer at the piano. Since then it has been partially re-written. Although offering much in the way of beauty, Mr. Huss's concerto leaves an impression of vagueness, chiefly because the musical material seems to be thrown together without definite purpose. Many of the themes are strikingly beautiful, others are stirring; there are moments of lovely orchestration. No one episode, however, has any ostensible connection with any other, the entire concerto, therefore, suggesting a photographic plate on which several pictures have been taken by mistake; a strong study of a head may be half hidden by a pretty view of a country house, and perhaps both are jostled by a graceful row of quivering poplar trees. These bits, exquisite in themselves, do not make a picture. Miss aus der Ohe did what she could, and aroused great enthusiasm by her noble playing, distinguished alike by beautiful tone, warmth of feeling, fine rhythm, and a general sense of mastery. The artist was recalled four or five times.

Smetana must always command deep respect as a composer who worked long and late, through the trials of deafness and other physical ills, chiefly for the musical glory of his native Bohemia. On first hearing, as well as on subsequent occasions, such of his symphonic poems contained in the cycle "My Country" as have been brought out here made an impression of great originality and poetic imaginativeness. But now, either because they have been heard too often, or because we have got too accustomed to the Czech idiom to be dazzled by the mere strangeness of the sounds, some of these poems, notably that played Saturday night, seem rather commonplace, showing in no way the sprakling freshness of "Die Verkaufte Braut."

One constantly reads that in the eighteenth century enthusiasm was regarded as improper, not to say wrong. My Lord Shaftesbury, third of the name, and a person highly thought of in his day, described enthusiasm, according to Mr. Augustine Birrell, as "one of the dangers of the age, a terrible distemper, almost as bad as the smallpox . . . a modification of the spleen, having its centre in an ill-regulated religion." Hume did not hold with enthusiasm, and on this topic Gibbon was led to say of a certain pious author: "Had not Law's vigorous mind been clouded by enthusiasm he might be ranked with the most agreeable and ingenious writers of his time." Had Gibbon, Hume, the Earl of Shaftesbury and all the rest been at Symphony Hall Saturday night, sourly as they might have looked at the demonstration Miss aus der Ohe's playing brought forth, on the whole they would have been well content with the demeanor of this audience of the twentieth century, who went to the length of receiving the first two movements of the Beethoven symphony in almost total silence. Perhaps the playing of the scherzo and of the finale met with more favor.

At the next concert Mr. Krasselt will make his first appearance as a soloist. This will be the programme: Brahms, Tragic Overture; Saint-Saëns, concerto for violoncello; Liszt, symphonic poem, "Ideale"; Dvorak, Symphony No. 8.

R. R. G.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.
NOVEMBER 21, 1903.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The First One Will be Held Next Tuesday Evening.

The first concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be held in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening and Senor E. Fernandez Arbos will be the soloist. Before the local committee heard of it, the management of the orchestra sent out from Boston some programmes which erroneously stated that the concert would be on Monday evening, instead of Tuesday. It is hoped that this will not cause any confusion among the purchasers of season tickets. Both concerts this winter are on Tuesday evenings. As there are special train arrangements this year, the programme need not be hurried. The concerts begin at 8:15 and there is a short intermission before the Schumann Symphony. In order that musical students may enjoy the concerts 100 seats will be placed on sale at Steinert's Monday morning for 75 cents apiece. A few admission tickets will also be sold at that price on the afternoon of the concert.

...LY ADVERTISER,
NOVEMBER 16,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Raff—Overture....."Eine Feste Burg," op. 127
Huss—Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, in B major, op. 10.
Miss Adele Aus der Ohe, soloist.
Smetana—Symphonic Poem, "Vysehrad," (No. 1 of the Cycle. "My Country.")
Beethoven—Symphony in D major, No. 2, op. 36

Luther's hymn "Ein Feste Burg" was the war-cry of the Reformation. The great doctor may, or may not have written its melody, but the fact remains that it was the battle-hymn of all the early Protestants and was not only a most dignified piece of religious music but was admirably suited for counterpoint as well. Consequently it has been frequently employed in music, and in two opposite ways. Bach used it learnedly, in a cantata; Meyerbeer dramatically in the "Huguenots;" Wagner most powerfully in the "Kaiser Marsch;" Mendelssohn contrapuntally in his "Reformation Symphony;" and Raff follows the Bach and Mendelssohn lead and juggles with the theme, his suave treatment especially recalling Mendelssohn's flute tootlings of the great and massive chorale! It makes a very ingenious and a thoroughly uninspired overture. One feels that, if one wanted, Raff could have gone on for 20 pages more of the same sort of musical mathematics.

One was glod to welcome Adele Aus der Ohe back to Boston. It does not seem so very long ago since the sedate young lady appeared, with braided hair and a general air of juvenility, for the first time in our concerts. She has been growing in art ever since, and is today one of the most classical of female pianists, a strong contrast to the two other stars in petticoats,—the fiery Bloomfield-Zeisler and the tropical Carreno. On this occasion she aided the American muse and gave a composition which displayed both technique and feeling. Happy the composer who has such an interpreter! The concerto of H. H. Huss took on new vigor because of Miss Aus der Ohe's noble reading of it. The pianist was most cordially received and recalled after the work with an enthusiasm not entirely warranted by its contents.

We remember the work as given at its first performance many years ago. There were several handicaps then. Mr. Huss was his own pianist at that performance, and composers are not often their best interpreters. That time the concerto came after Tschaikowsky's Pathetic Symphony, and was followed by Berloiz's fiery "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, and was crushed out between the two. At this concert there was a much fairer audition, for the work had a splendid interpretation and it was "well placed."

Yet at its best this concerto is a heavily-watered stock in a bear market; it has its points of value (the original introduction and the dashing chief theme of the finale, for example) but these are overcapitalized and are not sufficient to fill three movements. The slow movement is the weakest portion. If the work were shortened into a single-movement "Fantasy," it might become an interesting addition to the standard repertoire. As it stands its beauties lack continuity and there is occasionally a "mauvais quart d'heure" which is made up of padding and inconsequentiality.

Brave old Smetana! How one loves a man who is in earnest! It was a noble homage that this genius, with deafness and nervous troubles torturing him, brought to his beloved Bohemia, in his symphonic poems of patriotism. Smetana is greater than his great pupil, Dvorak, and is much more intensely national. The renascence of Bohemian music is almost wholly due to this suffering pioneer.

There are moments of grandeur and moments of sadness in "Vysehrad." One passage of tender melody reminds of a clarinette theme in the finale of Mendelssohn's "Scotch Symphony" which pictures loneliness in the Trossachs. But it comes with greater force in this work where it is in contrast with the grandeur of powerful themes.

Bohemia comes of right into her musical heritage, for music is often born of national sorrow, and no nation has suffered more than poor Bohemia. But the thirty years' war scourged her into absolute silence, and it is only since Smetana, Dvorak and Srb have begun their work that a national school is beginning to reassert itself. "Vysehrad" was finely performed but was scarcely appreciated at its full value by the audience, which remained if not apathetic, at least unexcited.

The second symphony of Beethoven was interesting, but not much more. It received a reading somewhat different from what we had anticipated, with rather exaggerated shading and not a single repeat omitted. The slow movement was as ever its best part. In this we may especially commend the horn-players, who gave their rather difficult and prominent phrases without a flaw. The bassoons have much work to do in the last two movements and they also deserve honorable mention.

As a whole the programme seemed less inspiring than usual. There was undeniable beauty of performance almost all through the evening, yet matters approached nearer to dulness than we like to see them in a symphony concert.

Louis C. Elson.

BOSTON HERALD.
NOVEMBER 20, 1903.

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL.

Mr. Rudolf Krasselt, the new first 'cellist of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will make his first appearance in America as a soloist this afternoon, when he will play Saint-Saens' concerto for 'celio No. 1. Mr. Krasselt was born on Jan. 1, 1879, at Baden-Baden. He studied chiefly with Klengel at Leipsic. His first appearance in public was at Baden-Baden when he was only 13 years old. He has been connected with the orchestra of the Rostock Theatre, the Philharmonic orchestra of Berlin, and the orchestra of the Vienna Court Opera. He was a member of the Krasselt quartet; the other members were his brother, Alfred, violin; his father, Gustav, viola, and his sister, Jenny, who died four years ago, was the pianist.

The orchestral numbers are the overture to "Midsummer Night's Dream," Dvorak's symphony in D minor No. 2, which was written for the Philharmonic Society of London and first performed at one of its concerts, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Ideal," which, introduced here by Theodore Thomas, has been played only once at a Symphony concert. The music is in illustration of Schiller's poem, "Die Ideale," but whereas Schiller names friendship and work as the sole consolations for the disillusions of life as man grows older, Liszt concludes with an "Apotheosis," in which the motive typical of "The Ideal" is glorified and made crashingly jubilant.

The programme of the sixth concert will include Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio," Bruch's fantasia on Scottish airs (played by Mr. Birnbaum, violinist, a new member of the orchestra), and Dohnanyi's symphony in D minor (first time in America).

BOSTON COURIER,
NOVEMBER 21, 1903.

——Friday's perfect weather ensured a large attendance at the symphony rehearsal, and society was out in fullest force. Mr. Rudolph Krasselt, the soloist, made a most favorable impression and was vigorously applauded. Among those present were Miss Mary Head, one of the season's debutantes, wearing a chic gown of white and black checked cloth, and a red hat; Miss May Kenney, looking exceedingly pretty in dark green cloth and toque of a paler shade of green with red wings. Miss Estelle Kimball, beautifully attired in gun metal gray velvet, with toque of rose pink, and corsage of violets. Miss Elsie Berry in black velvet with large black picture hat, and muff and stole of squirrel, dotted with ermine tails. Mrs. George Shattuck, Mrs. Francis Peabody, jr., Miss Mary Sargent, Mrs. Hall Curtis, Miss Alice Stackpole, Mrs. James H. Beale, Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Mrs. Oliver H. Howe, Mrs. James B. Forsythe, Mrs. John Lowell, sr., Mrs. William B. Rice, Miss Jane Waldron, Miss Rosamond Saltonstall, Miss Ethel Gibson, Miss Caroline King, Miss Katharine Fay, Miss Alice Fay, Miss Dorothy Jordan, Mrs. Eben Draper, Miss Barbara Higginson and her sister, Miss Juliette Higginson, Miss Nathalie Matthews, Mrs. F. B. Carpenter, Miss Marion Lawrence and her sister Miss Julia Lawrence, Mrs. John C. Phillips and her daughter, Miss Anna Phillips, Mr. Stewart Baird, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Bigelow, Miss Mabel B. Warren, Miss Margaret Manning, Mrs. F. L. Higginson, Miss Priscilla Stackpole, Miss Susie Howe and her mother, Mr. and Mrs. Grew, Mrs. S. V. R. Crosby and innumerable others of equal prominence in the social world.

Harpers Weekly
Nov 21-03.

Boston Romance

It was during the intermission. The men from Boston, otherwise the Boston Symphony Orchestra, had just played the "Waldweben" from Wagner's "Siegfried"—that magic idyl of woodland life—and some one was complaining of the lack of poetic truth in the interpretation, which was inelastic, metronomic, icily regular. These, surely, it was observed, were not Siegfried's woods!

"Oh no," was the illuminating response: "these were Boston woods."

It was an admirable criticism. Those were, essentially, Boston woods; and, by the same token, Mr. Gericke's emotion is Boston emotion: his impulses, his method of approach, are characteristic. To praise his orchestra—that orchestra whose virtuosity has become almost vulgarly traditional—is merely to indulge in the unexhilarating pastime of acknowledging the obvious. But perfection has its disadvantages. Do we not too complacently welcome the splendor and purity of tone, the flawless technical accomplishment, of this unique band, ignoring the vital shortcomings which are palpable, under the present direction, in its performances? If our memory serves, it is Mr. Finck who has frankly declared his preference for an inspired pianist and an indifferent piano over a perfect instrument and a poor performer. Not to make too harsh an application of the parable, one may say that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the perfect instrument, and Mr. Gericke, its conductor, the—well, let us say, unsatisfying performer. For color and movement, for passion, for romantic suggestion, you are offered the metronome and the stop-watch. We recall his conducting at the second of the orchestra's recent performances in New York. There was the brilliant "Sakuntala" overture of Goldmark, played with an entire disregard for eloquence and nuance; there was a new tone-poem by the Frenchman, Vincent d'Indy—"The Enchanted Forest" a vividly imagined paraphrase of a ballad of Uhland's, and here again Mr. Gericke was mechanical, insufficient, although the orchestra played exquisitely; there was a new and agreeably unimportant symphony by Glazounoff—his fourth—and in this Mr. Gericke was acceptably effective.

The subject is not brought forward in any zealous spirit of discovery; for the inadequate direction of the Boston band is a matter of familiar observation. But what an unseemly prank of fortune it is that so superb an instrument should suffer for lack of a master player!

[47]

...NOVEMBER 22, 1903.

KRASSELT'S DEBUT MOST AUSPICIOUS

Fifth Symphony Is Overlong and Underbalanced.

The Fifth Symhony was overlong and underbalanced, its main weight, like the plums in the sea captain's pudding, being loaded into one end. It began delightfully with Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture, with which Mr. Gericke had wisely ameliorated his program, first planned to begin with the grandiose and ponderous "Tragic" of Brahms.

Then came Mr Krasselt, to make his debut as the new first 'cellist, choosing for his entrance the A-minor concerto of Saint-Saens, which is excellent for an introduction, as it gives the performer chance to display both instrument and art. Mr. Krasselt is boyish in face and manner, but he seems serious and settled when he gets fairly at his work. He plays with confidence and aplomb, but with due reserve and deflection.

His tone gratifies at once, being full, smooth, rich and equable, suggesting something of Giese's in a general way. His technique appears well-founded, broadly developed and as polished as need be, his delivery of scales and ornate passages being light, swift, clear and shapely, without hurry or petty showiness. He regarded justly the form of what he had to deliver, put gaiety into the allegros and a pleasant sentiment—nothing deeper is needed—into the allegretto.

Excellent Impression.

He made an excellent impression, and those who remember Hekking, half-wondering that he had not been chosen, soon felt that this young man would show the solid qualities and graces in due time, without the academic hardness and dryness of the older master.

Liszt's tremendously and tediously transcendental rhapsody (which he calls a poem) meant to parallel Schiller's metaphysical ode, "The Ideal," followed. It has its great and high moments and its massive orchestral splendors, but it confounds, burdens and wearies through its long course, wherein the relief of contrast comes but fitfully. It has been well called an "elegy on departed youth," and a long, laborious elegy, without soft consolation, bright hope, or spiritual uplift, is not so easy to hear and bear.

Rich and Comfortable.

Dvorak was to be the symphonist, and Mr. Gericke—who had at first thought of the work in F, which would have been new here—took up the No. 2, in D-minor, which has been known favorably here for about twenty years. This contains one rich and comfortable movement, the adagio, which has a religious character, its grave themes being hightened and cheered by the ornate development in which they are set. The rest of the symphony, while not treated by Slavonic passion or urged by Slavonic energy and insistence, makes yet strong demand for close and analytic attention, and is not well placed after an hour and a half of constant and often laborious listening. That all these things were well played needs not to be proclaimed; but the symphony might have been finer in places if the men had not been, as some were boldly willing to admit, fatigued in mind and hand and breath by their long previous exercise.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1903

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

Miss Adele aus der Ohe was the soloist at the fourth symphony concert, and this is the programme presented by Mr. Gericke:

Raff: Overture, "Ein feste Burg," Op. 127. (First time.)
Huss: Concerto in B major, for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 10.
Smetana: Symphonic Poem, "Vysehrad" (No. 1 of the Cycle, "My Country").
Beethoven: Symphony in D major, No. 2, Op. 36.

Mr. Gericke, if an admirer of Raff, was unkind to the composer in producing his overture "Ein feste Burg." At best not a man of the highest genius, Raff nevertheless possessed a genuine gift of melody, a sense of orchestral color, a sound musicianship, and a certain vein of imaginativeness that enabled him, when his unfortunate money circumstances allowed him sufficient leisure, to produce a few works of undying beauty. With these compositions always ready to the conductor's hand, it was an odd conceit of Mr. Gericke's to prowl among dusty music shelves, and finally to drag to light a long forgotten work that even in its palmiest days could not have been regarded as a worthy example of the master's talents. Raff wrote this overture as a prelude to a tragedy, "Bernhard von Weimar," by one Karl Albert Wilhelm Genast, surely a relation-in-law, for Raff married an actress, by name Doris Genast. Although afterwards revised for concert performance, the overture must still be classed as an occasional piece, written to order or else to oblige a friend. In any case, it is a feeble, old-fashioned composition, which would give an inexperienced concert-goer a cruelly unjust conception of Raff's claim to fame.

Immediately after the overture came a pianoforte concerto by Mr. Henry Holden Huss, which was played here, for the first time anywhere, in 1894, with the composer at the piano. Since then it has been partially re-written. Although offering much in the way of beauty, Mr. Huss's concerto leaves an impression of vagueness, chiefly because the musical material seems to be thrown together without definite purpose. Many of the themes are strikingly beautiful, others are stirring; there are moments of lovely orchestration. No one episode, however, has any ostensible connection with any other, the entire concerto, therefore, suggesting a photographic plate on which several pictures have been taken by mistake; a strong study of a head may be half hidden by a pretty view of a country house, and perhaps both are jostled by a graceful row of quivering poplar trees. These bits, exquisite in themselves, do not make a picture. Miss aus der Ohe did what she could, and aroused great enthusiasm by her noble playing, distinguished alike by beautiful tone, warmth of feeling, fine rhythm, and a general sense of mastery. The artist was recalled four or five times.

Smetana must always command deep respect as a composer who worked long and late, through the trials of deafness and other physical ills, chiefly for the musical glory of his native Bohemia. On first hearing, as well as on subsequent occasions, such of his symphonic poems contained in the cycle "My Country" as have been brought out here made an impression of great originality and poetic imaginativeness. But now, either because they have been heard too often, or because we have got too accustomed to the Czech idiom to be dazzled by the mere strangeness of the sounds, some of these poems, notably that played Saturday night, seem rather commonplace, showing in no way the sprakling freshness of "Die Verkaufte Braut."

One constantly reads that in the eighteenth century enthusiasm was regarded as improper, not to say wrong. My Lord Shaftesbury, third of the name, and a person highly thought of in his day, described enthusiasm, according to Mr. Augustine Birrell, as "one of the dangers of the age, a terrible distemper, almost as bad as the smallpox . . . a modification of the spleen, having its centre in an ill-regulated religion." Hume did not hold with enthusiasm, and on this topic Gibbon was led to say of a certain pious author: "Had not Law's vigorous mind been clouded by enthusiasm he might be ranked with the most agreeable and ingenious writers of his time." Had Gibbon, Hume, the Earl of Shaftesbury and all the rest been at Symphony Hall Saturday night, sourly as they might have looked at the demonstration Miss aus der Ohe's playing brought forth, on the whole they would have been well content with the demeanor of this audience of the twentieth century, who went to the length of receiving the first two movements of the Beethoven symphony in almost total silence. Perhaps the playing of the scherzo and of the finale met with more favor.

At the next concert Mr. Krasselt will make his first appearance as a soloist. This will be the programme: Brahms, Tragic Overture; Saint-Saëns, concerto for violoncello; Liszt, symphonic poem, "Ideale"; Dvorak, Symphony No. 3.

R. R. G.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL. NOVEMBER 21, 1903.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The First One Will be Held Next Tuesday Evening.

The first concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be held in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening and Senor E. Fernandez Arbos will be the soloist. Before the local committee heard of it, the management of the orchestra sent out from Boston some programmes which erroneously stated that the concert would be on Monday evening, instead of Tuesday. It is hoped that this will not cause any confusion among the purchasers of season tickets. Both concerts this winter are on Tuesday evenings. As there are special train arrangements this year, the programme need not be hurried. The concerts begin at 8:15 and there is a short intermission before the Schumann Symphony. In order that musical students may enjoy the concerts 100 seats will be placed on sale at Steinert's Monday morning for 75 cents apiece. A few admission tickets will also be sold at that price on the evening of the concert.

DAILY ADVERTISER, NOVEMBER 16,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Raff—Overture....."Eine Feste Burg," op. 127
Huss—Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, in B major, op. 10.
Miss Adele Aus der Ohe, soloist.
Smetana—Symphonic Poem, "Vysehrad," (No. 1 of the Cycle, "My Country.")
Beethoven—Symphony in D major, No. 2, op. 36

Luther's hymn "Ein Feste Burg" was the war-cry of the Reformation. The great doctor may, or may not have written its melody, but the fact remains that it was the battle-hymn of all the early Protestants and was not only a most dignified piece of religious music but was admirably suited for counterpoint as well. Consequently it has been frequently employed in music, and in two opposite ways. Bach used it learnedly, in a cantata; Meyerbeer dramatically in the "Huguenots;" Wagner most powerfully in the "Kaiser Marsch;" Mendelssohn contrapuntally in his "Reformation Symphony;" and Raff follows the Bach and Mendelssohn lead and juggles with the theme, his suave treatment especially recalling Mendelssohn's lute tootlings of the great and massive chorale! It makes a very ingenious and a thoroughly uninspired overture. One feels that, if one wanted, Raff could have gone on for 20 pages more of the same sort of musical mathematics.

One was glad to welcome Adele Aus der Ohe back to Boston. It does not seem so very long ago since the sedate young lady appeared, with braided hair and a general air of juvenility, for the first time in our concerts. She has been growing in art ever since, and is today one of the most classical of female pianists, a strong contrast to the two other stars in petticoats, —the fiery Bloomfield-Zeisler and the tropical Carreno. On this occasion she aided the American muse and gave a composition which displayed both technique and feeling. Happy the composer who has such an interpreter! The concerto of H. H. Huss took on new vigor because of Miss Aus der Ohe's noble reading of it. The pianist was most cordially received and recalled after the work with an enthusiasm not entirely warranted by its contents.

We remember the work as given at its first performance many years ago. There were several handicaps then. Mr. Huss was his own pianist at that performance, and composers are not often their best interpreters. That time the concerto came after Tschaikowsky's Pathetic Symphony, and was followed by Berloiz's fiery "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, and was crushed out between the two. At this concert there was a much fairer audition, for the work had a splendid interpretation and it was "well placed."

Yet at its best this concerto is a heavily-watered stock in a bear market; it has its points of value (the original introduction and the dashing chief theme of the finale, for example) but these are overcapitalized and are not sufficient to fill three movements. The slow movement is the weakest portion. If the work were shortened into a single-movement "Fantasy," it might become an interesting addition to the standard repertoire. As it stands its beauties lack continuity and there is occasionally a "mauvais quart d'heure" which is made up of padding and inconsequentiality.

Brave old Smetana! How one loves a man who is in earnest! It was a noble homage that this genius, with deafness and nervous troubles torturing him, brought to his beloved Bohemia, in his symphonic poems of patriotism. Smetana is greater than his great pupil, Dvorak, and is much more intensely national. The renascence of Bohemian music is almost wholly due to this suffering pioneer.

There are moments of grandeur and moments of sadness in "Vysehrad." One passage of tender melody reminds of a clarinette theme in the finale of Mendelssohn's "Scotch Symphony" which pictures loneliness in the Trossachs. But it comes with greater force in this work where it is in contrast with the grandeur of powerful themes.

Bohemia comes of right into her musical heritage, for music is often born of national sorrow, and no nation has suffered more than poor Bohemia. But the thirty years' war scourged her into absolute silence, and it is only since Smetana, Dvorak and Srb have begun their work that a national school is beginning to reassert itself. "Vysehrad" was finely performed but was scarcely appreciated at its full value by the audience, which remained if not apathetic, at least unexcited.

The second symphony of Beethoven was interesting, but not much more. It received a reading somewhat different from what we had anticipated, with rather exaggerated shading and not a single repeat omitted. The slow movement was as ever its best part. In this we may especially commend the horn-players, who gave their rather difficult and prominent phrases without a flaw. The bassoons have much work to do in the last two movements and they also deserve honorable mention.

As a whole the programme seemed less inspiring than usual. There was undeniable beauty of performance almost all through the evening, yet matters approached nearer to dulness than we like to see them in a symphony concert.

Louis C. Elson.

BOSTON HERALD-NOVEMBER 20, 1903.

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL.

Mr. Rudolf Krasselt, the new first 'cellist of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will make his first appearance in America as a soloist this afternoon, when he will play Saint-Saens' concerto for 'cello No. 1. Mr. Krasselt was born on Jan. 1, 1879, at Baden-Baden. He studied chiefly with Klengel at Leipsic. His first appearance in public was at Baden-Baden when he was only 13 years old. He has been connected with the orchestra of the Rostock Theatre, the Philharmonic orchestra of Berlin, and the orchestra of the Vienna Court Opera. He was a member of the Krasselt quartet; the other members were his brother, Alfred, violin; his father, Gustav, viola, and his sister, Jenny, who died four years ago, was the pianist.

The orchestral numbers are the overture to "Midsummer Night's Dream," Dvorak's symphony in D minor No. 2, which was written for the Philharmonic Society of London and first performed at one of its concerts, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Ideal," which, introduced here by Theodore Thomas, has been played only once at a Symphony concert. The music is in illustration of Schiller's poem, "Die Ideale," but whereas Schiller names friendship and work as the sole consolations for the disillusions of life as man grows older, Liszt concludes with an "Apotheosis," in which the motive typical of "The Ideal" is glorified and made crashingly jubilant.

The programme of the sixth concert will include Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio," Bruch's fantasia on Scottish airs (played by Mr. Birnbaum, violinist, a new member of the orchestra), and Dohnanyi's symphony in D minor (first time in America).

BOSTON COURIER, NOVEMBER 21, 1903.

Friday's perfect weather ensured a large attendance at the symphony rehearsal, and society was out in fullest force. Mr. Rudolph Krasselt, the soloist, made a most favorable impression and was vigorously applauded. Among those present were Miss Mary Head, one of the season's debutantes, wearing a chic gown of white and black checked cloth, and a red hat; Miss May Kennev, looking exceedingly pretty in dark green cloth and toque of a pale shade of green with red wings. Miss Estelle Kimball, beautifully attired in gun metal gray velvet, with toque of rose pink, and corsage of violets. Miss Elsie Berry in black velvet with large black picture hat, and muff and stole of squirrel, dotted with ermine tails. Mrs. George Shattuck, Mrs. Francis Peabody, jr., Miss Mary Sargent, Mrs. Hall Curtis, Miss Alice Stackpole, Mrs. James H. Beale, Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Mrs. Oliver H. Howe, Mrs. James B. Forsythe, Mrs. John Lowell, sr., Mrs. William B. Rice, Miss Jane Waldron, Miss Rosamond Saltonstall, Miss Ethel Gibson, Miss Caroline King, Miss Katharine Fay, Miss Alice Fay, Miss Dorothy Jordan, Mrs. Eben Draper, Miss Barbara Higginson and her sister, Miss Juliette Higginson, Miss Nathalie Matthews, Mrs. F. B. Carpenter, Miss Marion Lawrence and her sister Miss Julia Lawrence, Mrs. John C. Phillips and her daughter, Miss Anna Phillips, Mr. Stewart Baird, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Bigelow, Miss Mabel B. Warren, Miss Margaret Manning, Mrs. F. L. Higginson, Miss Priscilla Stackpole, Miss Susie Howe and her mother, Mr. and Mrs. Grew, Mrs. S. V. R. Crosby and innumerable others of equal prominence in the social world.

Boston Romance

It was during the intermission. The men from Boston, otherwise the Boston Symphony Orchestra, had just played the "Waldweben" from Wagner's "Siegfried"—that magic idyl of woodland life—and some one was complaining of the lack of poetic truth in the interpretation, which was inelastic, metronomic, icily regular. Those, surely, it was observed, were not Siegfried's woods!

"Oh no," was the illuminating response: "these were Boston woods."

It was an admirable criticism. Those were, essentially, Boston woods; and, by the same token, Mr. Gericke's emotion is Boston emotion: his impulses, his method of approach, are characteristic. To praise his orchestra—that orchestra whose virtuosity has become almost vulgarly traditional—is merely to indulge in the unexhilarating pastime of acknowledging the obvious. But perfection has its disadvantages. Do we not too complacently welcome the splendor and purity of tone, the flawless technical accomplishment, of this unique band, ignoring the vital shortcomings which are palpable, under the present direction, in its performances? If our memory serves, it is Mr. Finck who has frankly declared his preference for an inspired pianist and an indifferent piano over a perfect instrument and a poor performer. Not to make too harsh an application of the parable, one may say that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the perfect instrument, and Mr. Gericke, its conductor, the—well, let us say, unsatisfying performer. For color and movement, for passion, for romantic suggestion, you are offered the metronome and the stop-watch. We recall his conducting at the second of the orchestra's recent performances in New York. There was the brilliant "Sakuntala" overture of Goldmark, played with an entire disregard for eloquence and nuance; there was a new tone-poem by the Frenchman, Vincent d'Indy—"The Enchanted Forest" a vividly imagined paraphrase of a ballad of Uhland's, and here again Mr. Gericke was mechanical, insufficient, although the orchestra played exquisitely; there was a new and agreeably unimportant symphony by Glazounoff—his fourth—and in this Mr. Gericke was acceptably effective.

The subject is not brought forward in any zealous spirit of discovery; for the inadequate direction of the Boston band is a matter of familiar observation. But what an unseemly prank of fortune it is that so superb an instrument should suffer for lack of a master player!

SUNDAY JOURNAL-NOVEMBER 22, 1903.

KRASSELT'S DEBUT MOST AUSPICIOUS

Fifth Symphony Is Overlong and Underbalanced.

The Fifth Symhony was overlong and underbalanced, its main weight, like the plums in the sea captain's pudding, being loaded into one end. It began delightfully with Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture, with which Mr. Gericke had wisely ameliorated his program, first planned to begin with the grandiose and ponderous "Tragic" of Brahms.

Then came Mr Krasselt, to make his debut as the new first 'cellist, choosing for his entrance the A-minor concerto of Saint-Saens, which is excellent for an introduction, as it gives the performer chance to display both instrument and art. Mr. Krasselt is boyish in face and manner, but he seems serious and settled when he gets fairly at his work. He plays with confidence and aplomb, but with due reserve and deflection.

His tone gratifies at once, being full, smooth, rich and equable, suggesting something of Giese's in a general way. His technique appears well-founded, broadly developed and as polished as need be, his delivery of scales and ornate passages being light, swift, clear and shapely, without hurry or petty showiness. He regarded justly the form of what he had to deliver, put gaiety into the allegros and a pleasant sentiment—nothing deeper is needed—into the allegretto.

Excellent Impression.

He made an excellent impression, and those who remember Hekking, half-wondering that he had not been chosen, soon felt that this young man would show the solid qualities and graces in due time, without the academic hardness and dryness of the older master.

Liszt's tremendously and tediously transcendental rhapsody (which he calls a poem) meant to parallel Schiller's metaphysical ode, "The Ideal," followed.

It has its great and high moments and its massive orchestral splendors, but it confounds, burdens and wearies through its long course, wherein the relief of contrast comes but fitfully. It has been well called an "elegy on departed youth," and a long, laborious elegy, without soft consolation, bright hope, or spiritual uplift, is not so easy to hear and bear.

Rich and Comfortable.

Dvorak was to be the symphonist, and Mr. Gericke—who had at first thought of the work in F, which would have been new here—took up the No. 2, in D-minor, which has been known favorably here for about twenty years. This contains one rich and comfortable movement, the adagio, which has a religious character, its grave themes being hightened and cheered by the ornate development in which they are set. The rest of the symphony, while not treated by Slavonic passion or urged by Slavonic energy and insistence, makes yet strong demand for close and analytic attention, and is not well placed after an hour and a half of constant and often laborious listening. That all these things were well played needs not to be proclaimed; but the symphony might have been finer in places if the men had not been, as some were boldly willing to admit, fatigued in mind and hand and breath by their long previous exercise.

SUNDAY HERALD—BOSTON, NOVEMBER 22, 1903.

FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "The Ideal," Rare in Boston.

Appearance of Mr. Krasselt, the New First 'Cellist—Overture from "Midsummer Night's Dream"—Mme. Patti's Second Concert in Symphony Hall.

The programme of the fifth Symphony concert, given in Symphony Hall last evening, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Overture, "Midsummer Night's Dream"..
.....Mendelssohn
Concerto in A minor, No. 1, for 'cello.....
.....Saint-Saens
Symphonic poem No. 12, "The Ideal".....Liszt
Symphony No. 2, in D minor.....Dvorak

Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Ideal," is not familiar to the concert-goers of Boston. Theodore Thomas produced it here in 1870, and it has been played once at a Symphony concert—in 1889. The music is in illustration of Schiller's poem, "The Ideal." The illusions of youth pass away; that which was dreamed of as beautiful and divine seldom appears in reality, and if it does it is a disappointment; fortune, fame, truth and love leave man to find his only consolation in friendship and activity. But Liszt would not accept as a refrain to the poem of human life: "This is the end of every man's desire." It was necessary to have an apotheosis, so he changed Schiller's ending; he believed that the holding fast of the ideal and the continual realization were the highest aims in existence; and therefore he gained his climax by a jubilant recapitulation of the motives of the earlier and more hopeful sections of his work.

It might be interesting to examine into the reasonableness of such a radical change in a classical poem merely for the purpose of making a Lisztian holiday; but we should not take the "literary" side of music too seriously. Mr. Henley says in his latest volume of essays—alas, it must be the last collection prepared by him—that "the 'aesthetic movement' has made painting so excessively literary, that either it is literature in a new medium or it is nothing." This saying may be applied to much of the modern music; and Liszt is still modern, far more modern than some of his most painstaking imitators of today, who affect to dub him old-fashioned.

It is necessary for a composer first of all to make music. The first question here is not whether Liszt bettered Schiller for his purpose, it is not whether he succeeded in translating into tones passages, line by line, of the poem, but whether the music itself will stand without the mottoes from the poem. An argument as to whether Schiller or Schopenhauer were the more truly philosophic in the view of the ages of man would be a distant digression.

The title, "The Ideal," is enough to any sensitive and sympathetic hearer who is able to make his own programme as it is suggested by the music. The aspirations, the hopes, the illusions, the disenchantment, and then the resolve to be heroic even in the face of cruel disappointment, and of the one supreme doubt, the firm belief in a divine average, in compensation somewhere and sometime in the vast universe to which this proud globe is as the ball rolled painfully by a beetle—these are surely in the music, nor is there any need of Schiller's lines or Lord Lytton's pompous and swollen translation. For the music of this poem is singularly clear, as well as imaginative, and for well-defined lines, for beauty of musical thought, for logical and poetic transformations of the leading idea, for nobility of expression, "The Ideal" must be ranked with the greatest works of Liszt. In this instance simplicity is not affected naivete, and strength is not merely bombast.

Although the poem is long, it is firmly knit together, and although there is a wealth of ingenious detail, there is no cessation in the flow of musical thought. There are passages of exquisite beauty; there is a broad sweep of vision; there is loftiness of imagination. A great, a nobly beautiful work that is not mocked by its title! The performance was a remarkable one, which reflected the highest credit on conductor and orchestra. Name all the qualities that characterize the ideal performance of such a masterpiece, and not one was missing in the performance of last night. And how familiar Wagner must have been with this score! How he helped himself freely with both hands for his own use and glory!

Mr. Krasselt made his first appearance as a soloist in this country. He is young, and youth, as Liszt said, is the time for virtuosity. Mr. Krasselt made a most favorable impression. His tone is pure and eminently agreeable, although it is not large and commanding. His mechanism is well developed; he plays with feeling and enthusiasm, as well as with the authority of an excellent musician. The concerto itself, with the exception of dry and formal padding toward the end, is delightful.

The overture and the symphony are well known and do not call for extended comment. The performance was of a high order. Seldom, if ever, has the overture—one of the few truly poetic compositions of Mendelssohn—been played with such beauty of tone and exquisite precision.

Notwithstanding the rush of other things last week, the Symphony rehearsal was crowded as usual. Mr. Rudolf Krasselt, the new 'cellist, was the soloist and was warmly greeted and applauded. Among those there were Miss Susan Howe, who received numerous congratulations from many friends who had not seen her since the announcement of her engagement to Mr. Dalton; Mrs. Henry S. Howe, Mrs. Francis Peabody, Jr., Mrs. John C. Phillips and Miss Anna Phillips, Miss Elizabeth Crafts, Mr. and Mrs. Henry S. Grew and their daughter, Mrs. S. V. R. Crosby; Mr. and Mrs. Albert F. Bigelow, Mrs. William P. Fay and Miss Katherine Fay, Mrs. Dudley Fay and Miss Alice Fay, Mrs. James H. Beal, Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Miss Rosamond Saltonstall, Mrs. F. L. Higginson, Miss Juliet and Miss Barbara Higginson, Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, Mrs. George B. Shattuck, Mrs. Eben Draper, Mrs. Frederick Richardson, Miss Mary Sargent, Mrs. Hall Curtis, Miss Mary Head, Miss Dorothy Jordan, Miss Priscilla Stackpole, Miss Estelle Kimball, Mrs. Matthew Luce, Miss Alice Stackpole, Miss Mabel Warren, Miss Marian and Miss Sarah Lawrence, Mrs. John Lowell, Sr., Miss Constance Tippett, Miss A. F. Manning, Miss Margaret Manning, Miss Nathalie Matthews, Miss May Kenney, Mrs. F. B. Carpenter, Miss Ethel Gibson, Miss Caroline King, Miss Elsie Berry, Mrs. J. B. Forsyth, Miss Jane Waldron, Mrs. W. B. Rice and Mr. Steward Baird. The soloist this week will be Mr. A. Birnbaum, a new violinist of the orchestra.

At the Symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon society turned out with its usual constancy and allegiance, and every seat was taken.

SUNDAY POST.

NOVEMBER 22, 1903

KRASSELT A SUCCESS

New 'Cellist of the Symphony Orchestra the Soloist at the Concert Last Evening

This was the programme of the fifth Symphony concert last evening:

Overture, "A Midsummer Night's Dream" .....Mendelssohn
Concerto for violoncello, Op. 33.....
.... Saint-Saens
Symphonic poem, "The Ideal".....Liszt
Symphony in D minor, No. 2.....Dvorak

Rudolf Krasselt was the soloist.

The "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture was superbly played and made a pleasing first number. The Liszt symphonic poem heard last evening has not been given at these concerts for some years, and while its title is "The Ideal," from the music being suggested by the Schiller poem, it is far from being an ideal work in any way, being unduly long and without distinction, excepting here and there some effective scoring. It is certainly inferior to the "Preludes" and some other similar works of the Liszt product, and it can well be laid away without loss to the musical world.

Dvorak's Symphony No. 2 made an excellent impression after a lapse of more than seven years since its last performance at these concerts. It has been overshadowed by the later symphony, "From the New World," but the earlier work is one of much interest and musical worth and will bear another hearing in this city in the near future. The performance was satisfactory in all respects. The soloist was Rudolf Krasselt, the new first 'cellist of the orchestra, who made his first appearance in Boston on this occasion. He is under 25 years of age, but already plays with the ease and experience of one much older. His tone is delightfully pure and sympathetic, his temperamental abilities are undoubted and he apparently has nothing to acquire in the way of technical proficiency.

The Saint-Saens concerto, which Alwin Schroeder has played at these concerts in recent years, may not be a work of great genius, but is most cleverly constructed, as is nearly everything by this eminent French composer, and is more pleasing than the majority of the somewhat limited number of concertos for this instrument. Mr. Krasselt played it in an inimitable manner, and his success was instantaneous and overwhelming. He received an immense ovation and many recalls, proving himself to be a worthy successor of one of the world's great 'cellists, who was a valued member of the orchestra for many years.

The programme of the rehearsal and concert this coming week will include Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture, a new symphony by Ernest von Dohnanyi, and Max Bruch's "Scotch Fantasy" for violin and orchestra, the soloist being A. Birnbaum.

SUNDAY GLOBE—NOVEMBER 22, 1903.

Krasselt, Cello Soloist, at Symphony Concert.

Mr Rudolf Krasselt, the new first cellist, was the soloist at the fifth rehearsal and concert by the Symphony orchestra, making his debut here with the Saint-Saens A minor concerto for cello and orchestra. The program opened with Mendelssohn's overture to "Midsummer Night's Dream," the remaining selections comprising Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Ideal," and Dvorak's D minor symphony. The Saint-Saens concerto is not unfamiliar to Symphony audiences, it being in Mr Schroeder's repertory, and the new member of Mr Gericke's forces may fairly be said to have challenged criticism with the older cellist by selecting this work for his debut here in solo work. Mr Krasselt played the concerto splendidly throughout. So far as the finger execution was concerned, it was very true and facile, and met all the demands dexterously. Possibly the pianissimo passages at times were too lightly outlined for the heavy orchestral background, but as a rule the proper proportions were maintained by the solo instrument, and the themes and their development were given with authority and contrasting effects which showed Mr Krasselt's great abilities in a most favorable light. His tones are very sweet, especially in the upper register; he plays with good expression, and his whole interpretation, while lacking somewhat in warmth and sonority, was characterized by a refinement and brilliancy of execution which won him hearty tributes of appreciation from the audience.

The "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture made a delightful introduction to a program which proved rather better suited to musical experts than to the general concert attendant. The beautiful Mendelssohn number was about as perfect in performance as one could wish, the shimmering fairy music showing the splendid team work of the violins at its best, and the mock pomposity of the Pyramus-Thisbe march being given with amusing vigor in its accented measures.

In the Liszt poem, the playing by the cello contingent calls for special approbation, the instruments giving out their themes with excellent precision and resonance. The figurations by the lighter string band went smoothly, the closing part of the piece was executed brilliantly and the various tonal episodes of the poem were presented in a poetic spirit harmonizing with the theme. Dvorak's symphony contains so many puzzling musical combinations that to the general ear much of the work is unsatisfactory. The beautiful harmonies of the second movement were adequately given, first by the pizzicato strings and wood-winds, and subsequently by the cellos, oboes and flutes, and the quaint scherzo was faultlessly presented, the staccato measures being notably crisp and harmonious.

Mr A. Birnbaum, one of the new violinists in the orchestra, will be this week's soloist, playing Max Bruch's Scotch fantasy for violin and orchestra. The other selections are Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture and Dohnanyi's D minor symphony, its first performance here.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1903

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

At the sixth Symphony concert Mr. Rudolf Krasselt made his first appearance here as a soloist. This was the programme:

Mendelssohn: Overture, "Midsummer Night's Dream."
Saint-Saëns: Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra in A minor, op. 33.
Liszt: Symphonic Poem No. 12, "The Ideal."
Dvorak: Symphony in D minor, No. 2, op. 76.

While the programme was of considerable interest and its performance was unusually brilliant, curiosity was, none the less, aroused chiefly by the opportunity to hear Mr. Krasselt play for the first time. This very young artist won a well-deserved success, for, in so far as a non-'cellist can judge, his playing was beautiful in the extreme. Mr. Krasselt produces a tone of delightful sweetness, he phrases with exceedingly fine taste, he overcomes technical difficulties with ease, making bravura passages sound not in the least disagreeable, a great feat for a 'cello player; he plays with authority and, although the Saint-Saëns concerto allows scope for little more than a display of virtuosity and of elegance, with warmth of feeling. Since in spite of his youth, Mr. Krasselt has already gained a varied orchestral experience, our orchestra is to be congratulated on securing the services of a musician of such notable talent. Saturday night his success was great.

The most important, if not the most agreeable, feature of this concert was the production of Liszt's symphonic poem, "Ideals," which, while not new here, is still very little known. The inspiration for this composition Liszt drew from Schiller's poem, "Ideale." And yet, it would seem, the musician could not have fallen very powerfully under the influence of the poet, since he chose to amend his version of the poem in distinct contradiction to the spirit and letter of the original. For Schiller, in beautiful verse, depicts the sensations of a poet from whom love and all the joy of living disappear, leaving as comforters only friendship and that supreme consoler, work. Liszt, on the other hand, not holding with the ruthless destruction of ideals, at the end of his orchestral poem gathers them all together in a glowing "Apotheosis." In considering this composition, therefore, Schiller may be disregarded, the question being, has Liszt himself produced something of worth and beauty?

He has, at all events, produced a work that, from its freedom of form, its beauty and expressiveness of orchestration, and its emotional content, might more easily have been written today than in 1856. Exquisitely beautiful, however, as many passages of this tone-poem are, it is so inordinately long and tries to express so much that at the end a listener is chiefly conscious of relief. Its performance Saturday was brilliant and sympathetic, but if Mr. Gericke had made far more sweeping cuts than he did they would all have been to the advantage of a work that then might have made as great an impression as did the composer's "Festklänge" or the wonderful "Todtentanz." In these days, when the work of Richard Strauss and his kind is or ought to be most in evidence, we cannot hear too many of Liszt's orchestral pieces, if only to see how much of it has been done and how well fifty years before.

This evening of great playing began with a brilliant performance of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture, which was being performed at the very same moment at the Hollis Street Theatre, and ended with an equally fine reading of Dvorak's charming D minor symphony—charming, at least, for three movements, when it suddenly turns sinister, baleful.

Another newcomer will be the soloist this week, Mr. A. Birnbaum. This will be the programme: Beethoven, overture to "Fidelio"; Max Bruch, Scotch Fantasy for violin and orchestra; Dohnanyi, Symphony in D minor (first time).

R. R. G.

[48]

L...LY ADVERTISER,

NOVEMBER 23, 1903

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Overture, "Mid-summer-night's Dream"...
..... Mendelssohn
Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra in A minor, op. 33.....Saint-Saens
Rudolf Krasselt, soloist.
Symphonic Poem No. 12, "The Ideal".....Liszt
Symphony in D minor, No. 2, op. 76.....Dvorak

The best came first. If there is any daintier bit of humor in the entire musical repertoire than Mendelssohn's "Mid-summer-night's-dream Overture," we have not the honor of its acquaintance. The gentlemanliness of Mendelssohn's character, which militated against him in displays of deep emotion and of dramatic effect, helped him in the matter of his musical humor, which is delicate and piquant; he makes play with a rapier, not with a bludgeon as Beethoven sometimes did. What the boy of 18 achieved in this overture, the man of 34 could not equal when the Prussian king desired him to write more music upon this Shakespearian play.

It was splendidly performed. One needed no musical Baedeker to trace the fairy elves upon the violins, to identify the theme which portrayed Bottom and his band of amateur actors; the bassoon brayed with the translated weaver and the bass-tuba made shift to reproduce what Mendelssohn wrote for the ophicleide, i.e., the snoring of the drunken Bottom while the fairies danced around his sleeping form. If one will only compare such a work with the humorous (?) piece for Piano by Richard Strauss there may be a lesson in the proceeding.

Rudolf Krasselt, 24 years of age and as juvenile in appearance as Mr. Schuecker was when he first appeared here, is a master of his instrument. We scarcely think that it was judicious to choose for a debut, the number which had been played as his last solo in these concerts by Mr. Krasselt's predecessor. There was bound to be something less of reserve, something more of sentimentality, in the newcomer's interpretation. But this sin of youth was the only shortcoming. There was a surety of intonation and a brilliancy of performance that won a great triumph. There was sufficient breadth in the noble C string passages, the double-stopping was clear, there was mastery in every branch of Mr. Krasselt's work. He is surely a great addition to the orchestra and the audience at once recognized the fact, recalling him time after time with very spontaneous enthusiasm.

Liszt's "Ideal" is not an ideal work. He soars after the infinite, in this labored composition, and meets with the usual fate of flying-machines. In "Les Preludes" the master attains what he here only attempts. There is no "team play" in the work; it is every man for himself. The clarinette gives a monologue, then the trombone unburdens itself of a series of troubles in a long soliloquy, and even the kettle-drum has its tale of woe to tell as a solo.

We did not attempt to follow the work as programme-music, and ignored the Schiller pegs upon which the spasmodic phrases were hung, for if instrumental music cannot stand without the support of a poetic explanation in words it will sink to the lowest rank among the Arts. Heard then as pure music this work seemed wearisome and incoherent, and it lacked the great climaxes which Liszt has launched forth like thunder-bolts in many of his other symphonic poems. It was most carefully performed, but the audience were mystified as well as Lisztified, and applauded but little.

Dvorak's second symphony, although in regular and accepted form, begins with a movement that is rather heterogeneous and abstruse, and this coming directly after Liszt's musical ejaculations was piling Ossa upon Pelion.

But the rest of the work seemed stronger than upon previous hearings. There is a pastoral character in the symphony that makes of it a species of symphonic "Waldweben," filled with carollings and tender woodland sounds. That it is sometimes reminiscent cannot be denied, even the four heavy accents which are found in Schubert's ninth symphony (and which he may have copied from Beethoven's violin concerto,) being present in the finale. Nevertheless these do not amount to plagiarism, they are simply new sermons upon old texts. There are, however, other symphonics in the repertoire which might have precedence over Dvorak's earlier works in this form. One might wish, for example, to hear Goetz's short symphony again, or either of Volkmann's two, or Paine's "Spring Symphony," which ought not to remain forever upon the shelf.

Louis C. Elson.

BOSTON HERALD—
TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1903.

ARBOS QUARTET'S FIRST CONCERT

The Young Musical Organization Heard in Agreeable Programme of Reasonable Length.

TSCHAIKOWSKY'S TRIO PRESENTED.

Its Characteristics Due to Its Purpose and Circumstances Under Which It Was Written.

The Arbos quartet (Messrs. Arbos, Roth, Ferir, Krasselt) gave its first concert in Boston last evening at Potter Hall. There was a large and very friendly audience. The programme was as follows:

Quartet in F minor, op. 95.....Beethoven
Sonata in E major for violin alone.....Bach
Trio in A minor for piano, violin and 'cello.....Tschaikowsky

A string quartet is a plant of slow growth. The best individual players put suddenly together may say with the delightful young man in "Great Expectations": "Hallo! here's a quartet; let's play it!" but the improvised performance will be far inferior to that given by four players of only fair ability who have been together for a few years and are acquainted with each other's musical good points, limitations, and peculiarities. In the preparation and in the performance of ensemble there must be a constant display of the qualities that are supposed to insure happiness to family life—there must be tact, forbearance, the ability to preserve courteous silence when another is talking, even though he chatter idly. Subordination of self at one time, and at another a firm but not arrogant command. A string quartet is not created by a clapping together of the hands, not as in "The Thousand Nights and a Night," by the rubbing of a lamp, a ring, or a seal. It is the work of time.

No one knows these homely facts better than the musicians who form the Arbos Quartet, for they have had experience in such organizations. A beginning must be made, however, and last night the Arbos Quartet came before the public. It would be unkind as well as untrue to say that this first performance was an ideal one or that it was one of much more than ordinary excellence. The members of the quartet would be the first to smile at the statement, for they are well aware of the qualities of an extraordinary performance, and they know that time alone is able to crown sincere endeavor and faithful preparation. It is enough to say that the performance was, indeed, creditable to such a young organization and that it gave promise for still greater enjoyment in the future.

Mr. Ferir has a beautiful quality of tone and he showed true quartet experience. Mr. Krasselt is young; the offence is not heinous, but if youth has its enthusiasm, its hot blood, and is therefore to be desired greatly, it also has its exuberance that is not easily controlled, and at times in the performance Mr. Krasselt was inclined to play as a soloist when his music was merely for one of a quartet. To indulge in detailed criticism at this time would be unfair and unnecessary, for even the winds of heaven should not be allowed to visit a young quartet too roughly.

Mr. Arbos arranged his programme with some regard for time, space, and distance. The concert was out at a reasonable hour, and the ears of the hearers were comparatively unjaded when Tschaikowsky's trio was presented. The trio itself has a curious history and it is a document in illustration of the composer's character. In 1880 he wrote his dear friend Mrs. von Meck that he could not endure the combination of a piano with a violin or with a violoncello; that he could not bear even to hear a trio, for the three individualities were too pronounced and too much at war. Nicholas Rubinstein died in March of the next year and Tschaikowsky, deeply affected by his death, and at the same time eager to gratify Mrs. von Meck who had urged him to write a trio, began at Rome to compose this work, to leave a record of the respect and love he bore Rubinstein, and also to please the woman to whom he owed so much, yet whose lips he never kissed, whose voice he never heard.

He kept her acquainted with the progress of the trio. He was alternately jubilant and despondent. He feared that it would sound as though he had transcribed an orchestral piece for the three instruments; he swore that it was good, and the next day he knew he should hate it as he hated so many of his compositions; he insisted that it should be played and severely criticised before publication; he wished an expert to revise his indications for bowing, etc., etc. A naturally lovable and noble soul, he was easily perplexed, often in the slough of despond, morbid, contradictory save in his enthusiasm for all that is ideal, for the only verities in life which are to so many normal beings as a vapor, a foolish dream, a chimera.

This trio, then, is "in memory of a great artist," and the dedication should always be printed on the programme, for it would serve in explanation of the character of the music which, now elegiac, now extravagantly wild or seemingly flippant, and with its sombre ending, may well confuse the judgment of those accustomed to staid and set forms.

Tschaikowsky purposed that each variation of the theme should be a portrayal of a side of Rubinstein's character. Thus Nicholas was passionately fond of dancing; hence the variation that to some may seem incongruous. The trio as a whole is not among Tschaikowsky's greatest works; it has its lengths and repetitions; but it is remarkably individual; there are superb pages, and there is at times a poignant expression of lamentation that is irresistible.

Mr. Bauer played the piano part with fine appreciation and sympathy, and with his customary intellectual grasp and brilliance of expression.

It was a pleasure to find Mr. Arbos willing to vary the customary programme. The excerpts from Bach's work were an agreeable change from a long quartet. Nor is there any good reason why in future a movement or two movements from a quartet should not be played instead of a whole work.

Mr. Arbos displayed many admirable qualifications of the competent quartet leader, and as a soloist he appeared to his better advantage than at the Symphony concert, for he played with more marked authority, and he was more the master of his resources.

The second concert of the series will be given on Monday evening, Dec. 21.

BOSTON GLOBE—
NOVEMBER 24, 1903.

Debut of the Arbos Quartet.

Last evening in Jordan hall the newly-formed Arbos quartet made its debut before an audience of a very brilliant character, fashionable and musical circles being represented by many of their prominent members, and in the balcony were hundreds of students, the assemblage nearly filling the auditorium. Mr Harold Bauer, pianist, assisted the quartet, which was composed of the following players: Mr Arbos, first violin; Mr Roth, second violin; Mr Ferir, viola, and Mr Krasselt, cello. The program included the F minor quartet, Beethoven; Bach's E major sonata for violin and Tschaikowsky's A minor trio for piano, violin and cello.

As the quartet was heard in but one selection, it is difficult to judge of its ability in general ensemble playing, though if the standard shown in the Beethoven number is maintained Mr Arbos is to be congratulated upon his association with artists whose performances will rank very high in the musical world. In the first place, the execution was very smooth, the tonality of the different instruments, whether singly or in groups, was thoroughly good, and the varying shades were observed with perfect understanding and unanimity. The familiar work was beautifully rendered, the final movements being played with an expression and spirit which were delightful in every way, the difficult passage work finding sympathetic and skilled interpreters in the four artists.

Mr Arbos played the Bach sonata very impressively. The tender beauty of the opening movement was splendidly expressed, and throughout his performance his tones were of silvery clearness, combined with a breadth of treatment which the soloist had not previously shown. The elegance and grace of his manner were again in evidence, and in every way he appeared to much greater advantage in the smaller hall than he did at his debut with the Symphony orchestra. His exquisite playing gained him showers of applause and many recalls.

The Tschaikowsky trio, by Messrs Bauer, Arbos and Krasselt, closed in a brilliant manner a program of high merit. Mr Bauer performed his piano part in his usual artistic and modest way, and Mr Arbos gave renewed evidence of his interpretative abilities before mentioned. The cello playing by Mr Krasselt was masterly, the young man demonstrating that he is "one to be reckoned with" in his chosen field, for he really achieved the chief honors in this selection by exhibiting a command of his instrument which was surprisingly artistic. His tones were rich and brilliant, his fingering was perfect and his bowing was accomplished with seeming ease. The big audience was very liberal in its applause, and the success of the debut of the quartet was fairly won. The next concert will be given Monday evening, Dec 21.

BOSTON POST,
NOVEMBER 24, 1903

ARBOS QUARTET CONCERT

The Arbos Quartet, consisting of Fernandez Arbos, first violin; Otto Roth, second violin; E. Ferir, viola, and Rudolf Krasselt, 'cello, gave the first of a series of concerts, last evening, at Jordan Hall, presenting the following programme:

Quartet in F minor, Op. 95.....Beethoven
Sonata in E major, for violin alone..Bach
Trio for piano, violin and 'cello, Op. 50.....Tschaikowski

Harold Bauer was the assisting artist.

This was the initial appearance of an organization which includes three of the new members of the Symphony Orchestra, Messrs. Arbos, Ferir and Krasselt. Mr. Roth, the other member of the quartet, was for many years second violin of the Kneisel organization. Critical judgment upon the ensemble of the newly organized quartet must, for a while, be suspended, for however eminent as soloists the individual members of a quartet may be it is impossible in one concert or in a series of concerts to get together, as it were, and play with that unity of purpose and finish in detail that distinguishes the ensemble efforts of a quartet that has played together for many years.

The Bach sonata is familiar, especially the gavotte movement, which has been effectively transcribed for pianoforte solo. Mr. Arbos played it with technical clearness and pleasing tone which made his performance very enjoyable to the audience.

The feature of the concert was the trio for piano, violin and 'cello, Op. 50, by Tschaikowski, a work full of interest from beginning to the ending. This is the work written as a memorial to Nicholas Rubinstein, which accounts for the funereal character of the latter portion of the final movement. Mr. Bauer was the leading factor in the general result, and to him must be given the largest share of praise. He again proved himself to be an ensemble artist of the highest order. The audience, which was a large one, included those well known in society, together with many prominent in the musical life of this city. The second in the series will be given Monday evening, Dec. 21.

DAILY ADVERTISER,
NOVEMBER 24, 1903

THE ARBOS QUARTETTE CONCERT.

The new Jordan Hall was filled with a surprisingly large and distinguished audience, at the first concert of the Arbos Quartette. We recall the beginnings of the Kneisel Quartette, in old Chickering Hall, on Tremont st. and in Union Hall, when the launching was not so auspicious as that of last night. If any comparisons are to be made, (and they seem to be unavoidable), it would seem only fair to compare beginning with beginning. Taking this as our standard, we can give almost unmitigated praise, for a better debut is not often heard.

The programme consisted of Beethoven's Quartette in F minor, Bach's Sonata in E major for violin alone, and Tachaikowsky's Trio for piano, violin and violincello, with Mr. Bauer at the piano.

The Beethoven Quartette was the Opus 95, with which the Spiering Quartette of Chicago made its debut last week. Another opportunity for comparison was thus afforded, with the result that we found the Arbos Quartette superior in individual quality of tone, while the westerners were somewhat in advance in ensemble. The new quartette consists of Mr. Arbos, first violin, Mr. Roth, second, Mr. Ferir, viola and Mr. Krasselt, cello. Mr. Roth needs no new description; he is a perfect chamber-musician. Mr. Ferir was not enough in evidence in the programme to judge entirely of his merits, but his work was good in all he did. The whole quartette was brilliant and fiery as befits a Beethoven quartette of the later period.

The Bach numbers are very difficult, with the additional handicap that their diffculties are concealed from the general public. It is a crucial test of musicianship to go through this ordeal with good intonation and with clearness in all the double and triple stopping. Mr. Arbos certainly accomplished this, and he gave the Gavotte en Rondeau with a crisp style that suited it perfectly and won him great applause; but there was a lack of breadth of tone and phrasing in the other movements.

The Tschaikowsky Trio, with three such artists as Krasselt, Bauer and Arbos, was something long to be remembered. Every time we hear a work by the Russian composer we are more impressed with the fact that he alone, of the recent instrumental masters, has a message of importance, has something poetic to convey, without either theorizing or experiment. It may be that Tschaikowsky's fame will grow greater as the years go by—we do not believe that the world has adequately recognized his genius yet.

The trio was played with abundant verve and enthusiasm, which awoke a responsive thrill in the audience, so that the applause was great and spontaneous. Mr. Arbos appeared in this to far greater advantage than he did in his first appearance in the Symphony concerts recently. His tone was sometimes a trifle aggressive, but there was sincerity and beauty in his work and he certainly won much of the success of the performance. Mr. Bauer needs no new laurels; he has proved, over and over again, that he is a great musician as well as a great virtuoso. His chamber-music-playing is full of keen insight and intelligence, although occasionally he bursts into crashes that overtop the strings. This time the piano lid was down, and the ensemble was helped thereby. The piano work in the finale was especially impressive.

Mr. Krasselt came fresh from his triumph in the Symphony Concert, and showed himself as strong in chamber-music as in the vaster domain of concerto-work. His care of ensemble was praiseworthy, and he repressed his tone to that of his companion.

The trio has much of the Russian melancholy, and its coda suggests death as clearly as the end of the Symphonie Pathetique. Per contra, the variations are of much lightness, Waltz rhythms (which Tschaikowsky seems to have loved) and Russian dances jostling each other. This part was roundly applauded.

The closed folding doors of the stage made an excellent sounding board, and the tones of the quartette rang out finely. The concert was of a sensible length,—not too prolix.

Louis C. Elson.

BOSTON HERALD—
NOVEMBER 25, 1903.

GERICKE'S GREAT RECEPTION

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Most Successful Concert to Immense Audience at Providence.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Nov. 24, 1903. The Boston Symphony orchestra was greeted tonight with the largest audience that has ever attended its concerts in Providence. A record sale was made, every seat having been taken at noon. This deserved reception was due to the interest in the revival of the Symphony season shown by President Faunce of Brown University and other distinguished citizens.

The orchestra came down on a special train which permitted the concert to begin at 8:15, half an hour earlier than in former years, and removed one of the chief causes for disatisfaction. By returning on a special train the necessity of hurrying the closing number, hitherto unavoidable, was removed. An innovation was an intermission, which was much appreciated by the society people and permitted of encores.

Mr. Gericke was given a hearty welcome as he came upon the stage and found his audience in perfect accord. Applause was without stint and the enthusiasm was such as to move the orchestra to its best efforts. The concert was an unqualified success.

Mr. Arbos captivated his auditors by his masterly rendition of Mendelssohn's concerto in E minor.

The second and final concert will be given Feb. 2, and for this the sale is so large that but few seats are obtainable.

[49]

BOSTON JOURNAL,
NOVEMBER 24, 1903.

ARBOS QUARTET HAS ITS DEBUT

New Chamber Music Club Begins Its First Season Under Best Auspices.

CONCERT IN JORDAN HALL

Each of the Four Players Has Talent and Is at Home in His Sphere, Arguing Well for the Club.

A large and fine audience was in Jordan Hall last evening to greet the Arbos Quartet on its first appearance as an addition to the chamber music clubs which Boston already possesses and to applaud warmly and long the excellent performance which it gave.

So soon as this after the formation of the quartet, and with practise time necessarily derived from the modicum of leisure among daily duties, it would be unwise to attempt to indicate how the characteristics of the club will resolve themselves ultimately, or even to prognosticate what its tendencies are like to be.

Note the Good.

For the moment it must be sufficient to note the good already observable and to anticipate much proper development from it. The four players are at home in their respective spheres and each has musicianly knowledge, taste and discretion, has an apt and ample technique, and an instrument of pleasant tone and solid volume.

But while these are necessary bases for a fine quartet, they are no more. Joint practise, assimilation of styles, harmony of predilections and constant mutual consideration and a single effort and ambition are essentials to perfection, and they will require time.

Last evening there was good balance in the voicing, no ebullient phrases disturbing it, although some occasional reticence was noticeable. The character of the selected works was regarded and well expressed, distinguishing fully between the almost fitful romanticism of the Beethoven F minor quartet, opus 95, and the moody passionateness of the Tschaikowsky trio in A minor, opus 50, which moves with so firm and so swift a foot from its opening elegy to the broad gaiety and diversity of the varied themes in the middle and last movements.

Tower of Strength.

In this latter work Mr. Bauer's assistance was as a tower of strong support. He played so nobly, earnestly lucidly and elegantly. Mr. Arbos appeared far more at ease and did himself much more justice in this intimate assembly than at his debut. He played Bach's E major sonata for violin solo with steady mastery of its details, clear phrasing, just intonation and quite sufficient tone, as well as with greater freedom and self-confidence, the music itself appearing to suit him better than did the Mendelssohn concerto. Altogether the concert made a pleasant and propitious beginning.

Boston Transcript
TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1903

Jordan Hall: Arbos Quartet

In Jordan Hall yesterday evening the Arbos Quartet, the fourth organization of string players to appear in Boston this winter, swung into line, and opened its season, with (like all well-regulated string quartets) the assistance of Mr. Harold Bauer. This was the programme:

Quartet in F minor, Op. 95.....Beethoven
Sonata in E major, for violin alone....J. S. Bach
Mr. Arbos.
Trio for piano, violin and violoncello, in A minor, Op. 50.....Tchaikovsky

Inasmuch as string quartets are the results of slow growth, there is very little to be said concerning the work of a quartet that has existed only a month or six weeks. The chief interest in the Arbos Quartet, therefore, was that aroused by its individual members. Mr. Arbos appeared to far greater advantage yesterday than he did when playing the Mendelssohn concerto a few weeks ago, for many of the qualities that make him so superior a concert master are distinctly useful to him as the first violin of a string quartet. In this position he shows an authority, warmth and energy that are lacking when he comes forward as a soloist.

Of the other members of the quartet there is little to say, for Mr. Otto Roth is already well known in Boston and his ability justly rated; Mr. Ferir one had little opportunity to hear, and Mr. Krasselt merely deepened the fine impression he made the other night at the symphony concert. Of the ensemble, it may honestly be said that it was quite as good as could, under the circumstances, be expected.

The programme, skilfully contrasted, and not too long, gave the large audience great pleasure. Mr. Arbos played a Bach sonata better than he did the Mendelssohn, although without much charm. Mr. Bauer took a hand in the delightful, brilliant, pathetic Tchaikovsky trio, playing his part of the music very beautifully but absolutely without effect, for the lowered piano lid made his tone uniformly dull and dead; the gayer, more brilliant passages of this diversified work went, therefore, for nothing.

On Monday, Dec. 21, the Arbos Quartet will give a second concert in Jordan Hall.

R. R. G.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1903.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Fifth Concert—Review by Philip Hale in the Boston Herald.

THE program of the fifth Symphony concert, given in Symphony Hall last evening, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Overture, Midsummer Night's Dream.....Mendelssohn
Concerto in A minor, No. 1, for 'cello.....Saint-Saëns
Symphonic poem No. 12, The Ideal.....Liszt
Symphony No. 2, in D minor.....Dvorák

Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Ideal," is not familiar to the concert goers of Boston. Theodore Thomas produced it here in 1870, and it has been played once at a Symphony concert—in 1880. The music is in illustration of Schiller's poem, "The Ideal." The illusions of youth pass away; that which was dreamed of as beautiful and divine seldom appears in reality, and if it does it is a disappointment; fortune, fame, truth and love leave man to find his only consolation in friendship and activity. But Liszt would not accept as a refrain to the poem of human life: "This is the end of every man's desire." It was necessary to have an apotheosis, so he changed Schiller's ending; he believed that the holding fast of the ideal and the continual realization were the highest aims in existence; and therefore he gained his climax by a jubilant recapitulation of the motives of the earlier and more hopeful sections of his work.

It might be interesting to examine into the reasonableness of such a radical change in a classical poem merely for the purpose of making a Lisztian holiday; but we should not take the "literary" side of music too seriously. Mr. Henley says in his latest volume of essays—alas, it must be the last collection prepared by him—that "the 'æsthetic movement' has made painting so excessively literary, that either it is literature in a new medium or it is nothing." This saying may be applied to much of the modern music; and Liszt is still modern, far more modern than some of his most painstaking imitators of today, who affect to dub him old fashioned.

It is necessary for a composer first of all to make music. The first question here is not whether Liszt bettered Schiller for his purpose. It is not whether he succeeded in translating into tones passages, line by line, of the poem, but whether the music itself will stand without the mottoes from the poem. An argument as to whether Schiller or Schopenhauer were the more truly philosophic in the view of the ages of man would be a distant digression.

The title, "The Ideal," is enough to any sensitive and sympathetic hearer who is able to make his own program as it is suggested by the music. The aspirations, the hopes, the illusions, the disenchantment, and then the resolve to be heroic even in the face of cruel disappointment, and of the one supreme doubt, the firm belief in a divine average, in compensa ion somewhere and some time in the vast universe to which this proud globe is as the ball rolled painfully by a beetle—these are surely in the music, nor is there any need of Schiller's lines or Lord Lytton's pompous and swollen translation. For the music of this poem is singularly clear, as well as imaginative, and for well defined lines, for beauty of musical thought, for logical and poetic transformations of the leading idea, for nobility of expression, "The Ideal" must be ranked with the greatest works of Liszt. In this instance simplicity is not affected naivete, and strength is not merely bombast.

Although the poem is long, it is firmly knit together, and although there is a wealth of ingenious detail, there is no cessation in the flow of musical thought. There are passages of exquisite beauty; there is a broad sweep of vision; there is loftiness of imagination. A great, a nobly beautiful work that is not mocked by its title! The performance was a remarkable one, which reflected the highest credit on conductor and orchestra. Name all the qualities that characterize the ideal performance of such a masterpiece, and not one was missing in the performance of last night. And how familiar Wagner must have been with this score! How he helped himself freely with both hands for his own use and glory!

Mr. Krasselt made his first appearance as a soloist in this country. He is young, and youth, as Liszt said, is the time for virtuosity. Mr. Krasselt made a most favorable impression. His tone is pure and eminently agreeable, although it is not large and commanding. His mechanism is well developed; he plays with feeling and enthusiasm, as well as with the authority of an excellent musician. The concerto itself, with the exception of dry and formal padding toward the end, is delightful.

The overture and the symphony are well known and do not call for extended comment. The performance was of a high order. Seldom, if ever, has the overture—one of the few truly poetic compositions of Mendelssohn—been played with such beauty of tone and exquisite precision.

BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON MASS., NOVEMBER 28, 1903.

The Arbos Quartette.

Last Monday evening in Jordan hall, occurred the first concert of the new Arbos Quartette. The organization consists of Mr. Arbos, first violin; Mr. Roth, second violin; Mr. Ferir, viola; and Mr. Krasselt, 'cello. The programme was:

Quartette in F minor.....Beethoven
Sonata in E major for violin alone .....Bach
Mr. Arbos.
Trio in A minor. .....Tschaikowsky

Mr. Harold Bauer was pianist in the trio.

There are traditional remarks always to be made concerning the establishing of such an organization, but by this time the conventional ground has been pretty thoroughly covered. However capable the individual players may be, a certain interval is necessary for them to fall into the way of working well together. All things considered, the concert of Monday evening was well worth while—the programme interesting, being unusual, but wisely chosen, the performance full of promise.

Mr. Arbos' playing grew steadily better and better as the programme advanced. His nervousness shows itself in occasional hard tone and the like; as he gained confidence his technique showed better. The movements of Bach's suite proved a thoroughly interesting and suggestive performance, the Gavotte and Rondo in particular, being capitally done.

Tschaikowsky's trio is an absorbing piece of work, with a strange, totally nnexpected end,—solemn, almost pontifical.

Mr. Bauer's playing was continuously perfect. The entrancing rhythm of his performance, his wonderful sympathy with change of mood, baffle praise. He seems to have proven himself an infallible resource; he has great ups, but no downs.

The audience was large, friendly, warm in response and quick to applaud. In every way it was an unusually satisfactory gathering, far more demonstrative than is usual in Boston. There were many recalls.

Sunday Globe
Nov 29-03

——Two concerts, perhaps as interesting of their kind as any of this winter, have been given the past week at Jordan hall, one on Monday evening, the first by the newly-formed Arbos quartet, and the second on Tuesday evening by Thibaud, the young French violinist, who made his second appearance in this city. He came fresh from his successful performance given in New York by the Philharmonic society, under the baton of Edouard Colonne of Paris, and fully confirmed the impression he made the first time he played here. In the audience were noted Mr and Mrs Andrew C. Wheelwright, Mrs Philip Hale, Mr and Mrs Eliot Hubbard, Mme Marius, Mrs S. B. Field, Mr William P. Blake, Mr and Mrs Chadwick, Mrs Ticknor, Mr and Mrs Frederic W. Vinton, Mr and Mrs J. Lowell Putnam and Miss Henrietta Sargent. Mrs Putnam wore a beautiful cloak of chiffon, lace and embroidery over her gown and a brown hat done in pink roses; Miss Sargent was in black lace, with light blue cloak and black hat with plumes. She also wore a pearl necklace. As was noticed the evening before many of the ladies have adopted the custom prevailing in New York of wearing handsome dinner gowns to concerts, which relieves the monotony of the dark costumes which so many coming from out of town are obliged to wear. Among the patrons of the Arbos quartet concert Monday evening were Mr and Mrs T. Handasyd Cabot, Mrs Cabot looking very pretty in pale blue voile with sleeves and yoke or lace and wearing a necklace of superb turquoise exactly the same shade as the gown; Mr and Mrs F. L. Higginson, Mrs Higginson in white figured lace with a touch of pink at the bodice and long cloak lined with pink; Miss Juliette Higginson in light evening gown, Mr and Mrs Henry L. Higginson, Mr and Mrs S. Lothrop Thorndike, Mr Charles Gardner, Dr and Mrs Beach, Miss Estelle Kimball in white veiling, Mme Rotoli, Mr and Mrs Leverett Tuckerman, Mrs Seth Sprague, Miss Hooper, Mr and Mrs Francis H. Peabody, Mr and Mrs Lang, Mr Arthur Foote, Miss Katherine Foote in bodice of insertions of white lace, dark skirt and black plumed hat; Mr and Mrs Gericke, Mr Dana, Miss Martha Dana, Mr and Mrs Frederic Converse, Mr and Mrs Comee, Miss Elise Fay, Judge Brackett, Mrs Hugh Cotton, Mr Eben D. Jordan, Miss Jordan, Mrs William H. Sands, Miss Sands and all the members of the Kneisel quartet. Mr Bauer, who assisted, received the warmest recognition.

BOSTON COURIER,

NOVEMBER 28, 1903.

——Friday afternoon brought out the customary large and brilliant attendance at the Symphony rehearsal, and a few of the many people noted on that occasion were Miss Dorothy Bigelow, Miss Alice Stackpole, Miss Elizabeth Shattuck, Miss Elfrieda Roosevelt, Miss Barbara Higginson and Miss Juliet Higginson, Mrs. Charles Fry, Miss Audrey Stanwood, Mrs. Fred Richardson, Miss Edith Stackpole, Mrs. Francis Peabody, Miss Rosamond Peabody, Miss Susan Amory, Miss Estelle Kimball, Mrs. Thomas C. Thacher, Mrs. Eben Draper, Mrs. Henry Howard Fay, Miss Madeleine Davis, Miss Mary Russell, Mrs. John B. Osborn, Mrs. Lewis H. Mudgett, Mrs. Oliver Ames, Mrs. F. B. Kittridge, Miss Cornelia Kittridge, Mrs. John Lowell, Miss Mabel Bayard Warren, Mrs. Matthew Luce, Mrs. Fred B. Carpenter, Miss Anna Berry, Mrs. Albert F. Bigelow, Miss Rosamond Saltonstall, Miss Margaret Manning, Mrs. De Ford Bigelow, Mrs. F. L. Higginson and her mother, Mrs. Shattuck, Miss Dorothy Jordan, Miss Priscilla Stackpole, Mrs. Arthur Beebe, Mrs. F. R. Comee, Mrs. Albert F. Bigelow, Mr. Grew, Mr. Julian De Cordeva, Mrs. J. L. Thorndike, Miss Margaret Codman and Mrs. Walter Buckingham Swan. Mr. and Mrs. Swan, by the way, have given up their house on the Beacon Boulevard, in Brookline, and have taken an apartment in Riverbank Court. Mrs. Swan has issued at home cards for Thursday afternoons.

——Distinctly smart was the audience which assembled in Jordan Hall, Monday evening, to listen to the excellent program arranged and presented by the Arbos Quartette. A few of the many representative people present were Colonel Higginson, Mr. and Mrs. Francis H. Peabody, Miss Edith Austin, Mr. Arthur Foote and his daughter, Miss Katharine Foote, Mr. and Mrs. Wilhelm Gericke, Miss Estelle Kimball, Miss Marion Richardson, Mrs. John B. Osborn, Mrs. S. B. Field, Mr. George Chadwick, Mr. Eben D. Jordan, who had with him his daughter, Miss Dorothy Jordan, Dr. and Mrs. Hall and numerous others.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE-

-NOVEMBER 29, 1903.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The program for the sixth Symphony rehearsal and concert comprised Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio," Bruch's fantasia on Scottish airs, for violin and orchestra, and Dohnanyi's D minor symphony, the latter selection played for the first time in America. Mr Alexander Z. Birnbaum, one of the new violinists of the orchestra, appeared as soloist. The familiar "Fidelio" overture was played in the usual vein, Mr Gericke's sympathetic reading being splendidly illustrated by his men. The selection was received with due appreciation and probably gave as genuine pleasure to the auditors as one movement on the program.

The Bruch fantasia on Scottish folk-melodies introduced Mr Birnbaum as a soloist for the first time in this country, and the debut should prove satisfactory to the young artist for he was most favorably received. The long composition does not abound in brilliant work for the solo instrument and so does not appeal very strongly to the "popular" taste, but the value of the work is highly appreciated by musicians and it is found in the repertory of all prominent violinists. Mr Birnbaum's interpretation was excellent throughout, the strongly marked rhythms of the opening and closing movements being given with broad and resonant effect, the cantabel playing in the second part was generally of good quality, the variations in the second movement were executed with commendable facility and the alternating passages of the third movement went smothly, although there were some faulty intonations in the rapid figurations. Mr Birnbaum is evidently an earnest man and conscientious in his work. He has a good tone, possibly better in the lower than in the upper register, and his finger work and bowing shows him to be well equipped in his chosen profession.

The Dohnanyi symphony is very long, there are five movements, and in each one the intricate themes are so interwoven, developed and divided among the different orchestral contingents that sounds abstruse and somewhat uninteresting. Dohnanyi has utilized the resources of the modern orchestra to the fullest extent, some of his combinations are really weird in effect, and to every group of instruments he has given work to do which tests the abilities of the players in no usual way, even in this age of writing melodic difficulties.

A single hearing is not sufficient in forming an opinion as to the importance of the symphony, and so a general commendation for the performance must suffice. The wind instruments were prominent in their harmonious work in groups, many of the themes being played in excellent tone, but there were some rough movements in the full orchestra measures, and the heavier instruments appear frequently to lag behind Mr Gericke's beat. The third movement showed the violins to be in their usual form in the precision and beauty of tone, the next movement was admirably given by the heavier contingent, and the triumphant finale at the close was all that could be expected. In this part, too, the variations and contrasting themes were splendidly played by all. That the symphony is skilfully constructed there is no doubt, though in the main it appears not to be destined to give satisfaction to any but musical experts.

Mme Melba will be this week's soloist. The program will include Brahms' "Academic" overture, Tschaikowsky's orchestral ballad, "The Voyvode" (a posthumous work) and the "Childe Harold" symphony by Berlioz. Melba will sing an aria from Mozart's "La Clemenza di Tito" and Ophelia's mad scene from Thomas' "Hamlet."

[50]

NOVEMBER 25, 1903.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An Overflowing House Greeted the Boston Orchestra's Return.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of the season in Infantry Hall last evening, and the return of this superb organization after a year of absence was greeted by a phenomenal audience. Every seat in the hall was filled with holders of season or single tickets, and about 300 musical enthusiasts availed themselves of the lower-priced "rush" tickets and stood throughout the concert. No such event has ever been witnessed before at a symphony concert in this city. It must be recorded as a triumph for those who undertook the task of awakening the dormant musical interest of this community, and in addition the financial responsibility for the success of the two concerts which the Boston orchestra is to give here this season. And, again, it goes to prove the wisdom of the arrangements which were made—the sliding scale of prices, the offer of admission tickets at a rate within the means of all, and the various other concessions to the comfort and convenience of patrons. It is not understood that any miracle has been wrought. The number of people in Providence who possess the capacity and taste to appreciate music of the highest class is no larger to-day than last week, or last year. For the present it suffices that the public has been awakened to the fact that a series of concerts such as the Boston Symphony Orchestra has offered here for over 20 years ought not to be suffered to lapse; and the further fact that without the interest manifested by a substantial patronage they would be surely discontinued.

The programme offered two novelties—a first performance of a work by Vincent D'Indy, the talented French composer, and the initial appearance here of the soloist, Mr. E. Ferrantes Arbos, the new concertmeister of the orchestra. It contained the following numbers:

Overture to "Euryanthe".....Weber
Concerto in E-minor, for violin, op. 64.....Mendelssohn
"La Foret Enchantee," "Legende-Symphonie," op. 8.....D'Indy
Symphony in D-minor, No. 4, op. 120.....Schumann

One can hardly help wondering what were the emotions of Conductor Gericke and his players upon seeing a house packed to the doors with a brilliant audience, representative of society, the musical contingent, the business and professional life of the city, where they have been accustomed to gaze upon a wide-spreading sea of empty benches, with a little island of the musically faithful in its centre, like shipwrecked mariners huddled upon a raft. Whatever they thought, the sensation was undoubtedly a pleasant one, for they seemed to play with unusual elan and vigor, responding, as musicians almost invariably do, to the stimulus of a large and cordially disposed audience.

Three of the four programme numbers were familiar and favorite selections. The opening overture, brilliant, melodious, and effectively scored—as is the case with all of Weber's overtures—was given a spirited rendering, and served as a pleasant introduction to the musical feast. The "solid" number, Schumann's fine D-minor Symphony, though by no means the greatest of symphonies, is an interesting and agreeable work, stamped unmistakably with the peculiar genius and individuality of its composer. A sympathetic reading by Mr. Gericke and a thoroughly adequate and careful performance by the orchestra made this, in its turn, a fitting close to an evening of pure musical enjoyment. The novelty of the programme, D'indy's symphonic legend, "The Enchanted Forest," an interesting specimen of the almost universal tendency among modern composers toward the production of strictly imaginative pieces, is scored with the skill of a master hand. Indeed, it may be said that the workmanship is so well done as to conceal, for the most part, the paucity of original musical ideas and thematic invention. In common with most composers of the modern French school, D'Indy has many colors on his palette and uses them with an unsparing hand. The result is brilliant, effective, often pleasing, and the hearer is content to allow these piquant sauces to tickle his musical palate without inquiring too closely into the nature of the dish.

In choosing for his solo number the Mendelssohn violin concerto Mr. Arbos made a selection that is always popular. It is bright, sparkling, melodious and, though presenting enough of technical difficulty to test the accomplishments of an artist, does not distract the attention of the hearer by extraordinary flights of gymnastics. Mr. Arbos revealed himself as a well-equipped and sympathetic player and was received with considerable enthusiasm, being recalled several times with applause that was unmistakably genuine as well as hearty. His tone is not large, but is of fine quality, pure and clear, and he has excellent command of both finger and bow. His rendering of the beautiful andante (the second movement) was especially artistic and pleasing. Evidently he is to prove a worthy successor to that excellent artist, Franz Kneisel, which in itself is high praise.

The audience was not only a large one, but quite enthusiastic as well. Every number was greeted with cordial and prolonged applause, and a general feeling of satisfaction at the return of our finest musical organization was plainly apparent. The second concert by the orchestra will be given on Tuesday evening, Feb. 2, beginning at 8:15.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An Overflowing House Greeted the Boston Orchestra's Return.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of the season in Infantry Hall last evening, and the return of this superb organization after a year of absence was greeted by a phenomenal audience. Every seat in the hall was filled with holders of season or single tickets, and about 200 musical enthusiasts availed themselves of the lower-priced "rush" tickets and stood throughout the concert. No such sight has ever been witnessed before at a symphony concert in this city. It must be recorded as a triumph for those who undertook the task of awakening the dormant musical interest of this community, and in addition the financial responsibility for the success of the two concerts which the Boston orchestra is to give here this season. And, again, it goes to prove the wisdom of the arrangements which were made—the sliding scale of prices, the offer of admission tickets at a rate within the means of all, and the various other concessions to the comfort and convenience of patrons. It is not understood that any miracle has been wrought. The number of people in Providence who possess the capacity and taste to appreciate music of the highest class is no larger to-day than last week, or last year. For the present it suffices that the public has been awakened to the fact that a series of concerts such as the Boston Symphony Orchestra has offered here for over 30 years ought not to be suffered to lapse; and the further fact that without the interest manifested by a substantial patronage they would be surely discontinued.

The programme offered two novelties—a first performance of a work by Vincent D'Indy, the talented French composer, and the initial appearance here of the soloist, Mr. E. Fernandez Arbos, the new concertmaster of the orchestra. It contained the following numbers:

Overture to "Euryanthe".....Weber
Concerto in E-minor, for violin, op. 64.....Mendelssohn
"La Foret Enchantee," Legende-Symphonie, op. 8.....D'Indy
Symphony in D-minor, No. 4, op. 120.....Schumann

One can hardly help wondering what were the emotions of Conductor Gericke and his players upon seeing a house packed to the doors with a brilliant audience, representative of society, the musical contingent, the business and professional life of the city, where they have been accustomed to gaze upon a wide-spreading sea of empty benches, with a little island of the musically faithful in its centre, like shipwrecked mariners huddled upon a raft. Whatever they thought, the sensation was undoubtedly a pleasant one, for they seemed to play with unusual elan and vigor, responding, as musicians almost invariably do, to the stimulus of a large and cordially disposed audience.

Three of the four programme numbers were familiar and favorite selections. The opening overture, brilliant, melodious, and effectively scored—as is the case with all of Weber's overtures—was given a spirited rendering, and served as a pleasant introduction to the musical feast. The "solid" number, Schumann's fine D-minor Symphony, though by no means the greatest of symphonies, is an interesting and agreeable work, stamped unmistakably with the peculiar genius and individuality of its composer. A sympathetic reading by Mr. Gericke and a thoroughly adequate and careful performance by the orchestra made this, in its turn, a fitting close to an evening of pure musical enjoyment. The novelty of the programme, D'Indy's symphonic legend, "The Enchanted Forest," an interesting specimen of the almost universal tendency among modern composers toward the production of strictly imaginative pieces, is scored with the skill of a master hand. Indeed, it may be said that the workmanship is so well done as to conceal, for the most part, the paucity of original musical ideas and thematic invention. In common with most composers of the modern French school, D'Indy has many colors on his palette and uses them with an unsparing hand. The result is brilliant, effective, often pleasing, and the hearer is content to allow these piquant sauces to tickle his musical palate without inquiring too closely into the nature of the dish.

In choosing for his solo number the Mendelssohn violin concerto Mr. Arbos made a selection that is always popular. It is bright, sparkling, melodious and, though presenting enough of technical difficulty to test the accomplishments of an artist, does not distract the attention of the hearer by extraordinary flights of gymnastics. Mr. Arbos revealed himself as a well-equipped and sympathetic player and was received with considerable enthusiasm, being recalled several times with applause that was unmistakably genuine as well as hearty. His tone is not large, but is of fine quality, pure and clear, and he has excellent command of both finger and bow. His rendering of the beautiful andante (the second movement) was especially artistic and pleasing. Evidently he is to prove a worthy successor to that excellent artist, Franz Kneisel, which in itself is high praise.

The audience was not only a large one, but quite enthusiastic as well. Every number was greeted with cordial and prolonged applause, and a general feeling of satisfaction at the return of our finest musical organization was plainly apparent. The second concert by the orchestra will be given on Tuesday evening, Feb. 2, beginning at 8:15.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Fifth Concert—Review by Philip Hale in the Boston Herald.

THE program of the fifth Symphony concert, given in Symphony Hall last evening, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Overture, Midsummer Night's Dream.....Mendelssohn
Concerto in A minor, No. 1, for 'cello.....Saint-Saëns
Symphonic poem No. 12, The Ideal.....Liszt
Symphony No. 2, in D minor.....Dvorák

Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Ideal," is not familiar to the concert goers of Boston. Theodore Thomas produced it here in 1870, and it has been played once at a Symphony concert—in 1880. The music is in illustration of Schiller's poem, "The Ideal." The illusions of youth pass away; that which was dreamed of as beautiful and divine seldom appears in reality, and if it does it is a disappointment; fortune, fame, truth and love leave man to find his only consolation in friendship and activity. But Liszt would not accept as a refrain to the poem of human life: "This is the end of every man's desire." It was necessary to have an apotheosis, so he changed Schiller's ending; he believed that the holding fast of the ideal and the continual realization were the highest aims in existence; and therefore he gained his climax by a jubilant recapitulation of the motives of the earlier and more hopeful sections of his work.

It might be interesting to examine into the reasonableness of such a radical change in a classical poem merely for the purpose of making a Lisztian holiday; but we should not take the "literary" side of music too seriously. Mr. Henley says in his latest volume of essays—alas, it must be the last collection prepared by him—that "the 'æsthetic movement' has made painting so excessively literary, that either it is literature in a new medium or it is nothing." This saying may be applied to much of the modern music; and Liszt is still modern, far more modern than some of his most painstaking imitators of today, who affect to dub him old fashioned.

It is necessary for a composer first of all to make music. The first question here is not whether Liszt bettered Schiller for his purpose. It is not whether he succeeded in translating into tones passages, line by line, of the poem, but whether the music itself will stand without the mottoes from the poem. An argument as to whether Schiller or Schopenhauer were the more truly philosophic in the view of the ages of man would be a distant digression.

The title, "The Ideal," is enough to any sensitive and sympathetic hearer who is able to make his own program as it is suggested by the music. The aspirations, the hopes, the illusions, the disenchantment, and then the resolve to be heroic even in the face of cruel disappointment, and of the one supreme doubt, the firm belief in a divine average, in compensation somewhere and some time in the vast universe to which this proud globe is as the ball rolled painfully by a beetle—these are surely in the music, nor is there any need of Schiller's lines or Lord Lytton's pompous and swollen translation. For the music of this poem is singularly clear, as well as imaginative, and for well defined lines, for beauty of musical thought, for logical and poetic transformations of the leading idea, for nobility of expression, "The Ideal" must be ranked with the greatest works of Liszt. In this instance simplicity is not affected naivete, and strength is not merely bombast.

Although the poem is long, it is firmly knit together, and although there is a wealth of ingenious detail, there is no cessation in the flow of musical thought. There are passages of exquisite beauty; there is a broad sweep of vision; there is loftiness of imagination. A great, a nobly beautiful work that is not mocked by its title! The performance was a remarkable one, which reflected the highest credit on conductor and orchestra. Name all the qualities that characterize the ideal performance of such a masterpiece, and not one was missing in the performance of last night. And how familiar Wagner must have been with this score! How he helped himself freely with both hands for his own use and glory!

Mr. Krasselt made his first appearance as a soloist in this country. He is young, and youth, as Liszt said, is the time for virtuosity. Mr. Krasselt made a most favorable impression. His tone is pure and eminently agreeable, although it is not large and commanding. His mechanism is well developed; he plays with feeling and enthusiasm, as well as with the authority of an excellent musician. The concerto itself, with the exception of dry and formal padding toward the end, is delightful.

The overture and the symphony are well known and do not call for extended comment. The performance was of a high order. Seldom, if ever, has the overture—one of the few truly poetic compositions of Mendelssohn—been played with such beauty of tone and exquisite precision.

BOSTON COURIER,
NOVEMBER 28, 1903.

——Friday afternoon brought out the customary large and brilliant attendance at the Symphony rehearsal, and a few of the many people noted on that occasion were Miss Dorothy Bigelow, Miss Alice Stackpole, Miss Elizabeth Shattuck, Miss Elfrieda Roosevelt, Miss Barbara Higginson and Miss Juliet Higginson, Mrs. Charles Fry, Miss Audrey Stanwood, Mrs. Fred Richardson, Miss Edith Stackpole, Mrs. Francis Peabody, Miss Rosamond Peabody, Miss Susan Amory, Miss Estelle Kimball, Mrs. Thomas C. Thacher, Mrs. Eben Draper, Mrs. Henry Howard Fay, Miss Madeleine Davis, Miss Mary Russell, Mrs. John B. Osborn, Mrs. Lewis H. Mudgett, Mrs. Oliver Ames, Mrs. F. B. Kittridge, Miss Cornelia Kittridge, Mrs. John Lowell, Miss Mabel Bayard Warren, Mrs. Matthew Luce, Mrs. Fred B. Carpenter, Miss Anna Berry, Mrs. Albert F. Bigelow, Miss Rosamond Saltonstall, Miss Margaret Manning, Mrs. De Ford Bigelow, Mrs. F. L. Higginson and her mother, Mrs. Shattuck, Miss Dorothy Jordan, Miss Priscilla Stackpole, Mrs. Arthur Beebe, Mrs. F. R. Comee, Mrs. Albert F. Bigelow, Mr. Grew, Mr. Julian De Cordeva, Mrs. J. L. Thorndike, Miss Margaret Codman and Mrs. Walter Buckingham Swan. Mr. and Mrs. Swan, by the way, have given up their house on the Beacon Boulevard, in Brookline, and have taken an apartment in Riverbank Court. Mrs. Swan has issued at home cards for Thursday afternoons.

——Distinctly smart was the audience which assembled in Jordan Hall, Monday evening, to listen to the excellent program arranged and presented by the Arbos Quartette. A few of the many representative people present were Colonel Higginson, Mr. and Mrs. Francis H. Peabody, Miss Edith Austin, Mr. Arthur Foote and his daughter, Miss Katharine Foote, Mr. and Mrs. Wilhelm Gericke, Miss Estelle Kimball, Miss Marion Richardson, Mrs. John B. Osborn, Mrs. S. B. Field, Mr. George Chadwick, Mr. Eben D. Jordan, who had with him his daughter, Miss Dorothy Jordan, Dr. and Mrs. Hall and numerous others.

BOSTON TIMES
BOSTON MASS., NOVEMBER 28, 1903.

The Arbos Quartette.

Last Monday evening in Jordan hall, occurred the first concert of the new Arbos Quartette. The organization consists of Mr. Arbos, first violin; Mr. Roth, second violin; Mr. Ferir, viola; and Mr. Krasselt, 'cello. The programme was:

Quartette in F minor.....Beethoven
Sonata in E major for violin alone.....Bach
Mr. Arbos.
Trio in A minor.....Tschaikowsky

Mr. Harold Bauer was pianist in the trio.

There are traditional remarks always to be made concerning the establishing of such an organization, but by this time the conventional ground has been pretty thoroughly covered. However capable the individual players may be, a certain interval is necessary for them to fall into the way of working well together. All things considered, the concert of Monday evening was well worth while—the programme interesting, being unusual, but wisely chosen, the performance full of promise.

Mr. Arbos' playing grew steadily better and better as the programme advanced. His nervousness shows itself in occasional hard tone and the like; as he gained confidence his technique showed better. The movements of Bach's suite proved a thoroughly interesting and suggestive performance, the Gavotte and Rondo in particular, being capitally done.

Tschaikowsky's trio is an absorbing piece of work, with a strange, totally nnexpected end,—solemn, almost pontifical.

Mr. Bauer's playing was continuously perfect. The entrancing rhythm of his performance, his wonderful sympathy with change of mood, baffle praise. He seems to have proven himself an infallible resource; he has great ups, but no downs.

The audience was large, friendly, warm in response and quick to applaud. In every way it was an unusually satisfactory gathering, far more demonstrative than is usual in Boston. There were many recalls.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—
—NOVEMBER 29, 1903.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The program for the sixth Symphony rehearsal and concert comprised Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio," Bruch's fantasia on Scottish airs, for violin and orchestra, and Dohnanyi's D minor symphony, the latter selection played for the first time in America. Mr Alexander Z. Birnbaum, one of the new violinists of the orchestra, appeared as soloist. The familiar "Fidelio" overture was played in the usual vein, Mr Gericke's sympathetic reading being splendidly illustrated by his men. The selection was received with due appreciation and probably gave as genuine pleasure to the auditors as one movement on the program.

The Bruch fantasia on Scottish folk-melodies introduced Mr Birnbaum as a soloist for the first time in this country, and the debut should prove satisfactory to the young artist for he was most favorably received. The long composition does not abound in brilliant work for the solo instrument and so does not appeal very strongly to the "popular" taste, but the value of the work is highly appreciated by musicians and it is found in the repertory of all prominent violinists. Mr Birnbaum's interpretation was excellent throughout, the strongly marked rhythms of the opening and closing movements being given with broad and resonant effect, the cantabel playing in the second part was generally of good quality, the variations in the second movement were executed with commendable facility and the alternating passages of the third movement went smothly, although there were some faulty intonations in the rapid figurations. Mr Birnbaum is evidently an earnest man and conscientious in his work. He has a good tone, possibly better in the lower than in the upper register, and his finger work and bowing shows him to be well equipped in his chosen profession.

The Dohnanyi symphony is very long, there are five movements, and in each one the intricate themes are so interwoven, developed and divided among the different orchestral contingents that to the general concert patron the work sounds abstruse and somewhat uninteresting. Dohnanyi has utilized the resources of the modern orchestra to the fullest extent, some of his combinations are really weird in effect, and to every group of instruments he has given work to do which tests the abilities of the players in no usual way, even in this age of writing melodic difficulties.

A single hearing is not sufficient in forming an opinion as to the importance of the symphony, and so a general commendation for the performance must suffice. The wind instruments were prominent in their harmonious work in groups, many of the themes being played in excellent tone, but there were some rough movements in the full orchestra measures, and the heavier instruments appear frequently to lag behind Mr Gericke's beat. The third movement showed the violins to be in their usual form in the precision and beauty of tone, the next movement was admirably given by the heavier contingent, and the triumphant finale at the close was all that could be expected. In this part, too, the variations and contrasting themes were splendidly played by all. That the symphony is skilfully constructed there is no doubt, though in the main it appears not to be destined to give satisfaction to any but musical experts.

Mme Melba will be this week's soloist. The program will include Brahms' "Academic" overture, Tschaikowsky's orchestral ballad, "The Voyvode" (a posthumous work) and the "Childe Harold" symphony by Berlioz. Melba will sing an aria from Mozart's "La Clemenza di Tito" and Ophelia's mad scene from Thomas' "Hamlet."

Sunday Globe
11-29-03

——Two concerts, perhaps as interesting of their kind as any of this winter, have been given the past week at Jordan hall, one on Monday evening, the first by the newly-formed Arbos quartet, and the second on Tuesday evening by Thibaud, the young French violinist, who made his second appearance in this city. He came fresh from his successful performance given in New York by the Philharmonic society, under the baton of Edouard Colonne of Paris, and fully confirmed the impression he made the first time he played here. In the audience were noted Mr and Mrs Andrew C. Wheelwright, Mrs Philip Hale, Mr and Mrs Eliot Hubbard, Mme Marius, Mrs S. B. Field, Mr William P. Blake, Mr and Mrs Chadwick, Mrs Ticknor, Mr and Mrs Frederic W. Vinton, Mr and Mrs J. Lowell Putnam and Miss Henrietta Sargent. Mrs Putnam wore a beautiful cloak of chiffon, lace and embroidery over her gown and a brown hat done in pink roses; Miss Sargent was in black lace, with light blue cloak and black hat with plumes. She also wore a pearl necklace. As was noticed the evening before many of the ladies have adopted the custom prevailing in New York of wearing handsome dinner gowns to concerts, which relieves the monotony of the dark costumes which so many coming from out of town are obliged to wear. Among the patrons of the Arbos quartet concert Monday evening were Mr and Mrs T. Handasyd Cabot, Mrs Cabot looking very pretty in pale blue voile with sleeves and yoke or lace and wearing a necklace of superb turquoise exactly the same shade as the gown; Mr and Mrs F. L. Higginson, Mrs Higginson in white figured lace with a touch of pink at the bodice and long cloak lined with pink; Miss Juliette Higginson in light evening gown, Mr and Mrs Henry L. Higginson, Mr and Mrs S. Lothrop Thorndike, Mr Charles Gardner, Dr and Mrs Beach, Miss Estelle Kimball in white veiling, Mme Rotoli, Mr and Mrs Leverett Tuckerman, Mrs Seth Sprague, Miss Hooper, Mr and Mrs Francis H. Peabody, Mr and Mrs Lang, Mr Arthur Foote, Miss Katherine Foote in bodice of insertions of white lace, dark skirt and black plumed hat; Mr and Mrs Gericke, Mr Dana, Miss Martha Dana, Mr and Mrs Frederic Converse, Mr and Mrs Comee, Miss Elise Fay, Judge Brackett, Mrs Hugh Cotton, Mr Eben D. Jordan, Miss Jordan, Mrs William H. Sands, Miss Sands and all the members of the Kneisel quartet. Mr Bauer, who assisted, received the warmest recognition.

[50]

BOSTON SUNDAY JOURNAL—NOVEMBER 29, 1903.

NEW SYMPHONY BY DOHNANYI

It Proves Itself to Be Long, Independent and Very Agreeable.

VIOLINIST MAKES DEBUT

Mr. Birnbaum Is a New Resident Performer of More Than Ordinary Ability.

The symphony in D minor, composed by Ernst von Dohnanyi, who appeared in Boston as a pianist, producing also a concerto, quintet and other things of his own during the season of 1900, was the novelty of the sixth Symphony program, at the end of which it was placed. This symphony was written not long ago, and its first performance was at Budapesth in January last, followed in October by one at Berlin under Weingartner. Not much beyond these bare facts has been heard about it, and it was awaited with little anxious expectation—indeed, there seemed to be little curiosity in regard to it anyway. It had a fair and fine exposition; it was listened to with complimentarily close attention; it gratified at times, and left upon the whole a generally favorable impression, deepened to cordial liking at times.

Somewhat Confused.

Yet this impression was somewhat confused, and an early second hearing would be necessary to the formation of a judicial opinion. Dohnanyi, who is credited with an almost too early disposition toward composition, which was sensibly directed to such study and professional practise as should precede it, appears here to be independent, resourceful, gifted, generous and even lavish in the use of his talents and means, hurrying on at times in almost reckless fashion, as if leaving results to take care of themselves.

This symphony is long, requiring more than an hour in performance, and its five movements are arranged in an original way. It has at first an allegro non troppo in the nominal key, the strong initial theme of which has a gentler response in the major, followed by a long tranquil subject in B minor. Out of these the movement is chiefly created, with smaller matters in plenty to fill the development, which rises to a stormy climax or two before its gradual "dying fall" through a quaint and somber figure.

The second movement, which might be called either rhapsody or romance, opens with a long and deeply sentimental adagio for English horn, which reappears later, but always with warm emotional coloring, in various solo voicings, and finally ends where it began, in the English horn. There is full charm in the theme, and many brilliant coruscations flash through the development; yet the movement seems prolix.

The third movement is a scherzo, the upward rushing presto of whose announcement suggests the entrance at a rough canter of a horseman climbing an opposing acclivity. The trio in D flat, departing from the fundamental F of the movement, is dignified and churchly; yet the coda is smartened up for new gaiety by the glockenspiel, cymbals and the percussion in general. The contrast made by the trio of antipodal, yet it is so unexpected as to pique and please.

Fourth Movement.

The reasonably short fourth movement is an intermezzo in B major, built upon a lovely song by the viola, which was beautifully played. The finale, returning molto costenuto to D minor, begins sedately, heavily emphasized by the drums, and soon presents for free variation a serious theme, which is followed by another large one, which is wrought into an elaborate, bold and vehement fugue, the first chorale-like announcement, speedily turning to a thoroughly exciting climax, which reminds one of the "Racoczy" march in spirit and speed.

As may be guessed, here are subject matter and orchestral treatment for many moods and many minds. One may well question whether all these things were deliberately meant to be associated and why, or whether they were seized half at random from a full storehouse and cast together fitfully. It is plain that Dohananyi has the melodic gift. His themes are almost multitude, and for the most part they are not put out in fragmentary phrases, but in long, symmetrical themes, that give the work almost the character of a fantasia.

Decided Intention.

Their treatment shows a decided intention and a firm, resolute hand, which can also hold softly and kindly. The instrumentation is knowing and progressive, calling for ample provision (including two harps, of which only one was to be had,) and using it without reserve. Some mannerisms in color appear, such as a fondness for muted horns, for trumpet obligatos and a use of the brass and lower wood-wind in a grim and harsh way that suggests the moods of Siegfried's dragon.

There are also several queer, eerie and ghostly colorings, which seem irrelevantly laid on, that would properly tone a "danse macabre." Yet the tenderer themes are poetic and have power to charm, and the music may well be understood as coming from a Hungarian heart and head inspired by the impetuous and erratic national genius.

Besides the new music, there was to be heard a new musician, Alexander Z. Birnbaum, who joins the first violins this season. He chose Bruch's "Scotch" fantasia, which does not use its highland quotations as subjects for formal development, but rather as suggestions toward the direction and sentiment of the poetic moods he desires to invoke and to connect only indirectly with auld Scotia. He takes them for promptings, not for propositions.

New Violinist.

Although virtuosi have adopted it, it is not properly a show piece; for, although it needs a ready and complete technique, it is rather a reflective and sensitive music. Mr. Birnbaum, who had the usual stranger's reception, kindly but cool, played it sympathetically. His execution is light, clean and deft, his tone genial and warm, and his playing was thoughtful, delicate and refined, with an intimation of reserved strength against a time of need. He grew in favor as he went on, was promptly and heartily applauded after the first and third movements, and several times recalled at the end.

The only other number was Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture, which began the evening.

The next concert will be a Melba night, for that artist will sing a scene from "Hamlet" and the air (probably) from Mozart's "Clemenza di Tito," which was looked for from Mme. Gadski.

The first of the series of concerts of the Arbos Quartet last Monday in Jordan Hall was attended by a large contingent of society, and among the most prominent present one noticed Mrs. Gordon Dexter, Mr. and Mrs. B. J. Lang and Miss Margaret Lang, who inherits so much of her father's musical ability; Mr. and Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, Mrs. John L. Gardner, who had with her Mr. Zorn, the artist; Mr. and Mrs. Charles P. Curtis, Dr. and Mrs. Henry P. Bowditch, Mr. Edward Jackson, Mr. and Mrs. William Bazely, Mr. and Mrs. S. Lothrop Thorndike and many others.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST.

NOVEMBER 29, 1903

SIXTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

A New Symphony by Dohnanyi the Feature of Last Evening's Concert —Alexander Birnbaum, Violinist, Was the Soloist

The programme of the sixth Symphony concert last evening was as follows:

Overture, "Fidelio," Op. 72.....Beethoven
Scotch fantasy for violin and orchestra .....Bruch
Symphony in D minor.....Dohnanyi
Soloist, Alexander Z. Birnbaum.

The feature of this programme was the symphony by the young composer-pianist, Ernst Dohnanyi, which had its initial American performance on this occasion. Many will recall the composer, for as a pianist he played at a symphony concert here March 17, 1900. He also gave two recitals, and appeared also with the Kneisel Quartet later in that season, and made a most favorable impression. He gave recitals also in the early part of the season of 1900-01, and also played his E minor concerto at a Symphony concert Nov. 3 of that year.

The symphony heard last evening is the most ambitious of any of the works of this composer thus far. It was promised for performance some time ago, but was withdrawn for various reasons, and many believed its performance to be only a possibility of the dim future if at all. But it has become a reality, and the thing is, what can be said of it? In the first place it is like the C major symphony of Schubert, one of "heavenly length," and, unlike most symphonies, it is in five movements—allegro, adagio, scherzo, intermezzo and finale.

The first and last movements adhere somewhat to standard symphonic form, the others are free in construction, the second very much in the nature of a rhapsody.

It is impossible to adequately review upon a single hearing an extended work of this kind, as much that was obscure and unintelligible last evening would probably become clearer upon another hearing.

First impressions suggest that Mr. Dohnanyi's symphony is an uneven and erratic work, many pages of interest being followed by others of dreary monotony. The thematic material is often pleasing, the instrumentation in many ways exceedingly effective, and the scherzo is enjoyable in every way, although reminiscent in character. If the symphony was condensed, omitting much that while elaborate is wearisome, the work would compare favorably with much of the latter-day output, for it shows more than usual talent, if not positive genius, on the part of its composer. Mr. Gericke's reading was most careful and finished, and he brought out all there was in the work to the best advantage.

The other numbers of the programme do not call for extended comment. Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture made an enjoyable opening number.

Mr. Alexander Birnbaum, a new member of the orchestra, gave a pleasing performance of the Bruch fantasy, in which he showed excellent technic and a fairly good quality of tone. His intonation, however, was not always absolute, and his general interpretation was intellectual rather than temperamental. Mr. Birnbaum was much applauded and several times recalled.

Distinctly smart was the audience which assembled in Jordan Hall Monday evening, to listen to the excellent programme arranged and presented by the Arbos Quartet. A few of the many representative people present were Colonel Higginson, Mr. and Mrs. Francis H. Peabody, Miss Edith Austin, Mr. Arthur Foote and his daughter, Miss Katharine Foote, Mr. and Mrs. Wilhelm Gericke, Miss Estelle Kimball, Miss Marion Richardson, Mrs. John B. Osborn, Mrs. S. B. Field, Mr. George Chadwick, Mr. Eben D. Jordan, who had with him his daughter, Miss Dorothy Jordan, Dr. and Mrs. Hall and numerous others.

SUNDAY HERALD—BOSTON, NOVEMBER 29, 1903.

SIXTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A New Symphony in D Minor by Dohnanyi Is Played.

Its First Performance in United States and It Was First Given in Budapest Last January — Has Length Rather Than Breadth—Mr. Birnbaum Soloist.

The programme of the sixth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony Hall last night, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Overture to "Fidelio".....Beethoven
Fantasia on Scottish airs for violin.....Bruch
Symphony in D minor.....Dohnanyi
(First time in this country.)

Dohnanyi's Symphony in D minor was not his first. When he was 19 years old—he was born in 1877—he wrote a symphony in F which took a prize offered by the "King of Hungary" for the best work by Hungarian composers. This symphony was performed at Budapest, but we know of no other performance. The Symphony in D minor was performed for the first time at Budapest on Jan. 7, 1903, and since then it has been played at Vienna and Berlin.

The composer has been eminently serious from his youth up. His father, a professor of mathematics and physics at Pressburg, found amusement in playing the 'cello, an instrument favored by many physicians, possibly because, as Walt Whitman said: "It is the voice of the young man's complaint." The father was unwilling to exploit the boy, who, they say, "showed unmistakable musical instincts before he was 3 years old," but it is well to remember that there are legends as well as vampires in Hungary. The boy began to compose, at least to scrawl notes on music paper, when he was 7 years old, and a little later he wrote pieces for violin and piano, which were correct in harmony and form; so says the passionate biographer. When Ernst was 12 years old he wrote 'cello sonatas, string quartets and other chamber music, and when he was 13 he played a piano quartet by Brahms in public, which Messrs. Runciman and Blackburn would characterize as a depraved proceeding.

Ernst became an ardent admirer of Brahms and went to work to write a Brahmsian piano quartet and string sextet. And then his father thought the boy should enter the university and study philosophy—so that he might enter more fully into the spirit of Brahms. The boy, like Hercules, was wooed then by Virtue and Vice; he decided to be a musician; he left the University of Budapest to study the more zealously composition under one Hans Koessler, who is known in Boston as the composer of a singularly lugubrious, pedantic and dull set of "Symphonic Variations," in memory of Johannes Brahms (played here in 1902), variations which were intended to portray Brahms mentally, physically, and socially. And at last Brahms himself became interested in Dohnanyi.

Dohnanyi has visited Boston as a pianist and a composer, and he was then eminently serious, a pianist to be respected even when his playing was massive and concrete rather than sympathetic and emotional.

It will thus be seen that heredity, nationality, early surroundings and the influence of Brahms have all entered into the mind of this composer, and the symphony in D minor may perhaps be the more easily explained. The work is a curious mixture of severe thought and of vague wandering; of precise and carefully considered expression and of rhapsodic utterance; of the dryness of one delighting in squares, cubes, powers and logarithms, and of the quasi-barbaric joy in striking rhythm, jingle and color.

Like an election torch-procession, the symphony is a good hour in passing a certain point. It is long and thick rather than broad and deep.

The themes for the most part are not distinguished, and the chief interest is in the contrapuntal treatment and in the grouping of tonal masses. It is only fair to add that the themes are not always favorably announced. Take the song theme, for instance, of the first movement: on its first appearance it is almost smothered by the drab orchestration; there is no contrast, there is no background; the whole is a blur. Yet this theme when it appears afterward has a certain suavity and grace, although it is neither individual nor striking.

The second movement is largely rhapsodic, yet here the composer is not wholly successful in establishing the appropriate mood. He at times appears as though he were a denationalized Hungarian trying to escape from the old traditions and yet irresistibly drawn back to them. There are frequent hints at melodic and rhythmic desire for the fatherland; there are the cadenzas that would fain remind the hearer of the Zimbalon, but the movement, in spite of occasionally free episodes, gives one the feeling of the composer's self-imposed restraint, of a substitution of that which has been inculcated and acquired for that which was natural and spontaneous.

But it is not necessary to speak of each movement—and there are five of them. It may be said that the scherzo in spite of its glitter and jingle is barren of ideas, and any young composer who for the finale of such a long work chooses the form of theme and variations and fugue surely can have no sense of humor. And so we come back to the original proposition: Mr. Dohnanyi is an eminently serious person. He has studied, he has mastered many things in his calling as a composer; he is unacquainted with the value of reserve, of reticence. He has so much to say, and yet so much is hardly worth saying, and so much of this is said pontifically. It would be vain to deny the charm of a little oasis here and there, just as it would be absurd to deny the mechanical talent of the composer. But there is no lofty flight of imagination, there is no continuous line of beauty, there are no great native moments. The emotional quality is slight, and the austerity is dry, not noble. The passion is that of the pedagogue who is excited in the solving of a problem. A crude and even coarse burst of genuine feeling would be welcome as a present delight and a promise for the future.

Mr. Alexander Z. Birnbaum, a new violinist of the orchestra, made his first appearance as a soloist in this country. Mr. Birnbaum was born in the fair land of Poland, which, as Thaddeus in Balfe's opera assures us, was once "ploughed by the hoof of the ruthless invader with might." The seed then sown produced a crop of violinists and pianists. But Mr. Birnbaum has not the qualities we associate with a Polish or a Russian virtuoso. He played Bruch's fantasia on Scottish airs, which is always interesting, for it affords an opportunity of guessing at the names of the tunes which Bruch has twisted for his purpose. Yet this same piece also gives opportunity for a display of the virtuoso's art. The performance of Mr. Birnbaum cannot be highly praised; indeed it was generally mediocre and occasionally worse than that. His tone was thin, and, without any discussion of his mechanism, it may be said that his interpretation had little diversity of expression and was too often spineless. He was heartily applauded.

The overture to "Fidelio" was finely played, and Mr. Gericke took infinite pains with the performance of the symphony.

In spite of its being the day after Thanksgiving, and the fact that there were several other counter attractions for that afternoon, at the Symphony rehearsal, Friday, no vacant seats were noticeable. Mr. Birnbaum, one of the new members of the orchestra, was the soloist. He is a medium-sized man with a quantity of light brownish hair worn in the true artistic disorder. His playing was very well received. A few of the many noted there were: Mrs. Charles Fry, Mrs. George B. Shattuck and her daughter Mrs. F. L. Higginson, Mrs. Oliver Ames, Mrs. Neal Rantoul, with her little daughter and her sister Miss Rosamond Saltonstall, Mrs. Arthur Blake and her two daughters Miss Beatrice Blake and Mrs. Frederick Richardson, Mrs. Francis Peabody, Jr., and Miss Rosamond Peabody, Mrs. H. H. Fay, Mrs. J. L. Thorndike, Mr. and Mrs. Albert F. Bigelow, Mrs. DeFord Bigelow, Mr. and Mrs. Henry S. Grew, Mrs. Hall Curtis, Mrs. Eben Draper, Mrs. Matthew Luce, Sr., Mrs. T. C. Thacher, Miss Elfrida Roosevelt, with Miss Elizabeth Shattuck, Miss Priscilla Stackpole and Miss Dorothy Jordan, two debutantes, Miss Edith Stockpole, Miss Katherine Fay, Mrs. J. W. Kenney and Miss Kenney, Miss Dorothea Bigelow with Miss Margaret Manning, Miss Annie Manning, Miss Mea Bowditch, Miss Margaret Codman, Mrs. John Lowell, Jr., Miss Juliet and Miss Barbara Higginson, Miss Mabel Warren, Miss Gretchen Hawes, Mrs. C. P. Kittredge and Miss Cornelia Kittredge, Miss Susan Amory, Miss Alice Stackpole, Miss Anna Berry, Mrs. Walter B. Swan, Miss Mary Russell, Mrs. John B. Osborn, Mrs. F. B. Carpenter, Miss Estelle Kimball, Miss Madeleine Davis, Miss Ellen Parks, Miss Audrey Stanwood, and Mrs. Julian de Cordova. Mme. Melba will be the soloist this week, and that means a crush.

The first of the series of Arbos Quartet concerts at Jordan Hall Monday night was naturally a notable occasion. There was enthusiasm, excitement and magnetism in the crowded house of Boston's best, much applause after each movement and closest attention during the playing. In the trio, which was one of the gems of the evening, played by Messrs. Bauer, Arbos and Krasselt, the exclusive audience forgot itself enough to burst out into applause in the middle of the movement.

Some of the many whom we noted there were Mr. and Mrs. H. L. Higginson, Mr. and Mrs. Leverett Saltonstall, Mrs. Henry M. Whitney and Miss Whitney, Mr. and Mrs. Francis H. Peabody, Mr. and Mrs. Gericke, Mr. William P. Blake and Miss Blake, Mr. Loeffler, Mr. and Mrs. Kneisel, Mr. Lothrop Thorndike, Mr. Eben D. Jordan and Miss Dorothy Jordan, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Foote, and Miss Katherine Foote, Mr. Max Zach, Mr. George W. Chadwick, Mr. and Mrs. Robert M. Morse, Mrs. Seth Sprague, Miss Mary Hooper, Mr. and Mrs. Henry A. Clapp, Mr. Charles E. Sampson, Mr. Svecenski, Mrs. N. Hugh Cotton, Mr. and Mrs. F. G. Macomber, Mr. Parkman Blake, Miss Estelle Kimball, Mrs. Philip Hale, Mrs. Walter Fitz, Mr. William G. Tucker, Mrs. S. B. Field, Mr. Schroeder, Mr. and Mrs. Longy, Mr. Henry Mason, Mr. Giraudet, Mrs. John B. Osborn, Miss Helen Ranney, Mrs. A. H. Latham, Mrs. H. P. Adams, Miss Adelaide Bigelow, Miss Adele Thayer, Dr. and Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Wheelwright, Mr. Maurice Parker and Mr. Julian de Cordova. The next concert will take place on Monday, Dec. 21.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven—Overture to "Fidelio."
Bruch—Scottish Fantasie for Violin and Orchestra. Mr. Alexander Z. Birnbaum, Soloist.
Dohnanyi—Symphony in D minor. (First time in America.)

The "Fidelio" overture, which is one of the weaker of the four overtures attached to Beethoven's single opera, received an excellent interpretation, clear and well-balanced from the first phrase to the last. Is there nothing newer in the way of overtures, waiting for an audition at these concerts?

The interest of the concert began with the debut of Mr. Birnbaum, one of the new members of our orchestra. Bruch's Scottish Fantasie is an interesting work; it grows stronger with repeated hearing. The German composers have always exhibited a fondness for Scottish melodies, as witness Schumann's settings of Burns' poems, Franz's use of the same material, Beethoven's arrangements and harmonizations of Scotch folk-songs, etc., etc. But only two Teutons have become in any degree Scottish under the spell of Gaelic music; Mendelssohn first and foremost,—and Bruch a long way after. Bruch once told the present writer that he was acquainted with fully 400 Scottish folk-songs and could play most of them by heart.

This fantasy is not Bruch's only excursion into this field. He has written a cantata,—"The Fiery Cross"—on a Walter Scott subject, and he gave some beautiful and very un-Gaelic treatment of the "Campbells Are Comin'" in his dramatic cantata, "Fair Ellen."

The material in this Fantasy is drawn from three Scots' melodies and they are given with many variations and with all possible violin virtuosity. They are not disguised beyond recognition and "Scots wha Hae" is worked up to masterly climax, but greater simplicity would have done more justice to the beauty of the most wonderful folk-music on earth. In the Scherzo Bruch caught something of the Scottish lilt, even if he could not build as perfect a Scottish theme as Mendelssohn achieved in the Scherzo of his A minor symphony; but no German can ever hope to equal that.

Mr. Birnbaum was nervous. At first this showed itself in a light, spasmodic tone and in aberrations of pitch. But he grew steadily better as the work went on, and he displayed such skill in double-stopping, in harmonics, and in runs and skips, that we are sure of his being a great addition to our orchestral ranks. He was recalled again and again, and his brilliant work deserved the tribute, in spite of the few shortcomings of the earlier parts of the performance.

Dohnanyi's new symphony equals Beethoven's ninth,—in length. It is however not its equal in sustained breadth. It is intensely modern and attempts every tone-color known to man. It is complex in rhythms as well as in scoring. Its first movement has many groans of despair and its use of kettledrums and contrabass pizzicati, as well as its death-suggesting coda, reminds very strongly of the great Symphony Pathetique.

A young composer is always bound to sing of the charnel-house; it is only your gray-beard who sings glad strains nowadays.

The second movement gave great display of wind instruments, and the English horn was beautifully played, as also was the bass-clarinette. The French horn gave forth some muted tones that were the most dismal sounds imaginable,—which was what the composer intended them to be. In this movement almost everything was ejaculatory and spasmodic. It is another failing of the modern symphonist to mix up his tempi and thus illustrate in a double sense Shakespeare's line,

"The times are out of joint!"

The outward procession of the audience began here. But the work grew stronger as it went on. The Scherzo (of course it was not playful) was a striking piece of tone-color and worked up to a noble climax. The intermezzo brought forth an expressive viola solo followed by one on the violin, both perfectly played. But we shall have an infinitely better viola obligata, next Saturday, when the "Childe Harold" symphony is to be given.

The finale was very striking, even upon the kettledrums. It reproduced thoughts from preceding movements, a proceeding sanctioned by Beethoven and perfected by Brahms in his C minor symphony. There was a remarkable fugue in the finale. Most composers content themselves with a fugato, a fugal exposition alone, but not so our young Hungarian; he works out his subject and countersubject ("ganz regelrecht") and seems loth to leave his contrapuntal development.

A young man who has such skill in orchestration, such contrapuntal knowledge, such general power, may yet grow very great. At present one must say that the numerous ideas presented are not well digested or assimilated; the material is there, but it is not yet brought into unity or homogeneity. Nevertheless this is not a symphony to fall asleep over. It presents too much of originality and too many strong ideas, not to speak of the numerous heavy explosions that interrupt tranquil slumber.

Louis C. Elson.

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

At the sixth symphony concert, Mr. Alexander B. Birnbaum, a new violinist of the orchestra, was the soloist, and this was the programme:

Beethoven: Overture to "Fidelio," op. 72.
Bruch: Fantasia on Scottish Folk Melodies for Violin, op. 46.
Dohnanyi: Symphony in D minor.

Two features of this concert gave food for thought. First, one may speak of the appearance of Mr. Birnbaum as a solo-player. Unquestionably a capable musician, and doubtless a valuable acquisition to our ranks of orchestral players, Mr. Birnbaum, none the less, did not, on Saturday night, offer a performance at all up to the standard of violin playing we have got accustomed to expect here. Had Mr. Birnbaum brought forward a new composition of consequence, his appearance would have been more welcome, for the list of worthy concert-pieces for violin and orchestra is, unfortunately, short. Or a scarcity of good violinists in the country at present would the more easily explain Mr. Birnbaum's invitation to play a solo at a symphony concert. On the contrary, however, there is at least one member of the orchestra who has never been given an opportunity here to play a concerto, although his appearances in smaller concerts have aroused great enthusiasm. There are, furthermore, two violinists of great renown now making concert-tours about the country, who have not been engaged to play with the orchestra here: Miss Maud Powell and Mr. Jacques Thibaud. In their place, we hear a young violinist who plays with indifferent skill a well-worn work which has, in past years, been admirably performed here several times, and one or two other young artists, of no great fame, who have already appeared at these concerts on quite as many occasions as their reputations would seem to make necessary. In justice to Mr. Birnbaum, by the way, it must be recorded that he received very hearty applause.

Cause for perplexity was also afforded by the production of a very long symphony, in five movements, by Ernst von Dohnanyi. This young composer, still only twenty-six years old, has enjoyed a long and thorough training of his really great musical talent. In addition to learning to play the pianoforte so well that he has made successful concert tours all over Europe and America, he has acquired the ability to toss off counterpoint fluently, also to write with skill for orchestra. And yet, although his works have won prizes in competitions and have aroused the interest of no less a personage than Brahms, there seems no adequate reason why a five-movement symphony by this clever young man should be produced in Boston. That very lengthy composition, the symphony in D minor, shows great talent for a young writer, being fertile in ideas, intelligently written, and clothed in more or less brilliant orchestral dress; many of its themes, indeed, are charming, all five parts have pleasant intervals, and there is an imposing ending. On the whole, though, the symphony is vague and wandering, written without a clearly seen and strictly adhered to plan; it is also lacking in originality. At best it is the effort of a talent that some day may well accomplish something great.

In the meantime, however, till Mr. Dohnanyi has developed into a composer of genuine power, why not trust the encouragement of his growing genius to his compatriots the Hungarians and the Austrians, we turning our attention the while to the works of our native composers? Although we may not have among us geniuses of the order of Richard Strauss and Vincent d'Indy, we have yet a goodly number of composers of genuine ability. Right here in Boston there are Mr. Atherton, Mr. Hill, Mr. Gebhard, Miss Lang, Mr. Converse, Mr. Foote, Mr. Chadwick; and this list is not complete. Abroad there are Mr. Hadley, Mr. Parker, Mr. Van Der Stucken and Mr. MacDowell, to mention only a few. Surely all these musicians have orchestral works ready for performance, or, at any rate, would be glad to make them ready if a likelihood of production offered itself. It may well be many years yet before an American composer produces a work fit to be compared with the "Heidenleben," but, at the least of it, many Americans today could do some hundred per cent better than Mr. Dohnanyi has done with his D minor symphony. The performance of their compositions, while making our concerts no less pleasant than they are now, would provide a valuable stimulus to the development of orchestral music by Americans.

The playing on Saturday was of a very high order, the overture to "Fidelio" going especially brilliantly. This will be the programme at the next concert, when Mme. Melba is to sing: Academic overture, Brahms; aria from "La Clemenza di Tito," Mozart; ballade symphonique pour orchestre, "Le Voyvode," Tschaikowski (first time); scena and aria from "Hamlet," A. Thomas; symphony, "Harold in Italy," Berlioz.

R. R. G.

BOSTON HERALD-DECEMBER 1, 1903.

SYMPHONY WILL GO ON.

Another Place Secured for Its Concert of Dec. 11, and It Will Take Place.

Assistant Manager Frederic R. Comee of the Boston Symphony orchestra said last night that the burning of the Academy of Music in Brooklyn yesterday morning would not compel the orchestra to cancel its engagement in Brooklyn Friday, Dec. 11. The concert will take place in some other hall. The Brooklyn Institute, under the management of which the concerts are given each year in Brooklyn, has the refusal of the Baptist Temple, and has wired Mr. Comee to that effect. The orchestra will give concerts in Philadelphia on Monday and Wednesday of next week, in Baltimore Tuesday and in New York Thursday.

[52]

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Sixth Concert—Review by Philip Hale in the Boston Herald.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 2, 1903.

THE program of the sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Symphony Hall last night, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Overture to Fidelio.....Beethoven
Fantasia on Scottish Airs for violin.....Bruch
Symphony in D minor.....Dohnanyi
(First time in this country.)

Dohnanyi's Symphony in D minor was not his first. When he was nineteen years old—he was born in 1877—he wrote a symphony in F which took a prize offered by the King of Hungary for the best work by Hungarian composers. This symphony was performed at Budapest, but we know of no other performance. The Symphony in D minor was performed for the first time at Budapest on January 7, 1903, and since then it has been played at Vienna and Berlin.

The composer has been eminently serious from his youth up. His father, a professor of mathematics and physics at Pressburg, found amusement in playing the 'cello, an instrument favored by many physicians, possibly because, as Walt Whitman said: "It is the voice of the young man's complaint." The father was unwilling to exploit the boy, who, they say, "showed unmistakable musical instincts before he was three years old," but it is well to remember that there are legends as well as vampires in Hungary. The boy began to compose, at least to scrawl notes on music paper, when he was seven years old, and a little later he wrote pieces for violin and piano, which were correct in harmony and form; so says the passionate biographer. When Ernst was twelve years old he wrote 'cello sonatas, string quartets and other chamber music, and when he was thirteen he played a piano quartet by Brahms in public, which Messrs. Runciman and Blackburn would characterize as a depraved proceeding.

Ernst became an ardent admirer of Brahms and went to work to write a Brahmsian piano quartet and string sextet. And then his father thought the boy should enter the university and study philosophy—so that he might enter more fully into the spirit of Brahms. The boy, like Hercules, was wooed then by virtue and vice; he decided to be a musician; he left the University of Budapest to study the more zealously composition under one Hans Koessler, who is known in Boston as the composer of a singularly lugubrious, pedantic and dull set of "Symphonic Variations," in memory of Johannes Brahms (played here in 1902), variations which were intended to portray Brahms mentally, physically and socially. And at last Brahms himself became interested in Dohnanyi.

Dohnanyi has visited Boston as a pianist and a composer, and he was then eminently serious, a pianist to be respected even when his playing was massive and concrete rather than sympathetic and emotional.

It will thus be seen that heredity, nationality, early surroundings and the influence of Brahms have all entered into the mind of this composer, and the Symphony in D minor may perhaps be the more easily explained. The work is a curious mixture of severe thought and of vague wandering; of precise and carefully considered expression and of rhapsodic utterance; of the dryness of one delighting in squares, cubes, powers and logarithms, and of the quasi barbaric joy in striking rhythm, jingle and color.

Like an election torch procession, the symphony is a good hour in passing a certain point. It is long and thick rather than broad and deep.

The themes for the most part are not distinguished, and the chief interest is in the contrapuntal treatment and in the grouping of tonal masses. It is only fair to add that the themes are not always favorably announced. Take the song theme, for instance, of the first movement; on its first appearance it is almost smothered by the drab orchestration; there is no contrast, there is no background; the whole is a blur. Yet this theme when it appears afterward has a certain suavity and grace, although it is neither individual nor striking.

The second movement is largely rhapsodic, yet here the composer is not wholly successful in establishing the appropriate mood. He at times appears as though he were a denationalized Hungarian trying to escape from the old traditions, and yet irresistibly drawn back to them. There are frequent hints at melodic and rhythmic desire for the fatherland; there are the cadenzas that would fain remind the hearer of the Zimbalon, but the movement, in spite of occasionally free episodes, gives one the feeling of the composer's self imposed restraint, of a substitution of that which has been inculcated and acquired for that which was natural and spontaneous.

But it is not necessary to speak of each movement—and there are five of them. It may be said that the Scherzo, in spite of its glitter and jingle, is barren of ideas, and any young composer who for the finale of such a long work chooses the form of theme and variations and fugue surely can have no sense of humor. And so we come back to the original proposition: Mr. Dohnanyi is an eminently serious person. He has studied, he has mastered many things in his calling as a composer; he is unacquainted with the value of reserve, of reticence. He has so much to say, and yet so much is hardly worth saying, and so much of this is said pontifically. It would be vain to deny the charm of a little oasis here and there, just as it would be absurd to deny the mechanical talent of the composer. But there is no lofty flight of imagination, there is no continuous line of beauty, there are no great native moments. The emotional quality is slight, and the austerity is dry, not noble. The passion is that of the pedagogue who is excited in the solving of a problem. A crude and even coarse burst of genuine feeling would be welcome as a present delight and a promise for the future.

Alexander Z. Birnbaum, a new violinist of the orchestra, made his first appearance as a soloist in this country. Mr. Birnbaum was born in the fair land of Poland, which, as Thaddeus in Balfe's opera assures us, was once "ploughed by the hoof of the ruthless invader with might." The seed then sown produced a crop of violinists and pianists. But Mr. Birnbaum has not the qualities we associate with a Polish or a Russian virtuoso. He played Bruch's Fantasia on Scotch Airs, which is always interesting, for it affords an opportunity of guessing at the names of the tunes which Bruch has twisted for his purpose. Yet this same piece also gives opportunity for a display of the virtuoso's art. The performance of Mr. Birnbaum cannot be highly praised; indeed, it was generally mediocre and occasionally worse than that. His tone was thin, and, without any discussion of his mechanism, it may be said that his interpretation had little diversity of expression and was too often spineless. He was heartily applauded.

The overture to "Fidelio" was finely played, and Mr. Gericke took infinite pains with the performance of the symphony.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Sixth Concert—Review by Philip Hale in the Boston Herald.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 2, 1903.

THE program of the sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Symphony Hall last night, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Overture to Fidelio.....Beethoven
Fantasia on Scottish Airs for violin.....Bruch
Symphony in D minor.....Dohnanyi
(First time in this country.)

Dohnanyi's Symphony in D minor was not his first. When he was nineteen years old—he was born in 1877—he wrote a symphony in F which took a prize offered by the King of Hungary for the best work by Hungarian composers. This symphony was performed at Budapest, but we know of no other performance. The Symphony in D minor was performed for the first time at Budapest on January 7, 1903, and since then it has been played at Vienna and Berlin.

The composer has been eminently serious from his youth up. His father, a professor of mathematics and physics at Pressburg, found amusement in playing the 'cello, an instrument favored by many physicians, possibly because, as Walt Whitman said: "It is the voice of the young man's complaint." The father was unwilling to exploit the boy, who, they say, "showed unmistakable musical instincts before he was three years old," but it is well to remember that there are legends as well as vampires in Hungary. The boy began to compose, at least to scrawl notes on music paper, when he was seven years old, and a little later he wrote pieces for violin and piano, which were correct in harmony and form; so says the passionate biographer. When Ernst was twelve years old he wrote 'cello sonatas, string quartets and other chamber music, and when he was thirteen he played a piano quartet by Brahms in public, which Messrs. Runciman and Blackburn would characterize as a depraved proceeding.

Ernst became an ardent admirer of Brahms and went to work to write a Brahmsian piano quartet and string sextet. And then his father thought the boy should enter the university and study philosophy—so that he might enter more fully into the spirit of Brahms. The boy, like Hercules, was wooed then by virtue and vice; he decided to be a musician; he left the University of Budapest to study the more zealously composition under one Hans Koessler, who is known in Boston as the composer of a singularly lugubrious, pedantic and dull set of "Symphonic Variations," in memory of Johannes Brahms (played here in 1902), variations which were intended to portray Brahms mentally, physically and socially. And at last Brahms himself became interested in Dohnanyi.

Dohnanyi has visited Boston as a pianist and a composer, and he was then eminently serious, a pianist to be respected even when his playing was massive and concrete rather than sympathetic and emotional.

It will thus be seen that heredity, nationality, early surroundings and the influence of Brahms have all entered into the mind of this composer, and the Symphony in D minor may perhaps be the more easily explained. The work is a curious mixture of severe thought and of vague wandering; of precise and carefully considered expression and of rhapsodic utterance; of the dryness of one delighting in squares, cubes, powers and logarithms, and of the quasi barbaric joy in striking rhythm, jingle and color.

Like an election torch procession, the symphony is a good hour in passing a certain point. It is long and thick rather than broad and deep.

The themes for the most part are not distinguished, and the chief interest is in the contrapuntal treatment and in the grouping of tonal masses. It is only fair to add that the themes are not always favorably announced. Take the song theme, for instance, of the first movement; on its first appearance it is almost smothered by the drab orchestration; there is no contrast, there is no background; the whole is a blur. Yet this theme when it appears afterward has a certain suavity and grace, although it is neither individual nor striking.

The second movement is largely rhapsodic, yet here the composer is not wholly successful in establishing the appropriate mood. He at times appears as though he were a denationalized Hungarian trying to escape from the old traditions, and yet irresistibly drawn back to them. There are frequent hints at melodic and rhythmic desire for the fatherland; there are the cadenzas that would fain remind the hearer of the Zimbalon, but the movement, in spite of occasionally free episodes, gives one the feeling of the composer's self imposed restraint, of a substitution of that which has been inculcated and acquired for that which was natural and spontaneous.

But it is not necessary to speak of each movement—and there are five of them. It may be said that the Scherzo, in spite of its glitter and jingle, is barren of ideas, and any young composer who for the finale of such a long work chooses the form of theme and variations and fugue surely can have no sense of humor. And so we come back to the original proposition: Mr. Dohnanyi is an eminently serious person. He has studied, he has mastered many things in his calling as a composer; he is unacquainted with the value of reserve, of reticence. He has so much to say, and yet so much is hardly worth saying, and so much of this is said pontifically. It would be vain to deny the charm of a little oasis here and there, just as it would be absurd to deny the mechanical talent of the composer. But there is no lofty flight of imagination, there is no continuous line of beauty, there are no great native moments. The emotional quality is slight, and the austerity is dry, not noble. The passion is that of the pedagogue who is excited in the solving of a problem. A crude and even coarse burst of genuine feeling would be welcome as a present delight and a promise for the future.

Alexander Z. Birnbaum, a new violinist of the orchestra, made his first appearance as a soloist in this country. Mr. Birnbaum was born in the fair land of Poland, which, as Thaddeus in Balfe's opera assures us, was once "ploughed by the hoof of the ruthless invader with might." The seed then sown produced a crop of violinists and pianists. But Mr. Birnbaum has not the qualities we associate with a Polish or a Russian virtuoso. He played Bruch's Fantasia on Scotch Airs, which is always interesting, for it affords an opportunity of guessing at the names of the tunes which Bruch has twisted for his purpose. Yet this same piece also gives opportunity for a display of the virtuoso's art. The performance of Mr. Birnbaum cannot be highly praised; indeed, it was generally mediocre and occasionally worse than that. His tone was thin, and, without any discussion of his mechanism, it may be said that his interpretation had little diversity of expression and was too often spineless. He was heartily applauded.

The overture to "Fidelio" was finely played, and Mr. Gericke took infinite pains with the performance of the symphony.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER,

NOVEMBER 30, 1903

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven—Overture to "Fidelio."
Bruch—Scottish Fantasie for Violin and Orchestra. Mr. Alexander Z. Birnbaum, Soloist.
Dohnanyi—Symphony in D minor. (First time in America.)

The "Fidelio" overture, which is one of the weaker of the four overtures attached to Beethoven's single opera, received an excellent interpretation, clear and well-balanced from the first phrase to the last. Is there nothing newer in the way of overtures, waiting for an audition at these concerts?

The interest of the concert began with the debut of Mr. Birnbaum, one of the new members of our orchestra. Bruch's Scottish Fantasie is an interesting work; it grows stronger with repeated hearing. The German composers have always exhibited a fondness for Scottish melodies, as witness Schumann's settings of Burns' poems, Franz's use of the same material, Beethoven's arrangements and harmonizations of Scotch folk-songs, etc., etc. But only two Teutons have become in any degree Scottish under the spell of Gaelic music; Mendelssohn first and foremost,—and Bruch a long way after. Bruch once told the present writer that he was acquainted with fully 400 Scottish folk-songs and could play most of them by heart.

This fantasy is not Bruch's only excursion into this field. He has written a cantata,—"The Fiery Cross"—on a Walter Scott subject, and he gave some beautiful and very un-Gaelic treatment of the "Campbells Are Comin'" in his dramatic cantata, "Fair Ellen."

The material in this Fantasy is drawn from three Scots' melodies and they are given with many variations and with all possible violin virtuosity. They are not disguised beyond recognition and "Scots wha Hae" is worked up to masterly climax, but greater simplicity would have done more justice to the beauty of the most wonderful folk-music on earth. In the Scherzo Bruch caught something of the Scottish lilt, even if he could not build as perfect a Scottish theme as Mendelssohn achieved in the Scherzo of his A minor symphony; but no German can ever hope to equal that.

Mr. Birnbaum was nerveus. At first this showed itself in a light, spasmodic tone and in aberrations of pitch. But he grew steadily better as the work went on, and he displayed such skill in double-stopping, in harmonics, and in runs and skips, that we are sure of his being a great addition to our orchestral ranks. He was recalled again and again, and his brilliant work deserved the tribute, in spite of the few shortcomings of the earlier parts of the performance.

Dohnanyi's new symphony equals Beethoven's ninth,—in length. It is however not its equal in sustained breadth. It is intensely modern and attempts every tone-color known to man. It is complex in rhythms as well as in scoring. Its first movement has many groans of despair and its use of kettledrums and contrabass pizzicati, as well as its death-suggesting coda, reminds very strongly of the great Symphony Pathetique.

A young composer is always bound to sing of the charnel-house; it is only your gray-beard who sings glad strains nowadays.

The second movement gave great display of wind instruments, and the English horn was beautifully played, as also was the bass-clarinette. The French horn gave forth some muted tones that were the most dismal sounds imaginable,—which was what the composer intended them to be. In this movement almost everything was ejaculatory and spasmodic. It is another failing of the modern symphonist to mix up his tempi and thus illustrate in a double sense Shakespeare's line,

"The times are out of joint!"

The outward procession of the audience began here. But the work grew stronger as it went on. The Scherzo (of course it was not playful) was a striking piece of tone-color and worked up to a noble climax. The intermezzo brought forth an expressive viola solo followed by one on the violin, both perfectly played. But we shall have an infinitely better viola obligata, next Saturday, when the "Childe Harold" symphony is to be given.

The finale was very striking, even upon the kettledrums. It reproduced thoughts from preceding movements, a proceeding sanctioned by Beethoven and perfected by Brahms in his C minor symphony. There was a remarkable fugue in the finale. Most composers content themselves with a fugato, a fugal exposition alone, but not so our young Hungarian; he works out his subject and countersubject ("ganz regelrecht") and seems loth to leave his contrapuntal development.

A young man who has such skill in orchestration, such contrapuntal knowledge, such general power, may yet grow very great. At present one must say that the numerous ideas presented are not well digested or assimilated; the material is there, but it is not yet brought into unity or homogeneity. Nevertheless this is not a symphony to fall asleep over. It presents too much of originality and too many strong ideas, not to speak of the numerous heavy explosions that interrupt tranquil slumber.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Evening [illegible]

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1903

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

At the sixth symphony concert, Mr. Alexander B. Birnbaum, a new violinist of the orchestra, was the soloist, and this was the programme:

Beethoven: Overture to "Fidelio," op. 72.
Bruch: Fantasia on Scottish Folk Melodies for Violin, op. 46.
Dohnanyi: Symphony in D minor.

Two features of this concert gave food for thought. First, one may speak of the appearance of Mr. Birnbaum as a solo-player. Unquestionably a capable musician, and doubtless a valuable acquisition to our ranks of orchestral players, Mr. Birnbaum, none the less, did not, on Saturday night, offer a performance at all up to the standard of violin playing we have got accustomed to expect here. Had Mr. Birnbaum brought forward a new composition of consequence, his appearance would have been more welcome, for the list of worthy concert-pieces for violin and orchestra is, unfortunately, short. Or a scarcity of good violinists in the country at present would the more easily explain Mr. Birnbaum's invitation to play a solo at a symphony concert. On the contrary, however, there is at least one member of the orchestra who has never been given an opportunity here to play a concerto, although his appearances in smaller concerts have aroused great enthusiasm. There are, furthermore, two violinists of great renown now making concert-tours about the country, who have not been engaged to play with the orchestra here: Miss Maud Powell and Mr. Jacques Thibaud. In their place, we hear a young violinist who plays with indifferent skill a well-worn work which has, in past years, been admirably performed here several times, and one or two other young artists, of no great fame, who have already appeared at these concerts on quite as many occasions as their reputations would seem to make necessary. In justice to Mr. Birnbaum, by the way, it must be recorded that he received very hearty applause.

Cause for perplexity was also afforded by the production of a very long symphony, in five movements, by Ernst von Dohnanyi. This young composer, still only twenty-six years old, has enjoyed a long and thorough training of his really great musical talent. In addition to learning to play the pianoforte so well that he has made successful concert tours all over Europe and America, he has acquired the ability to toss off counterpoint fluently, also to write with skill for orchestra. And yet, although his works have won prizes in competitions and have aroused the interest of no less a personage than Brahms, there seems no adequate reason why a five-movement symphony by this clever young man should be produced in Boston. That very lengthy composition, the symphony in D minor, shows great talent for a young writer, being fertile in ideas, intelligently written, and clothed in more or less brilliant orchestral dress; many of its themes, indeed, are charming, all five parts have pleasant intervals, and there is an imposing ending. On the whole, though, the symphony is vague and wandering, written without a clearly seen and strictly adhered to plan; it is also lacking in originality. At best it is the effort of a talent that some day may well accomplish something great.

In the meantime, however, till Mr. Dohnanyi has developed into a composer of genuine power, why not trust the encouragement of his growing genius to his compatriots the Hungarians and the Austrians, we turning our attention the while to the works of our native composers? Although we may not have among us geniuses of the order of Richard Strauss and Vincent d'Indy, we have yet a goodly number of composers of genuine ability. Right here in Boston there are Mr. Atherton, Mr. Hill, Mr. Gebhard, Miss Lang, Mr. Converse, Mr. Foote, Mr. Chadwick; and this list is not complete. Abroad there are Mr. Hadley, Mr. Parker, Mr. Van Der Stucken and Mr. MacDowell, to mention only a few. Surely all these musicians have orchestral works ready for performance, or, at any rate, would be glad to make them ready if a likelihood of production offered itself. It may well be many years yet before an American composer produces a work fit to be compared with the "Heldenleben," but, at the least of it, many Americans today could do some hundred per cent better than Mr. Dohnanyi has done with his D minor symphony. The performance of their compositions, while making our concerts no less pleasant than they are now, would provide a valuable stimulus to the development of orchestral music by Americans.

The playing on Saturday was of a very high order, the overture to "Fidelio" going especially brilliantly. This will be the programme at the next concert, when Mme. Melba is to sing: Academic overture, Brahms; aria from "La Clemenza di Tito," Mozart; ballade symphonique pour orchestre, "Le Voyvode," Tschaikowski (first time); scena and aria from "Hamlet," A. Thomas; symphony, "Harold in Italy," Berlioz.

R. R. G.

BOSTON HERALD-DECEMBER 1, 1903.

SYMPHONY WILL GO ON.

Another Place Secured for Its Concert of Dec. 11, and It Will Take Place.

Assistant Manager Frederic R. Comee of the Boston Symphony orchestra said last night that the burning of the Academy of Music in Brooklyn yesterday morning would not compel the orchestra to cancel its engagement in Brooklyn Friday, Dec. 11. The concert will take place in some other hall. The Brooklyn Institute, under the management of which the concerts are given each year in Brooklyn, has the refusal of the Baptist Temple, and has wired Mr. Comee to that effect. The orchestra will give concerts in Philadelphia on Monday and Wednesday of next week, in Baltimore Tuesday and in New York Thursday.

[52]

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CXIV. NO. 157.

FRIDAY, DEC. 4, 1903.

THE SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

Melba Will Sing Two Selections and the Orchestra Will Play Some Noteworthy Compositions This Week.

Mme. Melba will sing at the seventh public rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra this afternoon. Her selections are the aria, "Parto, parto," with clarionet obbligato, from Mozart's "La Clemenza di Tito," which was sung at a Symphony concert by Rosa Olitzka some years ago, and Ophelia's mad scene from "Hamlet," which has been sung here by several, among them Christine Nilsson, Clara Louise Kellogg, Sembrich, Calve and Melba herself, who have shone in the air while lesser lights have twinkled. Sembrich created the part of Ophelia in the opera itself, so far as Boston is concerned. The opera has never been popular in this country. Yet the last scene is entertaining, for Hamlet is crowned king; Laertes and Polonius, very much alive, cheer, and Gertrude talks of going to a nunnery.

The orchestral pieces will be Brahms' "Academic" overture, with its introduction of German student songs; Tschaikowsky's "The Voyvode," an orchestral ballad (first time) and Berlioz's symphony, "Harold in Italy," with viola solo by Mr. Ferir.

Sousa produced a transcription of "The Voyvode" at a concert in Tremont Temple last season. The piece is a posthumous work, and there is a story that when it was first played at Moscow, in 1891, the composer did not like it, swore at was rubbish, and tore up the score; but Siloti, the pianist, saved the parts and reconstructed the score after Tschaikowsky was dead and could not object. The ballad, which was played at New York and Chicago in 1897, has nothing to do with the plot of Tschaikowsky's first opera, "The Voyvode," which he also destroyed. The story, a grim one, is a poem by a Polish poet. "Voyvode" is a general, a commander, or the governor of a province. In this poem the Voyvode suspects his wife's fidelity and surprises her in a garden at night with a yung man who, reproaching her, is about to leave her forever. The Voyvode orders his valet to shoot the woman while he will attend to the lover. The servant's hand trembles—is he in sympathy with the pair?—his aim is not sure, and the bullet pierces the forehead of the Voyvode.

There will be no concert next week. The programme of the eighth concert will include Haydn's symphony, No. 9, in C minor, Paine's ballet music to "Azara," and the overture to "Tannhaeuser." Miss Maud MacCarthy will play Brahms' violin concerto. She played it last season.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CXIV., NO. 158.

SATURDAY, DEC. 5, 1903.

MELBA'S INDISPOSITION.

On account of a slight cold Mme. Melba was unable to sing yesterday afternoon at he Symphony rehearsal, to the great disappointment of an audience that filled the hall.

She will be unable to sing tonight at the Symphony concert, but she will postpone her departure for Europe and will positively sing in later concerts of the Symphony series.

The programme then this evening will be wholly orchestral: Brahms' Academic Overture, Tschaikowsky's orchestral ballad "The Voyvode" (first time) and Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" symphony.

BOSTON COURIER, DECEMBER 5, 1903.

——Society had a splendid representation at the symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon, the fact that Mme. Melba was unable to sing having slight effect upon the sum total of the attendance. Miss Ethel Barrymore, wearing red cloth, with a black picture hat and feather boa, was of those present, and evidently enjoyed the occasion to the utmost. She was with Miss Eleanora Sears. Others included in the vast audience were Mrs. John L. Gardiner, in black, with chinchilla furs; Mrs. George B. Shattuck, Miss Mabel B. Warren, Mrs. William P. Fay, Miss Audrey Stanwood, Mr. and Mrs. James B. Poor, Miss Mary Russell, Mrs. Matthew Luce, Mrs. George M. Cushing, Mrs. Henry Howard Fay, Mr. Arthur Hyde, Miss Eleanor Hyde, Mrs. J. L. Thorndike, Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Miss Lena Stevenson, Mrs. John B. Osborn, Miss Olivia Thorndike, Miss Marion Peabody, Miss Alice Stackpole, Miss Emily Sargent, Miss Sarah Lawrence, Miss Rosamond Allen, Miss Susan Amory, Mrs. Frederick Richardson, Mrs. Francis Peabody, jr., Mrs. Dudley Fay, Mrs. Eben Draper, Mr. Eben D. Jordan, Miss Dorothy Jordan, Miss Alice Fay, Miss Estelle Kimball, Miss Juliet Higginson, Mrs. James W. Kenney, Miss May Kenney, Miss Annie Manning, Miss Katharine Fay, Miss Mary Sargent, Miss Alice Gardiner, Miss Rachel Brooks, Miss Clara Shattuck, Mrs. Francis B. Kittredge, Miss Mary Eustis, Miss Elsie Tyson, Miss Hannah Stevenson, Miss Edith Stackpole and Mrs. Fred B. Carpenter.

Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, DEC. 6, 1903.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The first disappointment of the Symphony season was caused by the inability of Mme Melba to sing, as had been announced, at the seventh rehearsal and concert. She was not seriously ill, but took the precaution of not increasing a slight cold. She will appear later in the season, postponing her departure for Europe so as to fulfil her engagements here. There were no numbers substituted for Melba's solos and the program comprised the Brahms "Academic" overture, Tschaikowsky's orchestral ballad, "The Voyvode," and the Berlioz symphony, "Harold in Italy," the viola part being played by Mr A. Fevir, a new member of the orchestra.

The delightfully jolly "Academic" overture is always a welcome number, for Brahms has caught the "student" spirit so cleverly and expressed university "life" so vividly that the potpourri may well be considered a classic in its special field. The orchestra played in a manner which quickly dispelled the feelings of disappointment aroused by the absence of Mme Melba and the comical bassoon and celli passages put every one in good humor almost immediately. The overture has been given here so many times that the performance needs only commendation in general terms and not in detail, for Mr Gericke's men entered into the spirit of the work most heartily and played the piece with a verve and sympathy which evoked the heartiest applause from the auditors.

Tschaikowsky's gloomy ballad "The Voyvode," tells a tragic story in an effective way. Splendidly orchestrated, with characteristically harsh progressions, lightened for a brief interval by delicate love passages on the harp and violins and closing with a musical tumult, the work is very impressive. The interpretation was thoroughly good, the harp playing by Mr Schuecker being particularly enjoyable, and the fortissimo work by the whole force was as vigorous as one cares to hear. The ballad was played for the first time at these concerts.

The beautiful descriptive symphony by Berlioz went admirably. Mr Fevir played the viola part with skill, his intonation being very sweet throughout the varying arrangements of the Harold theme. In the "Pilgrims' March" the elusive changes in key and contrasting subjects of the movement showed the perfection of divided ensemble work by the orchestra. The quaint measures of the serenade of the mountaineer were deliciously sung by the woodwinds in the third part of the symphony, and the closing movement, with its groans, lamentations and other boisterous moments, received the necessary setting forth by the bass instruments. This last part was really diabolical in its suggestiveness of an orgy.

The next concerts will be given Dec 18 and 19, with Miss Maud MacCarthy as soloist, playing Brahms' violin concerto. The orchestra selections will be Haydn's ninth symphony, Prof J. K. Paine's ballet music from the opera, "Azara," and Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture.

The third of the concerts in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given at Symphony hall Sunday evening, Jan 3, when an unusually interesting program will be presented. Arrangements regarding the subscriptions for seats and the public sale will be made known at an early day.

Dec 6 03.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The second visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to New York will take place this week, and its two concerts will take place in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Mme. Melba; on Saturday, Mr. Rudolf Krasselt, the new first violoncellist of the organization, will make his first appearance. At the afternoon concert Mr. Gericke will make his contribution to the honor of Berlioz's memory and the celebration of the French composer's hundredth birthday, which falls on Friday, by giving the symphony "Harold in Italy." The viola solo in this will be played by Mr. Ferir, the new first viola of the orchestra.

The symphony in the Thursday evening concert is a new work by Mr. Ernst Dohnanyi, the Hungarian pianist, who made a considerable impression on his visit to New York not long ago. At that time he played an effective pianoforte concerto of his own, and took part in a performance of a pianoforte quintet, also of his own composition. The symphony was recently performed for the first time in Berlin.

Following are the programmes for the two concerts:

THURSDAY EVENING.

Symphony in D minor.....Dohnanyi
I. Allegro ma non troppo.
II. Molto adagio.
III. Scherzo: Presto.
IV. Intermezzo: Andante poco moto.
V. Finale: Introduzione, molto sostenuto; Tema con variazione e Fuga.
(First time in New York.)

Aria, "Parto, parto," from "La Clemenza di Tito".....Mozart
Clarinet obbligato by V. Lebailly.

"The Ideal," Symphonic Poem, No. 12.....Liszt

Scena, "Sweet bird that shun'st the noise of folly," from "L'Allegro, il Penseroso ed il Moderato".....Handel
Flute obbligato by A. Maquarre.

Academic Overture.....Brahms
Soloist: Mme. Melba.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Op. 21.....Mendelssohn

Concerto in A minor, for Violoncello and Orchestra, Op. 33.....Saint-Saens

"Le Voyvode," Ballade Symphonique pour Orchestre.....Tschaikowsky
(First time at these concerts.)

"Harold in Italy," Symphony in Four Movements, with Alto Solo, Op. 16.....Hector Berlioz
Viola Solo by E. Ferir.
I. Harold in the Mountains; Scenes of Melancholy, Happiness, and Joy; Adagio, Allegro.
II. March of the Pilgrims, Singing Their Evening Hymn; Allegretto.
III. Serenade of a Mountaineer of the Abruzzi to His Mistress; Allegro assai, Allegretto.
IV. Orgy of Brigands; Allegro frenetico.
Soloist: Rudolf Krasselt.

SUNDAY HERALD—BOSTON, [illegible] 1903.

SEVENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

A New Orchestral Ballad by Tschaikowsky the Novelty.

Mr. Gericke's Effort to Celebrate the Centenary of Berlioz Comes to Naught—Mme. Melba Has a Cold and Is Unable to Sing—Berlioz Symphony Is Played.

The programme of the seventh Symphony concert in Symphony Hall, Mr. Gericke, conductor, was as follows:

Academic overture.....Brahms
"The Voyvode," orchestral ballad.....Tschaikowsky
(First time at these concerts.)
Wedding march from "Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn
"Harold in Italy," symphony.....Berlioz

Mr. Gericke had bad luck with the programme of this concert. The programme, as originally planned, was in commemoration of the centenary of Berlioz, which could not be celebrated on Dec. 11—the birthday of Berlioz (1803)—for this week the orchestra will be giving concerts out of town. The original programme included the Symphony performed last night, the overture to "King Lear" and orchestral excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust." For certain reasons beyond his control, Mr. Gericke was obliged to change the programme, and therefore the centenary of the birth of the great Frenchman, the creator of modern orchestration, the creator who has not been surpassed by any of his disciples or imitators, will not be celebrated at these concerts, in which his name has been honored since the beginning. It is interesting to note in connection with this the Berlioz anniversary programme prepared by Theodore Thomas for the concerts of the Chicago orchestra Dec. 11-12.

Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini"; recitative and aria from "Les Troyens" (Miss Marguerite Hall); symphonic fantastique; ball scene and love scene from "Romeo and Juliet"; invocation, minuet, "Dance of the Sylphs"; romance, "My Heart with Grief Is Heavy" (Miss Hall); Rakoczy march from "The Damnation of Faust."

And then Mme. Melba took cold and was unable to sing the airs from "La Clemanza di Toto" and "Hamlet" to the keen disappointment of all, and not merely those who go to Symphony concerts for the sake of the soloists, male and female after their kind. The justly celebrated climate of Boston delights in sport with golden-voiced sopranos. Mme. Melba, however, will delay her departure and sing later at a Symphony concert.

The concert, then, was purely orchestral: The symphony by Berlioz remained; there was the Academic overture of Brahms, in which the composer was less academic than was his wont; "The Voyvode," an orchestral ballad by Tschaikowsky, which was produced here in the form of a transcription for brass band at a Sousa concert, Dec. 9, 1902; and the Wedding March from "Midsummer Night's Dream," which was introduced unexpectedly in honor of the day, which was to Maj. Henry L. Higginson a wedding anniversary.

It is said that Tschaikowsky was so disgusted with his ballad "The Voyvode," when it was rehearsed or first performed under his direction at Moscow in 1891, that he pronounced it rubbish and tore up the score; and that Alexander Siloti, his pupil, saved the orchestral parts, and after the death of Tschaikowsky put together the score, which was published in 1897. What injury these fanatical admirers, these rummagers in waste baskets and pigeonholes, these editors of "hitherto unpublished" essays, letters, romances, music, do to established reputations! There is a long line of victims, sufferers from indiscriminative enthusiasm. Within a few years Charles Lamb, Hazlitt, Rossetti, Carlyle, De Maupassant have thus been injured cruelly.

Tschaikowsky was often dissatisfied with his public works, and what man of genius does not at times loathe the very sight of the children of his brain? They are so inferior to what he would have them; they limp, they bear a hump, they stammer, they squint; yet in the eyes of the world they are fair to look upon or they are heroic figures. When Tschaikowsky destroyed the ballad, it was not through caprice, nor did he secretly hope for a saviour. He knew that the ballad was on the whole unworthy of him. The best of this music is merely pictorial and the pictures are not of large dimensions, nor are they framed for all time. They are startling, as well as a few beautiful, orchestral effects, for it was hard for Tschaikowsky writing for an orchestra to be persistently commonplace; but the love music in the garden is setimental rather than passionate, and the sentiment has no true distinction. The man that imagined the love music of "Romeo and Juliet," that composed certain songs as well as love themes in orchestral works, was right in refusing life to "The Voyvode." The poem of Mickiewicz even in a doubly strained translation is far more romantic and impressive than the music suggested, but not inspired.

Perhaps "Harold in Italy" was originally chosen for the Berlioz anniversary as a means of introducing Mr. Ferir, the new viola player. He displayed a rich and beautiful tone and he played with taste. The work itself is curiously characteristic of Berlioz, but it is inferior in imaginative force and intensity of musical grip to either the "Romeo and Juliet" symphony or the "Symphonie Fantastique." Yet it is a marvellous composition when we remember the year that gave it birth. "Harold in Italy" is 69 years old. Wagner in 1834 was uniting his opera, "Das Liebesverbot," at Magdeburg; Verdi had not written his first opera; Schumann at the age of 24 was founding his music journal; Tschaikowsky was not born; Brahms was a year old. For its time, Berlioz's symphony was a marvel of orchestral imagination, and imagination, as Jacob Boehme says, is the first emanation of the divinity.

This is a gross and material age and it is hard for us to realize the sincerity of the old-fashioned romanticists. It is hard for us to understand the once enormous popularity of "Childe Harold." Who reads the poem today? Yet it entered into the thought of Europe; certain phrases, lines are a part of the English language wherever it is spoken; and, without reference to the descriptive force shown by the poet, it may be said without fear of contradiction that "Childe Harold" contains the noblest apostrophe to liberty to be found in the whole range of English literature. It would be as impossible today to compose the symphony as it would be to write the poem.

Gone are those days of revolt against tyranny in thought as well as in government, the revolt that idolized the disorderly, turned pirates, cuthroats, as well as all deflers of conventionality into heroes, the revolt which might have been amusing had it not been so bitterly honest. Berlioz, delighted in the horrors of romanticism as he would have found supreme joy in the splendid extravagance and madness of Marlowe, Tourneur and other raging Elizabethans, in the tragic intensity of John Webster's Italian villains and lawless women had he been able to read the plays. And he thought romantically of romantic subjects. It is as though he wrote "Harold in Italy," in a long cloak and a bandit's hat, with a dagger dipped in red ink. The melancholy wanderer over the mountains, the muttering pilgrims, the mountaineer with his serenade, the orgy of brigands—these were all as real to him as the strollers and scenes on the boulevard. And this music should be played in this wild, fantastic spirit, otherwise it is impossible. This is no symphony for the lecturer and the analyist and the learned professor in front of the blackboard.

Regarded as a symphony with themes and development and sections and codas, it is impossible. When the music is bizarre or ugly the interpretation should bring out these qualities; they should not be softened for genteel ears. Let the composer fume and rave or wax sentimental and melancholy; let him be fantastical. Otherwise we are reminded of the fact that there once lived a man with wild ideas and a singular faculty for instrumentation; for we all are inclined to forget that the truly great, the men who have done mighty deeds, have been suspected of madness by the eminently respectable and by those at the time successful and envied.

In anticipation of hearing Mme. Melba an enormous crowd overflowed Symphony Hall Friday afternoon for the rehearsal, and bitter was the disappointment when it was learned that the prima donna was unable to appear. It was especially hard for the patient gathering numbering hundreds who assembled outside for the rush seats before 9 o'clock on that dismal, cold morning. Among those in the hall Friday were Mrs. Charles Head, Mrs. James Jackson, Mrs. Bryce Allan, Mrs. Francis Peabody, Jr., and Miss Rosamond Peabody, Mrs. George B. Shattuck, Mrs. F. L. Higginson, Miss Juliet Higginson, Mrs. John C. Phillips, Mrs. John L. Thorndike, Miss Olivia Thorndike with Miss Marion Peabody, Mrs. William P. Fay and Miss Katherine Fay, Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, Mrs. J. L. Gardner, Mrs. Dudley Fay and Miss Alice Fay, Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Miss Lena and Miss Hannah Stevenson, Miss Alice Stackpole, Mrs. Eben Draper, Mrs. Frederick Richardson, Miss Mabel Warren, Miss Emily Sargent, Mrs. Hall Curtis, Miss Julia Lawrence, Miss Ruth Richardson, Miss Mary Eustis, Miss Mary Sargent, Miss Clara Shattuck, Mrs. DeFord Bigelow, Mrs. H. H. Fay, Miss Audrey Stanwood, Mr. Arthur Hyde and his sister, Mr. and Mrs. Albert F. Bigelow, Mr. and Mrs. George M. Cushing, Miss Rosamond Allen, Mr. Eben Jordan and Miss Dorothy Jordan, Miss Estelle Kimball, Mrs. Matthew Luce, Miss Mary Russell, Miss Edith Stackpole, Miss Margaret Manning and Miss Louise Brooks, Miss Annie Manning, Miss Elsie Tyson, Mrs. F. B. Carpenter, Miss Susan Amory, Miss Rachel Brooks, Mrs. F. R. Comee, Mrs. F. B. Kittredge, Mr. and Mrs. James R. Poor and Mr. H. M. Ticknor. Miss Ethel Barrymore, charming in crimson cloth with a black picture hat and a long sable boa, who was with Miss Eleanora Sears, was there and met a number of friends who greeted her warmly. There will be no concert this week. Next week Miss Maud MacCarthy, the young violinist who made such a success last year, will be the soloist.

To avoid disappointing the Symphony audiences, Mme. Melba has promised the management to postpone her departure for Europe and positively sing at later concerts.

Arrangements have been made for the third concert in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The date fixed is Sunday evening, Jan. 3, and the arrangements for the subscription sale will be made known at an early date.

[53]

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CXIV., NO. 157.

FRIDAY, DEC. 4, 1903.

THE SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

Melba Will Sing Two Selections and the Orchestra Will Play Some Noteworthy Compositions This Week.

Mme. Melba will sing at the seventh public rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra this afternoon. Her selections are the aria, "Parto, parto," with clarionet obbligato, from Mozart's "La Clemenza di Tito," which was sung at a Symphony concert by Rosa Olitzka some years ago, and Ophelia's mad scene from "Hamlet," which has been sung here by several, among them Christine Nilsson, Clara Louise Kellogg, Sembrich, Calve and Melba herself, who have shone in the air while lesser lights have twinkled. Sembrich created the part of Ophelia in the opera itself, so far as Boston is concerned. The opera has never been popular in this country. Yet the last scene is entertaining, for Hamlet is crowned king; Laertes and Polonius, very much alive, cheer, and Gertrude talks of going to a nunnery.

The orchestral pieces will be Brahms' "Academic" overture, with its introduction of German student songs; Tschaikowsky's "The Voyvode," an orchestral ballad (first time) and Berlioz's symphony, "Harold in Italy," with viola solo by Mr. Ferir.

Sousa produced a transcription of "The Voyvode" at a concert in Tremont Temple last season. The piece is a posthumous work, and there is a story that when it was first played at Moscow, in 1891, the composer did not like it, swore at was rubbish, and tore up the score; but Siloti, the pianist, saved the parts and reconstructed the score after Tschaikowsky was dead and could not object. The ballad, which was played at New York and Chicago in 1897, has nothing to do with the plot of Tschaikowsky's first opera, "The Voyvode," which he also destroyed. The story, a grim one, is a poem by a Polish poet. "Voyvode" is a general, a commander, or the governor of a province. In this poem the Voyvode suspects his wife's fidelity and surprises her in a garden at night with a yung man who, reproaching her, is about to leave her forever. The Voyvode orders his valet to shoot the woman while he will attend to the lover. The servant's hand trembles—is he in sympathy with the pair?—his aim is not sure, and the bullet pierces the forehead of the Voyvode.

There will be no concert next week. The programme of the eighth concert will include Haydn's symphony, No. 9, in C minor, Paine's ballet music to "Azara" and the overture to "Tannhaeuser." Miss Maud MacCarthy will play Brahms' violin concerto. She played it last season.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CXIV., NO. 158.

SATURDAY, DEC. 5, 1903.

MELBA'S INDISPOSITION.

On account of a slight cold Mme. Melba was unable to sing yesterday afternoon at the Symphony rehearsal, to the great disappointment of an audience that filled the hall.

She will be unable to sing tonight at the Symphony concert, but she will postpone her departure for Europe and will positively sing in later concerts of the Symphony series.

The programme then this evening will be wholly orchestral: Brahms' Academic Overture. Tschaikowsky's orchestral ballad "The Voyvode" (first time) and Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" symphony.

BOSTON COURIER, DECEMBER 5, 1903.

——Society had a splendid representation at the symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon, the fact that Mme. Melba was unable to sing having slight effect upon the sum total of the attendance. Miss Ethel Barrymore, wearing red cloth, with a black picture hat and feather boa, was of those present, and evidently enjoyed the occasion to the utmost. She was with Miss Eleanora Sears. Others included in the vast audience were Mrs. John L. Gardiner, in black, with chinchilla furs; Mrs. George B. Shattuck, Miss Mabel B. Warren, Mrs. William P. Fay, Miss Audrey Stanwood, Mr. and Mrs. James B. Poor, Miss Mary Russell, Mrs. Matthew Luce, Mrs. George M. Cushing, Mrs. Henry Howard Fay, Mr. Arthur Hyde, Miss Eleanor Hyde, Mrs. J. L. Thorndike, Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Miss Lena Stevenson, Mrs. John B. Osborn, Miss Olivia Thorndike, Miss Marion Peabody, Miss Alice Stackpole, Miss Emily Sargent, Miss Sarah Lawrence, Miss Rosamond Allen, Miss Susan Amory, Mrs. Frederick Richardson, Mrs. Francis Peabody, jr., Mrs. Dudley Fay, Mrs. Eben Draper, Mr. Eben D. Jordan, Miss Dorothy Jordan, Miss Alice Fay, Miss Estelle Kimball, Miss Juliet Higginson, Mrs. James W. Kenney, Miss May Kenney, Miss Annie Manning, Miss Katharine Fay, Miss Mary Sargent, Miss Alice Gardiner, Miss Rachel Brooks, Miss Clara Shattuck, Mrs. Francis B. Kittredge, Miss Mary Eustis, Miss Elsie Tyson, Miss Hannah Stevenson, Miss Edith Stackpole and Mrs. Fred B. Carpenter.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, DEC 6, 1903.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The first disappointment of the Symphony season was caused by the inability of Mme Melba to sing, as had been announced, at the seventh rehearsal and concert. She was not seriously ill, but took the precaution of not increasing a slight cold. She will appear later in the season, postponing her departure for Europe so as to fulfil her engagements here. There were no numbers substituted for Melba's solos and the program comprised the Brahms "Academic" overture, Tschaikowsky's orchestral ballad, "The Voyvode," and the Berlioz symphony, "Harold in Italy," the viola part being played by Mr A. Fevir, a new member of the orchestra.

The delightfully jolly "Academic" overture is always a welcome number, for Brahms has caught the "student" spirit so cleverly and expressed university "life" so vividly that the potpourri may well be considered a classic in its special field. The orchestra played in a manner which quickly dispelled the feelings of disappointment aroused by the absence of Mme Melba and the comical bassoon and celli passages put every one in good humor almost immediately. The overture has been given here so many times that the performance needs only commendation in general terms and not in detail, for Mr Gericke's men entered into the spirit of the work most heartily and played the piece with a verve and sympathy which evoked the heartiest applause from the auditors.

Tschaikowsky's gloomy ballad "The Voyvode," tells a tragic story in an effective way. Splendidly orchestrated, with characteristically harsh progressions, lightened for a brief interval by delicate love passages on the harp and violins and closing with a musical tumult, the work is very impressive. The interpretation was thoroughly good, the harp playing by Mr Schuecker being particularly enjoyable, and the fortissimo work by the whole force was as vigorous as one cares to hear. The ballad was played for the first time at these concerts.

The beautiful descriptive symphony by Berlioz went admirably. Mr Fevir played the viola part with skill, his intonation being very sweet throughout the varying arrangements of the Harold theme. In the "Pilgrims' March" the elusive changes in key and contrasting subjects of the movement showed the perfection of divided ensemble work by the orchestra. The quaint measures of the serenade of the mountaineer were deliciously sung by the woodwinds in the third part of the symphony, and the closing movement, with its groans, lamentations and other boisterous moments, received the necessary setting forth by the bass instruments. This last part was really diabolical in its suggestiveness of an orgy.

The next concerts will be given Dec 18 and 19, with Miss Maud MacCarthy as soloist, playing Brahms' violin concerto. The orchestra selections will be Haydn's ninth symphony, Prof J. K. Paine's ballet music from the opera, "Azara," and Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture.

The third of the concerts in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given at Symphony hall Sunday evening, Jan 3, when an unusually interesting program will be presented. Arrangements regarding the subscriptions for seats and the public sale will be made known at an early day.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The second visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to New York will take place this week, and its two concerts will take place in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. On Thursday evening the soloist will be Mme. Melba; on Saturday, Mr. Rudolf Krasselt, the new first violoncellist of the organization, will make his first appearance. At the afternoon concert Mr. Gericke will make his contribution to the honor of Berlioz's memory and the celebration of the French composer's hundredth birthday, which falls on Friday, by giving the symphony "Harold in Italy." The viola solo in this will be played by Mr. Ferir, the new first viola of the orchestra.

The symphony in the Thursday evening concert is a new work by Mr. Ernst Dohnanyi, the Hungarian pianist, who made a considerable impression on his visit to New York not long ago. At that time he played an effective pianoforte concerto of his own, and took part in a performance of a pianoforte quintet, also of his own composition. The symphony was recently performed for the first time in Berlin.

Following are the programmes for the two concerts:

THURSDAY EVENING.

Symphony in D minor.....Dohnanyi
I. Allegro ma non troppo.
II. Molto adagio.
III. Scherzo: Presto.
IV. Intermezzo: Andante poco moto.
V. Finale: Introduzione, molto sostenuto; Tema con variazione e Fuga.
(First time in New York.)

Aria, "Parto, parto," from "La Clemenza di Tito".....Mozart
Clarinet obbligato by V. Lebailly.

"The Ideal," Symphonic Poem, No. 12.....Liszt

Scena, "Sweet bird that shun'st the noise of folly," from "L'Allegro, il Penseroso ed il Moderato".....Handel
Flute obbligato by A. Maquarre.

Academic Overture.....Brahms
Soloist: Mme. Melba.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Op. 21.....Mendelssohn

Concerto in A minor, for Violoncello and Orchestra, Op. 33.....Saint-Saens

"Le Voyvode," Ballade Symphonique pour Orchestre.....Tschaikowsky
(First time at these concerts.)

"Harold in Italy," Symphony in Four Movements, with Alto Solo, Op. 16.....Hector Berlioz
Viola Solo by E. Ferir.
I. Harold in the Mountains; Scenes of Melancholy, Happiness, and Joy; Adagio, Allegro.
II. March of the Pilgrims, Singing Their Evening Hymn; Allegretto.
III. Serenade of a Mountaineer of the Abruzzi to His Mistress; Allegro assai, Allegretto.
IV. Orgy of Brigands; Allegro frenetico.
Soloist: Rudolf Krasselt.

SUNDAY HERALD—BOSTON, DECEMBER 6, 1903.

SEVENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

A New Orchestral Ballad by Tschaikowsky the Novelty.

Mr. Gericke's Effort to Celebrate the Centenary of Berlioz Comes to Naught—Mme. Melba Has a Cold and Is Unable to Sing—Berlioz Symphony Is Played.

The programme of the seventh Symphony concert in Symphony Hall, Mr. Gericke, conductor, was as follows:

Academic overture.....Brahms
"The Voyvode," orchestral ballad.....Tschaikowsky
(First time at these concerts.)
Wedding march from "Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn
"Harold in Italy," symphony.....Berlioz

Mr. Gericke had bad luck with the programme of this concert. The programme, as originally planned, was in commemoration of the centenary of Berlioz, which could not be celebrated on Dec. 11—the birthday of Berlioz (1803)—for this week the orchestra will be giving concerts out of town. The original programme included the Symphony performed last night, the overture to "King Lear" and orchestral excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust." For certain reasons beyond his control, Mr. Gericke was obliged to change the programme, and therefore the centenary of the birth of the great Frenchman, the creator of modern orchestration, the creator who has not been surpassed by any of his disciples or imitators, will not be celebrated at these concerts, in which his name has been honored since the beginning. It is interesting to note in connection with this the Berlioz anniversary programme prepared by Theodore Thomas for the concerts of the Chicago orchestra Dec. 11-12.

Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini"; recitative and aria from "Les Troyens" (Miss Marguerite Hall); symphonic fantastique; ball scene and love scene from "Romeo and Juliet"; invocation, minuet, "Dance of the Sylphs"; romance, "My Heart with Grief Is Heavy" (Miss Hall); Rakoczy march from "The Damnation of Faust."

And then Mme. Melba took cold and was unable to sing the airs from "La Clemanza di Toto" and "Hamlet" to the keen disappointment of all, and not merely those who go to Symphony concerts for the sake of the soloists, male and female after their kind. The justly celebrated climate of Boston delights in sport with golden-voiced sopranos. Mme. Melba, however, will delay her departure and sing later at a Symphony concert.

The concert, then, was purely orchestral: The symphony by Berlioz remained; there was the Academic overture of Brahms, in which the composer was less academic than was his wont; "The Voyvode," an orchestral ballad by Tschaikowsky, which was produced here in the form of a transcription for brass band at a Sousa concert, Dec. 9, 1902; and the Wedding March from "Midsummer Night's Dream," which was introduced unexpectedly in honor of the day, which was to Maj. Henry L. Higginson a wedding anniversary.

It is said that Tschaikowsky was so disgusted with his ballad "The Voyvode," when it was rehearsed or first performed under his direction at Moscow in 1891, that he pronounced it rubbish and tore up the score; and that Alexander Siloti, his pupil, saved the orchestral parts, and after the death of Tschaikowsky put together the score, which was published in 1897. What injury these fanatical admirers, these rummagers in waste baskets and pigeonholes, these editors of "hitherto unpublished" essays, letters, romances, music, do to established reputations! There is a long line of victims, sufferers from indiscriminative enthusiasm. Within a few years Charles Lamb, Hazlitt, Rossetti, Carlyle, De Maupassant have thus been injured cruelly.

Tschaikowsky was often dissatisfied with his public works, and what man of genius does not at times loathe the very sight of the children of his brain? They are so inferior to what he would have them; they limp, they bear a hump, they stammer, they squint; yet in the eyes of the world they are fair to look upon or they are heroic figures. When Tschaikowsky destroyed the ballad, it was not through caprice, nor did he secretly hope for a saviour. He knew that the ballad was on the whole unworthy of him. The best of this music is merely pictorial and the pictures are not of large dimensions, nor are they framed for all time. They are startling, as well as a few beautiful, orchestral effects, for it was hard for Tschaikowsky writing for an orchestra to be persistently commonplace; but the love music in the garden is setimental rather than passionate, and the sentiment has no true distinction. The man that imagined the love music of "Romeo and Juliet," that composed certain songs as well as love themes in orchestral works, was right in refusing life to "The Voyvode." The poem of Mickiewicz even in a doubly strained translation is far more romantic and impressive than the music suggested, but not inspired.

Perhaps "Harold in Italy" was originally chosen for the Berlioz anniversary as a means of introducing Mr. Ferir, the new viola player. He displayed a rich and beautiful tone and he played with taste. The work itself is curiously characteristic of Berlioz, but it is inferior in imaginative force and intensity of musical grip to either the "Romeo and Juliet" symphony or the "Symphonie Fantastique." Yet, it is a marvellous composition when we remember the year that gave it birth. "Harold in Italy" is 69 years old. Wagner in 1834 was uniting his opera, "Das Liebesverbot," at Magdeburg; Verdi had not written his first opera; Schumann at the age of 24 was founding his music journal; Tschaikowsky was not born; Brahms was a year old. For its time, Berlioz's symphony was a marvel of orchestral imagination, and imagination, as Jacob Boehme says, is the first emanation of the divinity.

This is a gross and material age and it is hard for us to realize the sincerity of the old-fashioned romanticists. It is hard for us to understand the once enormous popularity of "Childe Harold." Who reads the poem today? Yet it entered into the thought of Europe; certain phrases, lines are a part of the English language wherever it is spoken; and, without reference to the descriptive force shown by the poet, it may be said without fear of contradiction that "Childe Harold" contains the noblest apostrophe to liberty to be found in the whole range of English literature. It would be as impossible today to compose the symphony as it would be to write the poem.

Gone are those days of revolt against tyranny in thought as well as in government, the revolt that idolized the disorderly, turned pirates, cuthroats, as well as all defiers of conventionality into heroes, the revolt which might have been amusing had it not been so bitterly honest. Berlioz, delighted in the horrors of romanticism as he would have found supreme joy in the splendid extravagance and madness of Marlowe, Tourneur and other raging Elizabethans, in the tragic intensity of John Webster's Italian villains and lawless women had he been able to read the plays. And he thought romantically of romantic subjects. It is as though he wrote "Harold in Italy," in a long cloak and a bandit's hat, with a dagger dipped in red ink. The melancholy wanderer over the mountains, the muttering pilgrims, the mountaineer with his serenade, the orgy of brigands—these were all as real to him as the strollers and scenes on the boulevard. And this music should be played in this wild, fantastic spirit, otherwise it is impossible. This is no symphony for the lecturer and the analyist and the learned professor in front of the blackboard.

Regarded as a symphony with themes and development and sections and codas, it is impossible. When the music is bizarre or ugly the interpretation should bring out these qualities; they should not be softened for genteel ears. Let the composer fume and rave or wax sentimental and melancholy; let him be fantastical. Otherwise we are reminded of the fact that there once lived a man with wild ideas and a singular faculty for instrumentation; for we all are inclined to forget that the truly great, the men who have done mighty deeds, have been suspected of madness by the eminently respectable and by those at the time successful and envied.

In anticipation of hearing Mme. Melba an enormous crowd overflowed Symphony Hall Friday afternoon for the rehearsal, and bitter was the disappointment when it was learned that the prima donna was unable to appear. It was especially hard for the patient gathering numbering hundreds who assembled outside for the rush seats before 9 o'clock on that dismal, cold morning. Among those in the hall Friday were Mrs. Charles Head, Mrs. James Jackson, Mrs. Bryce Allan, Mrs. Francis Peabody, Jr., and Miss Rosamond Peabody, Mrs. George B. Shattuck, Mrs. F. L. Higginson, Miss Juliet Higginson, Mrs. John C. Phillips, Mrs. John L. Thorndike, Miss Olivia Thorndike with Miss Marion Peabody, Mrs. William P. Fay and Miss Katherine Fay, Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, Mrs. J. L. Gardner, Mrs. Dudley Fay and Miss Alice Fay, Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Miss Lena and Miss Hannah Stevenson, Miss Alice Stackpole, Mrs. Eben Draper, Mrs. Frederick Richardson, Miss Mabel Warren, Miss Emily Sargent, Mrs. Hall Curtis, Miss Julia Lawrence, Miss Ruth Richardson, Miss Mary Eustis, Miss Mary Sargent, Miss Clara Shattuck, Mrs. DeFord Bigelow, Mrs. H. H. Fay, Miss Audrey Stanwood, Mr. Arthur Hyde and his sister, Mr. and Mrs. Albert F. Bigelow, Mr. and Mrs. George M. Cushing, Miss Rosamond Allen, Mr. Eben Jordan and Miss Dorothy Jordan, Miss Estelle Kimball, Mrs. Matthew Luce, Miss Mary Russell, Miss Edith Stackpole, Miss Margaret Manning and Miss Louise Brooks, Miss Annie Manning, Miss Elsie Tyson, Mrs. F. B. Carpenter, Miss Susan Amory, Miss Rachel Brooks, Mrs. F. R. Comee, Mrs. F. B. Kittredge, Mr. and Mrs. James R. Poor and Mr. H. M. Ticknor. Miss Ethel Barrymore, charming in crimson cloth with a black picture hat and a long sable boa, who was with Miss Eleanora Sears, was there and met a number of friends who greeted her warmly. There will be no concert this week. Next week Miss Maud MacCarthy, the young violinist who made such a success last year, will be the soloist.

To avoid disappointing the Symphony audiences, Mme. Melba has promised the management to postpone her departure for Europe and positively sing at later concerts.

Arrangements have been made for the third concert in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The date fixed is Sunday evening, Jan. 3, and the arrangements for the subscription sale will be made known at an early date.

[53]

BOSTON SUNDAY POST.

DECEMBER 6, 1903

MELBA TOO ILL TO SING

Owing to the indisposition of Mme. Melba, which prevented her appearance either at the Friday rehearsal or last evening's concert of the Symphony Orchestra, the numbers which she was to have sung were necessarily omitted. In consequence, an exclusively orchestral programme was presented, which included the following:

Academic Overture.....Brahms
"The Voyvode," ballad (posthumous) Tschaikowsky
Symphony, "Harold in Italy".....Berlioz

Brahms's "Academic" overture made a pleasing opening number, and the performance was unusually vigorous and effective, being much applauded.

The posthumous orchestral ballad by Tschaikowsky, entitled "The Voyvode," was heard at these concerts for the first time. It is said that the composer, at a performance of the work under his direction in 1891, was so dissatisfied with it that he destroyed the score, the fragments of which were put together by the pianist Siloti, and published in 1897, four years after Tschaikowsky's death.

The performance was admirable in every way. At this point, before the "Harold in Italy" symphony, the orchestra played the Mendelssohn "Wedding March" to commemorate, so it was said, the 40th anniversary of the marriage of Henry L. Higginson, the founder of the Symphony concerts. It was a very graceful act on the part of the orchestra and Mr. Gericke, being evidently appreciated by Mr. Higginson, who bowed his acknowledgments from his seat in the audience. The playing of the march without previous announcement came as a surprise to most of those present.

Following the usual intermission came the "Harold in Italy" symphony of Hector Berlioz, given to commemorate the centennial anniversary of the composer's birth (Dec. 11, 1803). It is a work of extended proportions, in which a solo viola is a leading factor. The symphony was superbly played, the viola playing of Mr. Ferir being a decided feature, and the performance was much applauded by the audience. There will be no public rehearsal and concert this coming week.

SOCIETY ATTENDS SYMPHONY

Society had a splendid representation at the Symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon, the fact that Mme. Melba was unable to sing having slight effect upon the sum total of the attendance. Miss Ethel Barrymore, wearing red cloth with a black picture hat and feather boa, was of those present, and evidently enjoyed the occasion to the utmost She was with Miss Eleanor Sears. Others included in the vast audience were Mrs. John L. Gardner, in black with chinchilla furs; Mrs. George B. Shattuck, Miss Mabel B. Warren, Mrs William P. Fay, Miss Audrey Stanwood, Mr. and Mrs. James H. Poor, Miss Mary Russell, Mrs. Matthew Luce, Mrs. George M. Cushing, Mrs. Henry Howard Fay, Mr. Arthur Hyde, Miss Eleanor Hyde, Mrs. J. L. Thorndike, Mrs. Neil Rantoul, Miss Lena Stevenson, Mrs. John B. Osborn, Miss Olivia Thorndike, Miss Marion Peabody, Miss Alice Stackpole, Miss Emily Sargent, Miss Sarah Lawrence, Miss Rosamond Allen, Miss Susan Amory, Mrs. Frederick Richardson, Mrs. Francis Peabody, Jr., Mrs Dudley Fay, Mrs. Eben Draper, Mr. Eben D. Jordan, Miss Dorothy Jordan, Miss Alice Fay, Miss Estelle Kendall, Miss Juliet Higginson, Mrs. James W. Kenney, Miss May Kenney, Miss Annie Manning, Miss Katharine Fay, Miss Mary Sargent, Miss Alice Gardiner, Miss Rachel Brooks, Miss Clara Shattuck, Mrs. Francis B. Kittredge, Miss Mary Eustis, Miss Elsie Tyson, Miss Hannah Stevenson, Miss Edith Stackpole and Mrs. Fred B. Carpenter.

The third of the concerts in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, Jan. 3, when an unusually interesting programme will be presented. Arrangements regarding the subscriptions for seats and the public sale will be made known at an early day.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which produced a symphony by Ernst von Dohnanyi here two or three years ago, will bring forward next week at Carnegie Hall a new one by the same young Hungarian pianist and composer, which had its premiere at Budapest as lately as last January.

Mme. Melba will be the Taursday evening soloist, and Rudolph Krasselt, the new 'cellist, will play alone Saturday afternoon.

The programmes:

THURSDAY EVENING.

Symphony in D minor.....Dohnanyi
(First time in New York.)
Aria, "Parto, Parto," from "La Clemenza di Tito".....Mozart
Mme. Melba.
"The Ideal," Symphonic Poem No. 12, Liszt
Scena, "Sweet Bird".....Handel
Mme. Melba.
"Academic Overture".....Brahms

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," op. 21.....Mendelssohn
Concerto in A minor, for violoncello and orchestra, op. 33.....Saint-Saens
Mr. Krasselt.
"Le Voyvode," ballade symphonique pour orchestre.....Tschaikowsky
"Harold in Italy," symphony in four movements, op. 16.....Hector Berlioz

BOSTON SUNDAY JOURNAL.

DECEMBER 6, 1903.

MELBA'S ABSENCE IS DISAPPOINTING

Slight Cold Keeps Her From Taking Part in the Symphony Program.

NEW TSCHAIKOWSKY BALLAD

Its Rendition Was Tender and Expressive, and Author's Genius Shines Througout.

There was an element of humor blended with the general disappointment because "a slight cold" had impressed Mme. Melba that she could not do justice to herself, her music or her audiences by retaining her place in the seventh Symphony program yesterday at Symphony Hall. An opportunity that was largely availed of was offered to two regretful women for asking of their friends, "Was it not knowing you, dear, that gave Melba the chill which prevents her singing for us?"

However, while sparing herself now, Mme. Melba did her best to make up for any temporary loss by promising to postpone her departure for Europe long enough to take part in a later concert.

The withdrawal of the vocal numbers left the audience free to turn its chief attention to the tragically romantic Tschaikowsky ballad, "The Voyvode," presented for its first real hearing, Sousa's previous brass band performance counting only as a perverted transcription. The composition, suggested by the poetic legend of Micklewicz, is illuminating, powerful and impressive. But it is illustrative of moods, and wastes no time or effort on attempted picturesqueness of detail.

It begins, to be sure, with the continuous flight of horses' feet, and there is a crash just at the close. But more potential is the gloomy mood which envelops this figure and stirs the imagination to think of a somber, bitter, determined, implacable man forcing his hurried course through a nocturnal environment as cold, black, resolute and harsh as his own spirit.

Tender and Beautiful.

The episode of the lovers whose confidence is watched and seized is enriched with tender and beautiful passionateness, as delicate as it is deep, and as sadly as softly expressed. Just before the fatal shot is heard the original sense, temper and manner sweep down again, perhaps implying the fatal fixity of the voyvode's purpose, unswayed by the tale of hopeless and guiltless love that he has overheard or by the timid, trembling protests of his pitiful vassal. The story is one to arouse Tschaikowsky's sympathy for the pathetic and ill-fated, and his genius shines in it, although he is said to have undervalued and scorned his music. It may have seemed mean to him, as being less than the opera he desired to write upon the story; but its preservation was fortunate.

Symphony Well Rendered.

The symphony was Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," which has often been played in Boston, and always heard with delight. It depends much, as the reader will remember, upon the viola obbligato that appears in the various movements and is apparently intended to represent not the set disposition of an individual holding aloof from what he witnesses, but rather the changeful attitude and mood of what Young Marlow calls "an observer upon life," who retains his individuality, but allows his feeling and expression to be molded as the episodes about him succeed each other.

The symphony was well read throughout and Mr. Ferir was much approved for his assumption of the solo viola part, which he played with sweet tone and sensitive phrasing, if with less volume and more reserve than was Mr. Kneisel's wont. But Harold was a dreamer, rather than a man of action, and there is no esthetic inconsistency if his representative withdraws toward the background sometimes and comments meditatively. A well colored, animated performance of Brahms' "Academic" overture was the first thing.

A fortnight hence the program is intended to contain the "Tannhauser" overture, a Haydn symphony, the ballet music from Paine's opera, "Azara," and the Brahms violin concerto, with Miss Maud MacCarthy for the soloist.

Mme. Melba's expected appearance at the Symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon was naturally the occasion of the largest gathering of music lovers at any of this season's Symphonies thus far. The crush outside the hall was something tremendous, for where else may one hear such a singer as Melba for the small sum for which one can get a seat in the second balcony? Few of the season ticket holders gave away their seats for this week's concerts, and consequently every one was in his or her own place, but what was the disappointment when it was announced that Melba was ill and could not appear. Among the most prominent persons noticed there were Mrs. Oliver Ames, Mrs. George B. Shattuck, Mrs. Matthew Luce, Miss Margaret Codman, Mrs. William P. Endicott, Mrs. T. C. Thacher, Mrs. Francis Peabody, Jr., Mrs. Frederick Richardson, Mrs. Charles Fry, Mrs. J. L. Thorndike, Miss Rosamond Peabody, Mrs. H. H. Fay, Miss Dabney, Mrs. John Lowell, Jr., Miss Elfrida Roosevelt, Mrs. Hall Curtis, Mrs. De Forest Bigelow, Mr. and Mrs. Albert F. Bigelow, Miss Beatrice Blake, Miss Dorothea Bigelow, Miss Barbara Higginson, Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Mrs. Eben Draper, Mrs. C. P. Kittredge, Miss Mabel Warren, Mrs. Stackpole and the Misses Stackpole, Mrs. George Duncan, Mrs. Guy Lowell, Miss Bowditch, Mrs. Victor Mapes, Mrs. Andrew Robeson, Mrs. John Lavelle, Mrs. Charles W. Stoddard, Mrs. James Washington Bartlett, Miss Cornelia Kittredge, Mrs. Walter B. Swan, Miss Susan Amory, Miss Estelle Kimball, Miss Ellen Parks, Mrs. Julian de Cordova and a host of others.

Not to have been present at the Cecelia Concert of last Wednesday evening is to argue oneself unknown in the musical world. Practically everybody who makes any pretensions to being musical was on hand to hear Melba, who seldom has been heard to better advantage. Already the names of some of the leading people who were present have been given in this department, suffice it to say at this time that among the families who were represented by one or more members were the Codman, Gardner, Cabot, Lang, Higginson, Hunnewell, Amory, Longfellow, Whitney, Bigelow, Head, Cotton, Stockton, Fay, Guild, Cochrane, Peabody, Loring, Thacher, Parkman, Nickerson, Storrow, Abbott, Jordan, Cotting, Dana, Hayden, Dabney, Hooper, Sears, and other families.

The third of the concerts in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, Jan. 3, when an unusually interesting program will be presented. Arrangements regarding the subscriptions for seats and the public sale will be made known at an early day.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra programmes for their concerts at Carnegie Hall this week are as follows:

THURSDAY EVENING.

Symphony in D minor.....Dohnanyi
(First time in New-York.)
Aria, "Parto, Parto," from "La Clemenza di Tito".Mozart
Clarinet obbligato by Mr. V. Lebailly.
"The Ideal," symphonic poem No. 12.....Liszt
Scena, "Sweet Bird that Shun'st the Noise of Folly," from "L'Allegro, il Penseroso, ed il Moderato"..Handel
Flute obbligato by Mr. A. Maquarre.
Academic overture.....Brahms
Soloist, Mme. Melba.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," op. 21..Mendelssohn
Concerto in A minor, for violoncello and orchestra, op. 33.....Saint-Saëns
"Le Voyvode," ballade symphonique pour Orchestre..Tschaikowski
(First time at these concerts.)
"Harold in Italy," symphony in four movements, with alto solo, op. 16.....Hector Berlioz
(Viola solo by Mr. E. Ferir.)
Soloist, M. Rudolf Krasselt.

Melba will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concert on Thursday evening. She will sing "Parto, parto," from Mozart's "La Clemenza di Tito," and Handel's "Sweet Bird." The principal feature of the programme will be Dohnányi's Symphony in D minor, a work which has never been heard here. Other numbers will be Liszt's "The Ideal" symphonic poem and Brahms's "Academic" overture.

At the matinée concert on Saturday Rudolf Krasselt, Mr. Schroeder's successor, will be the soloist, playing Saint-Saëns's concerto in A minor for violoncello and orchestra. Mr. Gericke will commemorate Berlioz with the "Harold in Italy" symphony, Mr. E. Ferir playing the solo viola. Other numbers will be Mendelssohn's overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and Tschaikowsky's symphonic ballade "Le Voyvode."

BOSTON DAILY ADV[illegible]

DECEMBER 7, 1903.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Programme.

Academic Overture.....Brahms
Orchestral Ballad, "Le Voyvode"..Tschaikowsky
"Childe Harold" Symphony.....Berlioz

Thus far the programme; but there was a pleasant interpolation in the shape of Mendelssohn's "Wedding March," played as a tribute to the wedding anniversary of the founder of the orchestra,—a very pretty surprise.

Mr. Gericke was at his very best in the first part of the concert, and at his weakest in the finale. We have never heard the "Academic Overture" so well played. It is a work that wears well, and its ingenious development of "Was kommt dort von der Hoeh'?", with its delightful bassoon passages, is as attractive as when it was first heard. The audience recognized the superb performance with very spontaneous applause. What a repertoire of songs the German students have! If an American composer wanted to write a college overture he would only find "Upidee," and "The Lone Fish-ball," as universal and original material, for "Billy McGee' is taken from a French sailor "santy," and "Fair Harvard" is an Irish tune, and many other university melodies are taken from foreign sources.

The "Voyvode" is a Russian general who returns from the war only to find his wife unfaithful. Planning to kill her and her lover, he is himself shot down by a servant. This work is not the true Tschaikowsky; let us forgive and forget. It has its graphic moments and Tschaikowsky is always master of his orchestra. The Voyvode comes riding home with a rush that reminds of the galloping of the Don Cossacks. Once arrived, however, he becomes rather inconsequential, and even the young lovers seem conventional in their love-making. Muted horns are a very good thing to portray evil with, but to hear them continually becomes rather tiresome, and the horn-players were called upon to play stopped tones almost continuously.

The only very original part of this work was when the bullet intended for his wife hit the Voyvode; then that official went out and growled himself to death.

"Oh God, it is a fearful thing
To see the human soul take wing"

but it becomes doubly frightful when it wings off on trombones and bass tubas, as it did on this occasion.

Now came the interpolated Wedding March, which might have been taken (by those who did not know the compliment conveyed) to mean that after the death of the Russian functionary the young lovers were married and lived happily ever afterward.

The "Childe Harold" symphony was not the best work to celebrate the memory of the composer with; the "Symphonie Fantastique" would have been better. The once fashionable melancholy of Byron's hero has in modern days given place to a wild despair, a virtriolic pessimism. Nevertheless, it was interesting to watch the tone-color of the viola, the instrument of dreamy sadness and of brooding, and to trace Childe Harold as portrayed upon the instrument. Mr. A. Ferir played exquisitely and proved that another good artist has been added to our orchestra. The delicacy with which he gave the chief theme (as much of a guiding motive as any found in Wagner) was sufficient to arouse enthusiasm.

The second movement—the March of the Pilgrims—presents one of Berlioz's remarkable bits of tone-coloring. To produce the tone of the Cathedral bell he employs harp and horn in combination, as effective a touch as ever was made in instrumentation. The horn at first spoiled the effect by playing too loudly, but at the end made amends by perfect shading. Mr. Ferir played the passages for viola,—"sull' ponticello" (bridge tones),—charmingly.

In the third movement much praise should be given to the excellence of the English horn and also to the shading of the Harold theme upon the flute. The second and third movements were splendidly interpreted.

Not so the finale. It was not a Summer convention of the Y. M. C. A. upon the Abruzzi mountains that Berlioz intended, but a fierce orgie such as would have caused Judge Emmons to have ejected the participants from any street or railway car in his dominions. In the interpretation there was pomp and bombast rather than fury,—a set of gentlemanly and ladylike brigands out for a holiday. Nevertheless Childe Harold died among them, which made the second death in this short programme.

Melba was to have sung and did not,—because of illness. The audience, however, seemed quite contented with a purely orchestral programme, judging by the applause, which was even more pronounced than usual.

Louis C. Elson.

SPRINGFIELD DAILY REPUBLICAN.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1903.

It is to be hoped that the difficulty between the Boston Symphony orchestra and the musicians' union may be settled without friction. It involves only about 20 men, who have been accustomed to do outside work and have held membership in the New York union for that purpose. It is the order to transfer their membership to the Boston union which has caused the trouble. Maj Higginson, who has always, and with reason, taken a firm ground in these matters, as one who supports an institution for the public benefit is well entitled to do, has declared bluntly that if this takes 10 minutes extra from his time the symphony in Boston will stop. He adds: "There is no use telling that to the musicians. They already know that." The fact is that the orchestra men are now so well paid that they can have no possible cause of grievance, and trouble is not likely to come from them. And if they are obliged to give up outside jobs over which the union has control, they can still get on very well, and it will be all the better for the work of the orchestra. The latest word is that the musicians concerned will stick to Maj Higginson.

[5?]

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Seventh Concert—Review by Philip Hale in the Boston Herald.

THE program of the seventh Symphony concert in Symphony Hall, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Academic Overture.....Brahms
The Voyvode (orchestral ballad).....Tschaikowsky
(First time at these concerts.)
Wedding March, from Midsummer Night's Dream.....Mendelssohn
Symphony, Harold in Italy.....Berlioz

Mr. Gericke had bad luck with the program of this concert. The program, as originally planned, was in commemoration of the centenary of Berlioz, which could not be celebrated on December 11—the birthday of Berlioz (1803)—for this week the orchestra will be giving concerts out of town. The original program included the symphony performed last night, the overture to "King Lear" and orchestral excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust." For certain reasons beyond his control Mr. Gericke was obliged to change the program, and therefore the centenary of the birth of the great Frenchman, the creator of modern orchestration, the creator who has not been surpassed by any of his disciples or imitators, will not be celebrated at these concerts, in which his name has been honored since the beginning. It is interesting to note in connection with this the Berlioz anniversary program prepared by Theodore Thomas for the concerts of the Chicago Orchestra December 11 and 12:

Overture, Benvenuto Cellini.
Recitative and aria from Les Troyens.
Miss Marguerite Hall.
Symphonie Fantastique.
Ball Scene and Love Scene from Romeo and Juliet.
Invocation. Minuet. Dance of the Sylphs.
Romance, My Heart With Grief Is Heavy.
Miss Hall.
Rakoczy March, from the Damnation of Faust.

And then Madame Melba took cold and was unable to sing the airs from "La Clemanza di Tito" and "Hamlet" to the keen disappointment of all, and not merely those who go to Symphony concerts for the sake of the soloists, male and female after their kind. The justly celebrated climate of Boston delights to sport with golden voiced sopranos. Madame Melba, however, will delay her departure and sing later at a Symphony concert.

The concert, then, was purely orchestral: The symphony by Berlioz remained; there was the "Academic" overture of Brahms, in which the composer was less academic than was his wont; "The Voyvode," an orchestral ballad by Tschaikowsky, which was produced here in the form of a transcription for brass band at a Sousa concert, December 9, 1902; and the Wedding March from "Midsummer Night's Dream," which was introduced unexpectedly in honor of the day, which was to Maj. Henry L. Higginson a wedding anniversary.

It is said that Tschaikowsky was so disgusted with his ballad "The Voyvode," when it was rehearsed or first performed under his direction at Moscow in 1891, that he pronounced it rubbish and tore up the score; and that Alexander Siloti, his pupil, saved the orchestral parts, and after the death of Tschaikowsky put together the score, which was published in 1897. What injury these fanatical admirers, these rummagers in waste baskets and pigeonholes, these editors of "hitherto unpublished" essays, letters, romances, music, do to established reputations! There is a long line of victims, sufferers from indiscriminative enthusiasm. Within a few years Charles Lamb, Hazlitt, Rossetti, Carlyle, De Maupassant have thus been injured cruelly.

Tschaikowsky was often dissatisfied with his public works, and what man of genius does not at times loathe the very sight of the children of his brain? They are so inferior to what he would have them; they limp, they bear a hump, they stammer, they squint; yet in the eyes of the world they are fair to look upon or they are heroic figures. When Tschaikowsky destroyed the ballad it was not through caprice, nor did he secretly hope for a saviour. He knew that the ballad was on the whole unworthy of him. The best of this music is merely pictorial and the pictures are not of large dimensions, nor are they framed for all time. They are startling, as well as a few beautiful, orchestral effects, for it was hard for Tschaikowsky writing for an orchestra to be persistently commonplace; but the love music in the garden is sentimental rather than passionate, and the sentiment has no true distinction. The man that imagined the love music of "Romeo and Juliet," that composed certain songs as well as love themes in orchestral works, was right in refusing life to "The Voyvode." The poem of Mickiewicz even in a doubly strained translation is far more romantic and impressive than the music suggested, but not inspired.

Perhaps "Harold in Italy" was originally chosen for the Berlioz anniversary as a means of introducing Mr. Ferir, the new viola player. He displayed a rich and beautiful tone, and he played with taste. The work itself is curiously characteristic of Berlioz, but it is inferior in imaginative force and intensity of musical grip to either the "Romeo and Juliet" symphony or the "Symphonie Fantastique." Yet it is a marvelous composition when we remember the year that gave it birth. "Harold in Italy" is sixty-nine years old. Wagner in 1834 was writing his opera "Das Liebesverbot" at Magdeburg; Verdi had not written his first opera; Schumann at the age of twenty-four was founding his music journal; Tschaikowsky was not born; Brahms was a year old. For its time Berlioz's symphony was a marvel of orchestral imagination, and imagination, as Jacob Boehme says, is the first emanation of the divinity.

This is a gross and material age, and it is hard for us to realize the sincerity of the old fashioned romanticists. It is hard for us to understand the once enormous popularity of "Childe Harold." Who reads the poem today? Yet it entered into the thought of Europe; certain phrases, lines are a part of the English language wherever it is spoken, and without reference to the descriptive force shown by the poet it may be said without fear of contradiction that "Childe Harold" contains the noblest apostrophe to liberty to be found in the whole range of English literature. It would be as impossible today to compose the symphony as it would be to write the poem.

Gone are those days of revolt against tyranny in thought as well as in government, the revolt that idolized the disorderly, turned pirates, cutthroats, as well as all defiers of conventionality, into heroes, the revolt which might have been amusing had it not been so bitterly honest. Berlioz delighted in the horrors of romanticism, as he would have found supreme joy in the splendid extravagance and madness of Marlowe, Tourneur and other raging Elizabethans, in the tragic intensity of John Webster's Italian villains and lawless women had he been able to read the plays. And he thought romantically of romantic subjects. It is as though he wrote "Harold in Italy" in a long cloak and a bandit's hat, with a dagger dipped in red ink. The melancholy wanderer over the mountains, the muttering pilgrims, the mountaineer with his serenade, the orgy of brigands—these were all as real to him as the strollers and scenes on the boulevard. And this music should be played in this wild, fantastic spirit, otherwise it is impossible. This is no symphony for the lecturer and the analyst and the learned professor in front of the blackboard.

Regarded as a symphony with themes and development and sections and codas, it is impossible. When the music is bizarre or ugly the interpretation should bring out these qualities; they should not be softened for genteel ears. Let the composer fume and rave or wax sentimental and melancholy; let him be fantastical. Otherwise we are reminded of the fact that there once lived a man with wild ideas and a singular faculty for instrumentation, for we all are inclined to forget that the truly great, the men who have done mighty deeds, have been suspected of madness by the eminently respectable and by those at the time successful and envied.

The third of the concerts in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, January 3, when an interesting program will be presented.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CXIV., NO. 165.

SATURDAY, DEC. 12, 1903.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN NO REAL DANGER

Maj. Higginson Expects No Trouble with Union.

HIS PLAYERS ARE WELL PAID.

They Understand Him and He Understands Them.

Maj. Henry L. Higginson, who has made possible the Symphony orchestra in Boston, when told by a Herald reporter this morning that the Musical Union had ordered 20 of the Boston Symphony players to join the Boston union or stop playing, said:

"I had heard nothing about it. It seems, however, that unionizing is being carried a bit far when musicians enter this business. I think the less said about this the better. Those musicians know already what I think about such matters, and what I will do. I have made severe contracts with my players, and they know what they can and cannot do. I expect no trouble from them. They know my position. I know that this is a matter in which the Symphony players will have to combat other musicians.

"The whole trouble is this: The Symphony players receive much higher salaries than other players, and the other players, perhaps with envy, stir up complaints. The Symphony players can have no grievance. They are getting very much higher salaries now than ordinary players. I have given them good salaries, and have contracts with them for the performance of certain duties. They know what they have to do. I say, 'Boys, here is your service to perform; do it.'

"The whole trouble is this: The Symphony players are subsidized, and others that are not so favored find they do not get along so well.

"All there is about it," said Maj. Higginson, "is that if this takes 10 minutes extra from my time, the Symphony in Boston will stop. There is no use telling that to the musicians. They already know that. I pay them well, and am satisfied as long as they render their services in return. Just as soon as players tell me that they cannot do what I require, I will tell them the same thing that your employer would tell you if you said you would do as you please: 'There's the door.'

"There is no danger of this, however. The Symphony players are interested in their art. Their positions enable them to follow this art to the best of their ability. If there is trouble to be settled it will have to be between the Symphony players and the other musicians. I have nothing to do with it. I do not know what the Symphony players think of this matter. They are in New York on a tour."

BOSTON EVENING RECORD,
DECEMBER 12, 1903.

If the union musicians compel the Symphony Orchestra players to take our union cards, as they threaten, the Harvard professors, sculptors and painters might as well organize for protection. If we are to have a "closed shop" among instrumental performers, the "closed shop" principle must logically be extended among all artistic workers. Why should not pianists be unionized? Why omit the De Reszkes, Melba, Blauvelt, etc., Taussig, James, Elliot, Hart, De Sumichrast? Why allow either singing or teaching without membership of some vocal protective association? Why should a manager be permitted to run an "open shop" of singers more than a "closed shop" of accompanists for those same singers?

BOSTON EVENING NEWS—
DECEMBER 12, 1903.

HIGGINSON HAS NOT HEARD ANY DEMANDS

Maj. Henry L. Higginson, chief financial backer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was interviewed today by a Boston News reporter relative to the demand made by the New York Musical Mutual Protective Union for twenty players in the orchestra who fill summer engagements in Greater New York during the summer months, and belong to the union, to resign or else quit playing with the non-union Symphony members.

No News From New York.

"First I have heard of it," said Maj. Higginson, adjusting his spectacles to read the despatch. "No such information has reached me from official sources. Everyone knows my attitude on such an issue, and when the demand is made to me I will act and be ready to talk. Until then I do not care to discuss the matter. My opinion is that it is cheap newspaper talk. I think I would have a good right to be heard if there is any such movement on foot, when I pay out such a substantial sum annually toward the support of the orchestra.

Envy Is the Trouble.

"It seems, however, that unionizing is being carried a bit too far when musicians enter this business. I think the less said about this the better. Those musicians know already what I think about such matters, and what I will do.

"The whole trouble is this: The Symphony players receive much higher salaries than other players, and the other players, perhaps with envy, stir up complaints. The Symphony players can have no grievance. They are getting very much higher salaries now than ordinary players. I have given them good salaries, and have contracts with them for the performance of certain duties. They know what they have to do. I say, 'Boys, here is your service to perform; do it.'"

Boston Times
Dec 12-03

Arrangements have been made for the third concert in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The date fixed is Sunday evening, Jan. 3, and the arrrangements for the subscription sale will be made known at an early date.

[55]

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Seventh Concert—Review by Philip Hale in the Boston Herald.

THE program of the seventh Symphony concert in Symphony Hall, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Academic Overture.....Brahms
The Voyvode (orchestral ballad).....Tschaikowsky
(First time at these concerts.)
Wedding March, from Midsummer Night's Dream.....Mendelssohn
Symphony, Harold in Italy.....Berlioz

Mr. Gericke had bad luck with the program of this concert. The program, as originally planned, was in commemoration of the centenary of Berlioz, which could not be celebrated on December 11—the birthday of Berlioz (1803)—for this week the orchestra will be giving concerts out of town. The original program included the symphony performed last night, the overture to "King Lear" and orchestral excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust." For certain reasons beyond his control Mr. Gericke was obliged to change the program, and therefore the centenary of the birth of the great Frenchman, the creator of modern orchestration, the creator who has not been surpassed by any of his disciples or imitators, will not be celebrated at these concerts, in which his name has been honored since the beginning. It is interesting to note in connection with this the Berlioz anniversary program prepared by Theodore Thomas for the concerts of the Chicago Orchestra December 11 and 12:

Overture, Benvenuto Cellini.
Recitative and aria from Les Troyens.
Miss Marguerite Hall.
Symphonie Fantastique.
Ball Scene and Love Scene from Romeo and Juliet.
Invocation. Minuet. Dance of the Sylphs.
Romance, My Heart With Grief Is Heavy.
Miss Hall.
Rakoczy March, from the Damnation of Faust.

And then Madame Melba took cold and was unable to sing the airs from "La Clemanza di Tito" and "Hamlet" to the keen disappointment of all, and not merely those who go to Symphony concerts for the sake of the soloists, male and female after their kind. The justly celebrated climate of Boston delights to sport with golden voiced sopranos. Madame Melba, however, will delay her departure and sing later at a Symphony concert.

The concert, then, was purely orchestral: The symphony by Berlioz remained; there was the "Academic" overture of Brahms, in which the composer was less academic than was his wont; "The Voyvode," an orchestral ballad by Tschaikowsky, which was produced here in the form of a transcription for brass band at a Sousa concert, December 9, 1902; and the Wedding March from "Midsummer Night's Dream," which was introduced unexpectedly in honor of the day, which was to Maj. Henry L. Higginson a wedding anniversary.

It is said that Tschaikowsky was so disgusted with his ballad "The Voyvode," when it was rehearsed or first performed under his direction at Moscow in 1891, that he pronounced it rubbish and tore up the score; and that Alexander Siloti, his pupil, saved the orchestral parts, and after the death of Tschaikowsky put together the score, which was published in 1897. What injury these fanatical admirers, these rummagers in waste baskets and pigeonholes, these editors of "hitherto unpublished" essays, letters, romances, music, do to established reputations! There is a long line of victims, sufferers from indiscriminative enthusiasm. Within a few years Charles Lamb, Hazlitt, Rossetti, Carlyle, De Maupassant have thus been injured cruelly.

Tschaikowsky was often dissatisfied with his public works, and what man of genius does not at times loathe the very sight of the children of his brain? They are so inferior to what he would have them; they limp, they bear a hump, they stammer, they squint; yet in the eyes of the world they are fair to look upon or they are heroic figures. When Tschaikowsky destroyed the ballad it was not through caprice, nor did he secretly hope for a saviour. He knew that the ballad was on the whole unworthy of him. The best of this music is merely pictorial and the pictures are not of large dimensions, nor are they framed for all time. They are startling, as well as a few beautiful, orchestral effects, for it was hard for Tschaikowsky writing for an orchestra to be persistently commonplace; but the love music in the garden is sentimental rather than passionate, and the sentiment has no true distinction. The man that imagined the love music of "Romeo and Juliet," that composed certain songs as well as love themes in orchestral works, was right in refusing life to "The Voyvode." The poem of Mickiewicz even in a doubly strained translation is far more romantic and impressive than the music suggested, but not inspired.

Perhaps "Harold in Italy" was originally chosen for the Berlioz anniversary as a means of introducing Mr. Ferir, the new viola player. He displayed a rich and beautiful tone, and he played with taste. The work itself is curiously characteristic of Berlioz, but it is inferior in imaginative force and intensity of musical grip to either the "Romeo and Juliet" symphony or the "Symphonie Fantastique." Yet it is a marvelous composition when we remember the year that gave it birth. "Harold in Italy" is sixty-nine years old. Wagner in 1834 was writing his opera "Das Liebesverbot" at Magdeburg; Verdi had not written his first opera; Schumann at the age of twenty-four was founding his music journal; Tschaikowsky was not born; Brahms was a year old. For its time Berlioz's symphony was a marvel of orchestral imagination, and imagination, as Jacob Boehme says, is the first emanation of the divinity.

This is a gross and material age, and it is hard for us to realize the sincerity of the old fashioned romanticists. It is hard for us to understand the once enormous popularity of "Childe Harold." Who reads the poem today? Yet it entered into the thought of Europe; certain phrases, lines are a part of the English language wherever it is spoken, and without reference to the descriptive force shown by the poet it may be said without fear of contradiction that "Childe Harold" contains the noblest apostrophe to liberty to be found in the whole range of English literature. It would be as impossible today to compose the symphony as it would be to write the poem.

Gone are those days of revolt against tyranny in thought as well as in government, the revolt that idolized the disorderly, turned pirates, cutthroats, as well as all defiers of conventionality, into heroes, the revolt which might have been amusing had it not been so bitterly honest. Berlioz delighted in the horrors of romanticism, as he would have found supreme joy in the splendid extravagance and madness of Marlowe, Tourneur and other raging Elizabethans, in the tragic intensity of John Webster's Italian villains and lawless women had he been able to read the plays. And he thought romantically of romantic subjects. It is as though he wrote "Harold in Italy" in a long cloak and a bandit's hat, with a dagger dipped in red ink. The melancholy wanderer over the mountains, the muttering pilgrims, the mountaineer with his serenade, the orgy of brigands—these were all as real to him as the strollers and scenes on the boulevard. And this music should be played in this wild, fantastic spirit, otherwise it is impossible. This is no symphony for the lecturer and the analyst and the learned professor in front of the blackboard.

Regarded as a symphony with themes and development and sections and codas, it is impossible. When the music is bizarre or ugly the interpretation should bring out these qualities; they should not be softened for genteel ears. Let the composer fume and rave or wax sentimental and melancholy; let him be fantastical. Otherwise we are reminded of the fact that there once lived a man with wild ideas and a singular faculty for instrumentation, for we all are inclined to forget that the truly great, the men who have done mighty deeds, have been suspected of madness by the eminently respectable and by those at the time successful and envied.

The third of the concerts in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, January 3, when an interesting program will be presented.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CXIV., NO. 165.

SATURDAY, DEC. 12, 1903.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN NO REAL DANGER

Maj. Higginson Expects No Trouble with Union.

HIS PLAYERS ARE WELL PAID.

They Understand Him and He Understands Them.

Maj. Henry L. Higginson, who has made possible the Symphony orchestra in Boston, when told by a Herald reporter this morning that the Musical Union had ordered 20 of the Boston Symphony players to join the Boston union or stop playing, said:

"I had heard nothing about it. It seems, however, that unionizing is being carried a bit far when musicians enter this business. I think the less said about this the better. Those musicians know already what I think about such matters, and what I will do. I have made severe contracts with my players, and they know what they can and cannot do. I expect no trouble from them. They know my position. I know that this is a matter in which the Symphony players will have to combat other musicians.

"The whole trouble is this: The Symphony players receive much higher salaries than other players, and the other players, perhaps with envy, stir up complaints. The Symphony players can have no grievance. They are getting very much higher salaries now than ordinary players. I have given them good salaries, and have contracts with them for the performance of certain duties. They know what they have to do. I say, 'Boys, here is your service to perform; do it.'

"The whole trouble is this: The Symphony players are subsidized, and others that are not so favored find they do not get along so well.

"All there is about it," said Maj. Higginson, "is that if this takes 10 minutes extra from my time, the Symphony in Boston will stop. There is no use telling that to the musicians. They already know that. I pay them well, and am satisfied as long as they render their services in return. Just as soon as players tell me that they cannot do what I require, I will tell them the same thing that your employer would tell you if you said you would do as you please: 'There's the door.'

"There is no danger of this, however. The Symphony players are interested in their art. Their positions enable them to follow this art to the best of their ability. If there is trouble to be settled it will have to be between the Symphony players and the other musicians. I have nothing to do with it. I do not know what the Symphony players think of this matter. They are in New York on a tour."

BOSTON EVENING RECORD,

DECEMBER 12, 1903.

If the union musicians compel the Symphony Orchestra players to take our union cards, as they threaten, the Harvard professors, sculptors and painters might as well organize for protection. If we are to have a "closed shop" among instrumental performers, the "closed shop" principle must logically be extended among all artistic workers. Why should not pianists be unionized? Why omit the De Reszkes, Melba, Blauvelt, etc., Taussig, James, Elliot, Hart, De Sumichrast? Why allow either singing or teaching without membership of some vocal protective association? Why should a manager be permitted to run an "open shop" of singers more than a "closed shop" of accompanists for those same singers?

BOSTON EVENING NEWS-

DECEMBER 12, 1903.

HIGGINSON HAS NOT HEARD ANY DEMANDS

Maj. Henry L. Higginson, chief financial backer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was interviewed today by a Boston News reporter relative to the demand made by the New York Musical Mutual Protective Union for twenty players in the orchestra who fill summer engagements in Greater New York during the summer months, and belong to the union, to resign or else quit playing with the non-union Symphony members.

No News From New York.

"First I have heard of it," said Maj. Higginson, adjusting his spectacles to read the despatch. "No such information has reached me from official sources. Everyone knows my attitude on such an issue, and when the demand is made to me I will act and be ready to talk. Until then I do not care to discuss the matter. My opinion is that it is cheap newspaper talk. I think I would have a good right to be heard if there is any such movement on foot, when I pay out such a substantial sum annually toward the support of the orchestra.

Envy Is the Trouble.

"It seems, however, that unionizing is being carried a bit too far when musicians enter this business. I think the less said about this the better. Those musicians know already what I think about such matters, and what I will do.

"The whole trouble is this: The Symphony players receive much higher salaries than other players, and the other players, perhaps with envy, stir up complaints. The Symphony players can have no grievance. They are getting very much higher salaries now than ordinary players. I have given them good salaries, and have contracts with them for the performance of certain duties. They know what they have to do. I say, 'Boys, here is your service to perform; do it.'"

Boston Eve

Arrangements have been made for a concert in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The date fixed is Sunday evening, Jan. 3, and the arrangements for the subscription sale will be made known at an early date.

[55]

Boston Transcript
TUESDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1903

"HAJAVAÇA"

Mr. A. J. Birnbaum, the new first violin in the Symphony Orchestra, sends from Boston to the Berlin Boersen Courier a chatty letter in which he gives his first impressions of American music. His "music-letter," which includes some appreciative remarks on the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is here given with a few irrelevant omissions:

"'Do you know Freischütz? No? Unfortunate man! You know at least the Jungfernkranz ("A rosy Crown we twine for Thee") from the Freischütz? No? Lucky man!' It was about in these words that Heine began one of his letters from Berlin, in which he jestingly sneered at the popularity of this most popular of all melodies. If I were disposed to describe the American street melodies that I have hitherto heard, I should need to use only the second half of Heine's question: 'Do you know Hajavaça?—No? Lucky man!' My first acquaintance with this noble opus was made on the Kaiser Wilhelm II., where the stewards' band played every forenoon the most frightful American melodies. Among the pieces that were played most frequently and received with most applause was a march-like composition, which, from its marked rhythm, I took to be Sousa's. Turning to my neighbor—a talk elegant, proud Yankee lady—I asked her the name of the piece. With a look of contempt for my ignorance, she answered: 'Hajavaça,' and I knew scarcely more than at first. A glance at the title-page informed me that the name was written 'Hiawatha'; and now I was worse at sea than ever, for the difference between Longfellow's poetic creation and this most frightful of all pieces of music is quite inconceivable.

"This was my first contact with American music; but I must confess that my judgment has since then changed in many respects. First and foremost, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is, so far as tone-coloring is concerned, the most wonderful that I have ever heard. Wind instruments that simply cannot be excelled for beauty of tone! There is an oboist—a Frenchman, Longe—whose tones move one to tears. In the very first number that I heard, Brahms's second symphony, he had an opportunity to exhibit his full virtuosity. He played the solo at the beginning of the minuet with a beauty that almost took one's breath away. Among the first violins there are virtuosos of amazing technique and wonderful tone. That such an orchestra needs an excellent conductor and has one, goes without saying. Wilhelm Gericke knows how to breathe his poetic soul into this ideal orchestra. Thus the concerts of the Boston Symphony are always an event, not only in Boston—where the tickets are sold by auction to the highest bidder, and the best seats often bring $500—but also in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and other cities.

"The soloist at the first concert was Harold Bauer, who played Tchaikovsky's B-flat concerto with technical perfection. The piece could, however, have borne heavier accentuation in many passages; Bauer made too much of its lyrical side. This artist, who has discarded the violin for the piano, has a wonderfully beautiful, rich touch and a fine, elevated style. At the second concert the violinist Arbos, hitherto unknown here, was heard in the Mendelssohn concerto and a Spanish composition of his own, and met with a warm reception. In the concerts before New Year's, Busoni, Frau Gadski, Thibaud, the Parisian charmeur, and others are to be heard; and the writer of these lines will try his fortunes before a Boston audience at the end of November.

"One who has been accustomed to go to the opera often misses a regular opera company here very painfully. All the greater, consequently, is the success of the travelling troupes. As it chances, the company of a Mr. Savage is now playing here, and I could not resist the temptation to go—all the more so, as the poster promised an opera that could raise me from the dead—'Carmen'! While I did not hear much that I could enjoy, still I must recognize the dexterity with which certain very difficult ensemble passages were rendered. The troupe got through their task pretty well, considering the small orchestra, the lack of a ballet, and the diminutive chorus, in which even the dragoon on watch had to join! Although in the third act a waterfall suddenly stopped going (such miracles are said to happen in nature), certain movements of the people were reduced to a minimum, and the Spanish dragoon wore an English uniform—still the opera made a deep impression; for 'Carmen' cannot be done to death! The title role was sung by a Miss Ivel. The lady had a very marked tremolo, was dreadfully rouged, but she had her good moments and developed a diabolical temperament, which, in connection with her wealth of black hair—unquestionably her own—led me to the conclusion that she really spells her name backwards.

"That is about the sum total of the music I have heard in two weeks. I might, however, mention the opening of the new Conservatory Hall, with a dramatic overture entitled "Melpomène," by Director Chadwick, and a very good rendition of Schumann's Piano Concerto by Frau Adamowska-Szymoska, a teacher of the institution. That exhausts the musical output. When I think how many concerts have been given during this short time in Berlin, how many new stars discovered, how many Paganinis redivivi come to light, I must confess that conditions in musical life are very low here—or should I say ideal? Well, we are going to New York several times, and I shall not fail to send you something about music in that business city. Perhaps I shall succeed in hearing 'Parsifal,' from the production of which Herr Conried expects to make mountains of gold."

Boston Daily Globe.
SATURDAY, DEC 12, 1903.

MAY BE DISRUPTED.

Symphony Orchestra Face to Face With Issue.

Some of Its Members Ordered to Withdraw by Union.

NEW YORK, Dec 11—Elated by their success in their recent controversy with the Metropolitan opera house orchestra, the New York musical mutual protective union took steps today which may result in the disruption of that master musical organization, the Boston symphony orchestra, which is at present on a visit to this city.

Twenty old members of the orchestra who are also members of the local union were notified that they must either resign from the union or else give up their connection with the out-of-town organization.

Among them were such old time New Yorkers as Messrs Koephel, Mansebach, Helleberg and Rettberg. The reason given for the demand is that by playing with nonunion musicians they are violating one of the strictest laws of the union.

Nearly all those notified joined the local union several years ago, and have continued their membership to enable them to accept engagements in the summer months in and around the city, and it will now be a question for them to decide whether it will pay them better to give up their winter engagement in Boston or their summer engagements here.

Should they decide to remain with the union their places could undoubtedly be filled by nonunion men in Boston, but Maj Henry L. Higginson, who is the financial backer of the Massachusetts organization, has repeatedly said that on the first sign of trouble with any union he would dissolve the whole orchestra.

News of the union's action created comment at the Metropolitan opera house tonight and was discussed by the managers and conductors of the orchestra present. Assistant manager Frederick R. Comee of the Boston orchestra said he had not heard officially of the notifications and preferred not to discuss the matter. Walter Damrosch, however, said:

"I am glad that the action has been taken, for the whole question will now be brought to an issue."

The Boston orchestra will play again at Carnegie hall tomorrow afternoon. The penalty to members of the union for violating the bylaws is a fine of $10 for the first offence, $20 for the second and expulsion for the third.

CONTRACT HOLDS.

Symphony Players All Sign One When Engaged.

Maj Higginson Says If They Don't Live Up to It They Must Go.

Maj Henry L. Higginson, financial backer of the Boston symphony orchestra, said at his State-st office this morning that he had heard nothing of the reported efforts of the New York musical mutual protective union to create trouble in the ranks of the Boston organization.

"I know nothing of the matter beyond what I have seen in this morning's papers," said he.

When asked if the statement attributed to him to the effect that on the first sign of trouble he would dissolve the whole orchestra, he answered:

"That was made nearly 20 years ago. I have contracts with every player in the orchestra, and when they refuse to live up to their contracts they will go out. If enough of them break their contracts to render it unwise to continue the organization, the latter will be disbanded.

"The orchestra is not run for a mere whim, for in the past few years there has been a deficit. I cannot stand for interference in the matter, and if contracts are broken, then those who break them will have to get out. That is all there is about it."

Boston Transcript
SATURDAY, DECEMBER 12, 1903

WILL STAND BY ORCHESTRA

SYMPHONY PLAYERS NOT LIKELY TO OBEY UNIONS

Special to the Transcript:

New York, Dec. 12—The impression among the men is that if any pressure comes from the unions, the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra would leave the union rather than the orchestra, but the Boston union is not expected to apply pressure unless the New York union puts on the screws, which also is not very likely. The men in the orchestra understand the attitude of Higginson, the management and Gericke toward any union interference and regard it more than they do the union, as they have no wish to lose life positions.

The orchestra may have trouble with the Boston Musicians' Union. The orchestra contains more than ninety musicians. Of this number about twenty, it is said, are members of the Musical Mutual Protective Association of this city, which has been at loggerheads with Mr. Conried of the Metropolitan Opera House for some time over the refusal of two members of the Metropolitan Orchestra to swear allegiance to the union. The Boston Musicians' Union, which was organized very recently, has made a demand on the members of the New York union in the Symphony Orchestra that they get transfer cards from the New York union to the Boston union. The Boston union, like the New York union, refuses to allow its members to play with non-union musicians.

It is the purpose of the Boston organization, it is said, to get the New York union men in the orchestra to make the change and then enforce the rule against their playing with musicians who are not affiliated with a union. As yet the Boston union has done nothing further than to notify many of the musicians to make the change. The New York union, it is said, has not taken any steps in the matter. There are a few members of the Boston union in the orchestra, but they are figures of minor importance and are engaged only as the occasion demands. One of the New York union men who joined the orchestra three years ago, said that he knew many of the union members had received notices from the Boston organization, but that nothing had been done by the New York union, and until something was done by the organization to which they belonged he doubted, he said, whether any of the members would heed the notice from Boston.

BOSTON TRAVELER.
DECEMBER 12. 1903

HIGGINSON IS DECISIVE

He Will Disband Symphony Orchestra Before He Will Submit to Union

The trouble that threatened to disrupt the Metropolitan Opera House Orchestra in New York has spread to the Symphony Orchestra of this city, which has been playing in New York and vicinity.

Twenty of the men are members of the Musical Union and members of the New York Local. The New York body wants these men transferred to the Boston Local and the men refuse.

They claim that they are not amenable to union rules, as they all receive more wages than the union scale calls for. Major Henry L. Higginson is ready for any trouble the New York Local may see fit to cause. He says he knows nothing about the unionizing as proposed by the New York Local and thinks the unionizing problem is being carried a little bit too far.

The men refuse to accept transfers to the local in this city, and they are backed up in their demands by Major Higginson. He says he will give up rather than submit to such dictation.

"Those musicians," said Major Higginson, "know already what I think about such matters, and what I will do. I have made severe contracts with my players, and they know what they can and cannot do.

"The Symphony players can have no grievance. They are getting much higher salaries now than ordinary players. I have given them good salaries, and have contracts with them for the performance of certain duties. They know what they have to do. I say, 'Boys, here is your service to perform; do it.'

"All there is about it," said Major Higginson, "is that if this takes 10 minutes extra from my time, the Symphony in Boston will stop. There is no use telling that to the musicians. They already know that I pay them well, and am satisfied as long as they render their services in return. Just as soon as players tell me that they cannot do what I require, I will tell them the same thing that your employer would tell you if you said you would do as you please: 'There's the door.'

"There is no danger of this, however. The Symphony players are interested in their art. Their positions enable them to follow the art to the best of their ability. If there is trouble to be settled it will have to be between the Symphony players and the other musicians. I have nothing to do with it. I do not know what the Symphony players think of this matter. They are in New York on a tour."

EVENING RECORD.
DECEMBER 14. 1903.

THREAT MADE BY MAJOR HIGGINSON

Maj. H. L. Higginson was greatly disturbed when he learned that 20 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who are members of the Musical Mutual Protective Assn. of New York, had been ordered to get transfer cards to the Boston Musicians' Union by Jan. 1 and that there was a possibility of there being some trouble. It is said that the 20 men have refused to obey the order, and if any effort at dictation be made Major Higginson says that he will disband the orchestra.

When asked about the matter, Maj. Higsinson said:

"It seems that unionizing is being carried a bit too far when musicians enter this business. Those musicians know already what I think about such matters and what I will do. I have made severe contracts with my players and they know what they can and cannot do. They know my position. I know that this is a matter in which the Symphony players will have to combat other musicians.

"The whole trouble is this: The Symphony players receive much higher salaries than other players and the other players, perhaps with envy, stir complaints The Symphony players can have no grievances.

"All there is about it is that if this takes 10 minutes extra from my time the Symphony in Boston will stop. There is no use telling that to the musicians. They already know that. I pay them well and am satisfied as long as they render their services in return. Just as soon as players tell me that they cannot do what I require, I will tell them the same thing that your employer would tell you if you said you would do as you please: 'There's the door.'

"There is no danger of this, however. The Symphony players are interested in their art. Their positions enable them to follow this art to the best of their ability. If there is trouble to be settled it will have to be between the Symphony players and the other musicians. I have nothing to do with it."

THE SUN. SATURDAY.
DECEMBER 12. 1903.

IT'S UNION MUSIC OR NONE.

TO PUT THE SCREWS ON BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Demand That Twenty New York Union Members Join the Boston Union—Next Move Against Non-Union Players—Walking Delegate Methods May Fail.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the oldest and best known musical organizations in this country, may, if things develop as they promise, have trouble on its hands before long with the Boston Musicians' Union.

The orchestra contains more than ninety musicians. Of this number about twenty, it is said, are members of the Musical Mutual Protective Association of this city, which has been at loggerheads with Mr. Conried of the Metropolitan Opera House for some time over the refusal of two members of the Metropolitan's orchestra to swear allegiance to the union.

The Boston Musicians' Union, which was organized very recently, has made a demand on the members of the New York union in the Symphony Orchestra that they get transfer cards from the New York union to the Boston union. The Boston union, like the New York union, refuses to allow its members to play with non-union musicians.

It is the purpose of the Boston organization, it is said, to get the New York union men in the orchestra to make the change and then enforce the rule against their playing with musicians who are not affiliated with a union.

The Boston union is young. It needs strength, and by this move, if successful, it would, it is said, come with a leap into a place of active power, for the New York union men who are in the Symphony Orchestra are all musicians of a high class.

As yet the Boston union has done nothing further than to notify many of the musicians to make the change. The New York union, it is said, has not taken any steps in the matter.

There are a few members of the Boston union in the orchestra, but they are figures of minor importance and are engaged only as the occasion demands.

The orchestra played last night at the Baptist Temple, Schermerhorn street and Third avenue, Brooklyn, to a crowded house. Herr Gericke, the conductor, said that he had not even heard of the Boston union's demand. He knew, however, he said, that there were a good many union men in the orchestra.

One of the New York union men who joined the orchestra three years ago, said that he knew that many of the union members had received notices from the Boston organization, but that nothing had been done by the New York union, and until something was done by the organization to which they belonged he doubted, he said, whether any of the members would heed the notice from Boston.

If the matter came to such an issue that they would either have to have the union or the orchestra, most of the men would, he thought, leave the union. They would be foolish to do otherwise, he said, when the Symphony Orchestra afforded them places practically for life.

BOSTON SUNDAY JOURNAL
DECEMBER 13, 1903.

SYMPHONY MEN WILL STAND BY MAJ. HIGGINSON

Players Say They Will Not Desert Him For Union.

STICK TO ORCHESTRA

Boston Branch of M. M. P. U. Wants Great Artists in Its Ranks.

Special to The Boston Journal.

New York, Dec. 12.—Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra playing here said tonight that no matter what any union wanted they were determined to stand by Maj. Henry L. Higginson and refuse to desert his company.

Director Gericke was seen tonight and asked to make a statement as to his position resultant upon the labor war against his company.

He replied that the whole thing was yet an enigma to him, and until something more definite had shaped itself he would not care to discuss the matter.

Judging from what various members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said, however, when asked about the rumored troubles with the Musical Mutual Protective Union, the members of the union who are in the orchestra will not forsake the latter in any event, even though their staying will mean their expulsion from the union. The ones who are with the orchestra are, of course, very efficient musicians and get large pay.

To give up a job in such an organization as the Boston Symphony Orchestra just to please a union would mean robbing themselves of much money, and the musicians are not prepared to do this.

Bread and Butter.

"It's our bread and butter," said one of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night, "and we will stick to it. I hope we will not have any great trouble with the union, for I am a member of it and believe in it as long as it stays within the province, but I don't intend to leave the Boston Symphony, no matter what happens."

Though one or two of the union men who are in the orchestra have admitted that they had been served with papers by the union, President Smith of the M. M. P. U., when seen today at the old homestead, denied any knowledge of the matter. He said that so far as he knew there had been and would be no trouble between his body and its members who are with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The manager of the Boston organization when he was in the Metropolitan Opera House last night said he knew nothing about the affairs of the men who belonged to the union. The fact that he had heard nothing from them makes it practically certain that even if they did get any notification from their union they will stay where they are. Mr. Higginson, who runs the orchestra, will give it up the minute any unions begin to interfere with him.

Much Mistaken.

"The Musical Mutual Protective Union is very much mistaken if it thinks it can make trouble in the Boston Symphony Orchestra or separate the players from their allegiance to Maj. Henry L. Higginson, who has done so much for us," said C. Hampe, a prominent violinist of the orchestra, when asked today about the attitude that body would take on the threat of the union that all the Symphony members must join if the company is not to be broken up.

"Men like Otto Rothe," he added, "are not going to desert our patron for any union on the face of the earth.

"The union has notified that the matter must be settled by the first of January or there will be trouble. We are all with Mr. Higginson. We get our salary by the year. The men in the union will drop out if necessary. The union is not able to guarantee them half the salary given by the orchestra. We won't leave Mr. Higginson and he won't give us up. He pays out about $220,000 a year for us and he is not going to ruin his band with any band players' organization."

LABOR UNION SEEKS POWER OVER SYMPHONY

Members of the Boston Musicians' Union are making an attempt to bring the ninety and more members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra into their union. If they do not succeed they threaten trouble.

The trouble has only just begun, but there is promise of much trouble during the time the members of the small Boston musical union try to bring Beethoven, Listz, Mendelssohn, Wagner and other classical and grand opera music down to a union scale.

The members of the local musical union hopes to enlarge and make important its body by taking in the famous Symphony Orchestra members, because about twenty of the Symphony players are members of the New York union, known as the Musical Protective Association. These twenty musicians, sometimes a few more and sometimes less, have summer engagements in New York. The plan of the Boston union, which is young and far from being strong, is to make a demand to have the Symphony members who belong to the New York union transferred to their local union here.

Make a Demand.

With that once done the next move would be to demand that all the members of the Symphony join the union or else they would, under the rules of the union, demand that the twenty odd members of the Symphony who are union men withdraw.

Maj. Henry L. Higginson, chief financial backer of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said he had received no official notification of this move, while talking with a Boston Journal reporter yesterday, but he would not deny that he had heard of it.

At present members of the Boston union have done no more than to notify many of the union musicians to make the change. The musicians admit this, it is claimed. If that plan fails it is claimed the Boston union will demand a wholesale transfer from the New York union as its right under union regulations.

A member of the Symphony Orchestra who knows the inside history of the threatened trouble said yesterday that he did not believe the Boston union could make trouble, because he felt certain the members of the New York union would withdraw before they would be transferred, in view of the trouble that would later result.

Line Drawn Here.

The players feel that there must be a line drawn somewhere. The majority feel that there is a vast difference between the average orchestra and one of musicians of national, and in some instances international repute. While an orchestra of ordinary musicians who play at dances and anywhere that ordinary music is wanted might form a union in order to fix prices for playing at dances, regulating the prices to fit the hours played, practically all the members of the Symphony feel that they should not be placed quite in that class and that it would be just as practical to attempt to unionize sculptors and artists.

It is said that the majority of the Symphony players who belong to the New York union are men who, while avowedly connected with the Symphony, are not regular players, but are called upon to play when needed and are paid for such service instead of being strict members. At the same time the leaders are not looking forward to the threatened trouble without some misgivings, for they fear the Boston union may cause some bother.

THE WORLD: SUNDAY,
DECEMBER 13, 1903.

MUSICIANS TO QUIT UNION.

They Say They Will Stand by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who were notified on Friday that they must either quit the orchestra or the Musical Mutual Protective Union were unanimous yesterday in declaring that they would stand by Henry Lee Higginson and their conductor rather than be bullied by the union.

"The union has given us until Jan. 1 to settle the matter," said C. Hampe, one of the violinists, "but you can say that we are not going to desert our patron, Mr. Higginson, who pays us our salary by the year. The union is not able to guarantee us half what we are now getting, and, if necessary, the men will drop the union. We can easily get summer engagements in places that are outside the jurisdiction of the New York union."

THE WORLD: SATURDAY,
DECEMBER 12, 1903.

UNION ATTACKS BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Twenty Members of the Orchestra Notified to Leave One or the Other.

Elated by their success in their recent controversy with the Metropolitan Opera-House orchestra, the New York Musical Mutual Protective Union took steps yesterday which may result in the disruption of that master musical organization the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is at present on a visit to this city.

Twenty-odd members of the orchestra, who are also members of the local union were notified that they must either resign from the union or else give up their connection with the out-of-town organization. Among them were such old-time New Yorkers as Messrs. Koeppel, Mansebach, Helleberg and Rettberg. The reason given for the demand is that by playing with non-union musicians they are violating one of the strictest laws of the union.

Nearly all of those notified joined the local union several years ago and continued their membership to enable them to accept engagements in the summer months in and around the city, and it will now be a question for them to decide whether it will pay them better to give up their winter engagement in Boston or their summer engagements here.

Should they decide to remain with the union their places could undoubtedly be filled by non-union men in Boston, but H. Lee Higginson, who is the fiancial backer of the Massachusetts organization, has repeatedly stated that on the first sign of trouble with any union he would dissolve the whole orchestra.

News of the union's action created considerable comment at the Metropolitan Opera-House last night, and was eagerly discussed by the managers and conductors of orchestra present. Assistant Manager Fred Comee, of the Boston Orchestra, who was in the audience, said he had not heard officially of the notifications and preferred not to discuss the matter. Walter Damrosch, however, said:

"I am very glad that the action has been taken, for the whole question will now be brought to an issue. The union has harassed us here in New York for a long time, but the out-of-town orchestras have been left alone, and I consider it only fair that we should all be treated alike."

John Lund, who is at present conductor of the Broadway Theatre orchestra and who formerly directed the Buffalo Orchestra, said: "I have not heard all the facts in the present case, but I will say that by enforcing their by-laws the local union is doing a good thing, in showing how ridiculous they are."

The Boston orchestra will play again at Carnegie Hall this afternoon. The penalty to members of the union for violating the bylaws is a fine of $10 for the first offence, of $20 for the second and expulsion for the third.

NEW YORK HERALD,
SATURDAY, DECEMBER 12, 1903.

UNION AFTER BOSTON PLAYERS

Hub's "Symphony" Musicians Are Warned to Join the Local or Face Trouble.

Turning from the Metropolitan Opera House orchestra, the Musical Union is now directing its attention to the Boston Symphony Society, with the idea of obtaining control of this body of ninety-four players, recognized as one of the most important in this country.

Of the members of the Boston Symphony only twenty belong to the Musical Union, and they are members of the New York local. The other players never have affiliated themselves with that body. It is only comparatively recently that the Boston union has been active. It recently issued cards to the twenty Symphony players, notifying them that they must obtain transfers to the Boston union. The alternative was said to be that they must leave the orchestra.

The Boston orchestra last night gave a concert in Brooklyn. William Gericke, on being questioned by a reporter for the HERALD, said he had heard of no notice received by any of the players. From members of the orchestra, however, it was learned that twenty had received the cards. It was said no attention would be paid to the action of the Boston union. The twenty union members say they are not amenable to union rules, as they all receive more than the union scale of wages.

NEW-YORK DAILY TRIBUNE,
SATURDAY, DECEMBER 12, 1903.

UNION AFTER THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

It Insists That Twenty-two Musicians Quit —They Will Probably Leave Union.

It was reported last night that the musical union of this city, which recently caused trouble in Mr. Conried's orchestra, had served notice on twenty-two members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who happen to be members of the union that they must either get out of the Boston organization or out of the union. There is no local union in Boston, and Henry L. Higginson, who makes all the engagements for the Boston orchestra, has never allowed the formation of one. He has again and again declared that if the members of his organization formed a union, the next morning there would be no Boston Symphony Orchestra. As the members play for him, and for him alone, the twenty-two who still keep a membership in the New-York union can hardly get any good out of it, and their answer to the order of the union can scarcely be in doubt.

Walter Damrosch was seen at the opera last night, and declared that, if true, this action of the union was a good thing. "It is honest conduct on the part of the union," he said, "for there is no reason in sense why a leader here in New-York should be compelled to submit to the dictates of the union utterly, while in Boston a conductor can have half or two-thirds of his band composed of non-union men. It is a good thing to bring matters to a head if we are all to find out just where we stand."

It is said that many members of the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra also are not members of the union, though as yet there has been no report of interference or trouble there.

Mr. Gericke, leader of the Boston orchestra, which played last night in Brooklyn, said that he had not heard of any such action on the part of the union. He was even surprised to learn that any of his men were members. He had, he said, little doubt, however, of their leaving the union rather than the orchestra.

THE NEW YORK TIMES,
SATURDAY, DECEMBER 12, 1903.

MAY DISRUPT BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Report That Musical Union Will Order Members to Withdraw.

Musical people in and about the Metropolitan Opera House last night were busy discussing the report that the Musical Mutual Protective Union is to order twenty or more of its members who are now with the Boston Symphony Orchestra to leave that body. If this is true it will mean either a great blow to the orchestra, in case the men decide to drop out, or else it will mean a great blow to the union in case the men disobey the command and remain with the Symphony Orchestra.

Conductor Gericke of the orchestra said last night that he did not know whether any of his men belonged to the New York union, though he admitted that several musicians from this city joined his body not very long ago.

The report of the possible breaking up of such an unusual musical organization as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, even although it was not absolutely verified, was enough to make men in the lobby of the Metropolitan Opera House last night forget for the moment all about "La Tosca" being performed inside and give themselves up to guesses about whether or not the union would make a trial of strength with the famous orchestra.

Heretofore the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been untroubled by the usual protests of union men against those outside their organization, though other musical organizations, such as the one led by Victor Herbert in Pittsburg and the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, have had to knuckle to the unions whenever the latter made demands.

The cause of the Boston organization's freedom from trouble in this direction is the attitude of Henry H. Higginson, the Boston banker, who owns and manages the orchestra. He has said over and over again that if any musical union tried to interfere with him he would simply give up the orchestra and let it disband.

As the person who has provided the money for its support and overseen its tours, his attitude for years has been "with a union, out goes the orchestra." This explains what has for a long time seemed strange to many people—the fact that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has had no trouble with unions while other musical organizations have had so much.

In the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gave a concert in Carnegie Hall to an enormous crowd night before last, there are between twenty and twenty-five members of the Musical Mutual Protective Union of New York. Of course, they are playing all the time with men who do not belong to the New York union, which is against the rules of the latter.

Walter Damrosch, as he walked into the Metropolitan last night, said that he thought it was time for the Boston organization to be having a contest with the union, as it had escaped heretofore in some unaccountable manner, while every other orchestra, like those in Pittsburg and Philadelphia, had had to be in a measure dependent on the whims of local unions.

None of the officers of the Musical Mutual Protective Union could be found at the headquarters of that body last night.

[57]

THE SUN, SUNDAY,
DECEMBER 13, 1903.

THREAT BY MAJOR HIGGINSON.

IF BOTHERED BY THE UNION, SYMPHONY WILL STOP.

He Will Disband Orchestra if Any Dictation Is Attempted—Union Action Justified, Says Walter Damrosch—The Musicians Are Standing by Major Higginson.

BOSTON, Mass., Dec. 12.—Major Henry L. Higginson was greatly disturbed to-day when he learned that twenty members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who are members of the Musical Mutual Protective Association of New York, had been ordered to get transfer cards to the Boston Musicians' Union by Jan. 1 and that there was a possibility of there being some trouble. It is said that the twenty men have refused to obey the order, and if any effort at dictation is made Major Higginson says that he will disband the orchestra.

When asked about the matter, Major Higginson said:

"It seems that unionizing is being carried a bit too far when musicians enter this business. Those musicians know already what I think about such matters and what I will do. I have made severe contracts with my players and they know what they can and cannot do. They know my position. I know that this is a matter in which the Symphony players will have to combat other musicians.

"The whole trouble is this: The Symphony players receive much higher salaries than other players and the other players, perhaps with envy, stir complaints. The Symphony players can have no grievances. They are getting very much higher salaries now than ordinary players.

"I have given them good salaries and have contracts with them for the performance of certain duties. They know what they have to do. I say, 'Boys, here is your service to perform; do it.'

"The Symphony players are subsidized and others that are not so favored find they do not get along so well.

"All there is about it is that if this takes ten minutes extra from my time the Symphony in Boston will stop. There is no use telling that to the musicians. They already know that. I pay them well and am satisfied as long as they render their services in return. Just as soon as players tell me that they cannot do what I require, I will tell them the same thing that your employer would tell you if you said you would do as you please: 'There's the door.'

"There is no danger of this, however. The Symphony players are interested in their art. Their positions enable them to follow this art to the best of their ability. If there is trouble to be settled it will have to be between the Symphony players and the other musicians. I have nothing to do with it."

Walter Damrosch said yesterday to a SUN reporter that the action of the union in regard to the musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was entirely justified.

"So long as the Musical Union is to be recognized at all," he said, "there is no reason at all why the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra should not be compelled to join just as all other musicians are. I never brought a musician to this country in my life that he was not compelled to join the union, and merely because Col. Higginson happens to be a millionaire that is no reason why an exception should be made to favor his orchestra.

"The tyranny of the union to-day in some circles is due to the activity of a certain member who rivals Sam Parks in his method of dealing with the musicians and with the men whom he has to employ."

What was said by the union men in the orchestra after the news of the Boston organization's demand become known was entirely favorable to the management of the orchestra. Several union men made no bones of saying that if the matter came to an issue where they would either have to leave the union or the orchestra, they would quit the union.

Officers of the Mutual Protective Union had a good deal to say about the action of the Boston union. Their organization, they asserted, had not been officially notified as yet of the Boston union's demands, and they were inclined to regard the affair as the act of some person without authority who is seeking to promote unduly the interests of the Boston union. The only reason they could assign for the Boston union's desire to enroll the twenty New York union men on its membership list was that the presence of the Symphony orchestra musicians in the union would at once give it a standing.

Officers of the local union did not hesitate to say that the union members of the Symphony organization were violating the rules of the union in playing with non-union men. But they hardly thought the New York union would do anything toward enforcing its rule while the Symphony Orchestra is in the city.

C. Hampe, a violinist in the orchestra and a non-union man, when asked about the probability of the orchestra becoming unionized, said expressively: "We are not brickbats." Then he added:

"Men like Otto Rothe are not going to desert our patron for any union on the face of the earth. We are all with Mr. Higginson."

Other members of the orchestra, some of them union men, expressed the same opinion.

Baltimore Sun
Dec 9-03

THRONG HEARS MELBA

The Great Singer Appears With Boston Symphony Orchestra.

ELICITS RAPTUROUS APPLAUSE

The Orchestra Produces Some Musical Novelties That Do Not Strike The Audience So Favorably.

The potency of an eminent vocal artist to attract a great audience was never more forcibly illustrated than by the extraordinary outpouring of humanity which filled every corner of the Lyric last night at the second concert of this year's series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Without disparaging in any way the popular interest in the Boston Orchestra it must be said that Melba was responsible for this wonderful gathering. Every seat was occupied and even standing room was difficult to find. The management stated that it was the largest audience that has ever attended a symphony concert except on the occasion of the opening of Music Hall and at that time Melba was also one of the artists.

The concert last night was in many respects a gala occasion. The audience was not only very large, but also representative in the best sense of the word. The program was unusually diversified and the soloist was probably the most attractive that could possibly be secured.

Melba Sings Well.

Mme. Melba chose as her numbers an aria from Mozart's "La Clemenza di Tito" and an aria from Handel's "L'Allegro." The former was not especially interesting, and gave few opportunities to the singer to show the real quality of her voice. It did not seem like Mozart in his usual melodious mood. The air sounded dry and academic, but, unfortunately, or fortunately, depending on the point of view, the artist who sings with the Boston Symphony Orchestra is restricted to a very narrow repertoire of classical selections. This particular composition had sufficient classical backing, but the popular note was painfully absent.

But in the Handel air, which is one of the standard show pieces of the coloratura singers, Mme. Melba was able to give full play to all her vocal graces. The same composition from the hand of a writer less inspired than Handel might have been trivial, but when perfectly sung, as was the case last night, the florid passages, the flute obligato, which is frequently so absurd, seemed perfectly natural and musically beautiful.

The singer's voice has the necessary liquid quality which prevents it from standing out against the flute accompaniment, while her beautiful delivery and exquisite tone quality make her rendition of this most ornate composition a notable achievement.

The applause that was evoked was almost rapturous, but however great the enthusiasm was, Director Gerricke refused to depart from his custom in allowing no encore selections. So the audience went away hungry for more of Melba's beautiful singing.

In the Handel number the flute obligato was played by Mr. Maquarre, who showed himself to be a flutist of extraordinary ability.

The Program.

The following was the program:

Mendelssohn—Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Op. 21.

Mozart—Aria, "Parto Parto," from "La Clemenza di Tito."
(Clarinet obligato by Mr. V. Lebailly.)

Liszt—"The Ideal," Symphonic Poem No. 12.

Handel—Scena, "Sweet bird that shun'st the noise of folly," from "L'Allegro, il Penseroso, ed il Moderato."
(Flute obligato by Mr. A. Marquarre.)

Glazounoff—Symphony No. 4, in E flat, Op. 48.
I—Andante
Allegro moderato
II—Scherzo Allegro vivace.
III—Andante.
Allegro.

Russian Symphony.

It was the first time that the sonorous name of Glazounoff had figured on the program of a symphony concert in Baltimore. This gentleman is one of the young Russians, just as there is a very noisy school of young Italians, and it is a very pretty idea on the part of Mr. Gericke to give the young men a chance. But either the temperature in the theatre was too high or the symphony came too late on the program—in any case, it failed to make a deep impression. It has a good deal of local color. Folksongs are used to some extent, and there is much cleverness displayed in spots, but it left the audience cold, or would have done so if the hall had not resembled a superheated oven.

The young composer from Russia will doubtless be heard, and it is possible that this selfsame symphony, under other conditions, would be interesting, but Mr. Gericke was not especially considerate in offering such a big thing by a relatively little man when there is so much that would be welcome. But on the other hand it would be difficult to find out what is going on in music unless some novelties were presented from time to time.

The Liszt Composition.

The wise musical seers at present have nothing but praise for the musical creations of Liszt, but it is very hard for the layman to keep pace with this modern Lisztian cult. The canny Abbé was a great virtuoso; he did much to make the Wagnerian music dramas possible; he was an ardent promoter of other musical interests, but as a composer he has frequently bitten off more than he could digest. And in any case program music does not seem to be in order nowadays. Tone poems without words are very empty. And the particular Liszt composition that was played last night had all the idiosyncracies of the Weimar master. Schiller's poem "Die Ideale" inspired the work, but it would require a chart and compass to keep up with "the ideals" as they are portrayed in music by Liszt. There are some beautiful moments along with some evidences of tawdriness and noisiness.

The chaste but rather un-Shakespearean overtrure to Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music was interesting as showing how completely Director Gericke had his men in hand. Everything was superbly played, but some very good playing was wasted in somewhat indifferent music.

On the whole, the concert without Melba would have been decidedly tame, but to hear her sing one line of her second aria was well worth an entire concert.

BALTIMORE AMERICAN,
DECEMBER 9, 1903.

GREAT CROWD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Excellent Program Splendidly Rendered Before Critical and Appreciative Audience.

For its second concert of the present season the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Gericke, gave at the Lyric last evening the following excellent program:

Mendelssohn—
Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," op. 21.

Mozart—
Aria, "Parto, parto," from "La Clemenza di Tito" (clarinet obligato by Mr. V. Lebailly).

Liszt—
"The Ideal," Symphonic Poem No. 12.

Handel—
Scena, "Sweet bird that shun'st the noise of folly," from "L'Allegro, il Penseroso, ed il Moderato" (flute obbligato by Mr. A. Maquarre).

Glazounoff—
Symphony No. 4, in E flat, op. 48.
I. Andante.
Allegro moderato.
II. Scherzo: Allegro vivace.
III. Andante.
Allegro.

Soloist:
MME. MELBA.

Of the orchestral numbers the Mendelssohn overture was very formless to the listeners, but it was so finely rendered that it was highly enjoyed. The Liszt "Symphonic Poem," No. 12, has been heard several times in Baltimore, but has never been considered equal to the Tasso poem, "The Lament and Triumph," which, having some realism as a basis, is more readily followed and comprehended. In the "Ideals" Liszt follows Schiller's poem, presenting the rising of noble aspirations and ideals, followed by their sinking in the inevitable struggle with the actual realities of life.

The third orchestral number, the Glazounoff Symphony, was evidently kept to the last as being the most brilliant and attractive work of the evening. This new Russian composer is little known in Baltimore, and this was the first performance of any of his symphonies here. As a composer he is rather cosmopolitan than Russian. His work suggests the melody and tenderness of the Scandinavian composers, Gade, Grieg and Hamerik; while some of the subjects, and their mode of treatment remind the hearer also of the modern Italian music of Mascagni; while there is but little resemblance to the modern Russian school of Tschaikowsky. However, his excellent work is original and suggestive rather than reminiscent. He is no copyist, but works along his own chosen line.

Melba was the star of the evening. The crowded house proved the drawing power of good vocal music. For while the Boston Orchestra always draws a large audience, Melba could have filled the house without it. She sang but two numbers, and both of these were from the old classic school of Handel and Mozart. The "Parto" aria is not the greatest nor the best in Mozart's beautiful opera, "The Mercy of Titus," and she sang it only fairly well. It has a range of less than two octaves, while the great aria in the opera, "Non piu di fiori," is preceded by a beautiful recitative, is longer and requires a compass of two and a third octaves. Her triumph was in the Handel aria, "Sweet bird that shunn't the noise of folly." This she gave in fine style, with all its Handelian roulades, appoglaturos, turns and trills. She was beautifully accompanied by the orchestra and the flute obligato of Mr. A. Maquarre.

After this number the audience recalled her several times, but it was at length understood that a Boston Symphony program is always complete as printed, and no provision is ever made for extra songs for encores.

The audience was the largest the Boston Orchestra has ever had in Baltimore.

PHILADELPHIA RECORD,
DECEMBER 8, 1903.

Melba and the Boston Symphony. Academy of Music.

At her matinee recital a few weeks ago Madame Melba clearly established her claim to be considered as infinitely the superior of any living coloratura soprano. At last evening's Boston Symphony concert, in the Academy of Music, she performed the extraordinary feat of eclipsing even herself. All her past local achievements were completely overshadowed by one of the most superb exhibitions of lyric art that has ever taken place within the music-hallowed walls of the Academy. For a triumph of such proportions due credit must be given to her very appropriate and fitting selection. The public has long been so accustomed to enthuse over the charms of Melba's voice as heard in such convicted show pieces as the "Mad Scene" from "Lucia" and the sugary waltz from "Romeo and Juliet" that it was to some extent unprepared to hear the cantatrice in something really worthy of her lyricism. The Aria "Parto, parto," from Mozart's "La Clemenza di Tito," which was her first selection in last evening's program, proved only a foretaste for the glories that were to follow in her later rendition of "Sweet Bird that Shun'st the Noise of Folly," from Handel's cantata, "L'Allegro, il Penseroso, ed il Moderato." If this cena is not of any marvelous worth as a musical conception it is at least far superior to Melba's usual lyrical vehicles, and is deliciously refreshing in its antique simplicity. It is, however, its pre-eminent suitability to the singer's voice that made the occasion so memorable. Years of search would fail to reveal any selection that could so radiantly disclose every attribute of the Australian soprano's art. The rosiest word-painting must fail to do justice to her supremely thrilling rendition of this work. Other singers doubtless excel Melba in sentiment, passion, feeling and dramatic power, but as a coloratura artiste she is unrivaled.

The remainder of the concert similarly attained a noble standard of musical excellence. Mendelssohn's "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Ideal," were almost flawlessly given, while Beethoven's Symphony No. 2 was interpreted with a keen appreciation of its manifold beauties.

[58]

BALTIMORE MORNING HERALD
DECEMBER 9, 1903.

MELBA DISAPPOINTING.

Famous Singer Heard With Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was given last night at the Lyric, was a distinct disappointment in more ways than one. Madame Melba was the soloist, and her name proved sufficient attraction to completely fill the hall with an enormous audience. Many had heard her before, but one and all were anxious to hear the world-famed singer. To those who are familiar with her wonderful voice a feeling of regret must have pervaded their spirits, and those who heard her for the first time doubtless felt that her prowess has been overrated. True, she received a genuine and rapturous ovation after her second appearance, for what will not the magic name of a great artist do? But underlying the apparent heartiness of the applause there was the unmistakable impression that it was given more for what she has done than for what she did last night.

Nine years ago, when the Lyric was opened under the name of the Music Hall, Madame Melba appeared as one of the many soloists of that occasion and sang the same scena with flute obbligato. But what changes those nine years have effected! The flutist is no more, having been drowned in the terrible disaster of the sinking of La Bourgogne. He has been succeeded by a younger man, whose performance was equally good, but the artist's voice has certainly much deteriorated. It has lost that purity of tone and that remarkable flutelike quality that were its great charms. Formerly Melba's voice and the flute sounded as two flutes. Always cold, the artist has gained nothing in warmth, and even her flexible vocal technique is not the equal of past times. Altogether Melba was a disappointment, not alone in her second number, Handel's scena "Sweet Bird That Shun'st the Noise of Folly," from "L'Allegro, Il Penseroso, ed it Moderato," with fluce obbligato, but also in Mozart's aria "Parto, Parto," from La "Clemenza di Tito."

The program was not of the most interesting character, and Mr. Gericke was very insistent in placing the symphony at the end. The symphony, in E flat, by Glazounoff, is new to Baltimoreans. The composer is quite a modern writer, having been born in 1865. There can be no doubt that he is possessed of a musical soul and has a romantic temperament, but the work itself, while exceedingly sweet, is not very striking in its thematic conception. Sweet it is from beginning to end, and, in fact, it is too sweet, too sugary to be entirely palatable. But it is gorgeously orchestrated, and the instrumentation saves it from the shelf. The scherzo contained the best material and was by far the most interesting of the three movements.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Melba Appears as Soloist at a Notable Concert.

The rare combination of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Melba as soloist attracted to the Academy of Music last night an audience almost as large as the house could hold. Every box and every seat was occupied and the "standees" were out in full force. It was distinctly a Melba night, too, for the crowd was evidently there to hear the great soprano and even the peerless Boston orchestra was for once obliged to take second place. Melba was looking her best being quite radiant in a bespangled gown of pink and white, with a wreath of pink roses in her hair, and was in her best trim vocally, although it must be acknowledged that her first selection was something of a disappointment. The "Parto, Parto," aria from Mozart's forgotten opera of "La Clemenza di Tito," is of a broad, declamatory style little suited to Melba's voice, with an absence of that ornamentation which one always looks for in her vocalism. It was, of course, sung with great beauty of tone, and with sustained power and admirable finish, but it was in her second number, "Sweet Bird That Shun'st the Noise of Folly," from Handel's "L'Allegro, il Penseroso, ed il Moderato," that Melba fairly outdid herself. This is saying a great deal, to be sure, but it is true. Even her amazing performance of the two "Mad Scenes," from Donizetti's "Lucia" and Thomas's "Hamlet," which aroused enthusiasm at her recent appearance here with her own concert company, were overshadowed by her wonderful rivalry of the flute last night, in the bird-like trills, runs and staccato notes of the Handel composition. It was such a brilliant achievement of the very perfection of vocal art as is seldom listened to, and even Melba has never before, it is quite safe to say, given us anything so fine. No encores were given, which was an evident disappointment to many, but there was no breaking of the established rule for these concerts even on so rare an occasion.

The orchestra seemed less interesting than usual, though it should scarcely be said less competent. Was it because Melba was there and she, for the night, was supreme? The "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture of Mendelssohn could not have been more beautifully played. Always alluring, it was unusually so as listened to last night, the fairy music being in particular most exquisitely rendered. But "The Ideal," Liszt's Symphonic Poem, No. 12, was not so attractive. Beautiful it is, rife with poetic suggestion and melodious effects, not frilled with the extravagant ornamentation which those who decry Liszt put down as mere "showiness" and "flashy folderol." Of no such quality is this tone poem, for one must acknowledge the composer's worth and admire his work while considering this example of his skill. Still it fell somewhat short of the desired effect last night, and the orchestra was not all that it is capable of being in the rendition. The symphony was Beethoven's in D major, No. 2, that bright, buoyant expression of a joy the composer could not have felt as he wrote it in illness and the despair of increasing deafness. But it has the charm of youthful spirits and the gladness of a happy life, and the performance was in line with Mr. Gericke's best accomplishment. The second concert of the second series will be held to-morrow evening, Miss Aus Der Ohe, pianist, being the soloist.

EVENING TELEGRAPH,

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1903.

Mme. Melba and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It is just ten years since Madame Melba made her debut before an American audience, instantly achieving that high distinction and winning that interested admiration which she has ever since retained. The anniversary was marked last evening by her reappearance at the Academy of Music as soloist in the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first series for the present season. The selections of her numbers on the programme can hardly be attributed to her choice, as she has always heretofore shown excellent tact and discriminating judgment in offering to the public such compositions as afford her the best opportunity and give her hearers the highest satisfaction.

Neither of the two pieces rendered last evening answer these somewhat exacting requirements. The Mozart aria, "Parto, Parto," from "La Clemenza di Tito," is of too remote interest and is too obscure in outline to be acceptable in a popular concert. The composition is one of Mozart's failures, and is rarely given except as an example of his ability to make an entire departure from his usual methods. It is dry, thin, and technical in the score, lacking musical quality, and having as its main element a declamatory character quite foreign to anything we expect from the thrilling vocalization of this melodious cantatrice.

On the other hand, the scene from Handel, a song beginning "Sweet bird," is virtually a show piece, like the music lesson in "The Barber of Seville," the mad scene in "Lucia," or the tour de force of the garden scene in "The Puritans." In the expert pyrotechnics of Handel's exhibition piece, Mme. Melba was, of course, splendidly effective, as goes without saying; but in the mere rendition of technical coruscations her excellence is fully equalled by the wonderful vocal exercises we have heard from Mme. Nordica, Mme. Sembrich and Mme. Gadski, while in that sympathetic coloratura which Mme. Melba has made her own province, she has no equal in the musical world.

The opening number of the programme was the glorious overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," which gave Felix Mendelssohn, while still a youth, a place among the greatest composers of Germany. The "fairylike" music of this delightful overture is given its distinctive qualities, naturally enough, by the first violins, and it can only be said that their rendition of their score last evening was simply perfection. The art of concerted playing can no further go, and the supreme effort of the violin was fully and adequately supported by the reserved power of the entire orchestra, marvellously controlled and held in reserve by the magic wand of Master Gericke.

A striking number of the first section was the Symphonic Poem, entitled "The Ideal," by Franz Liszt. This is truly a grand composition, giving a new conception of Liszt's power and varied ability. In the dignity and majestic sweep of its grander passages this work is worthy of a place among the great masterpieces of Bach and Beethoven and their immediate successors. The symphony of the occasion was Beethoven's Opus 36, in D major, of which all four parts were given. This symphony, although written after the clouds of affliction had settled on Beethoven's life, is full of the expressions of the pleasure of existence. The gayety and charm of song, the sweetness of melody, and the inspiration of noble harmonies are most charmingly embodied in this masterpiece of the greatest of all composers.

PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER,

DECEMBER 8, 1903

Second Monday Evening Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second Monday evening concert at the Academy of Music under the direction of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke last night, when the program included Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture, Liszt's symphonic poem entitled "The Ideal," and Beethoven's Second Symphony in D major, op. 36, all of which selections were rendered in a manner which exhibited the full significance of the music and communicated its utmost beauty.

The Liszt number was not particularly interesting, being rather more empty and disappointing than is usual even with Liszt, who is for the most part chiefly front, but it was most impressively interpreted, while the reading of the symphony, in its delicacy, in its lucidity, in its eloquence and in its unfailing refinement was an unalloyed delight. It is hardly necessary to say that the fairy music of Mendelssohn had a most brilliant presentation. In that kind of thing particularly the Boston Orchestra is quite unrivalled.

Mme. Melba was the soloist. Owing to a recent indisposition she was not in the best of voice, and in her opening number, an air from Mozart's opera, "La Clemenza di Tito," she was not in her element, anyhow. The "Sweet bird" of Handel went much better and there were persistent demands for an encore, which Mr. Gericke's judicious and unchangeable rule upon the subject prevented Mme. Melba from according. There was an audience in attendance which crowded the house in every part, and there was no lack of applause.

The Orchestra will be heard here again tomorrow evening, when it will play Meethoven's "Fidelio" overture, the first movement of Smetana's symphonic poem, "My Country," Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" symphony, and, with Miss Aus der Ohe, Huss' Concerto in B major for pianoforte.

NORTH AMERICAN,

DECEMBER 8, 1903.

Academy—Madame Melba.

Mr. Gericke and his band of a hundred musicians from Boston, with Mme. Melba as soloist, filled the Academy of Music last evening with concord of sweet sounds, punctuated by prolonged bursts of applause from listening thousands.

It was a thing to store away among memory's cherished treasures — this fortunate conjunction of the leading symphonic organization of the New World with the greatest of living lyric sopranos.

Academic Proficiency.

This Boston Orchestra attracts and allures by virtue of its serene and academic proficiency. Its skilful and experienced instrumentalists scarcely need a human metronome as a regulator of tempi. All is clear, precise and classically correct — "faultily faultless, icily regular"—a magnificent musical mechanism, acutely responsive to the loftiest efforts of inspired genius.

For an orchestra body so highly equipped, the practical bounds of musical expression and interpretation are identical with the artistic limitations imposed by nature and habit upon its conductor.

If the baton be swung without inspiration or enthusiasm, what does it all amount to? Mere perfunctory scraping and blowing. But Mr. Gericke's band of instrumentalists, instinct with the genius of harmony, carry all before them to lofty heights of musical inspiration.

Last evening it was not quite so much the band as the singer that captivated alike jaded critical attention and the greedy ears of the populace. Where Mme. Melba is, there she reigns supreme. A single graceful and gracious woman, with a Voice outweighs in public estimation many instruments of wood and brass.

MADAME MELBA

A Personal Triumph for Melba.

Thus the Boston Orchestra's concert last night, under Mr. Gericke, assumed the aspect of a personal triumph for Mme. Melba. Doubtless this was foreseen, for the orchestral numbers were familiar and conventional to the general ear—"Midsummer Night's Dream," overture; Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Ideals," and Beethoven's second symphony, in D major. These standard orchestral works were played with fluent precision and characteristic perspicacity by the great orchestra. The rippling gaiety of the Mendelssohn overture, the splendid woodwind passages, and polyphonic climaxes in the Liszt composition; the fantastic grace and wayward caprice of the Beethoven symphony, all were borne upon the ears of listening thousands as though by some potent enchanter's spell.

For her concert selections on this occasion Mme. Melba went far afield in the "Parto, parto" aria from Mozart's "Clemenza di Tito," with clarinet obligato and Haendel's "Sweet bird" scena and aria with its bewitching flute obligato, the latter finely played by Mr. Maquarre, of the Boston Orchestra.

Audience Enthusiastic.

The Mozart aria, in its simple form and persistent adherence to the middle register, is not well suited to Mme. Melba's high range and distinctive vocal method. The cantatrice was heard to advantage, however, in the brilliant finale, which aroused the audience to a high pitch of enthusiasm.

In the Haendel aria the diva was in her element. The lovely tone quality of her upper register, her amazing facility of execution and the prodigious tour de force of the final trill were rare and delightful surprises, at once charming and bewildering. It was a genuine triumph of bel canto, the like of which has not been disclosed here for many a year.

The programme for the Wednesday evening concert of the Boston band includes Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" Symphony, Beethoven's "Fidelio" Overture, Smetana's "Vysehrad" Symphonic Poem and Huss' B Major Concerto for piano and orchestra, with Adele Aus der Ohe as soloist.

PHILADELPHIA PRESS,

DECEMBER 8, 1903.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Melba in Classic Fioriturl—Beethoven's Second Interpreted.

With a program rich in romanticism and the added attraction of the nightingale of song, Madame Melba, it was little wonder that every seat in the Academy of Music was filled last night on the occasion of the second concert, first serious, of the Boston Orchestra.

The numbers read were as follows:—

Mendelssohn.Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Op. 21.
Mozart—Aria, "Parto, parto," from "La Clemenza di Tito"
(Clarionet obbligato by Mr. V. Lebailly).
Liszt....."The Ideal," Symphonic Poem No. 12
Handel—Scena, "Sweet bird that shun'st the noise of folly," from "L' Allegro, il Penseroso, ed il Moderato."
(Flute obbligato by Mr. A. Maquarre).
Beethoven—Symphony in D major, No. 2, Op. 36
Soloist, Mme. Melba.

Notwithstanding the recent and satisfying interpretation by Mr. Scheel of of the Mendelssohn overture, a repetition of the number by Mr. Gericke was none the less interesting, as the orchestra was in fine fettle, and gave a rendering quite in accord with the spirit of the conductor's reading, a reading reserved and poetic, and meriting the generous applause that followed.

As Madame Melba was not able to sing in Boston on Saturday night in consequence of illness, her Philadelphia friends anxiously awaited the hour of the concert, fearing that the queen of song would be compelled to cancel her engagement. But Madame Melba never disappoints unless something positive and uncontrollable interferes with her obligation to the public. So, at the conclusion of the overture, the fair singer appeared, and responded to her enthusiastic reception with gracious smiles and bows, giving under the trying conditions of a cold a conscientious rendering of an aria that requires from the vocalist to the last degree those qualities of musical instinct and consummate technique that is only possible to an artist of Madame Melba's equipment. Whatever hint of her recent indisposition may have been shown in the Mozart number, there was nothing but Melba at her best in the Handel aria, with its familiar florid effects and imitative echoes.

The less said about the Liszt symphonic poem the better. The composition, aside from the beautiful prelude with the solo for the horn, does not fulfill intentions. The work as a whole is profoundly uninteresting, and was in no wise redeemed by Mr. Gericke's reading, which was academic and wooden to the last degree. In fact, this number and the way in which it was taken came near spoiling the evening, which, however, reached the usual level of high-class excellence in the placid and pleasing interpretation of the Beethoven symphony. Mr. Gericke has arranged better orchestral programs and conducted better concerts. So far as the crowded house went it was decidedly of the opinion that it was a Melba night, and it made the most of her wonderful voice and art.

Madame Melba is so much pleased with the warmth of her reception on her concert tour that she has generously decided to postpone the date of her sailing so that she may keep faith with her Boston admirers.

The second concert of the second series will be given at the Academy of Music to-morrow evening, with Miss Aus der Ohe as the soloist.

PUBLIC LEDGER,

DECEMBER 8, 1903

MELBA IN CONCERT

The Popular Prima Donna with the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Madame Melba was the soloist at the second Monday evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the classical selections she had made for the occasion Mr. Gericke framed in this familiar programme:

Overture, "Midsummer Night's Dream."
Aria, "Parto, Parto"..... Mendelssohn
Symphonic poem, "Die Ideale"..... Mozart
Scena, "Sweet Bird"..... Liszt
Symphony in D major, No. 2..... Handel
..... Beethoven

The Mozart aria, from "La Clemenza di Tito," is quite outside the range of Madame Melba's excellence. It is a piece of serious declamation, with very little embellishment, which does not employ the best part of her voice, and depends wholly upon a breadth of style and a distinction of delivery that are not among her remarkable attainments. It was altogether disappointing. On the other hand, the familiar flute song from "L'Allegro," a favorite with light sopranos, she sang with extraordinary brilliancy and beauty, in that rich, full, golden upper voice that is always a fresh wonder. Nothing could excel the perfect evenness and smoothess of the runs, the clearness and roundness of the great staccato notes, or the bewildering splendor of the full voiced trill. Madame Melba's English, with its troublesome consonants, is seldom as clear as her Italian vowels, so that in this, as in some other respects, Donizetti and the others suit her better than Handel. But such firm execution as hers in so marvelous a voice is always a delight to hear.

The prima donna's appearance had drawn something of the same extra crowd that greeted her at a recent afternoon concert, a crowd that evidently expected the same generous response to encores, and was more persistent than discriminating in its applause. The orchestra was naturally overshadowed in these demonstrations. There was a lovely performance of the overture, and Mr. Gericke gave a very studious, analytical reading of the Liszt composition, which did not, however, put it among the most interesting of the series. It is one of those in which the reiteration of the themes carries no obvious suggestion, and leads to no apparent result. Yet parts of it—leaving out all reference to a programme—are extremely beautiful, and the work of the orchestra was admirable in tone, color and in rhythmic feeling.

The lovely and joyous second symphony was illtreated in being placed at the end of so mixed a programme, except that it asserted itself in its pure beauty and its transparent dignity, as it will always and anywhere, making no exaction upon the hearer except to listen and enjoy. It was played, as Mr. Gericke has played it before, with an even sentiment, and a clear, bright execution, and it supplied the real musical substance of the concert.

PHILADELPHIA PRESS,

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1903.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Second Concert of the Second Series—Aus der Ohe the Soloist.

At the Academy of Music last night the Boston Orchestra gave the second concert of the second series. The programe was interesting in make-up and read as follows:—

Beethoven .....Overture to "Fidelio," Op. 72
Huss,
Concerto in B major, for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 10.
(First time at these concerts.)
Smetana,
Symphonic Poem, "Vysehrad" (No. 1 of the Cycle, "My Country").
Hector Berlioz,
"Harold in Italy," Symphony in Four Movements, with Alto Solo, Op. 16.
(Viola Solo by Mr. E. Ferir.)
Soloist,
Miss Adele Aus Der Ohe.

The overture, as read by the conductor and read by the orchestra, was in the full sense of the word complete. Mr. Gericke was alive to the beauties of the score, and the promise of the opening allegro was fulfilled in the flow of beautiful music that reached a climax in the presto of the coda. The pleasant impression made by the Beethoven number was somewhat disturbed by the vehement, but, it must be confessed, unsatisfactory, piano concerto by an American composer, Mr. Huss, that followed.

Mr. Huss is undoubtedly endowed with talent of a high order, and his fecundity in invention and skill in working out elaborations is exhibited in the concerto, a composition that has as its obvious raison d'etre the exploitation of virtuosity, and in that respect the composer meets with signal success, as the work abounds in difficulties that can only be met by an artist whose technical equipment is of the order of Miss Aus der Ohe, who gave to the rendering of the composition the best of her resources. Notwithstanding the magnificent work of the pianist, it must be confessed, on a first hearing at least, that the concerto fails to make a deep impression on the score of pure music. It is true that there is more than a hint of beauty in many of the passages, but, unfortunately, the virtuoso idea has so completely dominated the composer as to lead him quickly, if not abruptly, from motives that are worthy of a different treatment than Mr. Huss has seen fit to give.

The disappointment occasioned by the Liszt number at the Monday concert was atoned for in the truly poetic and colorful "Vysehrad." The programatic scheme is consistently developed by the composer, and the story was enveloped in an atmosphere of rich tone created by the orchestra in obedience to the masterful reading of Mr. Gericke.

As December 11 will mark the lapse of 100 years from the birth of Berlioz it was fitting that some musical note should be made of the fact, so Mr. Gericke gave the "Harold in Italy." While the work is marked by qualities that are characteristic of the composer—qualities that have been aptly described as rolling with a storm of billows and a flash of scattering spray—still the work as a whole has never made more than a passing impression.

The symphony was given with every attention to detail, and whatever beauty the work may possess was certainly revealed by the orchestra in its rendering of Mr. Gericke's lucid reading. Mr. Ferir, the first viola of the orchestra, played the solo parts in a manner that proves him to be a musician of fine feeling and with a magnificent tone.

[59]

NORTH AMERICAN,

DECEMBER 10, 1903.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA WINS LOUD APPLAUSE

Miss Aus Der Ohe Admirably Plays a Concerto by an American Composer.

WAS DEDICATED TO HER

A feature in the Boston Orchestra's concert, at the Academy of Music last evening, was Henry H. Huss' concerto for piano and orchestra, in B major. Mr. Huss is one of the few American composers whose works figure in the Boston band's repertory.

This concerto, composed a dozen years ago, was dedicated to Miss Aus der Ohe. Hence, perhaps, its persistence where this charming pianiste appears in public.

Its three movements follow closely the accepted conventional forms, with much elaboration in the working out of ample thematic material. Florid development and excessive technical complexity are this concerto's salient characteristics; it carries no message of musical inspiration. Miss Aus der Ohe's playing was admirable, especially in the brilliant and stormy final movement.

Smetana's first composition for his "Fatherland" cycle—a Bohemian "symphonic poem," descriptive of the glory and decline of Vysehrad fortress—was listened to with interest. The ill-starred Bohemian genius has written nothing finer than this, and its interpretation by Mr. Gericke was refined and poetic.

Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" symphony, the viola solo passages played by Ed. Ferir, was the chief instrumental number. Mr. Ferir earned a round of applause, and the orchestral treatment of the first three movements was flawless. The furious spirit of the concluding movement was but partially and spasmodically indicated.

The "Fidelio" overture—that used as a prelude to the opera nowadays—was first on the programme—a Beethoven classic classically performed.

PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER,

DECEMBER 10, 1903

Second Wednesday Evening Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

The second concert in the Wednesday evening series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at the Academy of Music last evening. Although the unpleasant weather which prevailed had its natural effect upon the attendance, there was a good-sized audience present, and the occasion was not less than usually enjoyable. The most notable feature of the program was the Concerto in B major for pianoforte and orchestra by the American composer, Henry Huss. This had not before been played in this city and it proved to be very well worth hearing.

It is a strongly written and deeply interesting work, strikingly original in its conception, extremely skillful in its development, sincere in its feeling, poetic in its inspiration, and charmingly melodious in its themes. It is projected in the modern manner, engaging all the resources of the orchestra, and while it effectively exhibits the solo instrument, it is essentially symphonic in its nature and the part given to the orchestra is not less impressive and important than that assigned to the pianoforte. The latter, which is immensely difficult, was played by Miss Adele Aus der Ohe with power and breadth and brilliancy and seeming ease, and while it is characteristic of her manner to be rather cold and hard, the lovely andante was rendered with no lack of sympathetic tenderness. It will be a pleasure to hear this music again.

The remainder of the program comprised the "Fidelio" overture of Beethoven, the symphonic poem "Vysehrad" by Smetana and the "Harold in Italy" symphony of Berlioz. It was all admirably interpreted, and while the "Harold" symphony, with its attempt to follow a specific program, and to portray a succession of distinct scenes, does not appeal to every taste, it contains many beauties to which Mr. Gericke did ample justice. The viola solo which it introduces was admirably played by Mr. E. Ferir. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will next be heard here on Monday evening, January 11.

PHILADELPHIA RECORD,

DECEMBER 10, 1903.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Miss Aus Der Ohe the Soloist at Last Night's Concert.

With the exception of Beethoven's Fidelio overture there was little that was familiar, but, on the other hand, much that was decidedly interesting in last evening's program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Academy of Music. To local music-lovers the absolute novelty of the occasion was Henry Holden Huss' piano concerto in B major, which was interpreted by Adele Aus Der Ohe. It is a somewhat showy work, in which, however, there is a virile melodic background and as a medium for the display of virtuosity it is unquestionably effective. Miss Aus Der Ohe had evidently a keen appreciation of this latter quality, for never has her magnificent technique been more strikingly exhibited than at last night's concert. But, for all that, she is in no wise a spectacular performer. Superficiality is happily a minus quantity in her artistic make-up, and depth and sincerity animate her interpretation of even more avowed show pieces than Mr. Huss' work. Two other rather unusual numbers completed the program. They were Smetana's inspiring symphonic poem, Vysehad (No. 1 of the cycle "My Country") and Berlioz's odd and picturesque symphony, "Harold in Italy." Both were too well given to admit of any adverse criticism, beyond remarking that a trifle more elasticity and abandon on Mr. Gericke's part would not have been amiss in the frenzied "Orgy of Brigands," which is the subject of the final movement of the symphony. The viola solo portions of this Berlioz work were beautifully and sympathetically interpreted by E. Ferir.

NEW YORK PRESS.

DECEMBER 11, 1903.

YOUTHFUL COMPOSER DELIGHTS AUDIENCE

Dohnanyi a Revelation, as Interpreted by Boston Symphony.

Last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Music Hall was an event of tremendous importance. In fact, it may prove epoch-making in the annals of New York's concert life; and, for this reason, it was the occasion of the first performance here of Ernst von Dohnanyi's Symphony in D minor.

This bald statement may sound absurd to the casual reader. The true significance of it lies, however, in the fact this work revealed a genius who, in the opinion of at least one unprejudiced listener, will prove some day one of the world's great composers, if life sustains the glowing promises of the present. Dohnanyi is only 26 years old. It is therefore natural that his symphony should show many signs of youth and often speak eloquently in the idiom of other composers, especially Brahms. But the elements of a genius are always apparent even in the stumbling efforts of childhood, and in Dohnanyi these elements are so remarkably clear and in this symphony they are worked out with a musical mastership of such surprising profundity for one of his age that only extreme stolidity or an absolute absence of musical insight could fail to recognize their real importance even after a single hearing.

It is impossible to go into any explanatory details after an evening concert, when a work of such great moment has been heard for the first time. A mere expression of enthusiasm and statement of a deep personal conviction must suffice at such a time.

Unsatisfactory as this method is, it may carry a message to some who have not heard, and perchance may cause some who have heard and not seen to look a little closer. Dohnanyi's name should be written in big letters in the mind of every person interested in the progress of music. The young composer's future will speak for itself. We shall see.

The chief popular attraction of last night's concert was the appearance of Mme. Melba as the soloist. Instead of the aria from "Titus," which the programme announced, the prima donna sang the "Zeffiretti" aria from Mozart's "Idomeneus"—sang it with the clear, open bell-like tones characteristic of one of the world's most wonderful voices. Her second number was the one printed on the list—Handel's "Sweet Bird That Shun'st the Noise of Folly," from "Lallegro, il Penseroso, ed il Moderato," the flute obligato being played by A. Maquarre. In this piece Mme. Melba displayed her remarkable coloratura. Is there any singer who can trill on high A and B with such unrestrained vocal power and ringing clarity? Mme. Melba received a storm of applause, but refused to give an encore.

There was another change on last night's programme—a regrettable one. Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music was played instead of Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Ideal." The final number was the familiar Academic Overture by Brahms—a favorite piece in the repertory of the Boston Orchestra. Mr. Gericke led his men with more enthusiasm than usual; in fact, he conducted almost con amore during the Dohnanyi symphony. The wonderful band of Boston musicians was never heard to better advantage.

THE WORLD:

DECEMBER 11, 1903.

MELBA'S RETURN A NEW TRIUMPH.

Prima Donna the Soloist of the Boston Symphony Concert.

Nellie Melba made her appearanace last night at Carnegie Hall after an absence of several years. The occasion was the Boston Symphony concert. The auditorium was crowded.

Mme. Melba has changed little in appearance. And her voice! What new and extravagant adjectives of praise must be invented to describe this heaven-sent vocal mechanism! The tones simply purl from her throat as if physical effort did not enter into the reckoning. Melba's trill still lives, vibrates with a musical grace that is bewitching. What cares the audience whether Melba phrases Mozart's music with a grace that is not classic, whether or not she voices the deeper musical meaning of the composition? It simply applauds frantically and regrets with every moment that the "no-encore rule" is in force at these concerts.

In place of the aria from "Titus" originally announced Melba sang the Zeffiretti aria from Mozart's "Idomeneo," and as a second number Handel's familiar "Sweet Bird." In the latter the beauty of her voice was thrown into still higher relief by the marvellously mellow flute obligato played by the first flutist of the orchestra, Maguarre.

The orchestra, conducted by Mr. Gericke, played a novelty, Dohnanyi's Symphony in D minor. This was the first hearing of the work here, and there seems to be little in it to warrant a repetition. Dohnanyi has little to say and he says it stutteringly.

The rest of the programme was made up of Mendelssohn's overture to "Midsummer Night's Dream" and Brahms's Academic Overture.

THE SUN, FRIDAY.

DECEMBER 11, 1903.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

First Performance Here of a Symphony by Young Ernst Dohnanyi.

With the passing of the months the visits of the Boston Symphony Orchestra recur all too slowly. The second concert of the present season took place last night at Carnegie Hall, and it brought with it the magic name of Melba, accompanied by one of those dispiriting slips in the programme announcing that the soprano was suffering from the after effects of a recent cold. She sang a Mozart aria and the perennial "Sweet Bird" of Handel.

In the first number the evidences of the cold were plain, for the simple cantilena of Mozart is a sad revealer of vocal deficiencies. In the Handel selection, however, Mme. Melba's voice was in better condition. She sang the song with great brilliancy and a plenitude of tone that was quiet inspiring. Her voice is really better in quality than it was in her last operatic season here.

Some of the silver plating is worn off, to be sure, but the metal underneath is good. There is beauty enough in that voice to stock half a dozen aspiring neophytes of the Paris Grand Opera. Melba does not radiate temperament, and she is far from being a past mistress of the art of song, but she can fight a duel with a flute as well as any other contemporaneous soprano, and she can trill a trill that spreads with such a crescendo as to ravish the ear.

There were other features on the programme besides Melba. The Boston Symphony Orchestra was also heard, and with it came a new symphony by young Ernst Dohnanyi, the gifted Bohemian pianist, who delighted the inner brotherhood when he was here. Dohnanyi set out on the journey toward the Elysian fields of art with his soul prostrate at the feet of Schumann, but he fell a victim to the worship of Brahms. Now, the result was not hard to foresee.

He tried to translate gypsy music of Bohemia through the idioms of Schumann into the transcendental speculations of Brahms. Brahms himself was something of a Schumannite, especially in his piano music; so the road was not so crooked, after all. Nay, more, Brahms himself dallied with the czardas rips and scintillations of Hungarian themes.

But Brahms, Bless him! never thought of applying the orchestral athletics of Strauss to the music of the nomads. Dohnanyi has the advantage of living in the epoch of the wizard of "Til Eulespiegel," and he knows that when the critics used to abuse piano players for writing piano idioms for orchestra, they did not know what might be done by a young man not afraid of his technic.

Dohnanyi voided most of his Schumannite Brahms in the first movement of his symphony, spiced with acrid harmonies and strident furies of instrumentation which would make Richard Strauss hug himself by his own fireside, could he but hear them in the winds of his chimney corner.

A wild, stormy, Bohemian mountain torrent of a first movement it is, yet with a clear and intelligible form and a respect for the classic traditions in its thoughtful contrast of themes and its points of climactic concentration. It is bold, strong, daring music, this opening movement, original in style and treatment, yet restrained by a respect for the canons of good art.

It is not the sort of music Dohnanyi will write when he is older and more circumspect. Yet, possibly when he reaches the age of prudence we shall yearn for the heyday of his youth, when he slew his thousands of minor seconds and crashed tones together in crude bunches.

The slow movement, which is the second, is a Hungarian fantasia, a gypsy rhapsody, behind which lurks the shadow of the pianistic Strauss, the Strauss who made of the orchestra a titanic guitar. Dohnanyi transforms it into a cyclopean cembalon. The wild sweeps of scales, broken arpeggios and leaping runs are not here saved for the much enduring harp, but are orchestrated in full throated ecstasy.

The virtousity of the entire wood wind is strained to its utmost and the effect on the hearer is one of a mad riot of passionate young blood sporting with music (heavenly maid) out under the starry skies in the lush tenderness of a Bohemian night.

The scherzo is classic in form and orchestral in idiom. It is one of the most closely written movements of the work, tense, masculine, bitterly accentuated and relieved by a trio leaning heavily on a warm pedal point. Then follows an intermezzo, brief and singularly lovely in its reposeful simplicity. Its theme is for viola solo, which was most beautifully played by that poetic artist, Max Zach.

The finale is a theme and variations, ending with the inevitable fugue. It is a scholarly movement, but the scholarship is not paraded for its own sake. It makes interesting music, and brings to a close a thoroughly characteristic and interesting work, which will certainly be heard again in this town if conductors recognize an attractive novelty.

The other numbers were Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture and the "Academic" overture of Brahms. The orchestra was in splendid form last night, and its performance of the immensely difficult symphony of Dohnanyi was a thing to be recalled with delight. Mr. Gericke conducted the work with great sympathy.

N. Y. Herald Dec 11-1903.

MME. MELBA.
PHOTO COPYRIGHTED BY BARNETT, LONDON

THE RETURN OF A POPULAR PRIMA DONNA

MME. MELBA HAS QUITE AN OVATION

After a Long Absence Reappears on the Concert Stage in Carnegie Hall.

GIVEN A HEARTY WELCOME

Her Delightful Singing Is the Feature of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Second Concert of the Season.

The prime feature of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second concert last night in Carnegie Hall was the reappearance in New York after a long absence of Madame Melba, who was the soloist of the occasion. An enthusiastic welcome was extended to her by one of the most brilliant audiences Carnegie Hall has ever held.

It is seldom indeed that anything takes precedence over the orchestra itself at the New York concert of this famous Boston organization, and the exception to the rule last night was due to no lapse by the band and its conductor from their usual high level, for Mr. Gericke's programme was a thoroughly interesting one and his men were in fine feather. But Mme. Melba's return for once overshadowed the players in the public interest.

The prima donna has seldom, if ever, sung more charmingly. Some disappointment was felt that for the first of her announced numbers, the "Parto, Parto," from Mozart's "Titus," there should have been substituted the "Zeffiretti" aria from the same composer's "Idomeneus," a rather less striking passage, but this impression was forgotten in the face of her singing of it.

The tones were the same fresh, limpid ones which every one remembered, and which are so rare after all, and the technique that which recked little of any difficulties of the score. At the close of the aria the house fairly thundered its applause and the singer was brought to the stage a dozen times in vain attempts at a breach of the established anti-encore rules of the Boston orchestra.

Her tour de force came later in the scene from Handel's "L'Allegra il Penserogo ed il Moderato," which begins "Sweet bird that shuns't the noise of folly." This she sang in collaboration with Mr. A. Maquarre, the orchestra's solo flautist, to whose instrument Handel has given a part equal in importance to the vocal melody. This number Mme. Melba has sung before, frequently, but she surpassed herself in it last night. Her bravura was extraordinary, her trilling really flawless, her intonation most accurate. A slice of the credit for the beauty of this number must go to Mr. Maquarre by reason of his admirable contribution to the ensemble.

The orchestral portion of the list also suffered change in the substitution for Liszt's Symphonic Poem No. 12, "The Ideal," of the overture to "Midsummer Night's Dream." Besides this the programme included a symphony in D minor by Ernst von Dohnanyi—heard for the first time in New York—and Brahms' "Academic Festival Overture," opus 80.

Mr. Dohnanyi's symphony will be sure to stir up no end of musical discussion, but whatever denial may be made of its intrinsic value, it will not be and should not be summarily dismissed. As the work of a man of twenty-seven it is beyond question a remarkable composition, with not only stout workmanship and striking ingenuity to recommend it, but some noticeably vital melodic ideas as well. It naturally mirrors Brahms. All of the five movements but the first told with the audience.

There is little need to tell how Mr. Gericke reads the other two works or to enlarge upon his delicate treatment of the accompaniments to Mme. Melba's solos.

In the audience were Mr. and Mrs. George Griswold Haven, Miss Marion Haven, Mr. and Mrs. J. Nelson Borland, Mrs. Stanford White, Mr. and Mrs. Benjamin Guinness, the Hon. Hugo Barring, Mrs. Barnard Mackay, Mrs. Meta Mackay, Mr. and Mrs. Paul D. Cravath, Mrs. C. Devallo Lathrop, Mrs John E. Hadden, Dr. Louis Livingston Seaman, Mr. Haddon Chambers, Prince Troubetskoy, Mr. T. Sanford Beaty, Mr. A. Muray Young, Mrs. Augustus C. Taylor, Mr. Dwight Taylor, Mrs. Edward C. Moore, Mr. Andrew Carnegie, Mr. E. D. Worcester, Jr.; Mrs. C. A. Macy, Jr.; Mr. and Mrs. Charles Judson Gould, Mr. and Mrs. W. Harris Roome, Mrs. William Moir, Mrs. Timothee Adamowski, Miss A. A. Jennings, Mr. and Mrs. John L. Riker, Mr. Victor Beigel and Mr. and Mrs. Charles W. McAlpin.

[60]

NEW YORK TIMES,
DECEMBER 11, 1903.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

A New Symphony by Ernst von Dohnanyi Played.

Mme. Melba's Brilliant Singing in Two Airs Creates Enthusiasm.

A most brilliant audience that filled every seat and every foot of available standing room in Carnegie Hall greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening at the first concert of its second visit to New York this season. No doubt Mme. Melba's appearance as soloist was responsible for the increase in its numbers over last month; yet that increase was not great, for the orchestra itself is the potent attraction that summons most of this audience to Carnegie Hall and fills the auditorium without the spell of a great singer's name. There were changes in the programme from its form as first announced.

Owing, presumably, to the great length of Ernst Von Dohnanyi's symphony, which began the programme, Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture was substituted for Liszt's twelfth symphonic poem, "The Ideal," also of inordinate dimensions; Mme. Melba also substituted for an air from Mozart's "La Clemenzadi Tito," with clarinet obbligato, the air "Zefferetti," from the same composer's "Idomeneo."

The symphony recalled memories of the talented youth who wrote it, his two visits to this country in the Spring and Winter of 1900, his extraordinarily ripe and forcible piano playing, his pianoforte concerto, his piano quintet, and two or three lesser pieces for piano solo that he then made known. There was admiration then for his remarkable musicianship; and at the same time there were some questions suggested by both his playing and his music. For Mr. Dohnanyi was then but twenty-three years old, and his compositions seemed mature before their time, with a restraint and a profound seriousness that were enlivened by none of the exuberance, the daring, or the overflowing imagination of youth. "If they do these things in a green tree, what shall be done in a dry?"

The symphony allayed none of this uneasiness concerning the development of what is undoubtedly a remarkable talent. Mr. Dohnanyi is still young, but he is more than ever "young and intolerably severe." The techincal accomplishment, the great command of all the resources of symphonic development that he displays seem to overweight and to smother his fertility of musical idea. He has elaborated his material with the utmost ingenuity, and to the furthest point in the five movements that he found necessary in which to express himself; but with all the skill he has devoted to it, he has missed the larger and more conclusive logic, and especially the free and spontaneous impulse that would win his symphony unquestioning acceptance. There are a few themes of singular and plastic beauty; there are more than one too obviously devised for the purpose of development.

He makes many promising starts, but falls into frequent abstraction, with his contrapuntal dexterity. His first allegro opens with a theme striking, yet scarcely beautiful, and he has achieved some admirable and interesting results with it. The slow movement is the most interesting of the five, with its melody for the English horn more pastoral than typically Hungarian in character, as the programme annotator called it, which he afterward works up with dazzling passage work in the gypsy brilliancy of decoration.

The introduction to the finale theme and variations begins with soaring imagination and impressive breadth, but the flight is not sustained: the variations are ingenious rather than beautiful, though not lacking passages of charm; the closing fugue is an entertaining development of an almost aggressively ugly and four-cornered theme. But with all the technical mastery the appeal is almost always to the understanding rather than to the sympathy and the imagination. It clearly made no deep impression.

Mr. Dohnanyi has written with a keen sense of instrumental values,—and his orchestration is full of fine effects, which were superbly realized by the orchestra. The playing of the symphony, indeed, was a marvel of lucidity, of finely balanced proportion, of perfect ensemble. What New York amateur could listen to the delicious refinement, flexibility, and tonal beauty of the wood wind choir in this symphony without feeling the gnawing tooth of envy?

Mme. Melba returns after an absence of several years with a voice that seemed more beautiful, an art more perfect than ever. There is, no doubt, no other singer now to be heard that can equal her in either respect. The voice has the most entrancing, luscious smoothness, golden purity, perfect equality and brilliancy; the mechanism is absolutely without flaw.

She poured it out in unstinted volume last evening; her legato singing was full-throated, rich and beautifully phrased; her floritura glittered and dazzled, scattered as it was with ease and effortless profusion. The audience showed by tempestuous applause its appreciation of the voice and the art. There are limits, undoubtedly, to the musical value of both; but in the class of music to which she applies them they are supreme.

Mr. Maquarre's skillful playing of the flute obbligato merits praise. The orchestra gave an exquisitely finished performance of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture, and one of Brahms's Academic overtures in which the humor of the thing was not altogether revealed.

NEW-YORK DAILY TRIBUNE.
FRIDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1903.

Melba and the Boston Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its conductor, Wilhelm Gericke, is paying the second visit of this season to the metropolis this week, and last night gave the first of the three concerts which are to enliven the boroughs of Manhattan and Brooklyn in Carnegie Hall. With the fine body of artists came Mme. Melba, who next week will conclude a tour of the country with a concert here that was not contemplated when her manager laid out his plans some months ago. That the singer has many admirers in New-York has long been known, as was made manifest by the attendance on the concert. She sang her airs in a crowded audience room and carried off the laurel wreath of a popular success which was only partly deserved from an artistic point of view. But touching that something shall be said presently. Proper precedence having been given to the lady in the record, a matter of greater importance may have consideration.

Mr. Gericke opened the concert with a symphony in D minor by Ernst von Dohnanyi, the young Hungarian musician who visited us three years ago, and introduced himself most favorably both as pianist and composer. His pianoforte concerto and quintet were beautiful auguries of the dawning of a creative talent of a rare order, and put a keen edge on the expectations aroused by the announcement of his symphony. Those expectations were not fully realized. The work is laid out on larger lines. It has five movements, an intermezzo being introduced between the slow movement and the finale. It is the most sententious and best knit movement of the five, probably because the composer did not feel burdened by the need of elaborating its material to give it symphonic dimensions.

A sense of such an obligation rests like an incubus upon the other movements, especially the first, which is a compages of fragments, each exploiting a conceit in rhythmical or other treatment, which has little relationship with either its predecessor or successor. The effect upon an analytic listener was that of a series of abrupt changes and a lack of logical development. The instrumentation sounded crude and experimental, though quickened occasionally by a happy choice of tone colors, as in the English horn's song in the slow movement. There was an idea also in the Scherzo, but it sounded touselled in the proclamation until the Trio was reached, when the Lisztian voice spoke so plainly that it was no wonder that Mr. Gericke dropped "Die Ideale" out of his programme and instituted Mendelssohn's overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" instead.

The movement which disclosed the greatest amount of continuity and coherency was the finale, a theme with variations, but even this lost itself in thefugued conclusion. To sum up, Mr. Dohányi has not yet "found himself" as a composer for the orchestra.

Mme. Melba also made a change in the programme. She was announced to sing the air "Parto, ma tu, Ben Mio," from Mozart's "Clemenza di Tito" and "Sweet Bird," from Handel's "L'Allegro." Instead of the former she sang "Zeffiretti Gusinghieri" from Mozart's "Indomeneo." This she sang faultily, with bad phrasing, an acrid, nasal tone in the medium register, and no appreciation of Mozart's pretty and ingenious tonal delineation in the runs to which the word "volate" is set. But in the Handel air she was her old and glorious self. The old freshness, juvenility, loveliness and opulence came back into her voice, and her vocalization was a triumph. Her singing set the hearers wild with delight.

THE SUN, SUNDAY,
DECEMBER 13, 1903.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second matinée at Carnegie Hall yesterday. The programme consisted of Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, the Saint Saens 'cello concerto, Smetana's symphonic poem, "Vysehrad," and Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" symphony. The soloist was Rudolph Krassett, the new solo 'cellist of the orchestra. His performance was that of a competent and conscientious player, with a substantial tone and a good schooling. But his art showed neither distinction of style nor warmth of feeling. The orchestral numbers were admirably performed. The obligato in the "Harold" symphony was played by E. Ferir, the new leader of the violas.

NEW YORK HERALD,
DECEMBER 13, 1903.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's second matinee concert, given at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, before the usual large and cultivated gathering of its patrons, was an affair fit to rank in every respect with the organization's best local traditions. Mr. Gericke's programme was, as usual, admirable both in its matter and its manner of performance, and it served to publicly introduce as the soloist of the occasion the orchestra's new principal violoncellist, Rudolf Krasselt.

Mr. Krasselt easily demonstrated his possession of the qualities of a virtuoso and hinted at something more.

NEW-YORK DAILY TRIBUNE,
DECEMBER 13. 1903.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Yesterday afternoon's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a hearing to Rudolf Krasselt, a performer on the violoncello, who has succeeded to the place in the band so long and so brilliantly filled by Alwin Schroeder. Herr Krasselt played the familiar concerto in A minor by Saint-Saëns, and challenged the respectful admiration of his hearers. He is youthful, but obviously experienced, well grounded in his art, self-poised, facile and fluent of execution, musicianly of taste. The orchestral numbers, concerning which there was a deplorable confusion in the announcements, due, in part, to the changes made in last last Thursday evening's programme, were Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture, Smetana's "Vysehrad" and Berlioz's symphony, "Harold in Italy," with the obbligato viola part played by Mr. E. Ferir, also a new addition to the orchestra's forces. This performance was Mr. Gericke's contribution to the unnecessarily numerous celebrations of the composer's centenary. Like all the music of the afternoon, it was played with great beauty of tone and a maximum of finish.

Symphonists Threaten Strike.

And now it is the Boston Symphony Orchestra that is threatened by the walking delegate. This body of musicians, the finest and most dignified in the country, has kept aloof from "labor" rows, heretofore. It has not regarded itself in the same category with street cleaners, trolley drivers and longshoremen. It has insisted that it was a company of artists. Moreover, it has had nothing of which it could in reason complain. It is well paid, not overworked; its founder, Mr. Higginson, the Boston banker, has cared for it as a father cares for his children, putting it up at the best hotels at his own expense when on its travels and affording opportunities for individual members to profit, through the increase in public liking for instrumental music, for which he was so largely responsible.

But the success of the New York Boiler Makers Union in managing Mr. Conried, of the opera, in forcing two unprotected women in his orchestra to go to a beer saloon and play before a committee, in order that they might not be cast out of the Opera House, and in obtaining tribute of $100 each from the women, has inspired some uneasy soul to undertake the reformation of the greatest orchestra in the world. There are among the ninety musicians in the Boston band about twenty who have allied themselves to the bricklayers and plumbers' helpers, and these twenty, so it is said, have been prompted to demand "recognition." Exactly what form this recognition is to take is not made known, but it is assumed that it is the usual one of throwing out all the independent players and putting second class men in their places. This will mean the ruin of the orchestra and the cessation of public interest in its prosperity.

More uncertainty attends the impending strike than has attended any other, and the walking delegate of the fiddlers is more apprehensive than he confesses. If he succeeds, it will mean that union wages must be paid to the Boston men, whereas they all receive more than union wages at present; it will mean that the leading men will resign and the artistic level of the performances fall to that of theater music; it will mean that the end of a great enterprise will have been effected. A musician who is accepted by Mr. Gericke holds his place as long as he does his work properly, and keeps sober. He is provided for for life. Moreover, his connection with the finest band in the world is of advantage to him in that it confirms his standing and secures pupils and concert engagements which otherwise he would be unable to obtain. The Boston players are the elite of the music world. Will they elect to resign from that world, to forswear fealty to the men who have made them, and bestow it on an irresponsible walking delegate? Membership in a union can be of no advantage whatever to the Boston men, whereas it is clearly obvious that dissociation from all rings, cliques and secret societies that seek to limit their activities, divide their allegiance and incidentally profit by percentages out of their salaries, can be of marked benefit to every member of the orchestra.

Is it not time that something was left ununionized, for mere novelty's sake? The organization of laborers into factions that must ultimately conflict in interests and fall to fighting with one another, as they now fight those who feed and clothe them, has produced little of good to them, and much of harm to public convenience and private and corporate prosperity. Where a wrong exists a strike is the natural remedy. Where none has been even imagined, the attempt to enforce obedience to a society of malcontents is damaging to every one concerned, and helpful to not a single one. It is a form of insanity too prevalent at this time, and it calls for a sharp care. That cure the managers of the Symphony Orchestra can apply by promising dismissal to every man in it who resigns his independence or refuses to fulfill his contracts. It can be applied to by the great ununionized public that has its own opinion of organized "labor," and not a good opinion.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra offered another of its new members as soloist on Saturday afternoon—Rudolf Krasselt, who has succeeded Alwin Schroeder as first 'cellist. Mr. Krasselt played Saint-Saëns's A-minor concerto. He showed himself an artist of more than average ability and promise. He has a big, solid tone, but one which is inclined toward dryness. His technique is sure, and the general traits of his performance show good musicianship. Other numbers on the programme were the overture to "Fidelio," Smetana's picturesque symphony poem, "Vysehrad," and Berlioz's "Harold in Italy." In the last the solo viola was played by E. Ferir. Colonne has taught us that Berlioz is not for such calm, placid temperaments as that which governs Mr. Gericke. The playing of the orchestra was beyond criticism.

The second matinée concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, was heard by a large audience on Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. Some changes in Friday night's concert caused a rearrangement of the programme, which consisted, as rendered, of Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio," Saint-Saëns's concerto in A minor for violoncello and orchestra; op. 33, Smetana's symphonic poem, "Vysehrad," and Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," symphony in four movements, with alto solo, op. 16, in which the viola solo was played by Mr. Ferir.

The new violoncellist, Mr. Rudolph Krasselt, played with a fine technique and intelligence and made an excellent impression. A young performer, he has already made himself a master of his instrument and will doubtless acquire a still greater command of the subtler magic of his art. The orchestral work was, of course, thoughtful and sympathetic.

That Smetana's Bohemian symphony poem is a work striking and varied goes almost without saying. It is one of a cycle of six similar compositions, another of which was heard last night under Mr. Mottl's direction at the opera concert. Its full effectiveness was brought out by the orchestra, and all its sensations were conveyed. The Berlioz symphony was the offering of Mr. Gericke in the general tribute of honor to Berlioz at the time of his centenary. It also was "played for all it was worth," to pun upon the phrase of the card table, but the artificial quality that inheres in the work was evident, even in the masterly rendering of the Boston Orchestra

[61]

Brooklyn Eagle
Dec 12-03.

Give Us a New Music Hall.

If a man had stood at the doors of the Baptist Temple last night, when the symphony audience struggled to the street, he could have secured subscriptions of thousands of dollars for a new music hall in Brooklyn, on a pledge that the building should be ready for next season. Certainly a more unhappy and complaining company never left an entertainment whose programme was devised to spread joy, peace and serenity of soul. For the first time this large and representative company of Brooklyn people realized to the full their loss in the burning of the Academy of Music. We used to abuse the Academy when we had it, scold about its bareness, its draughts and its cold floors, but one night's experiment with a building not designed for musical effects showed that in our old Academy we had indeed entertained an architectural angel unawares.

The fire created an emergency and the Brooklyn Institute exercised its best judgment in selecting the Baptist Temple as an auditorium for the Boston Symphony concerts. The selection was made in good faith and without actual trial it would have been difficult to believe how inadequate that commodious church would prove for a purpose for which it was never intended. The church was designed to bring the greatest number of people into easy reach of the voice of a single speaker. The very arrangement which promotes that end serves to place a large part of the audience for an orchestra concert out of proper focus for the music. The platform curves out into th auditorium, with seats stretching away on each side. No better arrangement could be made for a preacher, none worse for an orchestra. People on one side last night heard the first violins and the bass viols, while the people on the other side heard second violins and all the brass. Then the galleries at the side of the Temple hang so low that the tone of the instruments almost under them is driven sharply out, while the tone of the rest of the orchestra is smothered. The effect was a total derangement and destruction of that balance and completeness of harmony upon which the beauty of orchestral music depends. The people in the galleries could hear the effects which the composer designed and perhaps half of the downstairs audience, those who sat in the middle of the church and not too far forward, could take pleasure in the music. But even these favored few must have suffered from the heat and lack of ventilation. For the great majority the concert was a travesty upon what an orchestral concert should be and the conditions were such that it was an imposition to charge an admission to share them. Frankly, if the Brooklyn Institute cannot find a better hall for the rest of the series it should abandon those concerts and return the price of tickets to its subscribers. There is a possibility in the Columbia Theater, where the roof is much higher and where the tone from an orchestra on the stage ought to blend properly before it reaches the auditors. But there are difficulties in the way of using any hall now in Brooklyn, and it is better to suspend the visits of the orchestra than to have its music strangled at birth.

The duty for the future is clear. The people who are interested in music in Brooklyn should make every effort to raise an adequate fund, to agree upon a site and then to build an adequate music hall here, suitable for orchestral and choral concerts and at the same time available for such public meetings as used to be held in the Academy. The new hall will serve the town for half a century. Therefore the fund should be large enough so that the building need not be scrimped either in space or construction. A plan on too small a scale would hamper the usefulness of the hall for a generation. There can be no comfortable or really musical large concerts in Brooklyn until a new hall is built. The man or woman who gives money and energy and enthusiasm to this matter now will be a public benefactor in the largest sense of that word. The poverty of Brooklyn was demonstrated last night and the relief should come as soon as it can be brought about.

N.Y. Times
Dec 13-03.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Berlioz's Memory Honored with His Harold Symphony—Mr. Krasselt, the New 'Cellist, Plays.

The changes that were made in the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at their Thursday evening concert required also a rearrangement of the orchestral list announced for yesterday afternoon. As revised it contained Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio," Smetana's symphonic poem "Vysehrad," and Berlioz's "Harold" Symphony. Mr. Krasselt, the new first violoncellist of the orchestra, was the soloist, playing Saint-Saëns's concerto in A minor, and Mr. Férir, the new first viola, played the obligato that runs through all the movements of the symphony.

The new violoncellist made a very favorable impression, and it was very clear to him that he had made friends for himself in the New York public. He is a very young man, but he is already an accomplished master of the technique of his instrument, and a player of fine spirit and intelligence. A great one it is not yet possible to call him, and he did not show that he could penetrate deeply into the hearts of his hearers with a tone of the greatest nobility, sensuous beauty, or poignancy of expression. His bowing is fluent, strong, and flexible, and his command of the fingerboard of the instrument extremely facile. All in all it was an admirable performance of the Saint-Saëns concerto, not a great work in itself, but at least one that does not stultify the instrument quite after the fashion of most concertos of its kind.

Smetana's symphonic poem is the first of that series of six that the Bohemian composer wrote to give expression to different aspects of his fatherland, as they presented themselves to an ardently patriotic musician—another one of which series is, by chance, to be given to-night at the Metropolitan Opera House by Mr. Mottl. They are strikingly picturesque and varied in their form and content; and "Vysehrad," giving the composer's idea of a famous fotress of glorious and chivalrous memories, has an exterior brilliancy that is most engaging. Profound or deeply felt it cannot be called; but all there is of effect in it was shown forth by Mr. Gericke's men.

The "Harold" Symphony was the Boston conductor's tribute to the hundredth anniversary of Berlioz's birth that is affecting the programmes this month of orchestral organizations the world over. As such it was listened to with all due attention; but that it made a deep impression cannot be said. It is full of orchestral color and subtlety, of elaborate strivings to present a picture of events in tone; but interesting as they are from a technical point of view, they fail because of the absolute dullness of the music as music and the lack of idea, of the means to express the ambitious ideas that the composer set before himself.

Artificiality is the quality that constantly forces itself upon the unprejudiced listener. It has been called "half symphony, half viola concerto, half opera without words"; and the characterization expresses the uncertainty of its form and purport.

Day's Music Includes Boston Symphony Concert, with Rudolf Krasselt Soloist in 'Cello Concerto.

There was much music in this city yesterday. In the afternoon "Lohengrin" was performed for the first time under the new Metropolitan management; about the same time Carnegie Hall was resounding with the music of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and in the evening "Traviata" was heard for the first time this season in the Metropolitan Opera House. Surely this was a big enough feast to satiate the most voracious musical gourmand.

First, the Carnegie temple of music. The programme offered Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture; Saint-Saens's 'cello concerto in A minor; Smetana's symphonic poem "Vysehrad" (No. 1 of the Cycle "My Country") and Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" symphony. Beethoven's overture was played by the Boston Orchestra, as usual, with beautiful sonority and precision. Rudolf Krasselt was the soloist in the Saint-Saens work, and proved himself a 'cellist of fine calibre. He displayed a good tone, an excellent technique, manly energy, temperament and feeling.

Smetana's symphonic poem, a pleasing bit of orchestral mood-painting, was played with exquisite clarity and finish. The Berlioz symphony failed to stir the emotions. Berlioz never sings. He talks—talks eloquently, but there is no musical inspiration.

Staats Zeitung
Dec 11-03.

Das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester.

In ihrem dritten Konzerte — gestern Abend in Carnegie Hall — brachten uns die Bostoner eine Novität, eine Symphonie in D-moll von Ernst von Dohnányi, einem noch recht jungen Musiker ungarischer Abkunft. Dohnányi hat bereits zwei Male Konzertreisen in Amerika gemacht und sich dabei als Pianist wie als Komponist eingeführt. Vor etwa zwei Jahren spielte er, ebenfalls in Carnegie Hall, sein Clavier-Concert, mit dem er einen recht vielversprechenden Eindruck machte. Leider erfüllt aber die gestern gehörte Symphonie die Hoffnungen noch nicht, die manche auf ihn gesetzt haben mögen. Fast das Einzige, was man dem Autor dieser Komposition nachrühmen kann, ist, daß er viel gelernt hat. Aber das symphonische Gewand der Meister ist ihm viel zu weit, es schlottert ihm um die Glieder herum, und seine Bemühungen, es auszufüllen, sind manchmal peinliche. Er bläht sich auf, er bläst in das weite Gewand hinein, aber es ist eben nur Wind, und überall sieht man die schlotternden Falten. Daß er selbst sich aber der Dürftigkeit seiner Erfindung und des Mechanischen seiner Gestaltung nicht bewußt ist, geht allein schon daraus hervor, daß er mit den traditionellen vier Sätzen nicht zufrieden war, sondern gleich fünf lieferte. Aber so geht's: Leute, die am wenigsten zu sagen haben, sind gewöhnlich am redseligsten.

Am trockensten und aufgeblähtesten ist unzweifelhaft das erste Allegro; dann kommt ein Adagio von beinahe beängstigender Gedankenarmuth: ein Quartensprung wird darin zu Tode gequält; der dritte Satz, das Scherzo, bietet wenigstens einige Einfälle dar, aber sie werden wahrlich nicht symphonisch ausgenützt; das Intermezzo hat den großen Vorzug der Kürze; im letzten Satz leistet der Komponist sein Bestes in einer vortrefflich gearbeiteten und gut klingenden Fuge. Aber dieser Beweis von Kunstfertigkeit kann nicht für den Mangel an Inspiration entschädigen. Dohnanyi ahmt Brahms' Stil in gar manchen Dingen nach, so auch gelegentlich in der Instrumentation; er ist aber offenbar bestrebt, mit einem größeren Pinsel die Farben dicker aufzutragen, er hat die Attitude der Originalität. Leider hat er die Originalität selbst nicht. Wenn er sein Ziel weniger hoch steckte, möchte er vielleicht eher seine musikalische Individualität entdecken. Vielleicht schlummert sie nur noch.

Man kann nicht sagen, daß diese Symphonie dem Orchester eine dankbare Aufgabe darbot, aber ebenso wenig läßt sich behaupten, daß das Orchester darin sein Allerbestes leistete. Es mochte eben unter dem Mangel an Inspiration leiden. Indessen, auch in der Mendelssohn'schen Sommernachtstraum-Ouverture schienen die Geigen nicht diese flimmernde Leichtigkeit zu haben, die man oft an ihnen bewundert hat. Die Academische Ouverture von Brahms, die das Konzert beschloß, wurde vorzüglich gespielt. Herr Gericke hatte sich mit der Dohnanyi'schen Symphonie offenbar die größte Mühe gegeben, aber es nutzte nichts: das Publikum war von nahezu sechzig Minuten solcher Musik — die immerhin viel besser sein mag, als sie klingt — nicht entzückt.

Aber in der Mitwirkung von Frau Melba gewann das gestrige Konzert noch eine besondere Anziehungskraft; kein Wunder daher, daß das Haus ausverkauft war. Seitdem wir sie hier zuletzt gehört, hat Frau Melba allen möglichen Völkerschaften, besonders auch unseren Antipoden etwas vorgesungen. Wer daraus nun folgerte, daß sie sich in Erscheinung und Stimme so oder so geändert haben müsse, wurde gründlich enttäuscht: das war genau dasselbe, leidenschaftslose Gesicht und — dieselbe unvergleichliche Stimme. In einer Arie aus Mozart's „Idomeneo" bekundete Frau Melba allerdings zunächst, daß ihr des göttlichen Wolfgang musikalische Seele ein Buch mit sieben Siegeln geblieben ist, aber in der bekannten „Sweet bird"-Arie aus Händel's „L'Allegro, il Penseroso ed il Moderato" schmolz sie das Eis, das sich um den Geschmack des rabiaten Wagner's anzusammeln pflegt, wenn er mit klassischen oder modernem Coloraturgesang kollidirt. In der That, dieser Stimmmechanismus ist beispiellos, er nimmt es an Zuverlässigkeit mit dem Instrument auf. Wer läßt Einen solche Triller hören, wie sie der Melba von den Lippen rollen? Auf dem hohen B setzt sie einen Triller an und läßt ihn langsam anschwellen, daß wohl dem Zuhörer, aber nicht der Sängerin der Athem ausgeht. Und dabei hat die Stimme alle ihre christallene Frische bewahrt. Trotz tosenden Beifalls wollte sich Frau Melba zu keinem „Encore" bequemen. Und ihre eigentlichen Parabenummern bewahrt sie sich für ihr eigenes Konzert in der nächsten Woche auf.

Es muß noch hinzugefügt werden, daß Herr Maquarre die obligate Flöte in der Händel'schen Arie mit Virtuosität und Geschmack spielte.

Staats Zeitung
Dec 12-03

Das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester.

Im gestrigen vierten Konzert des Bostoner Symphonieorchesters ließ sich der neu engagirte erste Cellist des Orchesters, Herr Rudolf Krasselt, als Solist hören. Er hatte sich das Saint-Saëns'sche A-moll Konzert für sein Debut gewählt. Daß er auf das Publikum einen vortheilhaften Eindruck machte, ging aus dem Beifall und den Hervorrufen hervor, die seinem Spiel folgten. Auch läßt sich nicht leugnen, daß Herr Krasselt viele gute Eigenschaften in's Gefecht zu führen hatte, wie glatten Bogenstrich, flotte Technik der linken Hand und zuverlässige Intonation. Aber solche Eigenschaften sind immer doch nur erst die Vorbedingungen zur Künstlerschaft des Virtuosen, und man wird Herrn Krasselt abermals als Solisten hören müssen, ehe man ihm irgendwelche Distinktion als Virtuose zusprechen kann. Er ist unstreitig ein guter Cellist und sicherlich eine bessere Acquisition für das Orchester, als dessen neuer Konzertmeister. Aber nach seiner gestrigen Leistung läßt sich noch nicht sagen, ob er auch Stil und Autorität genug besitzt, um zu dem ersten seines Faches gerechnet zu werden.

Das Programm war, wie dasjenige des dritten Konzertes, in letzter Stunde ein wenig abgeändert worden. Man fing mit der „Fidelio"-Ouverture an, die eine pietätvolle und wohlklingende Wiedergabe erfuhr. Dann folgte „Vyšehrad", das erste Stück aus Smetana's Cyklus „Mein Vaterland", ein höchst poetisches Stimmungsbild. Der Komponist versenkt sich beim Anblick der alten Burg in historische Träumereien und versucht die Bilder, die seine Phantasie ihm vorspiegelt, in Tönen auszudrücken. Die Ausführung durch das Orchester war eine farbenreiche und virtuose. Den Schluß des Konzertes bildete Berlioz' Symphonie „Harold in Italien". Herr E. Ferier, der neue erste Bratschist des Orchesters, spielte die schwierige obligate Viola.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The soloist at last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall was no less a personage than Mme. Melba. It is odd that the three greatest living representatives of the florid style of singing—Patti, Sembrich, and Melba—should all be in America at the same time. Mme. Melba has not been heard here for several years; her latest tour has been to Australia, which gave her to the world. Her numbers last night were the Zeffiretti aria from Mozart's "Idomeneus" and Handel's "Sweet bird that shun'st the noise of folly," with flute obligato—the cheap show piece in which Handel anticipates Donizetti at his worst. The singer's voice has not deteriorated during her absence. At first it was not quite under her control as regards the pitch, but that passed away, and those who like the clear, silvery, but cold tones of her voice had abundant opportunity to admire and applaud her.

The orchestra needed a famous vocalist on this occasion. The Boston band is notorious for its uninteresting programmes, and last night's was a record-breaker. One great work—Liszt's "The Ideal"—was promised, but the promise was not kept, and in its place the well-worn Midsummer Night's Dream overture of Mendelssohn was given. The Brahms "Academic" overture, which closed the concert, has its points of interest, but the piece which held the place of honor—Dohnányi's symphony in D minor—did not deserve such a distinction. One cannot but wonder at the extraordinary lack of taste and judgment shown by Mr. Gericke in selecting such a juvenile, immature production, and making his men waste their time over it. A biographer of Dohnányi says that "in the early morning the child began to write down notes indiscriminately on the paper. The mere writing of music gave him the greatest pleasure." Evidently it gives him a great deal of pleasure still, so that he does not know when to stop. Not content with the usual four symphonic movements, he added a fifth, his ambition evidently being to add Bruckner's chief shortcoming of interminableness to the faults of Brahms and Richard Strauss, his prototypes. The last movement contains a "Tema con variazione e Fuga," which characterizes the whole symphony. Mr. Dohnányi is quite a young man—he was born in 1877, and he was for three years a student at the Budapest Conservatory. How that "theme with variations and a fugue" must have pleased his teachers! They had evidently taught him the science of composition successfully. The art of composition, unfortunately, is quite a different thing, which cannot be taught. It implies the gift of creating new melodies, a gift of which Mr. Dohnányi gives no evidence in his fifty-minute symphony, which, with all its attempts at cleverness, is dull beyond description. It ranks with the average prize essay of a college sophomore who has carefully studied his books, and no more deserves detailed discussion than it deserves a public performance, when there are so many neglected masterworks clamoring to be heard.

[62]

N.Y. Sun
Dec 11-03.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AGAIN AT CARNEGIE HALL.

The Second New York Concert Draws a Great Audience—Gericke Tonans in a Genial Mood—Mme. Melba Sings Two Numbers and Is Still a Popular Idol—Brilliant Work of the Orchestra

Gericke Tonans, the Boston Jupiter, was in a considerate and a genial mood last night at Carnegie Hall. His deliverance of harmonies was tempered to the frailties of poor human nature. Of late, New York has had music for breakfast, dinner and tea, in the words of the now prehistoric Grosvenor, and the Boston Symphony conductor cropped his programme to fit an exact two hours.

A great audience greeted the reappearance of the orchestra, and all of Mr. Carnegie's chairs were filled—even to the ascending rows that soar in the supernal heights. The regard for the Boston Symphony Orchestra has now crystallized into a superstition, and hundreds of good people doggedly "follow the gleam" without knowing exactly why they do so. That is to say, many persons, it is evident, are devoted to these concerts, and all that in them is, as such, besides and apart from the genuine lovers of music who have a flair for the traditions of this famous orchestra. A sufficient number of these camp followers of Apollo were present last night to overburden Mme. Melba with applause, while

No shrieking frantic
Or corybantic

exceeded the proprieties at the end of the successive numbers of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke's brilliant and interesting orchestral programme. It is apt to be so; the solo gains a fictitious value from the popular idea that a single vocal performer—especially if it be a lady ample in personality and fame—is a greater wonder than any combination of harmonic instruments can possibly be. And when this wonderful lady has a beautiful yellow gown and sings a succession of bird-like notes with a flute (also pretty nearly a Solo) as a pacemaker, and when this lady is heard for the only time this year in New York except at her own concert, why, no wonder the applause rolled over the orchestra in a wave and washed away all ideas of proportion, if not of politeness.

The orchestra's opening work was a piece of Hungarian music first performed at Budapest in January of the present year, and now heard for the first time in New York. A symphony in D minor, by Ernst von Dohnányi, it was orchestrated by Mr. Gericke in five movements, the fourth being an intermezzo. Beginning Allegro ma non troppo, follows first a Molto adagio of rhapsodic beauty, then a Scherzo Presto, then the andante Intermezzo, and the Finale, in which the theme, in its brilliant variations, with many reminiscences of what has been heard before, is worked out with great elaboration of orchestral ornament. The work was played magnificently and was by far the most important music event of the evening.

Mme. Melba then sang an aria from "Idomeneus" most acceptably to the audience, and after the shouting was over Mr. Gericke substituted Mendelssohn's "Overture to Midsummer Night's Dream," op. 21, for the Liszt "Ideala" of the programme, since the latter would have taken half an hour to perform. There seems to be little room for criticism of this, for even though the "Dream" overture be so often heard, it is not often heard as the orchestra played it. One might be quite content to sit and listen to those lovely violins and thank heaven for the chance. Did Mendelssohn ever do anything better worth hearing?

Again Mme. Melba sang, this time Händel's "Sweet bird that shuns't the noise of folly," with a flute obbligato by Mr. Maquarre. After a great deal of applause and many recalls—noble heart! she resisted the temptation to sing again—the concert closed with Brahms's "Academic Overture," in whose stately and yet very eloquent harmonies were inlaid many student songs, most of them as cunningly hidden as Dvorák hid "Yankee Doodle" in the "New World Symphony." And the audience was dismissed promptly at 10:15 o'clock, with its brains and heart full of beautiful music, most artistically injected. It has been remarked that even as the Broadway cars run in Seventh avenue, and the Sixth avenue cars have most of their track in Amsterdam avenue, and as most of the population of Ireland and Italy now live in the United States—so the Boston Symphony Orchestra does not spend much time in Boston. This is Boston's loss; let us be glad we in New York get that organization twice a month, even with soloists included.

The programme for Saturday afternoon's concert is appended. It is possible that the Mendelssohn number, which Mr. Gericke stole from that programme, may be replaced by the Liszt symphony.

PROGRAMME FOR MATINEE.

Overture—"A Midsummer Night's Dream," op. 21 ..... Mendelssohn
Concerto in A minor, for violoncello and orchestra, op. 33; allegro non troppo; allegretto con moto; come prima ..... Saint-Saëns
Symphonic Poem, "Vysehrad" (No. 1 of the cycle, "My Country") ..... Smetana
"Harold in Italy," symphony in four movements, with alto solo, op. 16 ..... Hector Berlioz
(Viola solo by Mr. E. Ferir.)
I. Harold in the Mountains: Scenes of Melancholy, Happiness and Joy;
Adagio (G major).
Allegro (G major).
II. March of Pilgrims, singing their Evening Hymn: Allegretto (E major).
III. Serenade of a Mountaineer of the Abruzzi to his Mistress:
Allegro assai (C major).
Allegretto (C major).
IV. Orgy of Brigands: Allegro frenetico (G minor).
Soloist: Mr. Rudolf Krasselt.

Boston Orchestra, with Mme. Melba as Soloist—A Symphonic Experiment That Failed.

Carnegie Hall grows positively brilliant not more than a dozen times a season—the Musical Art Society, occasionally the Philharmonic Society, more often the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and an infrequent soloist of the Paderewski or Sembrich type, attract audiences of a size and distinction that may well be an inspiration to the concert givers. Last night was marked by one of these handsome gatherings, and the presence of the Boston orchestra, with Mme. Melba as soloist, was responsible for it.

The programme, as announced, balanced neatly the music of accepted tradition against what was experimental—for Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Ideal," may still be classed as a suppliant in the outer court of the temple of master works, while Ernst von Dohnanyi's D minor symphony, which began the list, had its Budapest premiere less than a year ago. But the symphony was found to be so long, that Mendelssohn's overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" was substituted for the Liszt piece, which is also long, and as the rest of the programme contained Brahms's "Academic" overture and Mozart and Handel arias for Mme. Melba, the scale was turned in favor of the established masters.

When Mr. von Dohnanyi's symphony was played, the case for the musical applaud was found to be very weak indeed. Turned into a lawyer's plea of equivalent power, it would have failed to convince a jury, even in the face of no opposition whatever. The young Hungarian pianist-composer's previous symphony, which Conductor Gericke honored with a Boston orchestra performance some years since, was tenuous enough, but this is frankly impossible.

There are five movements, and they occupied last night about fifty minutes. The themes of the first and second movements are rather good, but their development does not show real power of design; the scherzo was more compact, and won applause; then came a superfluous fourth movement, and the finale, with its inevitable fugue (every young composer must show that he can write a fugue) proved a monument of irrelevant banality.

Mr. Gericke evidently liked the music, but the orchestra played it with mental, tonal and intervallic reservations.

The Mendelssohn and Brahms overtures fell with unwonted pleasure on ears sated with the symphony's unmeaning measures. The Brahms music, particularly, was a grateful respite.

Mme. Melba's last previous appearance here was on April 29, 1901, when she sang the mad scene from "Lucia" in the operatic farewell. Since then she has been in Australia, England, and for the past two months touring successfully in this country. She was warmly welcomed last night, and seemed in splendid health and spirits. Rumors of a slight cold were dispelled by the outflow of regal tone that marked her singing of the "Zefferetti" aria from Mozart's "Idomeneo" and Handel's "Sweet Bird." Only a slight flatting of the penultimate note in the latter hinted that Mme. Melba was not in the fullest possession of her extraordinary voice.

It is a pleasure to listen to such an easy and natural outpouring of pure and well-placed tone; on the gifts that are hers by birthright and on the improvement she has made of them, Mme. Melba may ever safely rely. Such voices are rare enough to evoke a renewed sense of human possibilities; their employment as media of interpretation is almost a secondary consideration.

[63]

Commercial Advertiser
Dec 11-03.

A Pianist's Symphony and Melba.

Young Ernst von Dohnányi, a pianist of very unusual ability, still persists in his ambition to become a composer of note. There is no doubt about his industry. All of his compositions that have been heard here are very long; but if in quantity they are most generous, concerning their quality one is not so certain. Four years ago the Kneisels presented a pianoforte quintet of his. The following autumn Mr. Gericke, who regards the young Hungarian with a fatherly interest, had him play his own pianoforte concerto—a prize composition and one which gave abundant evidence of that fact. Last night at the second evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a symphony in D minor, his first attempt in this large form, was played. It was of great length, the performance of its five movements consuming all but an hour. It contained incidents which were genuinely interesting, but that the composer has yet a message for the world of sufficient import to require a five-movement symphony as his messenger is extremely doubtful.

Dohnányi is a Hungarian, wherefore it follows almost as night the day that his work is colored by the music of the Hungarian gypsies. But the impression his symphony gave was that he rather resented the influence of the Tsigane, and fought against it, and to help him in his battle had conjured up the shade of the mighty Brahms. So it happened that, while this orientalism flavored his first movement, it was cast in such a rigid mould of formality that it lost all but the faintest semblance of itself. But nature is stronger than art, even in music, and in the second movement, the adagio, the gypsy element appeared in its most rhapsodical form. One found it again strong in the fourth movement, an intermezzo, in which a solo viola, delightfully played by Max Zach, bore the chief burden. But in the third and fifth movements the composer sternly turned his face from his native land, and in the former wrought a scherzo of very conventional form, and in the latter ended his work with a big fugue.

Dohnányi is lavish in his instrumentation. He is a lover of color and piles it on with the extravagance of youth. He takes no heed of the difficulties that he makes for his orchestra. He is fond of the wind choirs and demands of them the highest virtuosity. But his orchestration is often rich at the expense of clarity. It is often thick and turgid—muddy is the word. As for the melodic ideas, they did not impress one as being very important, certainly not important enough to require a whole hour for explication. The symphony is interesting as the work of a young man still under thirty, and as an illustration of how pre-natal and acquired influences in art may battle with each other. But judged absolutely by itself, it was not very impressive. It was magnificently played, the orchestra receiving very warm applause for its work.

The soloist of the evening was Mme Nellie Melba, who has been touring up and down the country with a company of her own, after the fashion of prima donnas nowadays. She was not in the best of voice, having a slight cold, and for this reason did not sing the air from "La Clemenza di Tito," which had been advertised, but substituted for it one from "Idomeneo." Melba was never happy in Mozart, and her singing of this air did not rouse the audience to undue enthusiasm; but later when she sang Handel's "Sweet Bird" all the glory of her beautiful voice was revealed. What a trill the woman has! There is nothing like it on the concert stage to-day. Melba is not the most satisfying artist in the world, because the range of her art is very limited; but within the limits there is none quite like her.

The other numbers on the programme were Liszt's "The Ideal" and Brahms's "Academic" overture.

Boston Globe
Dec 17-03.

Miss Maud MacCarthy will be the soloist at this week's Symphony concerts, playing a violin concerto by Brahms.

Mme. Melba Received Warm Welcome with Boston Symphony

It was the reappearance of Mme. Melba at the second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra which made for most of the great applause greeting this organization last night at Carnegie Hall.

It is seldom indeed that anything takes precedence over the orchestra itself at the New York concert of this famous Boston organization, and the exception to the rule last night was due to no lapse by the band and its conductor from their usual high level, for Mr. Gericke's programme was a thoroughly interesting one and his men were in fine feather. But Mme. Melba's return for once overshadowed the players in the public interest.

The prima donna has seldom if ever sung more charmingly. Some disappointment was felt that for the first of her announced numbers, the "Parto, Parto," from Mozart's "Titus," there should have been substituted the "Zeffiretti" aria from the same composer's "Idomeneus," a rather less striking passage; but this impression was forgotten in the face of her singing of it.

The tones were the same fresh, limpid ones which every one remembered, and which are so rare after all, and the technique that which recked little of any difficulties of the score. At the close of the aria the house fairly thundered its applause and the singer was brought to the stage a dozen times in vain attempts at a breach of the established anti-encore rules of the Boston Orchestra.

Her tour de force came later in the scene from Handel's "L'Allegra il Penseroso ed il Moderato," which begins "Sweet bird that shun'st the noise of folly." This she sang in collaboration with Mr. A. Maquarre, the orchestra's solo flautist, to whose instrument Handel has given a part equal in importance to the vocal melody. This number Mme. Melba has sung before, frequently, but she surpassed herself in it last night.

Her bravura was extraordinary, her trilling really flawless, her intonation most accurate. A slice of the credit for the beauty of this number must go to Mr. Maquarre, by reason of his admirable contribution to the ensemble.

The orchestral portion of the list also suffered change in the substitution for Liszt's Symphonic Poem No. 12, "The Ideal," of the overture to "Midsummer Night's Dream." Besides this the programme included a symphony in D minor by Ernst von Dohnanyi—heard for the first time in New York—and Brahms' "Academic Festival Overture," opus 80.

Mr. Dohnanyi's Symphony will be sure to stir up no end of musical discussion, but whatever denial may be made of its intrinsic value, it will not be and should not be summarily dismissed. As the work of a man of twenty-seven it is beyond question a remarkable composition, with not only stout workmanship and striking ingenuity to recommend it, but some noticeably vital melodic ideas as well. It naturally mirrors Brahms. All of the five movements but the first told with the audience.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1903.

The Boston Symphony Concerts.

TWO concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place Thursday evening (December 10) and Saturday afternoon (December 12) at Carnegie Hall. There were some slight changes in the first program, which consisted of Ernest von Dohnanyi's D minor Symphony, the overture of "The Midsummer Night's Dream," by Mendelssohn, and Brahms' "Academic Overture." Melba sang.

When last in this country Dohnanyi was one of the guests at a luncheon at Lüchow's restaurant on Fourteenth street, and in the course of the conversation some of the people present who were interested in his musical tendency said that they were of the opinion, judging from his compositions, that he was leaning heavily upon Brahms. Dohnanyi smiled sardonically and intimated that there was nothing in Brahms that he could apply to his own work, that his inspirations were individual, and were not stimulated through such a source. It was rather a surprise to observe his apparent effort to belittle Brahms. This story in itself would would have no particular value if it were not for the fact that the D minor Symphony of Dohnanyi is peculiarly Brahms-like in many of its effects, and if we all did not know Mr. Gericke we would suspect him of having been rather sarcastic in the arrangement of the program by placing the "Academic Overture" on it with Dohnanyi's D minor Symphony; for while the Overture is not academic, the Symphony has many moments that remind one of academic efforts.

There is no question whatever that Mr. Dohnanyi is a young man with remarkable gifts, and he has ideas which, as the Evening Post always reiterates, are necessary for any musical work. But the Symphony as a whole is monotonous, it fails in its climaxes; its workmanship is frail, and it is defective in logic and in structural strength. It has pianistic orchestration, that is to say, one hears a piano concerto throughout the work, and that is one of the reasons why Rubinstein's orchestral compositions have fallen by the wayside. As THE MUSICAL COURIER stated many years ago, compositions of that kind suffer from the thraldom of the keyboard, being written by men whose supreme work and mental application have been in the direction of piano playing. Liszt emancipated himself from this, and so did Brahms, who originally was an excellent pianist; so did Schumann. Very few can reach that altitude, however, and when once Dohnanyi gets away from the piano we would be happy to hear orchestral works with the Dohnanyi orchestral fibre.

Melba sang from Mozart's "Idomeneo" a little aria called the "Zeffiretti"; and then she sang the familiar "Sweet Bird" aria by Handel. The singing of these two classical airs offered the best opportunity to analyze the characteristics of Melba's style and her voice. In the Mozart song, which required a bel canto, Melba sang like a baby; the tones and enunciation were childish. In the Handel aria the pyrotechnics disclosed the remarkable flexibility of her voice, its power, its penetrating resonance and the magnificent control which she exercises over its emission. Not a trace of temperament could be discovered, not a particle of feeling, not one sentiment of the poetry or of the music; but from a scientific viewpoint her imitations of the flute runs, trills and cadenzas were nearly perfection, if, in fact, it could have been done better. Melba's voice is an instrument of the mechanical order, something like the pneumatic Pianola, with this in favor of the Pianola, namely, that it is controlled very frequently by musical people through whose instincts music can be produced, while Melba is never temperamentally musical.

There are so few voices today, there are so few people—men or women—who can sing and who can sing music and who can interpret music as it should be sung, that even with all this absence of a temperamental or artistic gift, the science of Melba appeals to us through the purity of the tones and through the profound gift of Nature shown by her voice capacity. If the human voice is capable of such effects, what could be done by some woman who could sing music as it should be sung, with a voice like Melba's? There must be such. She is losing her higher notes; they must gradually go because they are not tenderly preserved.

At the Saturday matinee the admirable orchestra again emphasized all those many good points for which its playing has been famous these many years. Such shortcomings as there were in the Smetana and Berlioz numbers were the shortcomings always of the leader and never of the orchestra. An orchestra reflects the temperament of its conductor, and when such a conductor has no temperament, then it stands to reason that also the orchestra has none. Smoothness, precision and polish were in plentiful evidence, but the soul of the hearer longed for at least one spontaneous emotional outburst. It seemed imminent once in the highly colored Smetana poem and twice in Berlioz's best Symphony, but the effort of the orchestra died in its promise. The leader keeps a watchful eye on all crescendos and accellerandos, and they are compelled to conform to a carefully fixed sound and speed limit. His polite methods were most eloquently illustrated in the "Fidelio" overture by Beethoven, where a little more naturalness at times would have made a performance convincing that was merely correct. The same criticism must also hold good for the finale of the "Harold" Symphony. In that work, by the way, the familiar obligato was exceedingly well played by Mr. Ferir, the viola player, who was imported from London last fall by the Boston Symphony management.

Rudolph Krasselt, the solo 'cellist, played with fingers that were palpably schooled in Germany. His performance was sane, precise and unexciting. The bowing was angular, the phrasing lacked in elasticity, and the cantilena suffered from monotony of color. Krasselt has all the virtues and all the drawbacks of the Berlin and Leipsic violin and 'cello graduates who have never spent a year in Brussels or in Paris. The Fatherland turns out first class musicians, but there is a lasting shortage in its crop of virtuosi. In the German capital 'cello playing like that of Krasselt is greatly admired—and it is good playing of its kind—but set in the frame of a Boston Symphony concert it seems strangely small and scant of contour.

The Tribune.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1903.

MORE UNIONISM IN MUSIC.

The orchestral sweet bells seem to be jangled and out of tune quite generally. The Philadelphia orchestra is still in doubt about a guaranty for another season. The Pittsburg orchestra has lost its leader, Victor Herbert. The New York Philharmonic is limping through the present season with half a dozen different conductors. But the Boston orchestra, the only competitor Chicago has, is in a dangerous condition, principally owing to unionism.

The Boston orchestra at the beginning of the season lost its concertmaster and one or two principals. Their places were filled more or less successfully and all seemed to be running smoothly when a new difficulty presented itself. The Musical Mutual Protective union now proposes that twenty or more of its members shall leave the orchestra because there are nonunion men in that body. These twenty or more players, like the others, are under contract to Mr. Higginson, who, as is well known, supports the orchestra by paying its deficits. Without him the people of Boston would not have that fine organization. Mr. Higginson has said that rather than allow any interference with his business by musical artisans he will disband the orchestra.

The musicians' union is firm in its demand. Its love of the musical art is not so great as its hatred of players who will not carry dinner pails, pay initiation fees into its treasury, and do musical manual labor so many hours in a week for so many dollars, good players and bad players sharing alike, and hours and dollars to be regulated by the union. But this is not Mr. Higginson's view of the importance and dignity of musical art, and, it may be added, it is not the view of any other person outside the M. M. P. U. who loves music or knows anything about it. Mr. Higginson is firm also, as a man should be who pays all the bills and is bent upon furnishing his patrons with the best music. The question, therefore, is, will he disband the orchestra? If he does, of course Boston will lose one of its most attractive features, and it will be a serious loss to the cause of higher music. It is to be hoped that Mr. Higginson will adhere to his decision. A disbanded orchestra would not be so great a calamity as an orchestra dominated by the union and made up of a heterogeneous collection of good, bad, and indifferent players. It would be a death blow to music in America if the unions were allowed to dictate who should be employed and upon what terms, instead of the manager and conductor. Better no music than to submit to such tyranny. The Boston people from the earliest times have made bold fights for principle, and the principle in this case is one worth fighting for. It is possible for a labor union to carry its demands so far as to make itself not only ridiculous but harmful to the public. The demands of the M. M. P. U. are of that kind.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1903.

The Boston Symphony Concerts.

TWO concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place Thursday evening (December 10) and Saturday afternoon (December 12) at Carnegie Hall. There were some slight changes in the first program, which consisted of Ernest von Dohnanyi's D minor Symphony, the overture of "The Midsummer Night's Dream," by Mendelssohn, and Brahms' "Academic Overture." Melba sang.

When last in this country Dohnanyi was one of the guests at a luncheon at Lüchow's restaurant on Fourteenth street, and in the course of the conversation some of the people present who were interested in his musical tendency said that they were of the opinion, judging from his compositions, that he was leaning heavily upon Brahms. Dohnanyi smiled sardonically and intimated that there was nothing in Brahms that he could apply to his own work, that his inspirations were individual, and were not stimulated through such a source. It was rather a surprise to observe his apparent effort to belittle Brahms. This story in itself would would have no particular value if it were not for the fact that the D minor Symphony of Dohnanyi is peculiarly Brahms-like in many of its effects, and if we all did not know Mr. Gericke we would suspect him of having been rather sarcastic in the arrangement of the program by placing the "Academic Overture" on it with Dohnanyi's D minor Symphony; for while the Overture is not academic, the Symphony has many moments that remind one of academic efforts.

There is no question whatever that Mr. Dohnanyi is a young man with remarkable gifts, and he has ideas which, as the Evening Post always reiterates, are necessary for any musical work. But the Symphony as a whole is monotonous, it fails in its climaxes; its workmanship is faulty; it is defective in logic and in structural strength. It has pianistic orchestration, that is to say, one hears a piano concerto throughout the work, and that is one of the reasons why Rubinstein's orchestral compositions have fallen by the wayside. As THE MUSICAL COURIER stated many years ago, compositions of that kind suffer from the thraldom of the keyboard, being written by men whose supreme work and mental application have been in the direction of piano playing. Liszt emancipated himself from this, and so did Brahms, who originally was an excellent pianist; so did Schumann. Very few can reach that altitude, however, and when once Dohnanyi gets away from the piano we would be happy to hear orchestral works with the D minor orchestral fibre.

Melba sang from Mozart's "Idomeneo" a little aria called the "Zeffiretti"; and then she sang the familiar "Sweet Bird" aria by Handel. The singing of these two classical airs offered the best opportunity to analyze the characteristics of Melba's style and her voice. In the Mozart song, which required a bel canto, Melba sang like a baby; the tones and enunciation were childish. In the Handel aria the pyrotechnics disclosed the remarkable flexibility of her voice, its power, its penetrating resonance and the magnificent control which she exercises over its emission. Not a trace of temperament could be discovered, not a particle of feeling, not the sentiment of the poetry or of the music; but from a scientific viewpoint her imitations of the flute runs, trills and cadenzas were nearly perfection, if, in fact, it could have been done better. Melba's voice is an instrument of the mechanical order, something like the pneumatic Pianola, with this in favor of the Pianola, namely, that it is controlled very frequently by musical people through their instincts music can be produced, while Melba is never temperamentally musical.

There are so few voices nowadays, there are so few people—men or women—who can sing, who can sing music and who can interpret music as it should be sung, that even with all this absence of a temperamental or artistic gift, the science of Melba appeals to us through the purity of the tones and through the profound gift of Nature shown by her voice capacity. If the human voice is capable of such effects, what could be done by some woman who could sing music as it should be sung, with a voice like Melba's? There must be such. She is losing her higher notes; they must gradually go because they are not tenderly preserved.

At the Saturday matinee the admirable orchestra again emphasized all those many good points for which its playing has been famous these many years. Such shortcomings as there were in the Smetana and Berlioz numbers were the shortcomings always of the leader and never of the orchestra. An orchestra reflects the temperament of its conductor, and when such a conductor has no temperament, then it stands to reason that also the orchestra has none. Smoothness, precision and polish were in plentiful evidence, but the soul of the hearer longed for at least one spontaneous emotional outburst. It seemed imminent once in the highly colored Smetana poem and twice in Berlioz's best Symphony, but the effort of the orchestra died in its promise. The leader keeps a watchful eye on all crescendos and accelerandos; and they are compelled to conform to a carefully fixed sound and speed limit. His polite methods were most eloquently illustrated in the "Fidelio" overture by Beethoven, where a little more naturalness at times would have made a performance convincing that was merely correct. The same criticism must also hold good for the finale of the "Harold" Symphony. In that work, by the way, the familiar obligato was exceedingly well played by Mr. Ferir, the viola player, who was imported from London last fall by the Boston Symphony management.

Rudolph Krasselt, the solo 'cellist, played with fingers that were palpably schooled in Germany. His performance was sane, precise and unexciting. The bowing was angular, the phrasing lacked in elasticity, and the cantilena suffered from monotony of color. Krasselt has all the virtues and all the drawbacks of the Berlin and Leipsic violin and 'cello graduates who have never spent a year in Brussels or in Paris. The Fatherland turns out first class musicians, but there is a lasting shortage in its crop of virtuosi. In the German capital 'cello playing like that of Krasselt is greatly admired—and it is good playing of its kind—but set in the frame of a Boston Symphony concert it seems strangely small and scant of contour.

The Tribune.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1903.

MORE UNIONISM IN MUSIC.

The orchestral sweet bells seem to be jangled and out of tune quite generally. The Philadelphia orchestra is still in doubt about a guaranty for another season. The Pittsburg orchestra has lost its leader, Victor Herbert. The New York Philharmonic is limping through the present season with half a dozen different conductors. But the Boston orchestra, the only competitor Chicago has, is in a dangerous condition, principally owing to unionism.

The Boston orchestra at the beginning of the season lost its concertmaster and one or two principals. Their places were filled more or less successfully and all seemed to be running smoothly when a new difficulty presented itself. The Musical Mutual Protective union now proposes that twenty or more of its members shall leave the orchestra because there are nonunion men in that body. These twenty or more players, like the others, are under contract to Mr. Higginson, who, as is well known, supports the orchestra by paying its deficits. Without him the people of Boston would not have that fine organization. Mr. Higginson has said that rather than allow any interference with his business by musical artisans he will disband the orchestra.

The musicians' union is firm in its demand. Its love of the musical art is not so great as its hatred of players who will not carry dinner pails, pay initiation fees into its treasury, and do musical manual labor so many hours in a week for so many dollars, good players and bad players sharing alike, and hours and dollars to be regulated by the union. But this is not Mr. Higginson's view of the importance and dignity of musical art, and, it may be added, it is not the view of any other person outside the M. M. P. U. who loves music or knows anything about it. Mr. Higginson is firm also, as a man should be who pays all the bills and is bent upon furnishing his patrons with the best music. The question, therefore, is, will he disband the orchestra? If he does, of course Boston will lose one of its most attractive features, and it will be a serious loss to the cause of higher music. It is to be hoped that Mr. Higginson will adhere to his decision. A disbanded orchestra would not be so great a calamity as an orchestra dominated by the union and made up of a heterogeneous collection of good, bad, and indifferent players. It would be a death blow to music in America if the unions were allowed to dictate who should be employed and upon what terms, instead of the manager and conductor. Better no music than to submit to such tyranny. The Boston people from the earliest times have made bold fights for principle, and the principle in this case is one worth fighting for. It is possible for a labor union to carry its demands so far as to make itself not only ridiculous but harmful to the public. The demands of the M. M. P. U. are of that kind.

Music in Brooklyn

"WHAT a fall was there, my countrymen." Marc Antony's lament was recalled by some of the fastidious and short sighted Brooklynites compelled to hear a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Baptist Temple Friday night of last week. What a sad blow to the Women's Auxiliary that aimed to make these concerts dress parades. Families that had had the same seats in the Academy of Music for the past thirty years were rudely separated by the committee in charge of seating the audience in the new auditorium. The Baptist Temple is not adapted to concerts. It is badly ventilated, and the man who said the acoustics were good must have defective hearing. If the fire department does not insist on additional exits some subscribers will remain away from the concerts, even if the Institute refuses to refund their money. The Baptist Temple is a building much like the last Brooklyn Tabernacle in which the late Rev. Dr. Thomas De Witt Talmage preached. The Tabernacle, as many remember, burned down on a Sunday morning. While Talmage was standing before his pulpit shaking hands with strangers flames were discovered back of the great organ. All had to run for their lives, and before the fire engines could get to the corner of Clinton and Greene avenues the building was beyond the control of the firemen. The adjoining Hotel Regent and a private residence caught fire and all were swiftly burned to the ground before the eyes of thousands of terrified people. The Baptist Temple is lighted by electricity and so was the former Brooklyn Tabernacle. The floors and stairs of the Tabernacle were wood, and wood is the material used at the Temple. Therein lies the danger. The fire at the Tabernacle came at high noon, when only a hundred or about that number lingered to greet the famous preacher. Had the fire occurred at night when the auditorium was crowded there is no telling what might have happened. The burning of the Academy of Music a few weeks ago ought to teach some people a lesson. Communities, like individuals, sometimes escape punishment for violating certain laws, but when it comes to an assembly of 2,000 people it will not do to trifle with Providence too often.

Let the plain statement be made:

The Baptist Temple should not have been secured for the Institute concerts. Before the season is half over the committees will realize that they made a serious blunder.

If the new auditorium brings discomforts, the change is not without its humorous side. The members of the Boston Orchestra who had never ventured beyond the Academy of Music before had some difficulty in finding the place. They were told to take the Flatbush avenue car at the bridge. Fortunately, the Flatbush avenue car occupies the first track on that bewildering loop—the loop near Park row. But some of the men failed to notice the placard, and there wandered about like children lost in the desert. Mr. Longy, the oboe, arrived with a group of his colleagues, and he assured the men that the first track was right. This saved some of the others from losing themselves. The men spoke French, German and other languages, but no English. Mr. Arbos, the concertmeister, wore a fur lined coat (a kind of garment by which every prosperous musician in Europe is distinguished from the unsuccessful men in the profession). When the car carrying Mr. Arbos, Mr. Longy and a dozen other members of the orchestra reached the middle of the bridge there was a blockade, which caused a delay of twelve minutes. When the musical carload finally reached the corner of Flatbush avenue and Schermerhorn a thoughtful passenger informed the men that they had reached their destination. The musicians looked relieved when they saw the lighted Temple ahead of them and realized that they had been saved the awful fate of getting lost in Brooklyn.

The new stage of the Temple was built over the pool in which the faithful who pass the examination of the deacons are baptized at fixed intervals.

Throughout the evening Prof. Franklin W. Hooper, the director of the Brooklyn Institute, was up and about, trying, as far as he could, to have the place ventilated and pacify, also, as far as he was able, the subscribers who did not like their seats. There must be hundreds of them. This week Professor Hooper will hear from some of them.

The program was:

Symphony in D major, No. 2, op. 36.....Beethoven
Concerto in B major, for piano and orchestra, op. 10.....Huss
Symphonic poem, Vysehrad (No. 1 of the cycle My Country).Smetana
Academic Overture.....Brahms
Soloist, Miss Adele Aus der Ohe.

Beethoven's Second Symphony, what more can be written about it? A grandly conceived and yet simple composition that musicians have heard numberless times. The orchestra played in the usual finished manner, but it was the finish of the pianola, leaving the longing of the soul unsatisfied. The piano concerto by Henry Holden Huss, of Manhattan, gloriously performed by Miss Adele Aus der Ohe, in a way compensated for the long journey, the foul air and the other discomforts of the night. The concerto dedicated to Miss Aus der Ohe was performed by the composer at a concert by the New York Philharmonic, December, 1900. He also played it with the Cincinnati Orchestra in 1899, and with the Pittsburg Orchestra, January, 1902. The author of an elaborate musical work has declared that the Huss composition is the best piano concerto written by an American composer. When the composer played the composition with the New York Philharmonic three years ago THE MUSICAL COURIER published an analysis. All musicians like the work and find in it the things that are original and beautiful.

No praise is adequate to describe the musicianship of Miss Aus der Ohe. At the piano she effaces all thought of sex, for she plays, first, last and all the time, like an artist of the first rank, which she is. It is the men who lead the applause when Miss Aus der Ohe plays. The men know why they admire the sterling artist. Her attack, touch, phrasing, command of the instrument, combined in a rarely beautiful performance on this occasion Mr. Huss, the composer, witnessed her triumph from a seat in the gallery.

The native warmth was lacking in the performance of the part from Smetana's Symphonic Poem. The Brahms Academic Overture went better, but that is another story.

DAILY ADVERTISER,

DECEMBER 21, 1903

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Haydn.....Symphony No. 9 in C minor
Brahms.....Concerto for Violin
Miss Maud MacCarthy, Soloist.
Paine.....Ballet Music from "Azara"
Wagner..... Overture, "Tannhauser"

It may have been personal mood or it may have been the intrinsic style of the music, but Haydn's Symphony seemed puerile and tiresome. The violoncello solo in the Trio of the Minuet (finely played) afforded a little languid interest, but as a whole the work seemed stale, flat and unprofitable. Some of Haydn's symphonies wear better than the most of Mozart's—always excepting the G minor and the "Jupiter"—but the symphonic works of both masters belong to the age of the "Clarissa Harlowe" novel, and can interest here and there, but not as a whole. "Autre temps, autres m[illegible]s!"

From the extreme of simplicity the programme swept to the extreme of subtlety. We trust that Miss MacCarthy is not going to make Brahms' violin concerto an annual proceeding at our symphony concerts. She has proved that she can play the long work marvellously—for a young lady—and last Saturday she proved it again, which ought to be enough. There are not very many great violin concertos, but there are enough to avoid being restricted to a permanent Brahms diet.

It may be added, however, that the work gains on acquaintance. It may be a case of "first endure, then pity, then embrace," but we doubt if we shall ever embrace that prolix Adagio.

Miss MacCarthy played with astonishing surety, and in the cadenza and in the final movement exhibited much breadth in difficult double-stopped passages. She was recalled over and over again with great enthusiasm. Brahms' orchestration suffers by comparison with the modern colorists. Great as this master was, his greatness did not lie in the domain of brilliant scoring.

But the next works made ample amends for the neutral tints of the concerto. Paine's Moorish Dances glow with an Orientalism that is comparable with Rubinstein's "Feramors." Seductive, languishing and melodic, the three excerpts from "Azara" won sufficient applause to force the composer to bow his thanks to the audience. The interpretation was excellent and especial praise must be given to the English horn obbligato which was most eloquently performed.

The "Tannhaeuser" overture won the greatest success of the evening. It was wonderfully shaded—perhaps a little too carefully, for some of the "abandon" was lost. But the conflict of the two chief themes was finely brought out. The whole overture is a struggle (to alter Swinburne) between

"The trombones and viols of Virtue,
And the woodwind and cymbals of Vice."

And the violins and trombones get much the best of it in the last round. That coda is about as great as anything in the overture repertoire, and when Wagner cut it out to make room for a very dull transition into the first scene of the opera (the "Paris version"), he made a sacrifice to his theories that was nearly as great as the one that Abraham intended. But an angel stopped Abraham. We wish that some angel had stopped Wagner.

Louis C. Elson.

Music in Brooklyn

"WHAT a fall was there, my countrymen." Marc Antony's lament was recalled by some of the fastidious and short sighted Brooklynites compelled to hear a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Baptist Temple Friday night of last week. What a sad blow to the Women's Auxiliary that aimed to make these concerts dress parades. Families that had had the same seats in the Academy of Music for the past thirty years were rudely separated by the committee in charge of seating the audience in the new auditorium. The Baptist Temple is not adapted to concerts. It is badly ventilated, and the man who said the acoustics were good must have defective hearing. If the fire department does not insist on additional exits some subscribers will remain away from the concerts, even if the Institute refuses to refund their money. The Baptist Temple is a building much like the last Brooklyn Tabernacle in which the late Rev. Dr. Thomas De Witt Talmage preached. The Tabernacle, as many remember, burned down on a Sunday morning. While Talmage was standing before his pulpit shaking hands with strangers flames were discovered back of the great organ. All had to run for their lives, and before the fire engines could get to the corner of Clinton and Greene avenues the building was beyond the control of the firemen. The adjoining Hotel Regent and a private residence caught fire and all were swiftly burned to the ground before the eyes of thousands of terrified people. The Baptist Temple is lighted by electricity and so was the former Brooklyn Tabernacle. The floors and stairs of the Tabernacle were wood, and wood is the material used at the Temple. Therein lies the danger. The fire at the Tabernacle came at high noon, when only a hundred or about that number lingered to greet the famous preacher. Had the fire occurred at night when the auditorium was crowded there is no telling what might have happened. The burning of the Academy of Music a few weeks ago ought to teach some people a lesson. Communities, like individuals, sometimes escape punishment for violating certain laws, but when it comes to an assembly of 2,000 people it will not do to trifle with Providence too often.

Let the plain statement be made:

The Baptist Temple should not have been secured for the Institute concerts. Before the season is half over the committees will realize that they made a serious blunder.

If the new auditorium brings discomforts, the change is not without its humorous side. The members of the Boston Orchestra who had never ventured beyond the Academy of Music before had some difficulty in finding the place. They were told to take the Flatbush avenue car at the bridge. Fortunately, the Flatbush avenue car occupies the first track on that bewildering loop—the loop near Park row. But some of the men failed to notice the placard, and there wandered about like children lost in the desert. Mr. Longy, the oboe, arrived with a group of his colleagues, and he assured the men that the first track was right. This saved some of the others from losing themselves. The men spoke French, German and other languages, but no English. Mr. Arbos, the concertmeister, wore a fur lined coat (a kind of garment by which every prosperous musician in Europe is distinguished from the unsuccessful men in the profession). When the car carrying Mr. Arbos, Mr. Longy and a dozen other members of the orchestra reached the middle of the bridge there was a blockade, which caused a delay of twelve minutes. When the musical carload finally reached the corner of Flatbush avenue and Schermerhorn a thoughtful passenger informed the men that they had reached their destination. The musicians looked relieved when they saw the lighted Temple ahead of them and realized that they had been saved the awful fate of getting lost in Brooklyn.

The new stage of the Temple was built over the pool in which the faithful who pass the examination of the deacons are baptized at fixed intervals.

Throughout the evening Prof. Franklin W. Hooper, the director of the Brooklyn Institute, was up and about, trying, as far as he could, to have the place ventilated and pacify, also, as far as he was able, the subscribers who did not like their seats. There must be hundreds of them. This week Professor Hooper will hear from some of them.

The program was:

Symphony in D major, No. 2, op. 36.....Beethoven
Concerto in B major, for piano and orchestra, op. 10.....Huss
Symphonic poem, Vysehrad (No. 1 of the cycle My Country).Smetana
Academic Overture.....Brahms

Soloist, Miss Adele Aus der Ohe.

Beethoven's Second Symphony, what more can be written about it? A grandly conceived and yet simple composition that musicians have heard numberless times. The orchestra played in the usual finished manner, but it was the finish of the pianola, leaving the longing of the soul unsatisfied. The piano concerto by Henry Holden Huss, of Manhattan, gloriously performed by Miss Adele Aus der Ohe, in a way compensated for the long journey, the foul air and the other discomforts of the night. The concerto dedicated to Miss Aus der Ohe was performed by the composer at a concert by the New York Philharmonic, December, 1900. He also played it with the Cincinnati Orchestra in 1899, and with the Pittsburg Orchestra, January, 1902. The author of an elaborate musical work has declared that the Huss composition is the best piano concerto written by an American composer. When the composer played the composition with the New York Philharmonic three years ago THE MUSICAL COURIER published an analysis. All musicians like the work and find in it the things that are original and beautiful.

No praise is adequate to describe the musicianship of Miss Aus der Ohe. At the piano she effaces all thought of sex, for she plays, first, last and all the time, like an artist of the first rank, which she is. It is the men who lead the applause when Miss Aus der Ohe plays. The men know why they admire the sterling artist. Her attack, touch, phrasing, command of the instrument, all combined in a rarely beautiful performance on this occasion. Mr. Huss, the composer, witnessed her triumph from a seat in the gallery.

The native warmth was lacking in the performance of the part from Smetana's Symphonic Poem. The Brahms Academic Overture went better, but that is another story.

DAILY ADVERTISER,

DECEMBER 21, 1903

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Haydn.....Symphony No. 9 in C minor
Brahms.....Concerto for Violin
Miss Maud MacCarthy, Soloist.
Paine.....Ballet Music from "Azara"
Wagner..... Overture, "Tannhauser"

It may have been personal mood or it may have been the intrinsic style of the music, but Haydn's Symphony seemed puerile and tiresome. The violoncello solo in the Trio of the Minuet (finely played) afforded a little languid interest, but as a whole the work seemed stale, flat and unprofitable. Some of Haydn's symphonies wear better than the most of Mozart's—always excepting the G minor and the "Jupiter"—but the symphonic works of both masters belong to the age of the "Clarissa Harlowe" novel, and can interest here and there, but not as a whole. "Autre temps, autres mœurs!"

From the extreme of simplicity the programme swept to the extreme of subtlety. We trust that Miss MacCarthy is not going to make Brahms' violin concerto an annual proceeding at our symphony concerts. She has proved that she can play the long work marvellously—for a young lady—and last Saturday she proved it again, which ought to be enough. There are not very many great violin concertos, but there are enough to avoid being restricted to a permanent Brahms diet.

It may be added, however, that the work gains on acquaintance. It may be a case of "first endure, then pity, then embrace," but we doubt if we shall ever embrace that prolix Adagio.

Miss MacCarthy played with astonishing surety, and in the cadenza and in the final movement exhibited much breadth in difficult double-stopped passages. She was recalled over and over again with great enthusiasm. Brahms' orchestration suffers by comparison with the modern colorists. Great as this master was, his greatness did not lie in the domain of brilliant scoring.

But the next works made ample amends for the neutral tints of the concerto. Paine's Moorish Dances glow with an Orientalism that is comparable with Rubinstein's "Feramors." Seductive, languishing and melodic, the three excerpts from "Azara" won sufficient applause to force the composer to bow his thanks to the audience. The interpretation was excellent and especial praise must be given to the English horn obbligato which was most eloquently performed.

The "Tannhaeuser" overture won the greatest success of the evening. It was wonderfully shaded—perhaps a little too carefully, for some of the "abandon" was lost. But the conflict of the two chief themes was finely brought out. The whole overture is a struggle (to alter Swinburne) between

"The trombones and viols of Virtue,
And the woodwind and cymbals of Vice."

And the violins and trombones get much the best of it in the last round. That coda is about as great as anything in the overture repertoire, and when Wagner cut it out to make room for a very dull transition into the first scene of the opera (the "Paris version"), he made a sacrifice to his theories that was nearly as great as the one that Abraham intended. But an angel stopped Abraham. We wish that some angel had stopped Wagner.

Louis C. Elson.

FAMOUS "RUSH LINE" WAITING FOR THE DOORS OF SYMPHONY HALL TO OPEN ON FRIDAY FOR SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA REHEARSAL

SOME OF THE LEADING MUSICIANS AND BOHEMIANS OF BOSTON GATHER IN THIS LINE TO MAKE A RUSH FOR THE GALLERY RESERVED EXCLUSIVELY FOR THOSE WHO CAN THERE HEAR THE CONCERT FOR 25 CENTS. THE EXPLANATION FOR THIS GATHERING IS THAT ONLY A LIMITED NUMBER CAN BE ACCOMMODATED, AND WHEN THE GALLERY HAS ITS COMPLEMENT THOSE REMAINING ARE TURNED AWAY. ONE OF THE CONDITIONS OF ENTRANCE IS THAT THE "RUSHER" MUST HAVE A 25-CENT PIECE, AND IT IS NO UNUSUAL SIGHT TO SEE SOME OF BOSTON'S LEADING MUSICIANS WITH THE COIN HELD ALOFT SO THAT THE DOORKEEPER CAN SEE IT. THE PICTURE ABOVE WAS TAKEN LAST FRIDAY, AN UNUSUALLY COLD DAY, AND SOME OF THE "RUSHERS" HAD BEEN STANDING IN LINE FOR AN HOUR.

Is it a question whether the befeathered, befurred and bedecked dame of fashion, who saunters slowly and gracefully down the main isle of Symphony Hall at the Friday afternoon rehearsals just as the last twangs of the tuned violins have finished; it is a question whether she realizes what those hundred of beings seated in the second gallery have endured during the three, sometimes four, hours previous to the opening of the outside doors. They only seem to her to be a lot of interesting, queer people, most unfashionable, who carry great books of music under their arms, huge cakes of sweet chocolate and even boxes of sandwiches, which are put up for the occasion. If she only knew what these enthusiasts endured to hear the beloved orchestra, which sometimes seemed such a bore to the fashionable dame in the most expensive seat in the hall.

A five-minute study of the scene on Massachusetts avenue Friday would arouse sympathy and pity in the heart of the proudest dame. The wind swept up the avenue and down the avenue, and occasionally the gusts would swing around the corner from Huntington avenue, bringing clouds of dust. The thermometer registered 14 above, and the raw wind was biting.

Women who had lived for half a century stood in line for hours. Other women, young and pretty, dressed by fashionable tailors and possessing all the touches of culture and womanly dignity, braved the laughing glances of the non-musical who walked by and muttered words akin to "crazy" and "silly."

But the cold weather did not freeze the warm spirit of the music-lovers or others who were proxies for those too shy or afraid to stand on the steps for hours. Fun was easily made to suit the occasion. Happiness pervaded the shivering throng, and a laugh and a joke went up to match every sneer or jibe from the wondering men and women who passed by.

As another instance take the rehearsal of two weeks ago. The day was bitterly cold after a whole night of pouring rain. The steps of Symphony Hall were soaking wet and the four winds seemed to have agreed to blow all together around that coldest of corners, Massachusetts and Huntington avenues. But the doors never open until 1 o'clock, which, for some unknown reason, is the time set upon by the committee. So, no matter what the day or the weather may be, the one who goes on a rush to the Symphony must be strong in endurance. At 9 o'clock in the morning the first stone step was all taken by some energetic ones who are always the earliest arrivals on the scene. At 10 o'clock the next two steps were covered, one thoughtful old lady bringing a couple of camp chairs with her. Of course no one dared sit down on the damp steps, and even extra robes and old newspapers to stand upon were of no avail.

At 10 o'clock my feet were so cold as to actually be numb, and yet there were still three hours before the doors would open. However, I stuck to my post simply because Mme. Melba was to be the soloist for the afternoon. About 11 o'clock the pangs of hunger, added to the severe cold, made further waiting almost impossible.

But just then an Italian vender of bananas, oranges and apples appeared upon the scene and was hailed with shouts of delight. After doing quite a stroke of business he kindly donated several paper bags for the collection of banana skins. This was passed around amid many smiles of those newly arrived (those who had stood since 9 o'clock did not smile). At 12 o'clock the line of patient (?) waiters reached down to Gainsboro street, but all waited to hear the great Melba. Why is it that each and everyone who passes the crowd on the steps of Symphony Hall always indulges in the most aggravating of smiles and even turns the head to watch the interesting "rushers"? Those who smile in this way are noticeably not the ones who join the throng.

After four hours' waiting we were told that, "owing to a cold, Mme. Melba would not sing that day"! Could any other cross have possibly been added? But this is what one must expect who goes on "the rush." Of course there is always the feeling that with you are other music lovers, and on warm, bright days, it is not half bad fun to go at 11 o'clock with plenty of wraps, the silent friend (the book), or talkative friend, and nibble sweet chocolate until it is time to go inside. Then, of course, there is a long, tedious wait of an hour and a half before the concert begins, but it soon passes and usually the music makes up for the long waiting. The people are sometimes very interesting and their conversation highly amusing. Many are foreigners, some are merely students, but there is a feeling of comradeship which shows itself plainly on these occasions. Sometimes my next neighbor who stood beside me for three hours outside on the steps will sit next to me in the gallery and will often share lunch, novel or opera glasses with perfect good feeling. But on the whole from the days when great artists are to sing, particularly after rainy weather, kindly excuse me.

FROM A SUFFERER.

EIGHTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

An Enjoyable Programme Presented, With Maud MacCarthy as the Solo Violinist

Last evening's Symphony concert presented the following programme:

Symphony in C minor.....Haydn
Concerto for violin in D, Op. 77.....Brahms
Ballet music from the opera "Azara".....Paine
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner

This programme was in many ways enjoyable, more so than some of the programmes preceding. Haydn's symphony was one of the dozen that he wrote for the Salomon concerts in London between 1791 and 1794. It sounded more effective than most of his others when played by a modern grand orchestra in a large hall. Naturally, the proper place to hear a Haydn symphony is in a small hall with a moderate orchestra, as was originally intended.

The ballet music from Professor J. K. Paine's opera, "Azara," has been heard once before at these concerts. Consisting of three Moorish dances, it makes a pleasing orchestral excerpt, and they are among the best of the kind heard here for a long time. After hearing them, it is a matter of regret that the opera itself remains unknown to the stage, for if as a whole it is as effective as what little of it was heard last evening, it would rank among the best modern operas. The dances were superbly played and won instant recognition and great applause, as they fully deserved. The composer was present, and acknowledged the applause from his seat in the audience.

The ever popular "Tannhauser" overture created the usual demonstration, the performance being exceptionable. Miss MacCarthy played the Brahms concerto even better than she did here last season. There was admirable strength of conception, even if certain lack of maturity was in evidence; the tone quality, though not large, was purity itself, and in matter of technical proficiency there was little, if anything, to be desired. Miss MacCarthy received an immense ovation and several recalls at the close of the performance.

Mme. Melba is again announced as the soloist for the rehearsal and concert of this coming week.

MISS M'CARTHY VIOLIN SOLOIST

Makes Her Re-Entree at Symphony Concert and Gives Selections From Brahms.

PAINE'S "AZARA" BALLET

A Haydn Symphony and "Tannhauser" Overture Fill Out the Program.

It is an honorable distinction for a girl no older in life and art than Miss Maud MacCarthy to be taken for the second time in the course of a year as the violin soloist at a Symphony concert, when abroad in the world and at home in this country, too, there are so many violinists of established eminence who have never yet been heard there, and when secondary orchestras and minor cities can enlist the co-operation of Thibaud, who is at least a man of the hour, whatever his absolute value in art may be. But as her reappearance was clearly welcome and her performance gratified, all question as to the cause of her choice may be waived. What is peculiar and open to criticism is that she should have been put forward in the same work which served for her debut—the concerto of Brahms.

Versatility Is Needed.

We are warned to beware of the man with one book; should we distrust the musician with one concerto? It is true that Mr. Kneisel has played this concerto several times; but his catholicity is known, and there has always appeared a special reason in the work itself or in the occasion for his repetitions. A young artist, with the way to power and celebrity yet to conquer, should demonstrate versatility, unless he means to restrict himself to virtuosity or to a single composer.

Under certain conditions the repetition of a work might supply a gauge for the growth and progress of a player; but not if such repetition were deferred over a twelvemonth. Only the most studious, analytic and specific criticism could fairly compass two performances of a year apart, although some general impressions might be derived from a confronting of memory and the moment.

Miss MacCarthy, then, appears to have strengthened and ripened; but whether this be the result of study, purpose and effort, or only the normal growth of the accreted year, some more expert and minute critic of the violinist's art may undertake to decide and to illustrate by citation.

Deft Technique.

She newly presents the same pleasant, sweet, sufficient tone, the same graceful and deft technique, still implying some effort in arduous passages, the same definite mentality and the same sympathetic feeling. It should be said for her, however, that Brahms has here given small chance for sentiment to deepen toward passion; while he has required great skill for many devices of technique, but has asked it for legitimate purpose and not for show.

Miss MacCarthy, apparently depending somewhat upon the tacit encouragement of her master, Mr. Arbos, played in confident concentration upon her task, meeting her difficulties without obvious struggle and taking her success modestly. She put hearty spirit into the long, formal cadenzas of the first movement, rendered purity and tenderness to the romantic second, and had firm command over the trials and obstacles of the last. She certainly pleased and was approved, being several times recalled.

The Other Numbers.

The ballet music from Professor Paine's "Azara," which was heard with pleasure and some provocation to restlessness, intimates the dramatic fancy that moved him to write the poem and the music, and continue the action of the opera itself. It is not merely melodious, variably colored and characteristic in rhythms and instrumentation, but is so sugestive that an expert choreographer should have no difficulty in adapting to it not only the pas and "variations" of chief dancers, but also the work of coryphees and figurantes.

It was gaily played and people who only know Professor Paine's Greek tragic choruses and symphonies made the usual remark that they should not have thought he had it in him.

When it is added that the band played quite as they should, the C minor symphony (No. 9) of Haydn and the "Tannhauser" overture, there is no more to say except that the program was overlong.

Next time Mme. Melba will make good her promise and sing Handel's "Sweet Bird," with its flute-bird contest and Ophelia's mad scene from Thomas' "Hamlet." The orchestra will play a new set of variations upon an original theme by Elgar, Beethoven's 8th symphony and Bargiel's "Medea" overture.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CXIV., NO. 173.
SUNDAY, DEC. 20, 1903.

EIGHTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Prof. Paine's Ballet Music from "Azara."

Melodious Themes and Sumptuous Orchestration—Miss Maud MacCarthy Plays Brahms' Concerto for Violin and Wins Many Recalls.

The eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Gericke, conductor, was given in Symphony Hall last evening. The programme was as follows:

Symphony in C minor (B. & H. 9).....Haydn
Concerto for violin.....Brahms
Moorish dances from "Azara".....Paine
Overture to "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner

Prof. Paine's ballet music from "Azara" was played at a Symphony concert for the second time. Prof. MacDowell of Columbia honors his university by writing Celtic sonatas and New England idyls for the piano; Prof. Parker of Yale is addicted to the oratorio habit; but Prof. Paine writes an opera with a ballet of Moorish dancers, and thus bears witness to the fact that Harvard University encourages the cultivation of the more humanizing arts. The dances gave much pleasure. All of the themes are melodious and some are characteristic; the orchestration is now piquant, now sumptuous. The music is decorative and picturesque, as well as for the steps of dancing girls. It suggests the opera house with its peculiar atmosphere, the set scene, the entrance and the evolutions of the ballet. The dances were heartily applauded, and Prof. Paine rose from his seat on the floor and bowed his acknowledgments to audience and conductor and orchestra.

Here is a grand, romantic opera of which the vocal and piano score has been published. It is the work of an American musician whose compositions have won the respect of men of authority in this country and in Europe. There are two operatic companies in the United States that could produce "Azara": Mr. Conried's and Mr. Savage's. The former manager has gone to the trouble and the expense of preparing an English version of an opera by Smetana, a Czech, and he purposes to revive certain operas that have had only a short-lived popularity in the United States. Mr. Savage does not hesitate to produce with his company "Othello" and "Tosca" and he will bring out an English version of Puccini's "Mme. Butterfly." Neither manager is considering the production of "Azara," so far as we are informed, and Prof. Paine is looking forward to a production in Germany, for which a German text is already provided. It seems a pity that a serious opera by an American composer of established reputation should not first see the footlights in the land of his birth. Mr. Walter Damrosch was luckier with his "Scarlet Letter;" he had his own opera company; but it is not every composer that can afford this luxury.

Miss Maud Mac Carthy played Brahms' concerto for the violin. She played it when she appeared for the first time in this city (Nov. 15, 1902). Again she displayed a small, but pure and agreeable, tone, well grounded technic, an accent that would have won the applause of Polonious, and a maidenly discretion. To borrow Chaucer's phrase, she played "full fair," and she deserved the many recalls. But why Brahms' concerto again? Do we find in the Musician's Almanac for November and December: "About this time expect the violin concerto by Brahms"? An orator once made a brilliant speech, and he is now remembered as "Single-Speech Hamilton." Even a young player cannot afford to be characterized as a single-concerto violinist. No doubt Miss Mac Carthy's repertoire is not so limited; and again we ask in a spirit of love, when a young woman plays as well as Miss Mac Carthy does, why Brahms? Toujours Brahms as well as perdrix!

It is said of the late Joseph Gabriel Rheinberger, who thought in counterpoint and conversed in fugue that the music of Liszt gave him inward uneasiness, and whenever a piece by the Hungarian Abbe was on a programme, the eminent teacher of the Royal Music School at Munich withdrew from the hall during the performance to show publicly his disapproval and detestation. His conduct was thus somewhat ostentatious; and it disturbed the audience unless he happened to be in an end seat near a friendly door. It is said of Mr. H. T. Finck, the music critic of the New York Evening Post, that he tries to forget Brahms and all his works by reading some book by Hegel or Schopenhauer during the performance of music by his heart's abhorrence.

Mr. Finck's course is by far the more philosophical; he disturbs no one, and however abstruse the page, there is nothing in the music to divert his attention. To place red lights near certain doors of Symphony Hall with a legend on the wall: "This way out in case of Brahms," might offend some in the audience. It is much better to allow the discontented the liberty of self-improvement by reading. Not a newspaper that may flap or crackle; not a magazine the pages of which must be cut; but some discreetly-sized book that may be drawn from the pocket and easily held. "Molinos the Quietist," or the famous treatise "De Consolatione," or "The Gentle Life" would admirably suit the purpose; or a pocket chessboard with card chessmen might wile away the hour. Still better would be the importation of the drug described in "Realmah," which enabled the swallower to enjoy deep sleep with open eyes and a facial expression of intelligence.

The performance of the orchestra was of a high order of merit. The symphony and the overture themselves do not call for comment. It is not necessary to characterize the composer of the symphony as "Father Haydn," and allusions to "the well known genfality and sunny disposition of the father of the symphony" may well be spared.

There will be a tremendous rush for the rehearsal and concert this week (the first Thursday afternoon, on account of Christmas coming Friday) to hear Melba. She sings again, having generously offered her services for the pension fund of the orchestra, on Sunday night, the 27th. On Tuesday morning following she sails on the Saxonia from East Boston. After a few days in London, she goes, via Paris, to Monte Carlo, where she and M. Alvarez begin rehearsals at once for the production of Saint-Saens' new opera, to be produced in February.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, DEC 20, 1903.

EIGHTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

There were no novelties among the selections played at the eighth of the season's Symphony concerts, but the program was enjoyable and the appearance of Miss Maud MacCarthy as soloist was very welcome. The young violinist was given an exceedingly cordial reception and her performance was applauded with greater warmth than commonly marks bestowal of approval by symphony audiences.

Miss MacCarthy made her first public appearance in Boston with this orchestra a year ago and played Brahms' D major concerto for violin. She played the same composition last evening and her interpretation of the exacting work showed that she has made material advance in her art during the past 12 months.

Brahms' concerto does not offer exceptional opportunities for display of virtuosity but it requires for satisfactory interpretation scholarly musical attainments, depth of feeling and power of expression rarely possessed by a young artist. Miss MacCarthy is wonderfully gifted, and considering that she is less than 20 years of age, the most sanguine expectations regarding her future seem justified. Her tone is of rarely beautiful quality, her command of technique is equal to every demand and her playing is marked by intelligence of expression, refinement of sentiment and sincerity of purpose that can but command admiration. There was much greater power evident yesterday in her delivery of the broad and forceful passages of the first movement of the concerto than was shown when she played it here a year ago, and there was even more brilliancy in her performance of the cadenza and greater facility in her execution of the difficult and florid ornamentations of the finale.

Perhaps no one in the hall yesterday was more pleased with her success than the concert master of the orchestra, Mr E. Fernandez-Arbos. He was her teacher in London, and the ingenuous deference she paid him before and after her performance was noted with pleasure by the audience.

The other numbers composing Mr Gericke's program were Haydn's ninth symphony, ballet music from Prof Paines opera, "Azara," and the "Tannhauser" overture. This was the fourth time that Haydn's beautiful symphony had been given by this orchestra and it has surely never received a more gratifying performance. The fortissimo phrases of the first movement were given with smoothness and vigor and the intermediate themes and slower passages were played with a tenderness and delicacy of expression thoroughly in harmony with the requirements of the score. The cello solo in the trio was gracefully and agreeably played by Mr Krasselt.

The three Moorish dances from Prof Paine's opera were heard again with great pleasure and were played with the same skill, correctness of tempo and grace of rhythm that marked the performance of this music when first played under Mr Gericke's direction two years since. The "Tannhauser" overture was given a magnificent performance and compelled from the audience an enthusiastic demonstration of appreciation.

Because of the Christmas holiday the public rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra this week will be given Thursday afternoon instead of Friday. Mme Melba will be the soloist, and the program will be as follows: Overture, "Medea," Bargiel; "Sweet Bird," Handel; variations on an original theme, Edward Elgar; mad scene from "Hamlet," A. Thomas; symphony 8, in F major, Beethoven.

BOSTON POST, DECEMBER 24, 1903

Because of Christmas, the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, usually announced for Friday afternoon, will be given this Thursday afternoon at the usual hour.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1903

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, gave its eighth concert of the season Saturday night, Miss Maud MacCarthy, violinist, assisting. This was the programme in full:

Haydn: Symphony in C minor (B. & H. No. 9).
Brahms: Concerto for Violin, in D major, op. 77.
Paine: Ballet Music from the opera "Azara;" three Moorish Dances.
Wagner: Overture to "Tannhäuser."

While the rather forbidding programme set down for Saturday night made little promise of an interesting musical occasion, the concert proved, surprisingly enough, one of the liveliest and most brilliant of the present season. Superb playing did it, both Mr. Gericke and the orchestra, in their very best form, doing the work before them with a vigor and animation not always clearly in evidence. Even the Haydn symphony, the announcement of which is usually sufficient to make people come late or else to settle down to a comfortable perusal of the interesting programme books, held the attention of the audience, yea, even through the slow movement and the finale. This symphony in C-minor, by the way, less naive and "playful" than most symphonies by Haydn, sets forth much that is beautiful and, in its own way, big; particularly charming is the trio of the minuet, a delightful solo for 'cello. The orchestra played the work seriously, thereby doing justice to what Haydn had of greatness, and they were also successful in playing lightfully and gracefully without becoming unduly skittish in their interpretation. The symphony was received, not with the usual polite apathy, but with warm applause.

Then Miss Maud MacCarthy made her second appearance here with the orchestra in a year's time, again playing the Brahms concerto, that work of noble worth and beauty—if only the solo part could be omitted. According to the programme book, Miss MacCarthy is now just nineteen years of age. A young girl of attractive presence and of pleasing address, of well-developed technique and of unquestioned musical talent, she is still too young and inexperienced to appear as soloist at a symphony concert, where she takes her place in line with the accomplished violinists of the orchestra, with Mr. Loeffler, Mr. Kneisel, and with such visiting violinists as Camilla Urso, Gregorowitsch, Halir, César Thomson and Ysaye. An invitation to perform at a great orchestral concert should be regarded as a compliment to be paid only artists of high repute, and, with all her promise for the future, as yet Miss MacCarthy can hardly be called that. In showing such despatch in bringing her thus prominently before the public, her friends do her no kindness. And, furthermore, if Miss MacCarthy were to play at all at a symphony concert, she was ill advised to choose the Brahms concerto, for this composition is so technically difficult and so technically ungrateful that only a violinist of long experience and of great musical breadth can make it effective in concert. While often turning a phrase with surprising beauty, Miss MacCarthy on the whole shows in her playing her youthful immaturity, and her tone, unfortunately, as small and tight. In justice must it be said, however, that her performance was greeted with tremendous applause.

After the concerto came some ballet music from Mr. Paine's opera, "Azara"; three charming Moorish dances, very modern, fascinatingly melodious, with a wide variety of piquant rhythms, the whole clothed in orchestral dress now delicate, now resplendent with color. The dances are not Moorish in name only; they seem steeped in the very atmosphere of Andalusia. It is inexplicable that two operatic managers like Mr. Conried and Mr. Savage, both inclined to vary their repertoires considerably from those of their predecessors, should neglect an opera by Mr. Paine, who, till someone writes better music than he has written for his "Œdipus," is still the foremost American composer. The ballet music was enthusiastically received, and when the musician acknowdedged the applause from his seat, he was given an ovation.

This admirable concert was brought to its close by a remarkably brilliant performance of the "Tannhäuser" overture, which went with a warmth of passion that roused the house to a high pitch of enthusiasm. At the next concert Mme. Melba is to sing, and this will be the programme: Bargiel, overture to "Medea"; Handel, scena, "Sweet bird that shun'st the noise of folly"; Edward Elgar, variations on an original theme (first time); A. Thomas, Ophelia's mad scene from "Hamlet"; Beethoven, symphony No. 3, in F major. R. R. G.

Boston Transcript
WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 23, 1903

Because of Christmas, the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra usually announced for Friday afternoon will be given tomorrow (Thursday) afternoon at the usual hour.

DAILY ADVERTISER, DECEMBER 24, 1903

Because of Christmas, the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, usually announced for Friday afternoon, will be given this (Thursday) afternoon at the usual hour.

BOSTON JOURNAL.
DECEMBER 24, 1903.

MME. MELBA TO SING AT NEXT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Will Be Heard in "Sweet Bird" and Ophelia's Madness.

The ninth Symphony program, to be played as usual on Saturday evening and rehearsed this afternoon, because tomorrow is Christmas, is virtually sure of having Mme. Melba to give it brilliancy, as she has deferred sailing for Europe on purpose to assist in it, and in that other arranged for the pension fund concert of Sunday.

Contributing herself and her perfect vocalism, she brings no new song to the occasion, but will be heard in the exquisite and fascinating fioritura of Handel's "Sweet Bird," to which Mr. Maquarre will add the warbling flute obbligato, and also in the "mad" scene from Thomas' "Hamlet."

One new thing is announced for the occasion—a theme and resultant variations composed for orchestra by Edward Elgar, whom Theodore Thomas rates higher than any other writer of the time as a master of instrumentation.

The symphony will be Beethoven's ever friendly, favorite and jocund eighth, briefer than some of his, but all compact of beauty, variety, life and inspiration.

Medea and Her Story.

The overture is one of the two upon classic subjects composed by Bargiel. It is meant to shadow forth the character, deeds and fate of Medea, who was an unmitigatedly energetic, determined and unscrupulous personage, by no means "congenial companion for a small tea party," and a creature to agitate a composer to all the somber, tragic and fierce expression at his command. She started in life, as may be recalled, as an eminently potent sorceress, helped Jason to win the golden fleece, married him, and lived with him without any appeal for notoriety until the end of some ten years, when he transferred his affections to one Glauce, who did not enjoy her matrimony long, because Medea sent her a poisoned robe which killed her and her father, his death being compassed probably as a penalty for having begotten her. But Medea always had an exuberant appetite for slaughter. When she eloped with Jason, she took pains to delay her father's pursuit of her by killing her brother Absyrtis and strewing the fragments of his body along the road, that she might increase her lead while the pursuers were picking up the pieces. And after settling with Glauce, in order to fortify her exhibition of hate for Jason and his stock, she murdered and tore into fragments her own two sons by him and hurried off to Athens in a chariot drawn by Nagons. The Greek historians and dramatists assign to her other crimes and sundry miracles, and even go so far as to pronounce her the progenitress of the Medes. Bargiel has done what he could to suggest the decision, forcefulness and savagery of her character and exploits, but he could do no more than hint at them in music meant to imply horror, destruction, mystery and evil passion, with some suggestion of the better and happier elements of her tremendous existence. The hearer must explain it for himself and choose the thrills with which he will palpitate.

BOSTON GLOBE-DECEMBER 24, 1903.

Because of Christmas the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra usually announced for Friday afternoon will be given this afternoon at the usual hour.

BOSTON HERALD-DECEMBER 24, 1903.

The ninth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra [illegible] Symphony Hall this afternoon [illegible] programme will include Bargiel's overture, "Medea," which has not been played here for many years; Elgar's Variations on an original Theme, and Beethoven's familiar Eighth Symphony. Elgar's Variations are a series of musical portraits, and the work is described by the composer to his "friends pictured within." The composer himself says: "It is true that I have sketched for their amusement and mine, the idiosyncrasies of 14 of my friends, not necessarily musicians, but this is personal matter, and need not have been mentioned publicly. The variations should stand simply as a 'piece' of music. The theme is entitled "Enigma," and of this Mr. Elgar says: "The 'Enigma' must not explain—its 'dark saying must be left unguessed, and I warn you that the apparent connection between the variations and the Theme is often of the slightest texture; further, through and over the whole set another and larger theme 'goes,' but is not played. So the principal Theme never appears, even as in some late dramas—e. g., Maeterlink's 'L'Intruse' and 'Les Sept Princesses'—the chief character is never on the stage." Mme. Melba, who has wholly recovered from her cold, will sing Handel's "Sweet Bird," with flute obbligato by Mr. Andre Maquarre, and Ophelia's mad scene from Ambroise Thomas' "Hamlet." Nilsson was the first to sing this scene in Boston, but she sang it in a concert. Sembrich was the first to sing it here in opera, with Kaschmann as Hamlet.

[67]

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 23, 1903.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Eighth Concert—Review by Philip Hale in the Boston Herald.

THE eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, was given in Symphony Hall last evening. The program was as follows:

Symphony in C minor (B. & H. 9).....Haydn
Concerto for violin.....Brahms
Moorish Dances from Azara.....Paine
Overture to Tannhäuser.....Wagner

Professor Paine's ballet music from "Azara" was played at a Symphony concert for the second time. Professor MacDowell, of Columbia, honors his university by writing Celtic sonatas and New England idylls for the piano; Professor Parker, of Yale, is addicted to the oratorio habit, but Professor Paine writes an opera with a ballet of Moorish dancers, and thus bears witness to the fact that Harvard University encouraged the cultivation of the more humanizing arts. The dances gave much pleasure. All of the themes are melodious and some are characteristic; the orchestration is now piquant, now sumptuous. The music is decorative and picturesque, as well as for the steps of dancing girls. It suggests the opera house with its peculiar atmosphere, the set scene, the entrance and the evolutions of the ballet. The dances were heartily applauded, and Professor Paine rose from his seat on the floor and bowed his acknowledgments to audience and conductor and orchestra.

Here is a grand, romantic opera of which the vocal and piano score has been published. It is the work of an American musician whose compositions have won the respect of men of authority in this country and in Europe. There are two operatic companies in the United States that could produce "Azara": Mr. Conried's and Mr. Savage's. The former manager has gone to the trouble and the expense of preparing an English version of an opera by Smetana, a Czech, and he purposes to revive certain operas that have had only a short lived popularity in the United States. Mr. Savage does not hesitate to produce with his company "Othello" and "Tosca," and he will bring out an English version of Puccini's "Madame Butterfly." Neither manager is considering the production of "Azara," so far as we are informed, and Professor Paine is looking forward to a production in Germany, for which a German text is already provided. It seems a pity that a serious opera by an American composer of established reputation should not first see the footlights in the land of his birth. Walter Damrosch was luckier with his "Scarlet Letter"; he had his own opera company, but it is not every composer that can afford this luxury.

Miss Maud MacCarthy played Brahms' Concerto for the violin. She played it when she appeared for the first time in this city (November 15, 1902). Again she displayed a small but pure and agreeable tone, well grounded technic, an accent that would have won the applause of Polonious, and a maidenly discretion. To borrow Chaucer's phrase, she played "full fair," and she deserved the many recalls. But why Brahms' Concerto again? Do we find in the Musicians' Almanac for November and December: "About this time expect the Violin Concerto by Brahms"? An orator once made a brilliant speech, and he is now remembered as "Single Speech Hamilton." Even a young player cannot afford to be characterized as a single concerto violinist. No doubt Miss MacCarthy's repertory is not so limited; and again we ask, in a spirit of love, when a young woman plays as well as Miss MacCarthy does, why Brahms? Toujours Brahms as well as perdrix!

It is said of the late Joseph Gabriel Rheinberger, who thought in counterpoint and conversed in fugue, that the music of Liszt gave him inward uneasiness, and whenever a piece by the Hungarian Abbe was on a program the eminent teacher of the Royal Music School at Munich withdrew from the hall during the performance to show publicly his disapproval and detestation. His conduct was thus somewhat ostentatious, and it disturbed the audience unless he happened to be in an end seat near a friendly door. It is said of H. T. Finck, the music critic of the New York Evening Post, that he tries to forget Brahms and all his works by reading some book by Hegel or Schopenhauer during the performance of music by his heart's abhorrence.

Mr. Finck's course is by far the more philosophical; he disturbs no one, and, however abstruse the page, there is nothing in the music to divert his attention. To place red lights near certain doors of Symphony Hall with a legend on the wall: "This way out in case of Brahms," might offend some in the audience. It is much better to allow the discontented the liberty of self improvement by reading. Not a newspaper that may flap or crackle; not a magazine the pages of which must be cut; but some discreetly sized book that may be drawn from the pocket and easily held. "Molinos the Quietist," or the famous treatise "De Consolatione," or "The Gentle Life" would admirably suit the purpose; or a pocket chessboard with card chessmen might while away the hour. Still better would be the importation of the drug described in "Realmah," which enabled the swallower to enjoy deep sleep with open eyes and a facial expression of intelligence.

The performance of the orchestra was of a high order of merit. The symphony and the overture themselves do not call for comment. It is not necessary to characterize the composer of the symphony as "Father Haydn," and allusions to "the well known geniality and sunny disposition of the father of the symphony" may well be spared.

BOSTON COURIER, DECEMBER 26, 1903.

——Not even the Christmas preparations, and the numerous "last things" which always develop on the day previous to a holiday, prevented a large and brilliant audience from assembling in Symphony Hall, Thursday afternoon, for the rehearsal, and Mme. Melba,—who was at her very best, and beautifully clad in pale gray, done with white lace, and a large white picture hat, with a sweeping plume across the brim. Among those present were Miss Estelle Kimball, in brown corduroy, with a brown toque; Miss Mary Russell in navy blue and a white lace hat, having a pale blue brim; Mr. and Mrs. Gericke, Mrs. James H. Beale, Mrs. John B. Osborn, Miss Rosamond Allen, who was very beautifully clad in dark blue zibeline; Mrs. Matthew Luce, Mrs. James W. Kenney, distinguished in black; Miss May Kenney in green cloth, and a green toque, red wings; Mrs. William Humphrey, Mrs. Arthur Blake, Mr. and Mrs. James R. Poor, and the latter's mother, Mrs. Oliver, Miss Audrey Stanwood, Mrs. James B. Forsyth, Miss Florence Blair, Miss Clara Shattuck, wearing navy blue, and a large blue hat with plumes; Miss Margaret Codman in gray, with a red hat; Mrs. Harris Metcalfe, Miss Mabel B. Warren, Mr. and Mrs. Oliver Ames, the latter very handsome in her correct black, with picture hat and rope of pearls; Mrs. Frederick R. Sears, sr., Mrs. James Jackson, Miss Edith Stackpole, Miss Beatrice Blake in green, Miss Rachel Brooks, Miss Collette Dumeresq, Miss Alice Sohier, Mrs. Lowell, Miss Madeleine Boardman in red, and Persian lamb coat; Mrs. John L. Gardner, Miss Katherine Fay, Miss Eleanora Sears, Miss Anna Thayer, Miss Dorothy Jordan in red, with sable furs and a black picture hat; Mr. Eben D. Jordan, Miss Anna Berry, Miss Barbara Higginson, Miss Juliet Higginson, Miss Rosamond Saltonstall, Mrs. Fred B. Carpenter, Bishop Lawrence, Miss Marion Ladd, Mrs. J. DeForest Danielson, Mrs. C. H. Washburn and Miss Grace Dabney.

Sunday night the audience for the Melba concert will doubtless be equally brilliant for among the list of subscribers are such well known people as Mrs. Oliver Ames, Mrs. N. Hugh Cotton, Col. and Mrs. Higginson, Mr. and Mrs. F. L. Higginson, Mr. W. P. Blake, Mrs. S. Bullard Clary, Mrs. E. H. Clapp, Mrs. C. K. Cumston, Mrs. George L. Clark, Mrs. Mary L. Day, the Misses Hooper, Mrs. L. Cartaret Fenno, Mr and Mrs. Gericke, Mrs. I. N. Kimball, Mrs. Francis C. Lowell, Clara E. Munger, Miss Parkman of Brimmer street, Mr. Francis H. Peabody, Mr. W. K. Richardson, Mrs. A. E. Sprague, Mrs. William Warren Vaughan, Mr. T. D. Whitney, Mr. Gaugengigl and Mr. J. L. Thorndike.

The postponed appearance of Melba at the Symphony rehearsal Thursday afternoon, brought out a prodigous crush in spite of the fact that it was the afternoon before Christmas. Mme. Melba was in a French gown of gray crepe, the flounce done with white lace and bands of embroidery in a darker tone, and a large white and gray hat. On the corsage were many fine diamonds. After her first song Mme. Melba was brought out again and again to acknowledge the long continued plaudits. After her second number Mme. Melba had an informal reception in the artists' room. Mrs. Gardner in her three-fold chinchilla cape and toque, was one of the first to congratulate the prima donna.

In the audience Thursday afternoon were Mr. and Mrs. Oliver Ames, Mrs. DeForest Danielson, Mrs. James Jackson, with her daughter Mrs. George C. Lee, Jr.; Mrs. F. R. Sears, Sr., Miss Madeline Boardman and her fiance Mr. Wallace Goodrich, Mr. and Mrs. Albert F. Bigelow, Bishop Lawrence, Mrs. Francis Peabody, Jr., Miss Eleonora Sears, with Miss Anna Thayer, Miss Juliet and Miss Barbara Higginson, Miss Rosamond Saltonstall, Mrs. Guy Lowell, Mrs. William P. Fay and Miss Katherine Fay, Mr. Eben Jordan and Miss Dorothy Jordan, Mrs. Arthur Blake and Miss Beatrice Blake, Miss Grace Dabney, Miss Dorothea Bigelow, Miss Eleanor and Miss Alice Sohier, Miss Colette Dumaresq, Mrs. John L. Gardner, Mrs. J. H. Beal, Miss Clara Shattuck, with Miss Margaret Codman, Miss Edith Stackpole, Mrs. Matthew Luce, Mrs. J. B. Osborn, Mrs. Eben Stanwood, Mrs. Comee, Miss Marian Ladd, Miss Margaret Jackson, Mrs. J. W. Kenney and Miss Kenney, Miss Rosamond Allen, Miss Estelle Kimball, Dr. John D. Williams, Mr. and Mrs. James R. Poor, Mrs. F. B. Carpenter, Miss Rachel Brooks, Miss Aubrey Stanwood, Miss Mary Russell, Mrs. William Humphrey and Miss Edith Wynne Matthison of the "Everyman" company. Mr. Gilibert of the Melba company will be the soloist this week and should attract a great audience.

NINTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Elgar's Variations the New Feature of Programme.

First Performance Here of This Interesting and Brilliant Work—Mme. Melba Sings Arias by Handel and Ambroise Thomas—Bargiel's "Medea."

The programme of the ninth Symphony concert, given last night in Symphony Hall, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Overture, "Medea".....Bargiel
Scena, "Sweet Bird".....Handel
Variations on an original theme.....Elgar
(First time here.)
Ophelia's mad scene from "Hamlet".....
.....A. Thomas
Symphony No. 8.....Beethoven

Woldemar Bargiel was a sorely disappointed man long before he died. He was disappointed in the conduct of his colleagues toward him; he was disappointed in the judgment passed by the great musical public on his works. A step-brother of Clara Schumann, he was trained in the straight and narrow path of conservatory righteousness, but he had instincts and tendencies toward romanticism. In the early sixties of the 19th century he was characterized as a composer of ability and dangerous ideas. This overture, "Medea," was considered too modern at Leipsic, and when it was played afterward at Vienna, the critic Hanslick deplored the fact that the younger composers affected such grisly subjects; he wondered why they were not cheerful and gay in music.

There was a time when Bargiel was reckoned with as one of the possibly great. In 1865 he was called to Rotterdam to take charge of an institution, and his years of honorable service in Holland were the happiest of his life. He was invited in 1874 to be a teacher at the high school for music in eBrlin, and then his real and fancied troubles began. There is no doubt but that he was treated unfairly and shoved aside to make room for intriguers and inferior musicians. His serious compositions were heard less and less frequently he grew suspicious, sour, bitter of speech—we are writing from personal knowledge—but in the company of those whom he trusted he was genial, witty, wise. As a teacher he was patient and helpful, as well as naturally gifted in the art of instruction.

The years go by and Bargiel's music is now seldom heard. A pianist taught by some one of the old school may play an excerpt from a suite; a 'cellist may play an adagio; but the larger works are practically unknown to the younger generation of music hearers. Nor is the reason of this neglect one for conjecture. The reason is in the music itself. The hostility of colleagues and the neglect of conductors and the coolness of contemporary audiences never kill a great work. The music that soon dies after a struggle had the seeds of the fatal disease when it was born.

Take this "Medea." There is no programme. The name "Medea" should be enough. The subject is tragic; but the music is not forcibly tragic either in the ancient or in the modern spirit. There are dissonances that irritated the Gewandhaus audience when they were first heard; but dissonances do not necessarily establish a tragic mood. Gluck by simplest means was nobly antique in musical tragedy. Perhaps it is not too much to say that no composer ever reproduced the irresistible simplicity, the effective repression, the direct pathos, the mysterious atmosphere of inexorable Fate that are among the characteristics of the highest Greek tragedy as did the Chevalier Gluck in his overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis."

A modern radical, Vincent d'Indy, has succeeded by force of imagination in portraying in tones the story of Medea; but his music is French music for a French "Medee." Cherubini, whose "Anacreon" is indisputably Grecian, did comparatively little with his "Medea." Bargiel's overture is more interesting than Cherubini's of the same title; but it is wanting in high imagination. The themes are not potently typical; the treatment of them does not firmly establish moods that are the suggestion or the expression of the passion and tragedy of the wild legend. It is sound, respectable music, with here and there an inclination toward imaginative flight. The romanticism of Bargiel was held as in a vise by his classical heredity and training. The preservation of the traditions, expression in forms that were approved models—these were first in his thoughts; nor was Medea, with all her sorcery, able to drive them from his brain.

Mr. Elgar's Variations, played here for the first time, have been highly praised. If one was amazed at the reputation of this composer after hearing the "Cockaigne" overture or the much-lauded sea songs, or after a reading of the "Dream of Gerontius," he was told by the Elgarian: "But you should hear Elgar's Variations."

This work is, indeed, a work of unusual merit for an Englishman. It is, on the whole, an interesting work for a composer of any nationality. Mr. Elgar has told us all his purpose: "I have sketched for their amusement and mine the idiosyncrasies of 14 of my friends, not necessarily musicians; but this is a personal matter, and need not have been mentioned publicly. The variations should stand simply as a 'piece' of music."

And so they must stand, for unless the hearer should know intimately these friends of Mr. Elgar, he could not tell whether the portraiture were successful; and even if he knew them, his view might be a different one from the composer's.

The connection between the theme "Enigma" and these variations is often of the slightest, and the composer hints at a "principal theme that never appears," unlike the theme of Istar, in d'Indy's fine set of variations, which is first proclaimed in full only when the heroine, stripped little by little of her dress and jewels, stands forth proud and triumphant in her splendid nakedness.

Whether these portraits of [illegible] Hank, Sister Sue, Thomas and Jerremiah, and the other friends are faithful reproduction of idiosyncracies is a question that does not concern us, though the first variations might lead us to infer that some of the friends were dull persons, or idle chatterers, or mere dealers in saws and maxims. For composers as well as others may have queer tastes in the matter of friendship. But the music grows more and more delightful. "Dorabella" is the one friend we should like to know; the others of the later variations are pleasant companions, and they might improve still more on acquaintance, but "Dorabella," with her coquetry, her grace, her rippling laugh and sly smile, her pouting lips and suggestion of subtle fragrancy lead us to her. Mr. Elgar! Never mind about "C. A. E." and the others tagged with letters of the alphabet.

There is often in this work a display of genuine fancy in thought and expression, and there is an occasional flash of imagination. The brilliance and the beauty of certain variations make one suspect that Mr. Elgar at the start was deliberately dull, either to work out a crescendo of interest or from the belief that certain pages in a set of variations must be dull in obedience to long established custom. The finale is, on the whole, effective, although it contains formulas of commonplace and routine. The work made an unusually favorable impression on the audience, and the applause was honest as well as hearty.

Mme. Melba sang Handel's "Sweet Bird" for the third time at these concerts. The flute obligato was played by Mr. André Maquarre. The air itself belongs to a class that is made tolerable only by the consummate art of a great virtuoso in perfect condition. The bravura passages must, like the cataract in Tennyson's song, leap in glory, Mme. Melba's upper tones in this air were not so clear and of such exquisite quality as on former occasions, nor was her coloratura so spontaneous. No doubt her late indisposition had something to do with this. The fact remains that the middle and lower registers of her voice were last night the most effective.

In the old story used by the poets Ford and Crashaw, it was the bird with warbling throat that failed to imitate the lute and at last dropped and "brake her heart." No such fate befell Mme. Melba, although Mr. Maquarre set her a brave example for vocal emulation, but the voice in this air was not the incomparable organ that moved and thrilled by power of golden beauty in the late performance of "The Damnation of Faust," when Mme. Melba's performance was memorable, unforgettable. In the familiar scene of Ophelia's madness she sang with greater brilliance and with more confident bravura. Here there was no thought of technical difficulties and anxious labor. The applause and the recalls were richly merited.

Elgar's variations and the overture by Bargiel were played with a care that was not too evident, with a finish that was never finical, with all the qualities demanded by the music and in sympathy with the composer's intentions. Beethoven's 8th symphony, agreeable as it is, seemed here unnecessary. The concert was long enough without it.

[68]

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 23, 1903.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Eighth Concert—Review by Philip Hale in the Boston Herald.

THE eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, was given in Symphony Hall last evening. The program was as follows:

Symphony in C minor (B. & H. 9).....Haydn
Concerto for violin.....Brahms
Moorish Dances from Azara.....Paine
Overture to Tannhäuser.....Wagner

Professor Paine's ballet music from "Azara" was played at a Symphony concert for the second time. Professor MacDowell, of Columbia, honors his university by writing Celtic sonatas and New England idylls for the piano; Professor Parker, of Yale, is addicted to the oratorio habit, but Professor Paine writes an opera with a ballet of Moorish dancers, and thus bears witness to the fact that Harvard University encouraged the cultivation of the more humanizing arts. The dances gave much pleasure. All of the themes are melodious and some are characteristic; the orchestration is now piquant, now sumptuous. The music is decorative and picturesque, as well as for the steps of dancing girls. It suggests the opera house with its peculiar atmosphere, the set scene, the entrances and the evolutions of the ballet. The dances were heartily applauded, and Professor Paine rose from his seat on the floor and made his acknowledgments to audience and conductor and orchestra.

Here is a grand, romantic opera of which the vocal and piano score has been published. It is the work of an American musician whose compositions have won the respect of men of authority in this country and in Europe. There are two operatic companies in the United States that could produce "Azara": Mr. Conried's and Mr. Savage's. The former manager has got to the trouble and the expense of preparing an English version of an opera by Smetana, a Czech, and he purposes to revive certain operas that have had only a short lived popularity in the United States. Mr. Savage does not hesitate to produce with his company "Othello" and "Tosca," and will bring out an English version of Puccini's "Madame Butterfly." Neither manager is considering the production of "Azara," so far as we are informed, and Professor Paine is looking forward to a production in Germany, for which a German text is already provided. It seems a pity that a serious opera by an American composer of established reputation should not first see the footlights in the land of his birth. Walter Damrosch was luckier with his "Scarlet Letter"; he had his own opera company, but it is not every composer that can afford this luxury.

Miss Maud MacCarthy played Brahms' Concerto for the violin. She played it when she appeared for the first time in this city (November 15, 1902). Again she displayed a small but pure and agreeable tone, well grounded technic, an accent that would have won the applause of Polonious, and a maidenly discretion. To borrow Chaucer's phrase, she played "full fair," and she deserved the many recalls. But why Brahms' Concerto again? Do we find in the Musicians' Almanac for November and December: "About this time expect the Violin Concerto by Brahms"? An orator once made a brilliant speech, and he is now remembered as "Single Speech Hamilton." Even a young player cannot afford to be characterized as a single concerto violinist. No doubt Miss MacCarthy's repertory is not so limited; and again we ask, in a spirit of love, when a young woman plays as well as Miss MacCarthy does, why Brahms? Behold yours Brahms as well as perdrix!

It is said of the late Joseph Gabriel Rheinberger, who thought in counterpoint and conversed in fugue, that the music of Liszt gave him inward uneasiness. And whenever a piece by the Hungarian Abbé was on a program the eminent teacher of the Royal Music School at Munich withdrew from the hall during the performance to show publicly his disapproval and detestation. His conduct was thus somewhat ostentatious, and it disturbed the audience unless he happened to be in an end seat near a friendly door. It is said of H. T. Finck, the music critic of the New York Evening Post, that he tries to forget Brahms and all his works by reading some book by Hegel or Schopenhauer during the performance of music by his heart's abhorrence.

Mr. Finck's course is [illegible] more philosophical; he disturbs no one, and, however abstruse the page there is nothing in the music to divert his attention. Displace red lights near certain doors of Symphony Hall and legend on the wall: "This way out in case of Brahms," lest offend some in the audience. It is much better to allow the discontented the liberty of self improvement by reading. Not a newspaper that may flap at the ear; not a magazine the pages of which must be [illegible] some discreetly sized book that may be drawn from the pocket and easily held. "Molinos the Quietist," the famous treatise "De Consolatione," or "The Gentle Life" would admirably suit the purpose; or a pocket chessboard with card chessmen might while away the hour. Still better would be the importation of the drug described in "Realmah," which enabled the swallower to enjoy deep sleep with open eyes and a facial expression of intelligence.

The performance of the orchestra was of a high order of merit. The symphony and the overture themselves do not call for comment. It is not necessary to characterize the composer of the symphony as "Father Haydn," and allusions to "the well known geniality and sunny disposition of the father of the symphony" may well be spared.

BOSTON COURIER, DECEMBER 26, 1903.

——Not even the Christmas preparations, and the numerous "last things" which always develop on the day previous to a holiday, prevented a large and brilliant audience from assembling in Symphony Hall, Thursday afternoon, for the rehearsal, and Mme. Melba,—who was at her very best, and beautifully clad in pale gray, done with white lace, and a large white picture hat, with a sweeping plume across the brim. Among those present were Miss Estelle Kimball, in brown corduroy, with a brown toque; Miss Mary Russell in navy blue and a white lace hat, having a pale blue brim; Mr. and Mrs. Gericke, Mrs. James H. Beale, Mrs. John B. Osborn, Miss Rosamond Allen, who was very beautifully clad in dark blue zibeline; Mrs. Matthew Luce, Mrs. James W. Kenney, distinguished in black; Miss May Kenney in green cloth, and a green toque, red wings; Mrs. William Humphrey, Mrs. Arthur Blake, Mr. and Mrs. James R. Poor, and the latter's mother, Mrs. Oliver, Miss Audrey Stanwood, Mrs. James B. Forsyth, Miss Florence Blair, Miss Clara Shattuck, wearing navy blue, and a large blue hat with plumes; Miss Margaret Codman in gray, with a red hat; Mrs. Harris Metcalfe, Miss Mabel B. Warren, Mr. and Mrs. Oliver Ames, the latter very handsome in her correct black, with picture hat and rope of pearls; Mrs. Frederick R. Sears, sr., Mrs. James Jackson, Miss Edith Stackpole, Miss Beatrice Blake in green, Miss Rachel Brooks, Miss Collette Dumeresq, Miss Alice Sohier, Mrs. Lowell, Miss Madeleine Boardman in red, and Persian lamb coat; Mrs. John L. Gardner, Miss Katherine Fay, Miss Eleanora Sears, Miss Anna Thayer, Miss Dorothy Jordan in red, with sable furs and a black picture hat; Mr. Eben D. Jordan, Miss Anna Berry, Miss Barbara Higginson, Miss Juliet Higginson, Miss Rosamond Saltonstall, Mrs. Fred B. Carpenter, Bishop Lawrence, Miss Marion Ladd, Mrs. J. DeForest Danielson, Mrs. C. H. Washburn and Miss Grace Dabney.

Sunday night the audience for the Melba concert will doubtless be equally brilliant for among the list of subscribers are such well known people as Mrs. Oliver Ames, Mrs. N. Hugh Cotton, Col. and Mrs. Higginson, Mr. and Mrs. F. L. Higginson, Mr. W. P. Blake, Mrs. S. Bullard Clary, Mrs. E. H. Clapp, Mrs. C. K. Cumston, Mrs. George L. Clark, Mrs. Mary L. Day, the Misses Hooper, Mrs. L. Cartaret Fenno, Mr and Mrs. Gericke, Mrs. I. N. Kimball, Mrs. Francis C. Lowell, Clara E. Munger, Miss Parkman of Brimmer street, Mr. Francis H. Peabody, Mr. W. K. Richardson, Mrs. A. E. Sprague, Mrs. William Warren Vaughan, Mr. T. D. Whitney, Mr. Gaugengigl and Mr. J. L. Thorndike.

The postponed appearance of Melba at the Symphony rehearsal Thursday afternoon, brought out a prodigous crush in spite of the fact that it was the afternoon before Christmas. Mme. Melba was in a French gown of gray crepe, the flounce done with white lace and bands of embroidery in a darker tone, and a large white and gray hat. On the corsage were many fine diamonds. After her first song Mme. Melba was brought out again and again to acknowledge the long continued plaudits. After her second one number Mme. Melba had an informal reception in the artists' room. Mrs. Gardner in her three-fold chinchilla cape and toque, was one of the first to congratulate the prima donna.

In the audience Thursday afternoon were Mr. and Mrs. Oliver Ames, Mrs. DeForest Danielson, Mrs. James Jackson, with her daughter Mrs. George C. Lee, Jr.; Mrs. F. R. Sears, Sr., Miss Madeline Boardman and her fiance Mr. Wallace Goodrich, Mr. and Mrs. Albert F. Bigelow, Bishop Lawrence, Mrs. Francis Peabody, Jr., Miss Eleonora Sears, with Miss Anna Thayer, Miss Juliet and Miss Barbara Higginson, Miss Rosamond Saltonstall, Mrs. Guy Lowell, Mrs. William P. Fay and Miss Katherine Fay, Mr. Eben Jordan and Miss Dorothy Jordan, Mrs. Arthur Blake and Miss Beatrice Blake, Miss Grace Dabney, Miss Dorothea Bigelow, Miss Eleanor and Miss Alice Sohier, Miss Colette Dumaresq, Mrs. John L. Gardner, Mrs. J. H. Beal, Miss Clara Shattuck, with Miss Margaret Codman, Miss Edith Stackpole, Mrs. Matthew Luce, Mrs. J. B. Osborn, Mrs. Eben Stanwood, Mrs. Comee, Miss Marian Ladd, Miss Margaret Jackson, Mrs. J. W. Kenney and Miss Kenney, Miss Rosamond Allen, Miss Estelle Kimball, Dr. John D. Williams, Mr. and Mrs. James R. Poor, Mrs. F. B. Carpenter, Miss Rachel Brooks, Miss Aubrey Stanwood, Miss Mary Russell, Mrs. William Humphrey and Miss Edith Wynne Matthison of the "Everyman" company. Mr. Gilibert of the Melba company will be the soloist this week and should attract a great audience.

NINTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Elgar's Variations the New Feature of Programme.

First Performance Here of This Interesting and Brilliant Work—Mme. Melba Sings Arias by Handel and Ambroise Thomas—Bargiel's "Medea."

The programme of the ninth Symphony concert, given last night in Symphony Hall, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Overture, "Medea".....Bargiel
Scena, "Sweet Bird".....Handel
Variations on an original theme.....Elgar
(First time here.)
Ophelia's mad scene from "Hamlet".....A. Thomas
Symphony No. 8.....Beethoven

Woldemar Bargiel was a sorely disappointed man long before he died. He was disappointed in the conduct of his colleagues toward him; he was disappointed in the judgment passed by the great musical public on his works. A step-brother of Clara Schumann, he was trained in the straight and narrow path of conservatory righteousness, but he had instincts and tendencies toward romanticism. In the early sixties of the 19th century he was characterized as a composer of ability and dangerous ideas. This overture, "Medea," was considered too modern at Leipsic, and when it was played afterward at Vienna, the critic Hanslick deplored the fact that the younger composers affected such grisly subjects; he wondered why they were not cheerful and gay in music.

There was a time when Bargiel was reckoned with as one of the possibly great. In 1865 he was called to Rotterdam to take charge of an institution, and his years of honorable service in Holland wer the happiest of his life. He was invited in 1874 to be a teacher at the high school for music in eBrlin, and then his real and fancied troubles began. There is no doubt but that he was treated unfairly and shoved aside to make room for intriguers and interior musicians. His serious compositions were heard less and less frequently. He grew suspicious, sour, bitter of speech—we are writing from personal knowledge—but in the company of those whom he trusted he was genial, witty, wise. As a teacher he was patient and helpful, as well as naturally gifted in the art of instruction.

The years go by and Bargiel's music is now seldom heard. A pianist taught by some one of the old school may play an excerpt from a suite; a 'cellist may play an adagio; but the larger works are practically unknown to the younger generation of music hearers. Nor is the reason of this neglect one for conjecture. The reason is in the music itself. The hostility of colleagues and the neglect of conductors and the coolness of contemporary audiences never kill a great work. The music that soon dies after a struggle had the seeds of the fatal disease when it was born.

Take this "Medea." There is no programme. The name "Medea" should be enough. The subject is tragic; but the music is not forcibly tragic either in the ancient or in the modern spirit. There are dissonances that irritated the Gewandhaus audience when they were first heard; but dissonances do not necessarily establish a tragic mood. Gluck by simplest means was nobly antique in musical tragedy. Perhaps it is not too much to say that no composer ever reproduced the irresistible simplicity, the effective repression, the direct pathos, the mysterious atmosphere of inexorable Fate that are among the characteristics of the highest Greek tragedy as did the Chevalier Gluck in his overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis."

A modern radical, Vincent d'Indy, has succeeded by force of imagination in portraying in tones the story of Medea; but his music is French music for a French "Medee." Cherubini, whose "Anacreon" is indisputably Grecian, did comparatively little with his "Medea." Bargiel's overture is more interesting than Cherubini's of the same title; but it is wanting in high imagination. The themes are not potently typical; the treatment of them does not firmly establish moods that are the suggestion or the expression of the passion and tragedy of the wild legend. It is sound, respectable music, with here and there an inclination toward imaginative flight. The romanticism of Bargiel was held as in a vise by his classical heredity and training. The preservation of the traditions, expression in forms that were approved models—these were first in his thoughts; nor was Medea, with all her sorcery, able to drive them from his brain.

Mr. Elgar's Variations, played here for the first time, have been highly praised. If one was amazed at the reputation of this composer after hearing the "Cockaigne" overture or the much-lauded sea songs, or after a reading of the "Dream of Gerontius," he was told by the Elgarian: "But you should hear Elgar's Variations."

This work is, indeed, a work of unusual merit for an Englishman. It is, on the whole, an interesting work for a composer of any nationality. Mr. Elgar has told us all his purpose: "I have sketched for their amusement and mine the idiosyncrasies of 14 of my friends, not necessarily musicians; but this is a personal matter, and need not have been mentioned publicly. The variations should stand simply as a 'piece' of music."

And so they must stand, for unless the hearer should know intimately these friends of Mr. Elgar, he could not tell whether the portraiture were successful; and even if he knew them, his view might be a different one from the composer's.

The connection between the theme "Enigma" and these variations is often of the slightest, and the composer hints at a "principal theme that never appears," unlike the theme of Istar, in d'Indy's fine set of variations, which is first proclaimed in full only when the heroine, stripped little by little of her dress and jewels, stands forth proud and triumphant in her splendid nakedness.

Whether these portraits of Uncle Hank, Sister Sue, Thomas and Jeremiah, and the other friends are faithful reproduction of idiosyncracies is a question that does not concern us, although the first variations might lead us to infer that some of the friends were dull persons, or idle chatterers, or mere dealers in saws and maxims; for composers as well as others may have queer tastes in the matter of friendship. But the music grows more and more delightful. "Dorabella" is the one friend we should like to know; the others of the later variations are pleasant companions, and they might improve still more on acquaintance, but "Dorabella," with her coquetry, her grace, her rippling laugh and sly smile, her pouting lips and suggestion of subtle fragrancy lead us to her, Mr. Elgar! Never mind about "C. A. E." and the others tagged with letters of the alphabet.

There is often in this work a display of genuine fancy in thought and expression, and there is an occasional flash of imagination. The brilliance and the beauty of certain variations make one suspect that Mr. Elgar at the start was deliberately dull, either to work out a crescendo of interest or from the belief that certain pages in a set of variations must be dull in obedience to long established custom. The finale is, on the whole, effective, although it contains formulas of commonplace and routine. The work made an unusually favorable impression on the audience, and the applause was honest as well as hearty.

Mme. Melba sang Handel's "Sweet Bird" for the third time at these concerts. The flute obligato was played by Mr. Andre Maquarre. The air itself belongs to a class that is made tolerable only by the consummate art of a great virtuoso in perfect condition. The bravura passages must, like the cataract in Tennyson's song, leap in glory, Mme. Melba's upper tones in this air were not so clear and of such exquisite quality as on former occasions, nor was her coloratura so spontaneous. No doubt her late indisposition had something to do with this. The fact remains that the middle and lower registers of her voice were last night the most effective.

In the old story used by the poets Ford and Crashaw, it was the bird with warbling throat that failed to imitate the lute and at last dropped and "brake her heart." No such fate befell Mme. Melba, although Mr. Maquarre set her a brave example for vocal emulation, but the voice in this air was not the incomparable organ that moved and thrilled by power of golden beauty in the late performance of "The Damnation of Faust," when Mme. Melba's performance was memorable, unforgettable. In the familiar scene of Ophelia's madness she sang with greater brilliance and with more confident bravura. Here there was no thought of technical difficulties and anxious labor. The applause and the recalls were richly merited.

Elgar's variations and the overture by Bargiel were played with a care that was not too evident, with a finish that was never finical, with all the qualities demanded by the music and in sympathy with the composer's intentions. Beethoven's 8th symphony, agreeable as it is, seemed here unnecessary. The concert was long enough without it.

[68]

BOSTON SUNDAY JOURNAL—DECEMBER 27, 1903.

MME. MELBA

The latest picture of the great songstress, who appeared last week at a Symphony concert.

MELBA'S SINGING ADDS MUCH LIGHT

Elgar's "Enigma" in Theme and Variations Novelty of the Symphony.

SOME UNNAMED FRIEND

Somber "Medea" Overture and Beethoven's Lightsome Eighth Symphony Played.

In her large share of the ninth Symphony program, Mme. Melba newly showed—as she has often shown before, and will doubtless show again in her part of the pension fund program, this evening—that she is a superlatively exquisite and almost peerless vocalist.

Yet as even the great and unrivalled have their imperfections, and as her position is too firmly established to be even shaken by criticism, one may note, even at this late day, that error of her scale, derived from non-equalization of vowels, which causes her E and her A to be often narrow, thin and incisive, too much early attention having been given to individualizing them as letters, instead of molding them slightly into tonal symmetry with the broader vowels. But against this, one sets the elastic facility of her scales, her coruscant floritura, and the incomparable justice equality, decision and splendor of her trill. Still, she does not pass beyond vocalism into artistic song. Her range is narrow, her repertory is limited to extracted operatic scenes, bravura waltzes, and such like things wherin neither mentality nor sympathy has need to penetrate beneath the surface.

Antique Gems.

For this Symphony audience she chose two of these antique gems, viz.: Handel's "Sweet Bird," wherein (as also in her familiar "mad" scene from "Lucia,") there is such close rivalry and such elegant association between the voice and the flute, played by Mr. Maquerre, and Ophelia's death scene from the "Hamlet" of Ambrosse Thomas, who therein demonstrates the incomprehensibility by the Gothic mind of Shakespeare'sc tragedy and its personages.

Possibly, if Mme. Melba could enter imaginatively into Ophelia's agony and distraction, she might impart to those "wild and whirling words" and measures a gravity of despair that would make them poignant and terrible.

But their emotion is beyond her ken, and she can only vocalize and wander on through the empty scene.

One Novelty.

Elgar's "Enigma" theme and variations constituted the novelty of the occasion, came almost unchallenged, and passed undetained. Inasmuch as the composer has frankly said that their mutual relation was tenuous and illogical, even in a technical sense, only the expert would attempt to make anything of them, especially as it is said that their connection is rather in another theme which is far from obvious, although it is declared to overhang them all.

The theme itself, so far as it can be held and examined, is of an unsatisfied, longing, interrogative character, as if seeking it knows not what. The variations are said to be suggestive each of some unnamed friend; and hence that the notion springs up that each variation in turn asks what is the mystery in that human notion which it typifies, or what is the problem which it seeks to solve. But as no clue, however faint, is supplied, the listener must be content with the dexterity, speed and resourcefulness with which all are shaped and the vitality that is infused into them. The nominal theme—for one may fancy the really inspiring subject to be spiritual rather than artistic—is in the minor mode, and the fourteen variations are fairly divided between that and the major.

Romantic Melody.

There are to be found in them soft, lingering, plaintive, romantic melody, and also a spirit of bustle, pomp, heroism and martial motion. The work gives enough fresh pleasure to be accepted for that alone, without bothering to guess what it means and why it was made.

The Bargiel "Medea" overture began the program sadly and sombrely, for the moral keynote is set more to woe than awe and rises to passionateness in the finale. At the end of the rather too protracted program was given in a finely shaded and bright-hearted reading Beethoven's Eighth Symphony.

SUNDAY POST, DECEMBER 27, 1903

MELBA SOLOIST AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

The programme of the ninth Symphony concert last evening was as follows:

Overture to "Medea," Op. 22.....Bargiel
Scena, "Sweet Bird".....Handel
Variations on an original theme, Op. 36..Elgar
"Mad Scene" from "Hamlet".....Thomas
Symphony No. 8, in F.....Beethoven

This was one of the most interesting programmes of the season thus far, the orchestral feature being the variations by Edward Elgar, the English composer, whose "Dream of Gerontius," the "Cockaigne" overture and other works have brought him from obscurity and neglect to the position as the greatest living composer in England, and it may be said, among the most original composers of any country.

The orchestral variations, Op. 36, were played last evening for the first time in this city. There are 14 variations in all, written as pictures of certain friends of the composer. Whether is not the music portrays these personages is difficult to determine, but one thing is certain, and that is the music is original to a degree, superbly scored, and the exhibition of inventive power on the part of the composer is such as to justify unstinted praise, there being not a dull moment anywhere. The variations were admirably played and made a great impression. Mr. Gericke is entitled to many thanks for the giving of such a work, and may he soon repeat it, for it is worthy of frequent hearings.

Bargiel's "Medea" overture was resurrected again after many years, and it proved to be still a pleasing work and easy of comprehension, being one that the audience appreciated fully. Mme. Melba was in excellent voice, and sang Handel's "Sweet Bird" and Ambroise Thomas's mad scene from "Hamlet" with her usual brilliancy and finish. Both these numbers are simply vocal "fireworks," but the general public like such things, and Melba knows how to sing them, and sing them well.

She received an immense ovation after each number, and several recalls.

Charles Gilibert is announced as the soloist for the rehearsal and concert of this coming week, and the orchestral numbers include a new overture by Eugen D'Albert, Loeffler's "Death of Tintagiles," and Glazounow's symphony No. 4, given by request.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE—DECEMBER 27, 1903.

MUSICAL.

Pension Fund Concert Tonight.

Mme Melba Sings With the Symphony Orchestra.

Recitals of the Week—Preludes and Echoes.

The program announced for the concert this evening at Symphony hall, in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is a particularly good one, and it is gratifying to know that the patronage will be equal to the merit of the occasion and the object for which the concert is given. By the kindness of Mme Melba, in contributing her assistance for the benefit of the cause, a notably strong attraction is added to the evening's program. Mme Melba is to sing an aria from "Traviata" and the waltz song from "Romeo and Juliet." Signorina Sassoli, the young Italian harpist, who has also volunteered her services, is to play the "Chorale and Variations" by Vidor. The orchestral numbers will include the "Mignon" overture, the "Nocturne and Scherzo" from "Midsummer Night's Dream," the "Peer Gynt" suite by Grieg, the variations, suite 3, Tschaikowsky, and the "Largo" by Handel. The box office at Symphony hall will be open this afternoon for the sale of seats.

NINTH SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

Mme Melba was the feature of the ninth Symphony program last week, the celebrated soprano contributing the aria, "Sweet Bird," from Handel's "L'Allegro," and Ophelia's mad scene from Ambroise Thomas' opera, "Hamlet." The orchestral numbers comprised the overture from Bargiel's "Medea," variations on an original theme, Elgar and Beethoven's eighth symphony. Mr Maquarre played the flute obligato in the Handel aria. The qualities of Mme Melba's voice have been described so often that it is difficult to say anything new about it. The great singer's vocalizing is as beautiful and her art as perfect as ever, the mechanism is seemingly faultless and the voice is as opulent, pure and as wonderfully flexible as of yore. She sang the Handel aria gloriously, the phrasing was exquisite and the bravura passages duplicated in sweetness of tone and facility in execution the musical embroideries of the accompaning flute. It was a brilliant performance, which set the audience wild with delight, and Mr Maquarre came in for his share of the honors, for his part of the aria was skilfully played.

In the more dramatic Ophelia music Melba was equally satisfactory, although the scena lacks the brilliancy of the Handel excerpt and does not permit those dazzling pyrotechnical feats which are the startling features of the prima donna's art. It was very artistic singing, though, and the audience showed by tumultuous applause its appreciation of the performance. Mme Melba returned to the stage innumerable times after each number in response to the somewhat unusual demonstrations from a symphony audience.

The orchestra acquitted itself admirably in these two selections. The Elgar variations, 14 in number, were played here for the first time, and they proved to be very interesting, partly by reason of the variety in the scoring, but chiefly because of their merits as compositions. The pieces are portraitures of friends of Mr Elgar, and judging by some of the bits, the characteristics of those indicated, must have been quite marked. The second "picture" was an odd piece of staccato work, No. 3 evidently was a gruff individual, and the heavier instruments told the story capitally. In No. 6 there is a chumannesque touch, like unto his "Carnival," which is admirably scored, and which the orchestra set forth brilliantly.

The 10th, "Dorabella," is a charming intermezzo with muted strings giving forth a fetching waltz rhythm and which was the gem of the lot. The cellos are worthy of special praise for their harmonious work in the 11th number, which were beautiful legato passages for that instrument. The last portrait is a brilliant martial figure, with fortissimo trimmings for the organ and the whole orchestra, and evidently was a personage of importance. The whole suite was interpreted in a way to win much applause.

The proper pomposity of treatment and fortissimo in modulations were shown in the "Medea" overture. Clever writing, no doubt, but rather harsh to the ear. The Beethoven symphony received a sympathetic interpretation, as usual.

This week's soloist will be Mr Charles Gilibert, the French baritone. The orchestral selections will be the overture, "Improvisatore," D'Albert; Loeffler's symphonic poem, "La Mort de Tintagiles," and Glazounow's fourth symphony.

Sunday Post Dec 27-03

MELBA GREETED BY FASHIONABLE AUDIENCE

Not even the Christmas preparations and the numerous "last things" which always develop on the day previous to the holiday prevented a large and brilliant audience from assembling in Symphony Hall Thursday afternoon for the rehearsal and Mme. Melba, who was at her very best, and who presented a most alluring appearance in pale gray done with a profusion of white lace, and a large white hat with a sweeping plume across the front of the brim. Some of those so fortunate as to be included in the audience were Miss Estelle Kimball, in brown corduroy with corsage of violets and a brown toque; Miss Mary Russell, wearing navy blue and a white lace toque with a pale blue brim; Mr. and Mrs. Gericke, Mrs. James H. Beale, Mrs. John E. Osborn, Miss Rosamond Allen, who was in dark blue zibeline; Mrs. Matthew Luce, Mrs. James W. Kenney, who was distinguished in black her pretty daughter, Miss May Kenney, in green cloth and a green toque with red wings; Mrs. William Humphrey, Mrs. Arthur W. Blake, Mr. and Mrs. James R. Poor and the latter's mother, Mrs. Oliver; Miss Audrey Stanwood, Mrs. James B. Forsyth, Miss Florence Blair, Miss Clara Shattuck, wearing navy blue and a large blue hat with plumes; Miss Margaret Codman in gray with a red hat; Mrs. Harris Metcalfe, Miss Mabel B. Warren, Mr. and Mrs. Oliver Ames, the latter very handsome in her correct black with picture hat and a rope of pearls; Mrs. Frederick R. Sears, Sr., Mrs. James Jackson, Miss Edith Stackpole, Miss Beatrice Blake, wearing green; Miss Rachel Brooks, Miss Collette Dumaresq, Miss Alice Sohier, Mrs. Lowell, Miss Madeleine Boardman in red with jacket of Persian lamb; Mrs. John L. Gardner in black with handsome chinchilla furs; Miss Katherine Fay, Miss Eleanora Sears, Miss Anna Thayer, Miss Dorothy Jordan in red with sables and black picture hat; Mr. Eben D. Jordan, Miss Anna Berry, Miss Barbara Higginson, Bishop Lawrence, Miss Marion Ladd, Mrs. C. H. Washburn, Mrs. J. DeForest Danielson and Miss Grace Dabney.

Tonight the audience for the Melba concert will doubtless be equally brilliant, for among the long list of subscribers are such well-known people as Mrs. Oliver Ames, Mrs. N. Hugh Cotton, Colonel and Mrs. Higginson, Mr. and Mrs. F. L. Higginson, Mr. William P. Blake, Mrs. S. Bullard Clary, Mrs. Eugene H. Clapp, Mrs. Charles Cumston, Mrs. George L. Clark, Mrs. Mary L. Day, the Misses Hooper, Mrs. L. Cartaret Fenno, Mr. and Mrs. Wilhelm Gericke, Mrs. I. N. Kimball, Mrs. Francis C. Lowell, Miss Clara E. Munger, Miss Parkman of Brimmer street, Mr. Francis H. Peabody, Mr. W. K. Richardson, Mrs. A. E. Sprague, Mrs. William Warren Vaughan, Mrs T. D. Whitney, Mr. Gaugengig and Mr. J. L. Thorndike.

[69]

BOSTON POST.

DECEMBER 28, 1903

IN AID OF ITS PENSION FUND

Concert by the Symphony Orchestra Last Evening—Mme. Melba and Miss Ada Sassoli Were the Soloists.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert last evening at Symphony Hall under direction of Wilhelm Gericke, assisted by Mme. Melba and Miss Ada Sassoli, harpist. The concert was the third given in aid of the orchestra pension fund, and the programme was as follows:

Overture, "Mignon".....A. Thomas
Aria from "Traviata".....Verdi
Nocturne and scherzo from "Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn
Chorale and variations for harp.....Widor
Suite No. 1, "Peer Gynt".....Grieg
Waltz song from "Romeo and Juliet"..Gounod
Variations, Suite 3.....Tschaikowsky
Largo, with five harps, strings and organ. Handel

There was an immense audience present; every seat was occupied and many were standing, and the programme was of the sort to attract not only the average musical audience, but many regular patrons of the Symphony concerts as well. The popular "Mignon" overture probably never was played better, and made an enjoyable opening number. The "Peer Gynt" suite No. 1, is always pleasing to hear, it being one of the best things that Grieg has ever written. The performance was ideal in every way. The nocturne and scherzo from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music were superbly given, as were also the Tschaikowsky variations.

Mme. Melba was in excellent voice and excepting an occasional note here and there she appeared to be at her very best. Both numbers that she sang are familiar, and she has given them here more than once, but, nothwithstanding, she is superb in this kind of vocal pyrotechnics, and it suited the audience exactly. Mme. Melba received ovations, recalls and floral tributes after each number, and gave an extra number with admirable harp accompaniment by Miss Sassoli, who also, as soloist in the Widor Chorale and Variations, proved herself to be an exceptional performer on this instrument. She was also much applauded and recalled. The final number was the favorite though hackneyed Handel "Largo," given with violins, five harps and organ, the assisting artists being Mr. Goodrich, Mr. Schuecker, Misses Sassoli, Dowse, Nickerson and Hamilton. This was especially well given, and made an effective closing number. From the size of the audience it is evident that a large sum was realized for the pension fund, which is certainly a fact most gratifying, as the object is a most worthy one, and merits the assistance of all interested in the welfare of this unrivalled orchestra.

Boston Daily Globe.

MONDAY, DEC 28, 1903.

MELBA FLAWLESS.

Sings at Symphony Concert for Pension Fund.

Audience of Music Lovers Generous in Applause of Diva.

Symphony hall last night saw a magnificent audience of music lovers gathered not only to contribute to the benefit of Boston's noblest musical organization, but to honor Mme Nellie Melba. That very deserving institution, the pension fund of the Boston symphony orchestra, must have been materially benefited, for society and most of its supporters were there in gayest plumage and determined not to miss a single note. Long lines of "standees" remained throughout the concert around the three exposed sides of the hall, and were still applauding when the conductor's last bow of acknowledgment had been given.

The program was one of rich variety. The harp was much in evidence throughout. The "Mignon" overture was so delightfully played that the audience forgot for the time their impatience to hear Mme Melba's aria from "Traviata," which followed. This was sung with the finish and abandon of the true artist, in the florid style in which Mme Melba always excels. It is hard to see how this Verdi number could have been even equaled by any other living artist. After repeated recalls she returned to receive at the hands of the first violin a huge laurel wreath presented her by the orchestra. In her second vocal triumph, the celebrated waltz song from "Romeo and Juliet," she fairly outdid herself in declamatory singing, the amorous Gounod love theme lending itself much more to her flawless method than did the fervent but milder Tosti serenati which followed after repeated recalls. The Tosti number, sung from notes, and accompanied by Signorina Sassoli on the harp, was indeed beautifully done. With the singer's usual graciousness, the girlish harpist was made to share the emphatic favor of the audience. Both received big bouquets of pink roses.

Mme Melba was evidently in splendid voice, and had the audience in her power from first to last. In the dreamy Mendelssohn nocturne and scherzo Mr Gericke's phasing was exquisite. After the latter movement the two fluteists were compelled to bow acknowledgement of the appreciation of their prominent and delightfully played part. In the Tschaikowsky variations, it seemed that the limit of orchestral possibilities had been reached, so elaborate is the score and so perfectly was it performed. In the Peer Gynt suite from Grieg, the first movement was introduced by a flute theme of surpassing beauty and the second being one for muted strings, and the third a bewitching gypsy air with suggestions of Carmen. The finale was Handel's superb largo, in which the violins of the orchestra were assisted by five harps, played by Signorina Sassoli, Miss Dowse, Miss Nickerson, Miss Hamilton and Heinrich Schuecker, and with Wallace Goodrich at the organ.

DAILY ADVERTISER,

DECEMBER 28, 1903.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Bargiel—Overture to "Medea." op. 22.
Handel—Scena, "Sweet Bird that shun'st the noise of folly," from "L'Allegro il pensieroso ed il moderato." (Flute obbligato, Mr. Andre Maquarre.).....Madame Melba
Edward Elgar—Variations on an original Theme. op. 36. (First time.)
A. Thomas—Ophelia's Mad-Scene from "Hamlet." (Act IV., Scene 2).....Madame Melba
Beethoven—Symphony No. 8, in F major, op. 93.

Bargiel is not quite as successful as Cherubini in his overture to "Medea," for while the latter keeps definitely to the old, conservative school, the former is neither quite classical nor quite modern. From the music of both we gather that Medea was rather an unpleasant lady; not the kind that one would enjoy taking in to dinner; one would be almost sure to find Amanitas among the mushrooms and ptomaines in the lobster salad. One was astonished to find Wagner's motif of Cunning (which is so prominent in the Trilogy) playing a prominent part in this overture. The work was well interpreted and is more effective, in its contrasts and its full harmonies, than many a modern composition that is more frequently heard in our concerts.

Handel is stronger than Bach in his vocal solos, but for all that we could not thrill greatly at the "Sweet Bird"; possibly we have had a surfeit of poultry at this season. The old, formal Da Capo Aria is always more or less trying, with its enforced repetition of the first part. Nor was Melba at her very best. There was effort in the highest register and untrue intonation in the trill. The floriture in the middle register was, however, very fluent. Mr. Maquarre played the flute obbligato very finely and was accorded an ovation with Mme. Melba at the end. But the singer did much better in her second number. Her "bel canto" in the Swedish folk-song, which forms the cavatina of the scene, was beautiful, and, with the exception of insecure intonation at the very end, the number was one of the most effective vocal performances recently heard in Boston. Mme. Melba was recalled times without number, and in the Mad Scene she surely deserved her great triumph.

But, from the artistic standpoint, how absurd these vocal mad-scenes are! Some scientist ought to write a monograph upon "Vocalism and Insanity." There is an epidemic of craziness among operatic heroines. Dinorah, Lucia, Linda di Chamounix, and a host of others go crazy. Some tenors also go mad, as for example, Lionel in "Martha" and the hero of Wagner's "Fairies." The crazier they become the better they sing! This points to some occult connection between the brain and the vocal chords. The first symptoms of this operatic mental alienation is a tendency to trill, to give brilliant scale passages, and to sing high staccato phrases.

We confess to great enthusiasm regarding Elgar's orchestral variations, heard here for the first time. This and Cowen's "Scandinavian Symphony" seem to us the two best orchestral works ever sent out from England, and the former is far more original than the latter. It may be a question as to whether the boundaries of instrumental music are not being extended too far. Beethoven started the orchestra to portraying definite events and surroundings in his "Pastoral Symphony"; Richard Strauss set it to giving lectures on metaphysics; Weingartner and Huber caused it to represent a picture gallery; and now Elgar gives a set of photographs of some of his friends by a set of orchestral variations.

It may be pleaded that Schumann did something like this in some piano works, but that composer was less definite in the matter, and besides it is quite fair to imitate the style of a well-known composer, as Schumann did that of Paganini, Chopin, Mendelssohn, etc.; in Elgar's case the parties indicated by initials are not all of them either musicians or celebrities. It is said that Elgar was recently met by a journalist, who said: "I never met any people like that!" "Certainly not," replied the composer, "they are ladies and gentlemen!"

One shudders to think of what might happen if some Boston composer (we have composers in Boston!) should begin such musical sketching. He would give "B. J. L." with a touch of "Parsifal" modified by Handel; "C. M. L." would be depicted by 150 dissonances and a viol d' amour solo; "Wm. G." would be a symphonic movement in the strictest classical style; "J. K. P." might be represented by "Fair Harvard" turned into a Moorish Dance; the possibilities are endless.

But one need not judge of these sketches by their individual meaning. Indeed they need not be spoken of as variations, for they are of the freest character. Taken purely as music (and thus the composer wishes them to be judged), they form one of the best contributions to the modern repertoire. They are unforced and do not strain after fierce dissonance or thorny and novel progressions, but they give beauty as well as originality, and present most effective contrasts. Good, intelligible music is here, and a climax that is full of power. Elgar has the good fortune to live in a nation of prosaic contrapuntists and his work shines forth the more brilliantly by contrast with the hard-boiled cantatas and wooden fugues of his contemporaries.

Beethoven's sprightly little 8th symphony closed the concert merrily. It is the most humorous of all the set of symphonies. What comic play is made with the clown of the orchestra—the bassoon! The duet of bassoon and kettle-drums is the acme of quaintness. The pretty figure of 3 notes, suddenly bitten off by the gruff contrabasses, is a bit of practical joking, and so is the abrupt and wofully conventional end of the Allegretto. The dialogue between violins and deep strings ('cellos and contrabasses) in the second movement is as fresh as the day it was written, and as attractive. Beethoven loved to play with the bassoon, and this might almost be called a bassoon symphony; that instrument was excellently performed on this occasion and the contrabasses and the horn also deserve a word of praise for especial unity and steadiness.

THE PENSION FUND CONCERT.

The concert of last night, given in aid of the Symphony Pension Fund, although it gave a long and important programme, does not call for detailed criticism, since all the playeds from Mme. Melba, Signorina Sassoli and Mr. Gericke, down to the drummer, gave their services in aid of a noble cause. The programme took on a more popular cast than one finds on Saturday nights, and was enjoyed from first to last. A tremendous audience, of high degree, was present.

Mme. Melba was on her native heath with two operatic arias—"Ah, fors' e lui," from "Traviata," and the waltz from "Romeo and Juliet,"—and, as the prohibitive rule relative to encore did not apply here as it does in the symphony concerts, the "horny-handed" had their opportunity and used it, forcing an encore, which was Mattei's "Serenata," with a cadenza written expressly for Mme. Melba. She sang this beautifully and was charmingly accompanied, on the harp, by Signorina Sassoli. Madame Melba was at her best in this concert.

A harp solo is rather at a disadvantage in Symphony Hall, yet Signorina Sassoli made an excellent impression with Widor's variations on a chorale theme. The final number of the programme, Handel's "Largo," introduced 5 harpers—Signorina Sassoli, Misses Raymah Dowse, Florence Nickerson and Fanny Hamilton and Mr. Schuecker. The stage looked as if a Welsh Eistedfodd were taking place.

The orchestra gave chiefly popular music, or rather the lightest works of some of the famous composers. Thomas's "Mignon" overture, Mendelssohn's "Nocturne and Scherzo" from the "Midsumer Night's Dream" music, Tschaikowsky variations, and best of all the "Peer Gynt" Suite (No. 1) by Grieg. That all this was greatly enjoyed goes without saying. But back of it all was the excellent object of the concert. There are orchestras at present in almost every city of America, but among all of these there are but 6 that can by any stretch of the imagination be called permanent. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Philadelphia, the Pittsburg, the Cincinnati, the Chicago and the New York Philharmonic. The "permanency" of at least 3 of these may be doubted. It means very much therefore to build an extra buttress, such as this pension fund, around our own band.

Speaking of the Philadelphia Orchestra (which, by the way, is coming to Boston in February) leads us to make mention of a commendable new departure inaugurated in connection with symphonic work by Mrs. E. I. Keffer and a number of other Philadelphia ladies. Symphony concerts are given in that city to the general public, the masses, at 10 cents admission! With such a benificence in Philadelphia, and Arens' Cooper Institute Symphony concerts for the wage-earners in New York, is it not time to do something more than the Friday 25-cent gallery rush for the music-lovers with lean purses, in Boston?

Louis C. Elson.

EVENING RECORD,

DECEMBER 29. 1903.

Seats are now ready at Symphony Hall for the organ recital to be given there on Thursday evening of next week by C. E. Clemens, the Cleveland organist.

BOSTON JOURNAL-

DECEMBER 29, 1903.

Seats for the organ recital at Symphony Hall on Thursday evening of next week by Charles E. Clemens of Cleveland are now on sale at the box office.

DAILY ADVERTISER,

DECEMBER 29. 1903.

Seats are now ready at Symphony Hall for the organ recital to be given there on Thursday evening of next week by C. E. Clemens, the Cleveland organist.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CXIV., NO. 181.

MONDAY, DEC. 28, 1903.

THIRD PENSION FUND CONCERT

Given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall—A Large Audience Present.

The third concert in aid of its pension fund was given by the Boston Symphony orchestra last night in Symphony Hall. Mr. Gericke conducted. Mme. Melba and Miss Sassoli most generously gave their services. Appreciation of the orchestra, which is one of the chief ornaments of this city, and the fame of Mme. Melba crowded the house. The programme was as follows:

Overture, "Mignon".....A. Thomas
Aria from "Traviata".....Verdi
Mme. Melba.
Nocturne and Scherzo from "Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn
Chorale and variations.....Widor
(For harp.)
Miss Sassoli.
Suite No. 1, "Peer Gynt".....Grieg
Waltz, "Romeo and Juliet".....Gounod
Mme. Melba.
Variations, suite 3.....Tschaikowsky
Largo, for violins, five harps and organ..Handel
Harpists—Miss Ada Sassoli, Miss Florence Nickerson, Miss Raymah Dowse, Miss Fanny Hamilton, Mr. Heinrich Schuecker, Mr. Wallace Goodrich, organist.

The programme was changed from that originally announced; Grieg's characteristic and picturesque "Peer Gynt" suite took the place of the variations from Delibes' ballet "Coppelia." Mr. Gericke no doubt thought that variations by Widor and Tschaikowsky were enough. The programme was of a popular nature, popular in the best sense, although the purist might object to the official sanction given to the so-called "Largo," a swollen arrangement and a singular perversion of a simple air in Handel's opera "Xerxes."

The melodious and brilliant overture and the selections from the works of Mendelssohn, Grieg and Tschaikowsky were all well adapted to the purpose of the concert—to draw an audience from all classes of music lovers and to give them pleasure. The hearty and spontaneous applause showed that this pleasure was real.

Mme. Melba was in better voice than at the Symphony concert the night before. She sang the second portion of Verdi's air with great dash and spirit, and the beauty of her voice was displayed fully in the familiar "Serenata" which she sang after the waltz song from "Romeo and Juliet." In this simple song with the harp accompaniment of Miss Sassoli, her golden notes were without alloy, nor did the added embellishments toward the end seem incongruous, for there was no arrogance of bravura. The singer was applauded enthusiastically and recalled again and again after each aria, and flowers and a wreath were given to her.

Miss Sassoli's art and attractive personal simplicity were shown in the chorale by Widor, which was introduced here by Mr. Schuecker at a Symphony concert. She, too, was warmly applauded.

[70]

N.Y. Dec 30-1903

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Ninth Concert—Review by Philip Hale in the Boston Herald.

THE program of the ninth Symphony concert, given last night in Symphony Hall, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Overture, Medea.....Bargiel
Scena, Sweet Bird.....Handel
Variations on an Original Theme.....Elgar
(First time here.)
Ophelia's Mad Scene, from Hamlet.....A. Thomas
Symphony No. 8.....Beethoven

Woldemar Bargiel was a sorely disappointed man long before he died. He was disappointed in the conduct of his colleagues toward him; he was disappointed in the judgment passed by the great musical public on his works. A step-brother of Clara Schumann, he was trained in the straight and narrow path of conservatory righteousness, but he had instincts and tendencies toward romanticism. In the early sixties of the nineteenth century he was characterized as a composer of ability and dangerous ideas. This overture, "Medea," was considered too modern at Leipsic, and when it was played afterward at Vienna, the critic Hanslick deplored the fact that the younger composers affected such grisly subjects; he wondered why they were not cheerful and gay in music.

There was a time when Bargiel was reckoned with as one of the possibly great. In 1865 he was called to Rotterdam to take charge of an institution, and his years of honorable service in Holland were the happiest of his life. He was invited in 1874 to be a teacher at the high school for music in Berlin, and then his real and fancied troubles began. There is no doubt but that he was treated unfairly and shoved aside to make room for intriguers and inferior musicians. His serious compositions were heard less and less frequently. He grew suspicious, sour, bitter of speech—we are writing from personal knowledge—but in the company of those whom he trusted he was genial, witty, wise. As a teacher he was patient and helpful, as well as naturally gifted in the art of instruction.

The years go by and Bargiel's music is now seldom heard. A pianist taught by someone of the old school may play an excerpt from a suite; a 'cellist may play an adagio; but the larger works are practically unknown to the younger generation of music hearers. Nor is the reason of this neglect one for conjecture. The reason is in the music itself. The hostility of colleagues and the neglect of conductors and the coolness of contemporary audiences never kill a great work. The music that soon dies after a struggle had the seeds of the fatal disease when it was born.

Take this "Medea." There is no program. The name "Medea" should be enough. The subject is tragic; but the music is not forcibly tragic either in the ancient or in the modern spirit. There are dissonances that irritated the Gewandhaus audience when they were first heard; but dissonances do not necessarily establish a tragic mood. Gluck by simplest means was nobly antique in musical tragedy. Perhaps it is not too much to say that no composer ever reproduced the irresistible simplicity, the effective repression, the direct pathos, the mysterious atmosphere of inexorable fate that are among the characteristics of the highest Greek tragedy as did Chevalier Gluck in his overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis."

A modern radical, Vincent d'Indy, has succeeded by force of imagination in portraying in tones the story of Medea; but his music is French music for a French "Médée." Cherubini, whose "Anacreon" is indisputably Grecian, did comparatively little with his "Medea." Bargiel's overture is more interesting than Cherubini's of the same title; but it is wanting in high imagination. The themes are not potently typical; the treatment of them does not firmly establish moods that are the suggestion or the expression of the passion and tragedy of the wild legend. It is sound, respectable music, with here and there an inclination toward imaginative flight. The romanticism of Bargiel was held as in a vise by his classical heredity and training. The preservation of the traditions, expression in forms that were approved models—these were first in his thoughts; nor was Medea, with all her sorcery, able to drive them from his brain.

Mr. Elgar's Variations, played here for the first time, have been highly praised. If one was amazed at the reputation of this composer after hearing the "Cockaigne" overture or the much lauded sea songs, or after a reading of the "Dream of Gerontius," he was told by the Elgarian: "But you should hear Elgar's Variations."

This work is, indeed, of unusual merit for an Englishman. It is, on the whole, an interesting work for a composer of any nationality. Mr. Elgar has told us all his purpose: "I have sketched for their amusement and mine the idiosyncrasies of fourteen of my friends, not necessarily musicians; but this is a personal matter, and need not have been mentioned publicly. The Variations should stand simply as a 'piece' of music."

And so they must stand, for unless the hearer should know intimately these friends of Mr. Elgar, he could not tell whether the portraiture were successful; and even if he knew them, his view might be a different one from the composer's.

The connection between the theme "Enigma" and these variations is often of the slightest, and the composer hints at a "principal theme that never appears," unlike the theme of Istar, in d'Indy's fine set of variations, which is first proclaimed in full only when the heroine, stripped little by little of her dress and jewels, stands forth proud and triumphant in her splendid nakedness.

Whether these portraits of Uncle Hank, Sister Sue, Thomas and Jeremiah, and the other friends are faithful reproduction of idiosyncrasies is a question that does not concern us, although the first variations might lead us to infer that some of the friends were dull persons, or idle chatterers, or mere dealers in saws and maxims; for composers as well as others may have queer tastes in the matter of friendship. But the music grows more and more delightful. "Dorabella" is the one friend we should like to know; the others of the later series are ant companions, and their [illegible] is acquaintance, but "Dorabella," with her roguishly, her grace, her rippling laugh and sly smile, her pouting lips and suggestion of subtle fragrancy, lead us to her, Mr Elgar! Never mind about "C. A. E." and the others tagged with letters of the alphabet.

scene of Ophelia's madness she sang with greater brilliance and with more confident bravura. Here there was no thought of technical difficulties and anxious labor. The applause and the recalls were richly merited.

Elgar's variations and the overture by Bargiel were played with a care that was not too evident, with a finish that was never finical, with all the qualities demanded by the music and in sympathy with the composer's intentions. Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, agreeable as it is, seemed here unnecessary. The concert was long enough without it.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, DECEMBER 28, 1903

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

The assistance of Mme. Melba on Saturday night lent distinction to the ninth symphony concert. This was the programme:

Overture, "Medea".....Bargiel
Scena, "Sweet Bird".....Handel
Variations on an original theme.....Elgar
(First time here.)
Ophelia's Mad Scene, from "Hamlet"...A. Thomas
Symphony No. 8.....Beethoven

The occasion being eminently Mme. Melba's, it will be proper to speak of the singer first. For her solo numbers she chose Handel's "Sweet Bird," and the mad scene from Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet," both of which selections she has sung before at symphony concerts; to the "Sweet Bird," indeed, she seems as devoted as Mr. Ben Davies is to "Waft Her, Angels." Of Mme. Melba's art there is little new to say. The singer has a voice of exquisite purity, and one quality she has in common with Mme. Sembrich; both ladies sing so freely and easily that, while listening to them, one constantly wonders how lesser vocalists contrive to make singing seem so difficult and laborious. Of warm or tender feeling, of elegance of phrasing or diction, of intelligent musicianliness, Mme. Melba gave few indications Saturday night. Merely to listen to her tones, however, is a satisfaction. After each song she was recalled four or five times with frantic enthusiasm. A beautiful feature of "Sweet Bird," by the way, was Mr. Maquarre's exquisite playing of the flute obligato.

There is also little to be said concerning the orchestral part of the concert. Although carefully and brilliantly played, the Beethoven symphony was heard too late at night to make the effect that belongs to it, and the Bargiel overture, likewise admirably performed, was heard too late in its life to arouse interest. Even in the days when its dissonances and other departures from the conventional disturbed listeners at Leipsic, the work could have been but an inadequate commentary on the life and fate of the barbaric but unhappy Medea, who was abandoned for Creusa of Corinth.

The single novelty of the evening was one worth hearing: a Theme and Variations by Elgar. If only from curiosity, one must welcome any work of this composer, who has been hailed in England with an acclaim that is hard to understand when one knows only his "Sea Songs" and the "Cockaigne" overture. Of the variations, Mr. Elgar has said: "It is true that I have sketched, for their amusement and mine, the idiosyncrasies of fourteen of my friends, not necessarily musicians; but this is a personal matter, and need not have been mentioned publicly. The Variations should stand simply as a piece of music. The Enigma I will not explain . . . its dark saying must be left unguessed, and I warn you that the apparent connection between the Variations and the Theme is often of the slightest texture; further, through and over the whole set another and larger theme goes but is not played. . . . So the principal theme never appears, even as in some late dramas—e. g., Maeterlinck's 'L'Intruse' and 'Les Sept Princesses'; the chief character is never on the stage."

From these rather mystical remarks one point stands out clearly: the composition in question is to be treated musically and not psychologically. Considered as a "piece" of music, then, the theme and some seven or eight of the variations are exceedingly dull music indeed, unimaginative, prosaic, harsh-sounding, unmelodious. If they are musical sketches of Mr. Elgar's friends, his circle must form a colorless company. The latter portion of the work, however, is more interesting. One variation in paticular, probably the ninth, is vigorous and attention-compelling, and it is followed by a charmingly graceful movement which a study of the programme-book would lead one to think must be entitled "Dorabella." The remainder of the composition holds the interest straight through the animated and really exciting finale, offering on its way many moments agreeable in the style of Mendelssohn, or, more accurately, of Sir Arthur Sullivan in a serious vein. Although the most noteworthy example of his talent we have yet heard here, the theme and variations still fail to make manifest why Mr. Elgar should be regarded quite so highly as he is in England. However, there is still the "Dream of Gerontius" to get acquainted with.

At Saturday's concert Mr. Gilibert is to sing two arias. The orchestral programme contains d'Albert's overture "Improvisatore," for the first time Mr. Loeffler's "La Mort de Tintagiles," and, by request, Glazounow's fourth symphony. R. R. G.

Symphony Hall: Pension Fund Concert

Last night in Symphony Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Gericke, conductor, gave its third concert in aid of its pension fund. The players had the valuable assistance of Mme. Melba and of Miss Ada Sassoli, the harp player who made so great a success here a few weeks ago, both ladies kindly volunteering their services. This was the programme:

Overture, "Mignon".....A. Thomas
Aria from "Traviata," "Ah, fors' è lui"...Verdi
Mme. Melba.
Nocturne and Scherzo from "Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn
Chorale and Variations.....Widor
(For harp)
Signorina Sassoli.
Suite No. 1, "Peer Gynt".....Grieg
Waltz, "Romeo and Juliet".....Gounod
Mme. Melba.
Variations, Suite 3.....Tchaikovsky
Largo, for Violins, Five Harps and Organ..Handel
Harpists—Signorina Ada Sassoli, Miss Florence Nickerson, Miss Raymah Dowse, Miss Fanny Hamilton, Mr. Heinrich Schuecker.
Organist—Mr. Wallace Goodrich.

Of all the concerts given in Boston this winter, none afforded more pleasure than that of last night. The programme was chosen with rare judgment, every number being bright and attractive, with just the proper amount of seriousness, as in the wonderful "Aasentod" of Grieg, to furnish the necessary contrast. The playing, too, was spirited and brilliant to an exciting degree. It was a great night for soloists. Mme. Melba was received after both arias with tumultuous applause, so long protracted after the waltz that she sang as an encore Tosti's "Serenata," to an accompaniment by Miss Sassoli on the harp. Miss Sassoli, too, is to be congratulated on finding a composition for harp and orchestra that did not bore people. Widor's Chorale and Variations are written so skilfully for harp, requiring the instrument to do only what it can do well, that the piece, brilliantly performed by Miss Sassoli, gave keen delight to everybody. As soloists the Messrs. Maquarre may also be mentioned, for their fine playing at the end of the Mendelssohn scherzo assumed the character of solo work, and was recognized as such by Mr. Gericke and by the audience. All told, the concert was an occasion of great playing of a fascinating programme. It was enjoyed by an audience that packed the hall, every seat and most of the standing room being occupied. R. R. G.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CXV., NO. 1.

FRIDAY, JAN. 1, 1904.

THIS WEEK'S BILL AT THE SYMPHONY

The programme of the 10th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra this afternoon at Symphony Hall will include the overture of D'Albert's opera, "The Improvisatore" (first time), Charles M. Loeffler's symphonic poem, "The Death of Tintagiles," after the drama of Maurice Maeterlinck, and Glazounoff's symphony No. 4 (by request). D'Albert's opera, which was produced in Berlin in 1901, is founded, in part, on Victor Hugo's grisly drama, "Angelo, Tyrant of Padua," which Rachel brought to Boston in 1855; but the librettist uses only the name of Hugo's podesta and certain incidents of the drama; there is no Tisbe, the play actress The overture is Carnival music. Mr. Loeffler's symphonic poem has been played here three times, twice in its original version and once in the amended form. The composer will play the viole d'amour at the two concerts this week. Glazounoff's brilliant symphony gave so much pleasure at the beginning of the season that the request for repetition seems natural.

Mr. Charles Gilibert, baritone, will sing Ralph's drinking song, from Bizet's "Fair Maid of Perth," with orchestral accompaniment; and these songs with piano: Massenet's "Twilight," Perilhou's "Virgin at the Manger," and the "Song of Gilles," from Poise's "Joli Gilles."

The programme of the concerts Jan. 8-9 will include the overture to Saint-Saens' "Les Barbares" (first time), Henselt's piano concerto (Mr. Busoni, pianist); Caser Franck's symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman," and Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony.

N.Y. Dec 30-1903

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Ninth Concert—Review by Philip Hale in the Boston Herald.

THE program of the ninth Symphony concert, given last night in Symphony Hall, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Overture, Medea.....Bargiel
Scena, Sweet Bird.....Handel
Variations on an Original Theme.....Elgar
(First time here.)
Ophelia's Mad Scene, from Hamlet.....A. Thomas
Symphony No. 8.....Beethoven

Woldemar Bargiel was a sorely disappointed man long before he died. He was disappointed in the conduct of his colleagues toward him; he was disappointed in the judgment passed by the great musical public on his works. A step-brother of Clara Schumann, he was trained in the straight and narrow path of conservatory righteousness, but he had instincts and tendencies toward romanticism. In the early sixties of the nineteenth century he was characterized as a composer of ability and dangerous ideas. This overture, "Medea," was considered too modern at Leipsic, and when it was played afterward at Vienna, the critic Hanslick deplored the fact that the younger composers affected such grisly subjects; he wondered why they were not cheerful and gay in music.

There was a time when Bargiel was reckoned with as one of the possibly great. In 1865 he was called to Rotterdam to take charge of an institution, and his years of honorable service in Holland were the happiest of his life. He was invited in 1874 to be a teacher at the high school for music in Berlin, and then his real and fancied troubles began. There is no doubt but that he was treated unfairly and shoved aside to make room for intriguers and inferior musicians. His serious compositions were heard less and less frequently. He grew suspicious, sour, bitter of speech—we are writing from personal knowledge—but in the company of those whom he trusted he was genial, witty, wise. As a teacher he was patient and helpful, as well as naturally gifted in the art of instruction.

The years go by and Bargiel's music is now seldom heard. A pianist taught by someone of the old school may play an excerpt from a suite; a 'cellist may play an adagio; but the larger works are practically unknown to the younger generation of music hearers. Nor is the reason of this neglect one for conjecture. The reason is in the music itself. The hostility of colleagues and the neglect of conductors and the coolness of contemporary audiences never kill a great work. The music that soon dies after a struggle had the seeds of the fatal disease when it was born.

Take this "Medea." There is no program. The name "Medea" should be enough. The subject is tragic; but the music is not forcibly tragic either in the ancient or in the modern spirit. There are dissonances that irritated the Gewandhaus audience when they were first heard; but dissonances do not necessarily establish a tragic mood. Gluck by simplest means was nobly antique in musical tragedy. Perhaps it is not too much to say that no composer ever reproduced the irresistible simplicity, the effective repression, the direct pathos, the mysterious atmosphere of inexorable fate that are among the characteristics of the highest Greek tragedy as did Chevalier Gluck in his overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis."

A modern radical, Vincent d'Indy, has succeeded by force of imagination in portraying in tones the story of Medea; but his music is French music for a French "Médée." Cherubini, whose "Anacreon" is indisputably Grecian, did comparatively little with his "Medea." Bargiel's overture is more interesting than Cherubini's of the same title; but it is wanting in high imagination. The themes are not potently typical; the treatment of them does not firmly establish moods that are the suggestion or the expression of the passion and tragedy of the wild legend. It is sound, respectable music, with here and there an inclination toward imaginative flight. The romanticism of Bargiel was held as in a vise by his classical heredity and training. The preservation of the traditions, expression in forms that were approved models—these were first in his thoughts; nor was Medea, with all her sorcery, able to drive them from his brain.

Mr. Elgar's Variations, played here for the first time, have been highly praised. If one was amazed at the reputation of this composer after hearing the "Cockaigne" overture or the much lauded sea songs, or after a reading of the "Dream of Gerontius," he was told by the Elgarian: "But you should hear Elgar's Variations."

This work is, indeed, of unusual merit for an Englishman. It is, on the whole, an interesting work for a composer of any nationality. Mr. Elgar has told us all his purpose: "I have sketched for their amusement and mine the idiosyncrasies of fourteen of my friends, not necessarily musicians; but this is a personal matter, and need not have been mentioned publicly. The Variations should stand simply as a 'piece' of music."

And so they must stand, for unless the hearer should know intimately these friends of Mr. Elgar, he could not tell whether the portraiture were successful; and even if he knew them, his view might be a different one from the composer's.

The connection between the theme "Enigma" and these variations is often of the slightest, and the composer hints at a "principal theme that never appears," unlike the theme of Istar, in d'Indy's fine set of variations, which is first proclaimed in full only when the heroine, stripped little by little of her dress and jewels, stands forth proud and triumphant in her splendid nakedness.

Whether these portraits of Uncle Hank, Sister Sue, Thomas and Jeremiah, and the other friends are faithful reproduction of idiosyncrasies is a question that does not concern us, although the first variations might lead us to infer that some of the friends were dull persons, or idle chatterers, or mere dealers in saws and maxims; for composers as well as others may have queer tastes in the matter of friendship. But the music grows more and more delightful. "Dorabella" is the one [illegible] like to know; the [illegible] are [illegible] acquaintance, but [illegible] grace, her rippling laugh and [illegible] and suggestion of subtle fragrance, lead us to her. Mr. Elgar! Never mind about "C. A. E." and the other [illegible] tagged with letters of the alphabet.

Of all the concerts given in Boston this winter, none afforded more pleasure than that of last night. The programme was chosen with rare judgment, every number being bright and attractive, with just the proper amount of seriousness, as in the wonderful "Aasentod" of Grieg, to furnish the necessary contrast. The playing, too, was spirited and brilliant to an exciting degree. It was a great night for soloists. Mme. Melba was received after both arias with tumultuous applause, so long-protracted after the waltz that she sang as an encore Tosti's "Serenata," to an accompaniment by Miss Sassoli on the harp. Miss Sassoli, too, is to be congratulated on finding a composition for harp and orchestra that did not bore people. Widor's Chorale and Variations are written so skilfully for harp, requiring the instrument to do only what it can do well, that the piece, brilliantly performed by Miss Sassoli, gave keen delight to everybody. As soloists the Messrs. Maquarre may also be mentioned, for their fine playing at the end of the Mendelssohn scherzo assumed the character of solo work, and was recognized as such by Mr. Gericke and by the audience. All told, the concert was an occasion of great playing of a fascinating programme. It was enjoyed by an audience that packed the hall, every seat and most of the standing room being occupied. R. R. G.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CXV., NO. 1.

FRIDAY, JAN. 1, 1904.

THIS WEEK'S BILL AT THE SYMPHONY

The programme of the 10th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra this afternoon at Symphony Hall will include the overture of D'Albert's opera, "The Improvisatore" (first time), Charles M. Loeffler's symphonic poem, "The Death of Tintagiles," after the drama of Maurice Maeterlinck, and Glazounoff's symphony No. 4 (by request). D'Albert's opera, which was produced in Berlin in 1901, is founded, in part, on Victor Hugo's grisly drama, "Angelo, Tyrant of Padua," which Rachel brought to Boston in 1855; but the librettist uses only the name of Hugo's podesta and certain incidents of the drama; there is no Tisbe, the play actress. The overture is Carnival music. Mr. Loeffler's symphonic poem has been played here three times, twice in its original version and once in the amended form. The composer will play the viole d amour at the two concerts this week. Glazounoff's brilliant symphony gave so much pleasure at the beginning of the season that the request for repetition seems natural.

Mr. Charles Gilibert, baritone, will sing Ralph's drinking song, from Bizet's "Fair Maid of Perth," with orchestral accompaniment; and these songs with piano: Massenet's "Twilight," Perilhou's "Virgin at the Manger," and the "Song of Gilles," from Poise's "Joli Gilles."

The programme of the concerts Jan. 8-9 will include the overture to Saint-Saens' "Les Barbares" (first time), Henselt's piano concerto (Mr. Busoni, pianist); Caser Franck's symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman," and Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, DECEMBER 28, 1903

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

The assistance of Mme. Melba on Saturday night lent distinction to the ninth symphony concert. This was the programme:

Overture, "Medea".....Bargiel
Scena, "Sweet Bird".....Handel
Variations on an original theme.....Elgar
(First time here.)
Ophelia's Mad Scene, from "Hamlet"..A. Thomas
Symphony No. 8.....Beethoven

The occasion being eminently Mme. Melba's, it will be proper to speak of the singer first. For her solo numbers she chose Handel's "Sweet Bird," and the mad scene from Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet," both of which selections she has sung before at symphony concerts; to the "Sweet Bird," indeed, she seems as devoted as Mr. Ben Davies is to "Waft Her, Angels." Of Mme. Melba's art there is little new to say. The singer has a voice of exquisite purity, and one quality she has in common with Mme. Sembrich; both ladies sing so freely and easily that, while listening to them, one constantly wonders how lesser vocalists contrive to make singing seem so difficult and laborious. Of warm or tender feeling, of elegance of phrasing or diction, of intelligent musicianliness, Mme. Melba gave few indications Saturday night. Merely to listen to her tones, however, is a satisfaction. After each song she was recalled four or five times with frantic enthusiasm. A beautiful feature of "Sweet Bird," by the way, was Mr. Maquarre's exquisite playing of the flute obligato.

There is also little to be said concerning the orchestral part of the concert. Although carefully and brilliantly played, the Beethoven symphony was heard too late at night to make the effect that belongs to it, and the Bargiel overture, likewise admirably performed, was heard too late in its life to arouse interest. Even in the days when its dissonances and other departures from the conventional disturbed listeners at Leipsic, the work could have been but an inadequate commentary on the life and fate of the barbaric but unhappy Medea, who was abandoned for Creusa of Corinth.

The single novelty of the evening was one worth hearing: a Theme and Variations by Elgar. If only from curiosity, one must welcome any work of this composer, who has been hailed in England with an acclaim that is hard to understand when one knows only his "Sea Songs" and the "Cockaigne" overture. Of the variations, Mr. Elgar has said: "It is true that I have sketched, for their amusement and mine, the idiosyncrasies of fourteen of my friends, not necessarily musicians; but this is a personal matter, and need not have been mentioned publicly. The Variations should stand simply as a piece of music. The Enigma I will not explain . . . its dark saying must be left unguessed, and I warn you that the apparent connection between the Variations and the Theme is often of the slightest texture; further, through and over the whole set another and larger theme goes but is not played. . . . So the principal theme never appears, even as in some late dramas—e. g., Maeterlinck's 'L'Intruse' and 'Les Sept Princesses'; the chief character is never on the stage."

From these rather mystical remarks one point stands out clearly: the composition in question is to be treated musically and not psychologically. Considered as a "piece" of music, then, the theme and some seven or eight of the variations are exceedingly dull music indeed, unimaginative, prosaic, harsh-sounding, unmelodious. If they are musical sketches of Mr. Elgar's friends, his circle must form a colorless company. The latter portion of the work, however, is more interesting. One variation in paticular, probably the ninth, is vigorous and attention-compelling, and it is followed by a charmingly graceful movement which a study of the programme-book would lead one to think must be entitled "Dorabella." The remainder of the composition holds the interest straight through the animated and really exciting finale, offering on its way many moments agreeable in the style of Mendelssohn, or, more accurately, of Sir Arthur Sullivan in a serious vein. Although the most noteworthy example of his talent we have yet heard here, the theme and variations still fail to make manifest why Mr. Elgar should be regarded quite so highly as he is in England. However, there is still the "Dream of Gerontius" to get acquainted with.

At Saturday's concert Mr. Gilibert is to sing two arias. The orchestral programme contains d'Albert's overture "Improvisatore," for the first time Mr. Loeffler's "La Mort de Tintagiles," and, by request, Glazounow's fourth symphony. R. R. G.

Symphony Hall: Pension Fund Concert

Last night in Symphony Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Gericke, conductor, gave its third concert in aid of its pension fund. The players had the valuable assistance of Mme. Melba and of Miss Ada Sassoli, the harp player who made so great a success here a few weeks ago, both ladies kindly volunteering their services. This was the programme:

Overture, "Mignon".....A. Thomas
Aria from "Traviata," "Ah, fors' è lui"....Verdi
Mme. Melba.
Nocturne and Scherzo from "Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn
Chorale and Variations.....Widor
(For harp)
Signorina Sassoli.
Suite No. 1, "Peer Gynt".....Grieg
Waltz, "Romeo and Juliet".....Gounod
Mme. Melba.
Variations, Suite 3.....Tchaikovsky
Largo, for Violins, Five Harps and Organ..Handel
Harpists—Signorina Ada Sassoli, Miss Florence Nickerson, Miss Raymah Dowse, Miss Fanny Hamilton, Mr. Heinrich Schuecker.
Organist—Mr. Wallace Goodrich.

The Washington Symphony Orchestra

Some Account of the Organization, Its Development, Aims, and Personnel

BACK of the present organization known as the Washington Symphony Orchestra there is a long vista of history—longer than the scarce two seasons of the present successful orchestra would seem to indicate. It is not natural that a city with the artistic tendencies of Washington should be, with the orchestra under the direction of Mr. De Koven, at its first venture in this particular field. There are at this time

MR. REGINALD DE KOVEN
Director of the Washington Symphony Orchestra

even, several musical societies, and one of them, the Georgetown Orchestra, while not pretending to the scope of the Washington Symphony Orchestra, is worthy of all praise for its earnest work during the many years of its existence. But a large and able orchestra, capable of being compared favorably with the best in other cities, has been attempted here but once before, and that was with Mr. Santelmann as leader and the Marine Band orchestra as a nucleus. Not until Mr. Reginald De Koven took the matter up and gave his talents and influence to the cause was the permanence of an able symphony within the realm of possibilities, and with this season's arrangements so well and so far perfected it seems that it is well within the bounds of probability that Washington will have, from now on, an orchestra of which the city may be proud, and of which other cities may be covetous to the extent of patronizing it well on such concert tours as it may make. Primarily, however, the orchestra has been formed with the idea of giving to Washington itself the best orchestral music and the opportunity of taking rank as a city able and willing to support one of the best associations of its kind in the country. There is every reason why this should be so, since Washington is now recognized as a favorite residence city for the most wealthy and cultured persons of the country.

The present success of the orchestra, and, indeed, its very existence, is due to the untiring efforts of three men, who have been able to enlist the co-operation of others in the enterprise. The first of these is Mr. De Koven, now a resident of Washington, to whom more than to any one else great credit is due. In the first place, he has rare musical ability that is everywhere recognized; he has great wealth and influence, and his standing in the social world assures the interest of that element of society, so necessary in the support of high-priced and high-class attractions. Added to these is an earnestness and enthusiasm which has done a great deal that no amount of mere knowledge and influence could have accomplished. One more thing to be kept in mind is that Mr. De Koven is giving his services as director and the influence of an honored name in musical circles absolutely free, which places him in the front rank of the donors to the cause when one considers the high salaries paid to the leaders of the great orchestras of the country, leaving out of account the financial aid which he has rendered. The second of these men who have had the success of the orchestra much at heart is Mr. E. H. Droop, of the firm of E. F. Droop & Sons, who is well known in musical and business circles of Washington. Last year, the stress period with the orchestra, he was both treasurer and manager, and acquitted himself so well that the venture, which was a predicted failure, was able to enter on its second season with better prospects and every assurance of success. This year he was unable to assume the double responsibility, on account of the demands of his business, but was persuaded to retain the treasurership. Mr. Richard Heard, of Boston, was selected for permanent manager, a selection which has been proved a wise one from the able manner in which Mr. Heard has conducted his office during the present season. Mr. Heard is the third of these men to whom present success is due. He has had a long experience in the management of musical ventures, and comes to Washington from Boston, where he was manager of Chickering Hall and of other enterprises. He has taken up the work of co-operation with Mr. De Koven with a zeal and vim which has put new life into the undertaking. Through him the inauguration of a permanent office and management, which has long been a desired factor, has been made possible, and Mr. Heard is devoting all his time and attention to promoting the interests of the organization.

MR. RICHARD HEARD
Manager of the Washington Symphony Orchestra

Last year the orchestra was such an artistic success that in spite of financial shortcomings there was sufficient encouragement to warrant its continuance in the field. This year both sides have been strengthened greatly, and there is no fear of the outcome. In the music, those parts which were weak last year are now the strongest points, for extraordinary material has been secured. The financial outlook is good, and the names of the guarantors form sufficient evidence of this. Moreover, the sale of seats and season tickets has even exceeded the best hopes of the management. The soloists already secured are: Madame Bloomfield-Zeisler, pianist; Mr. Belinski, 'cellist, for the second concert; M. Jacques Thibaud, violinist, for the third, and for other concerts it is expected that two of the stars of the Conried Metropolitan Opera Company will be secured.

MME. FANNIE BLOOMFIELD-ZEISLER, PIANIST
Soloist at the First Washington Symphony Orchestra Concert

The members of the orchestra are as follows: Reginald De Koven, conductor; H. C. Rakemann, concert master; first violins: H. C. Rakemann, Chris. Arth, Sol Minster, Raymond Schroeder, Victor H. Johnson, Joseph Harrison, Jr., Emil Christiani, Wm. E. Green, C. H. Smith, and J. H. Foster; second violins: Max Kaestl, Henry Schwakopf, Fritz W. Iseman, Douglas Crawford, Charles V. Samuels, Louis A. Naecker, Domenico R. Stanisci, and F. C. Carter; violas: Charles B. Donch, Geo. M. Leimbach, Robert C. Stearns, Wm. C. Buckingham, C. Mills, and F. Rose; 'cellos: M. Belinski, C. Furthmaier, Fritz Mueller, David Wolfsteiner, Bruce L. Taylor, and Wm. R. Phillips; basses: Wm. A. Donch, Chris. Feige, Frank C. Boynton, Henry Denham, L. C. Newell, and Henry Schult: flutes: Henry Jaeger and William Wagener; clarinets: Andrew Coda and Peter Aitoro; oboes: Henry Rietzel and John Lammers; bassoons, Paul Lietke and Jules Dieudonne; trumpets: Otto F. Lehnert and Joseph Haina; tuba, Karl Otto; horns: Adolf Belz, Albert Lehman, Julius Schulz, and Carl L. Neumann; trombones: John P. Esputa, F. Muehlhausen, and John Eibel; drums: Wm. Giachetti and Alfred Fauth; tympani, C. Schroeder.

A partial list of box-holders for this season includes Mrs. A. E. Bates, Mrs. C. A. Williams, Mrs. Eugene Hale, Mrs. Stilson Hutchins, Mrs. E. H. G. Slater, Mrs. Henry May, Mrs. Pinchot, Mrs. Thomas F. Walsh, Mrs. James Lowndes, Mrs. L. Z. Leiter, Mrs. Stephen B. Elkins, Mrs. Herbert Wadsworth, Mrs. Reginald De Koven, Mrs. Westinghouse, Mrs. Reyburn, Mrs. H. Kirk Porter, Gen. W. F. Draper, Mr. Edward Blair, Mrs. Longworth and Mr. Nicholas Longworth. The guarantors include, besides those mentioned among the box-holders: Mr. Eugene Stevens, Mr. H. C. Perkins, Col. Henry May, Mr. S. P. Emmons, Mr. Chr. Heurich, Mrs. J. G. Eaton, Mr Oscar F. Comstock, Mr. Bernard R. Green, Mary E. Symonds, Mrs. V. G. Fischer, Mr. S. M. Craiger, Mr. S. W. Woodward, Mrs. C. H. McKim, Mr. Herbert Wadsworth, Mrs. Jno. R Reyburn, Mr. F. Pohndorf, Mr. R. Wayne Parker, F. A. Miller, U. S. N., Mr. Allerton Cushman, and Mr. H. C. Taylor. Other subscribers are: Mrs. Eugene Schuyler, Mrs. Clarence Edwards, Mrs. N. B. Prentice, Mrs. M. C. Audenreid, Mrs. C. Carlisle, Admiral Taylor, Miss K. V. E. Berry, Mrs. Ward Thoron, Mrs. B. H. Warner, Mrs. J. B. Foraker, Hon. F. G. Newlands, Miss Mary A. Cryder, Mrs. Thomas Nelson Page, Mr. Edmund Pendleton, Mr. Melville Fuller, Mrs. E. A. Hitchcock.

In conclusion, it may be well to call attention to the fact that the Washington Symphony Orchestra is worth a great deal to the city, and that this should be recognized even by those who are in the habit of saying that they do not care for music or musical interests. The mere presence of such an organization is an advertisement of culture and wealth, and as such it deserves the support of all, and especially those who have mercantile interests in the city, irrespective of their belief in or appreciation of the art of music. This is a matter-of-fact view of the situation which should not be lost sight of even in the face of the artistic and social prestige which the organization has won for itself.

Springfield Mass.
COURT SQUARE THEATER.
MONDAY EVENING,
JANUARY 18, AT 8.15.
ONLY APPEARANCE THIS SEASON OF THE BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA.
MR WILHELM GERICKE,
CONDUCTOR.
SOLOIST, MR BUSONI.
THE DISTINGUISHED ITALIAN PIANIST SPECIALLY ENGAGED FOR A SERIES OF CONCERTS.
Tickets at Taylor's Music Store on and after Monday, January 11.

The Washington Symphony Orchestra

Some Account of the Organization, Its Development, Aims, and Personnel

BACK of the present organization known as the Washington Symphony Orchestra there is a long vista of history—longer than the scarce two seasons of the present successful orchestra would seem to indicate. It is not natural that a city with the artistic tendencies of Washington should be, with the orchestra under the direction of Mr. De Koven, at its first venture in this particular field. There are at this time even, several musical societies, and one of them, the Georgetown Orchestra, while not pretending to the scope of the Washington Symphony Orchestra, is worthy of all praise for its earnest work during the many years of its existence. But a large and able orchestra, capable of being compared favorably with the best in other cities, has been attempted here but once before, and that was with Mr. Santelmann as leader and the Marine Band orchestra as a nucleus. Not until Mr. Reginald De Koven took the matter up and gave his talents and influence to the cause was the permanence of an able symphony within the realm of possibilities, and with this season's arrangements so well and so far perfected it seems that it is well within the bounds of probability that Washington will have, from now on, an orchestra of which the city may be proud, and of which other cities may be covetous to the extent of patronizing it well on such concert tours as it may make. Primarily, however, the orchestra has been formed with the idea of giving to Washington itself the best orchestral music and the opportunity of taking rank as a city able and willing to support one of the best associations of its kind in the country. There is every reason why this should be so, since Washington is now recognized as a favorite residence city for the most wealthy and cultured persons of the country.

MR. REGINALD DE KOVEN
Director of the Washington Symphony Orchestra

The present success of the orchestra, and, indeed, its very existence, is due to the untiring efforts of three men, who have been able to enlist the co-operation of others in the enterprise. The first of these is Mr. De Koven, now a resident of Washington, to whom more than to any one else great credit is due. In the first place, he has rare musical ability that is everywhere recognized; he has great wealth and influence, and his standing in the social world assures the interest of that element of society, so necessary in the support of high-priced and high-class attractions. Added to these is an earnestness and enthusiasm which has done a great deal that no amount of mere knowledge and influence could have accomplished. One more thing to be kept in mind is that Mr. De Koven is giving his services as director and the influence of an honored name in musical circles absolutely free, which places him in the front rank of the donors to the cause when one considers the high salaries paid to the leaders of the great orchestras of the country, leaving out of account the financial aid which he has rendered. The second of these men who have had the success of the orchestra much at heart is Mr. E. H. Droop, of the firm of E. F. Droop & Sons, who is well known in musical and business circles of Washington. Last year, the stress period with the orchestra, he was both treasurer and manager, and acquitted himself so well that the venture, which was a predicted failure, was able to enter on its second season with better prospects and every assurance of success. This year he was unable to assume the double responsibility, on account of the demands of his business, but was persuaded to retain the treasurership. Mr. Richard Heard, of Boston, was selected for permanent manager, a selection which has been proved a wise one from the able manner in which Mr. Heard has conducted his office during the present season. Mr. Heard is the third of these men to whom present success is due. He has had a long experience in the management of musical ventures, and comes to Washington from Boston, where he was manager of Chickering Hall and of other enterprises. He has taken up the work of co-operation with Mr. De Koven with a zeal and vim which has put new life into the undertaking. Through him the inauguration of a permanent office and management, which has long been a desired factor, has been made possible, and Mr. Heard is devoting all his time and attention to promoting the interests of the organization.

MR. RICHARD HEARD
Manager of the Washington Symphony Orchestra

Last year the orchestra was such an artistic success that in spite of financial shortcomings there was sufficient encouragement to warrant its continuance in the field. This year both sides have been strengthened greatly, and there is no fear of the outcome. In the music, those parts which were weak last year are now the strongest points, for extraordinary material has been secured. The financial outlook is good, and the names of the guarantors form sufficient evidence of this. Moreover, the sale of seats and season tickets has even exceeded the best hopes of the management. The soloists already secured are: Madame Bloomfield-Zeisler, pianist; Mr. Belinski, 'cellist, for the second concert; M. Jacques Thibaud, violinist, for the third, and for other concerts it is expected that two of the stars of the Conried Metropolitan Opera Company will be secured.

MME. FANNIE BLOOMFIELD-ZEISLER, PIANIST
Soloist at the First Washington Symphony Orchestra Concert

The members of the orchestra are as follows: Reginald De Koven, conductor; H. C. Rakemann, concert master; first violins: H. C. Rakemann, Chris. Arth, Sol Minster, Raymond Schroeder, Victor H. Johnson, Joseph Harrison, Jr., Emil Christiani, Wm. E. Green, C. H. Smith, and J. H. Foster; second violins: Max Kaestl, Henry Schwakopf, Fritz W. Iseman, Douglas Crawford, Charles V. Samuels, Louis A. Naecker, Domenico R. Stanisci, and F. C. Carter; violas: Charles B. Donch, Geo. M. Leimbach, Robert C. Stearns, Wm. C. Buckingham, C. Mills, and F. Rose; 'cellos: M. Belinski, C. Furthmaier, Fritz Mueller, David Wolfsteiner, Bruce L. Taylor, and Wm. R. Phillips; basses: Wm. A. Donch, Chris. Feige, Frank C. Boynton, Henry Denham, L. C. Newell, and Henry Schult: flutes: Henry Jaeger and William Wagener; clarinets: Andrew Coda and Peter Aitoro; oboes: Henry Rietzel and John Lammers; bassoons, Paul Lietke and Jules Dieudonne; trumpets: Otto F. Lehnert and Joseph Haina; tuba, Karl Otto; horns: Adolf Belz, Albert Lehman, Julius Schulz, and Carl L. Neumann; trombones: John P. Esputa, F. Muehlhausen, and John Eibel; drums: Wm. Giachetti and Alfred Fauth; tympani, C. Schroeder.

A partial list of box-holders for this season includes Mrs. A. E. Bates, Mrs. C. A. Williams, Mrs. Eugene Hale, Mrs. Stilson Hutchins, Mrs. E. H. G. Slater, Mrs. Henry May, Mrs. Pinchot, Mrs. Thomas F. Walsh, Mrs. James Lowndes, Mrs. L. Z. Leiter, Mrs. Stephen B. Elkins, Mrs. Herbert Wadsworth, Mrs. Reginald De Koven, Mrs. Westinghouse, Mrs. Reyburn, Mrs. H. Kirk Porter, Gen. W. F. Draper, Mr. Edward Blair, Mrs. Longworth and Mr. Nicholas Longworth. The guarantors include, besides those mentioned among the box-holders: Mr. Eugene Stevens, Mr. H. C. Perkins, Col. Henry May, Mr. S. P. Emmons, Mr. Chr. Heurich, Mrs. J. G. Eaton, Mr Oscar F. Comstock, Mr. Bernard R. Green, Mary E. Symonds, Mrs. V. G. Fischer, Mr. S. M. Craiger, Mr. S. W. Woodward, Mrs. C. H. McKim, Mr. Herbert Wadsworth, Mrs. Jno. R Reyburn, Mr. F. Pohndorf, Mr. R. Wayne Parker, F. A. Miller, U. S. N., Mr. Allerton Cushman, and Mr. H. C. Taylor. Other subscribers are: Mrs. Eugene Schuyler, Mrs. Clarence Edwards, Mrs. N. B. Prentice, Mrs. M. C. Audenreid, Mrs. C. Carlisle, Admiral Taylor, Miss K. V. E. Berry, Mrs. Ward Thoron, Mrs. B. H. Warner, Mrs. J. B. Foraker, Hon. F. G. Newlands, Miss Mary A. Cryder, Mrs. Thomas Nelson Page, Mr. Edmund Pendleton, Mr. Melville Fuller, Mrs. E. A. Hitchcock.

In conclusion, it may be well to call attention to the fact that the Washington Symphony Orchestra is worth a great deal to the city, and that this should be recognized even by those who are in the habit of saying that they do not care for music or musical interests. The mere presence of such an organization is an advertisement of culture and wealth, and as such it deserves the support of all, and especially those who have mercantile interests in the city, irrespective of their belief in or appreciation of the art of music. This is a matter-of-fact view of the situation which should not be lost sight of even in the face of the artistic and social prestige which the organization has won for itself.

COURT SQUARE THEATER.
MONDAY EVENING,
JANUARY 18, AT 8.15.
ONLY APPEARANCE THIS SEASON OF THE BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA.
MR WILHELM GERICKE,
CONDUCTOR.
SOLOIST, MR BUSONI.
THE DISTINGUISHED ITALIAN PIANIST SPECIALLY ENGAGED FOR A SERIES OF CONCERTS.
Tickets at Taylor's Music Store on and after Monday, January 11.

[72]

SUNDAY JOURNAL—JANUARY 3, 1904.

GILIBERT SINGS IN GOOD VOICE

Symphony Novelty Was "Improvisatore" Light Overture by D'Albert.

GLAZOUNOFF SECOND TIME

Loeffler's Tragic "Tintagiles" Poem Repeated and Played by the Author.

The "Improvisatore" music of D'Albert, which began last evening's Symphony program, would not be accepted as an overture in the usual operatic sense, but rather as a preparatory introduction, not drawing hints and themes from forthcoming scenes, but rather outlining the environment and suggesting the atmosphere in which they would pass—making the mind ready for these conditions, so to speak, so that the action might come as a surprise.

The story is romantic, passionate and touches tragedy, but its chief events transpire during the lively, noisy, cheery carnival time, when disguise, intrigue and counterplot are so common and so expected that they may hide treachery and danger as easily as they mask love and chivalry.

This short introduction is therefore all gay, tripping, light of emphasis, careless of mood and preludes the general merrymaking through which are to glide the personages whose fates, inclusive of happy possibilities, shall yet come close to the verge of deathly peril. For encouraging a disposition of easy yet eager attention, in unison with the most buoyant epoch of the year, these pages are capitally contrived and they were turned off smartly by the orchestra.

Deeply Influenced.

Mr. Loeffler's orchestral poem, "The Death of Tintagiles," again carried an attent and deeply influenced the assembly through the dreadful episodes of Maeterlinck's tragedy, the horrors and cruelties of which seem so needless to relate, since they point to no possible parallel that might be averted by a knowledge of them.

They wring the heart to no purpose, unless it be to contrast against them the tender beauty of such love as that of Ygraine for her delicate little brother. As heretofore, Mr. Loeffler's ideality and his power of sympolizing it in the form of melody and the colors of instrumentation were potent from the beginning of the poem to the end—in the early threats of violent power in the rumorous drums and trumpets, in the dull darkness and the bitter storm that rises to fury in its rage; in the soft, gentle conference of the girl and the child, and the wail and woe of their dark and savage separation; in the crash of the fatal doorway, and in the peace, relief and benediction that follows after the catastrophe.

These are spiritually and morally, rather than intellectually and specifically, expressed in the score, and the intensity with which the progress of the tragedy is enforced was heightened by Mr. Loeffler's presence in the orchestra to play the viola d'amour part, which expresses the timid, plaintive, pathetic child, victim of a power he cannot comprehend in a fate that is all mystery.

Composition of Fancies.

The Glazounoff symphony (in E flat, No. 4) was again much enjoyed on this second hearing and showed itself more clearly for what it is—a composition more of fancies and psychical states than of thought, reflection and calculation. The three parts appear to express in a general scope, languorous, amatory, tranquillizing happiness; busy, animated, active, restless mirthfulness; and high-spirited, positive, vigorous, wilful vitality, emphatic in assertion, ready and fertile in motion, ardent, full and high-pulsed in temper.

In the first movement long-drawn, pensive, sentimental melody prevails, which in the second becomes fluent, swift and sparkling, while in the third the obvious theme which opens it mildly soon gives way to large, varied and rich-colored development, full of technical skill and strength. Thoughtful feeling, lively resolution and energetic execution seem to make the sequence.

Mr. Gilibert's contributions brought great pleasure and elicited from one gentleman whose conversation, as it forced itself upon his neighbors, was largely of his foreign experiences and advantages, this lofty commendation: "Do you know, now, that fellow's really a very creditable singer?"

Took Wide Range.

Mr. Gilibert's four selections took a wide range. He began with the cynical, forced, hollow merriment and the actual, bitter despair of Raiph's hopeless soliloquy in Bizet's "Fair Maid or Perth," and ended with the bubbling bucolic delight of Gilles' "Voici le Matin, la Grive a Chante," including between these Massenet's "Twilight" and Perilhou's "Virgin by the Manger," sung in fine mezza-voce, with perfect and tranquil sostenuto and quiet delicacy, the comedian spirit and the big voice yielding primacy to the sensitive, reserved artist. Mr. Zach accompanied the three chansons altogether well.

At the next concert Mr. Busoni will make his rentree in the Henselt F minor piano concerto. Saint Saens' "Barbarians" overture will have its first hearing, and Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony and Franck's "Chasseur Mandit" poem will also be played.

SUNDAY POST, JANUARY 3, 1904

TENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Enjoyable Orchestral Numbers by D'Albert, Loeffler and Glazounoff —Charles Gilibert Was the Soloist

This was the programme of the 10th Symphony concert last evening:

Overture to "The Improvisatore".....D'Albert
Aria from "Fair Maid of Perth".....Bizet
Symphonic Poem, "Death of Tintagiles".....Loeffler
Songs: "Twilight".....Massenet
"Virgin at the Manger".....Perilhou
"Song of Gilles".....Poise
(With piano accompaniment.)
Symphony No. 4.....Glazounoff

The overture to D'Albert's opera, "The Improvisatore," was heard at these concerts for the first time.

The opera is founded partly on Victor Hugo's drama, "Angelo, Tyrant of Padua," and was first heard at Berlin in 1901. Naturally one can obtain little, if any, idea of the opera from the overture, which, though brilliantly scored, is noisy and without any apparent musical value. As a novelty it was about the least of any of them this season.

Mr. Loeffler's impressionist work, "The Death of Tintagiles," makes about the same impression now as it did when first produced. To one who is in sympathy with the Maeterlinck poem, the music that Mr. Loeffler has provided will, no doubt, add interest and enjoyment to the text, but otherwise his symphony poem, clever and imaginative though it is, will mean but little.

The performance was admirable in every way, the composer playing the solo viole d'amour part, and he was the recipient of much applause.

It was pleasant to again hear the Glazounoff symphony, and it grows in interest with a more intimate knowledge. It was given here earlier in the season and made such a favorable impression that Mr. Gericke gave it again at this concert by special request.

Apparently it is one of the best symphonies written since Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic," and will undoubtedly be in the regular orchestral repertoire in the near future.

Mr. Gilibert, the well-known French operatic baritone, was the soloist. He was in good voice and sang in his usual inimitable style and finish.

The group of songs, with piano accompaniment, pleased the audience so well that the singer received an immense ovation. There were many recalls in the hope that an extra number would be given, but the rule of these concerts says otherwise, and the audience was forced to be content without an encore.

SUNDAY GLOBE—JANUARY 3, 1904.

Tenth of the Season's Symphony Concerts.

The popular French baritone, Charles Gilibert, was the soloist at last week's symphony concerts, his contributions comprising an aria from Bizet's opera, "The Fair Maid of Perth," and songs by Massenet, Perilhou and Poise. The orchestral numbers were d'Albert's overture to "The Improvisatore," Loeffler's symphonic poem, "The Death of Tintagiles" and Glazounoff's fourth symphony. Mr Loeffler played the viole d'amour in his own work, and Mr Zach was the piano accompanist for Mr Gilibert's group of songs. D'Albert's overture, which was played for the first time at these concerts, proved to be a delightful novelty, brilliantly and elaborately orchestrated and full of the carnival spirit. It has a swing and dash and tonal coloring which is a splendid reflex of holiday jollity, the percussion episodes are very cleverly introduced, the themes are catchy bits of melody and the work is scored in a masterly way and without undue stress given to dissonant and inharmonious modulations. It is a right down merry composition, pleasing to the ear, and it was played in the happiest mood by the orchestra.

Mr Gilibert's vocal work deserves high praise, although doubtless a song or two more in the lighter vein would not have been taken amiss by the audience. Few baritones there are whose tones are as sweet or whose phrasing and coloring are more artistic, and in each of his songs the sentiments were expressed with a skill in contrasts which were marked examples of vocal art of a high quality. The abandon in the Bizet aria, with its devil-may-care "tra la la"; the beautiful and restful "Twilight" of Massenet, the sweet sanctity of the Perilhou hymnal and the rollicking "Joli Gilles" of Poise were voiced in delightful cadences, and after each aria the singer was greeted with hearty applause.

Mr Loeffler was received with great favor after the close of the performance of his work. His symphonic poem is a composition which from its elaborate nature and complexity of scoring appeals largely to the advanced student or professiona musician, and its great merits find proper recognition mainly in the ranks of those who might be called musical experts. The orchestra performed the piece in a thoroughly sympathetic manner. In the first part of the Glazounoff overture the thematic bits were juggled deftly by the different contingents; the second movement showed harmonious ensemble work by the strings, and the closing part, the most difficult of the three, was given with proper fortissimo effect.

Mr F. Busoni will be this week's soloist, playing Henselt's F minor concerto for piano. The other selections will be the overture "Les Barbares," Saint-Saens; Cesar Franck's smyphonic poem, "Le Chasseur Maudit," and Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony.

SUNDAY HERALD—BOSTON, JANUARY 3, 1904.

TENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Seldom So Many Vacant Seats as Seen Last Night.

The Overture to D'Albert's Opera, "The Improvisatore," a Symphony by Glazounoff and a Symphonic Poem by Loeffler, "The Death of Tintagiles," Are Given.

The programme of the 10th Symphony concert, Mr. Gericke conductor, given last night in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

Overture to the opera, "The Improvisatore" (first time).....D'Albert
Air, "Quand la Flamme," from "The Fair Maid of Perth".....Bizet
Symphonic poem, "The Death of Tintagiles".....Loeffler
Songs—
"Twilight".....Massenet
"The Virgin at the Manger".....Perilhon
Song of Gilles from "Joli Gilles".....Poise
Symphony No. 4 in E flat (by request)...Glazounoff

The fury of the storm kept many at home. Seldom have there been so many vacant seats at a Symphony concert.

The overture to D'Albert's opera, "The Improvisatore," was played here for the first time. It has been performed at Symphony concerts in Chicago and Cincinnati. The music is purposely carnivalesque. It is ostensibly light and gay, but these qualities are superficial. The music is not shot through with merriment and recklessness. The themes of a sparkling overture should have distinction, otherwise the overture will not sparkle. Nor is there in this music the imperious reminder of popular chatter and turmoil. A would-be profound composer here would fain scintillate.

The first theme is effectively announced, but the second theme is comic opera, and not of the first class. The best part of the work is its orchestral dress, and the variagated costume covers a naturally phlegmatic body. Auber did this sort of thing much better. Some years ago D'Albert gave a memorable performance of Beethoven's G major concerto at a Symphony concert—it was his second visit to Boston. The wonder is that a man who had such an uncommon gift of interpretation should itch like any young Frenchman for stage reputation. He has written seven operas within 10 years. These operas have seen the footlights; they have been reviewed solemnly and at length, and they live—in music lexicons.

Glazounoff's symphony played last October gave many so much pleasure that they asked for a repetition. The music is melodious, fluent, brilliant, and not without elegance. There are symphonies which are said to be great and do not give pleasure. It is a good thing to have occasionally a symphony that has not this singular attribute of greatness. Mr. Loeffler's symphony poem was played for the fourth time; the second performance of the revised version.

The characteristics of this highly imaginative work have been discussed here more than once, and at length, and it is not necessary to catalogue again the many beauties. It is a unique composition, not on account of its subject, for Leon Dubois has written music for the same little tragedy for marionettes; not because of the viol d'armour, which was played in a masterly manner by the composer; but by reason of the invention and the treatment. The day has gone by when Maeterlinck can be dismissed contemptuously as a "decadent," especially by those who have never read his plays; and with that day has gone the idea that a composer who finds suggestion in the dramas must necessarily be "morbid." "The Death of Tintagiles" is no more morbid than death itself; and "decadent," in the true meaning of the word, may be applied to Marlowe, Shakespeare, Sir Thomas Browne, DeQuincey, Keats, Pater, Yeats—a highly respectable list, one that might be recommended by the most prudent professor of composition and rhetoric in a young ladies' seminary.

Mr. Loeffler has caught the spirit of various Maeterlinckian moods, and expressed them in peculiarly original music. He does not try to retell the tragedy in music; he puts into music his impressions of the story of the boy Tintagiles, his sisters, and their fearful and vain struggle against the old queen in the tower of the dark castle. His symbolism, as that of Maeterlinck, is human. Nor is it necessary to know the tragedy in order to be moved by the music. Such imaginative music is rare. While the composer is alive, it is characterized as odd, strange, and by some it is called "wonderful, no doubt, but unintelligible"; the composer at last dies; the next generation decides that he was a genius; it ridicules the dull ears that did not appreciate the power and beauty of his music, and it also neglects, or does not recognize, the imaginative of its own period.

Mr. Gilibert sang with rare skill. A comedian of the first order, he distinguished between the concert and the operatic stage, and did not overstep the boundary line. By his flawless diction, by vocal proficiency, by his knowledge of the value of tonal color, by personal authority and magnetism, he turned trifles into consummate works of art. The audience called and recalled him, but the traditions were respected, and Mr. Gilibert could only bow repeatedly his thanks.

All the seats and all the standing room were filled at Symphony Hall Sunday night for the pension fund concert, and an unusually brilliant and interesting audience it was. Mme. Melba was in a somewhat plainly built gown for her of pale blue chiffon velvet with spangled lace and full sleeves of tulle. Small white flowers with foliage were in the hair and her jewels were pearls and diamonds. After the first song Mr. Arbos presented Mme. Melba with a huge laurel wreath tied with white ribbons from the orchestra, and later roses were handed up to her.

Some of those there were Mr. and Mrs. Boylston Beal, Mr. and Mrs. S. V. R. Crosby, Mr. Robert M. Cushing with his son and daughter-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. Howard Cushing; Mr. and Mrs. F. R. Sears, Sr., Mr. and Mrs. Dudley Fay, with their daughters, Miss Lily and Miss Alice; Mr. John E. Thayer, with his niece, Miss Elizabeth Andrew, Mrs. Henry P. Kidder, with a party including her sister, Mrs. Frank Wells, Miss Madeline Boardman, Mrs. Timothee Adamowski, Mrs Roger Allen and Miss Rosamond Allen, Mr. and Mrs. Edward L. Osgood, Mrs. Henry M. Whitney, Miss Ruth Whitney, Dr. and Mrs. Langdon Frothingham, Mrs. Nathan Matthews, Jr., Miss Nathalie Matthews, Mrs. Neal Rantoul, with her sister, Miss Rosamond Saltonstall, the Misses Lena and Hannah Stevenson, with Miss Grace Dabney; Mrs. Robert M. Morse and Miss Morse, Miss Alice Stackpole, Mr. Otis Kimball and Miss Estelle Kimball, Miss Mary Eustis, Miss Eleanor Hyde, Mr. and Mrs. James R. Poor, Mr. and Mrs. J. B. Forsyth, Mrs. William B. Rogers, Sr., Mrs. William B. Rice, Miss Jane and Miss Martha Waldron, Dr. Henry L. Morse, Mr. S. Gannett Wells, Mr. Eugene Greenleaf, Mr. and Mrs. N. Hugh Cotton and their daughters, Mr. and Mrs. Charles N. Clapp and Miss Clapp, Mr. and Mrs. Edward H. Clement, Prof. Cross and Mr. and Mrs. Charles Hellier.

[73]

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, JANUARY 4, 1904

Symphony Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

Owing to the severity of the storm, there was an unfortunately small audience at the last Symphony concert—unfortunately, because it was one of the most agreeable of the season. This was the programme, Mr. Charles Gilibert being the soloist:

D'Albert: Overture to the opera, "The Improvisatore."
(First time.)
Bizet: "Quand la Flamme de L'Amour," from "The Fair Maid of Perth."
Loeffler: Symphonic Poem, "The Death of Maurice Tintagiles," after the drama of Maeterlinck.
(The viole d'amour is played by the composer.)
Songs with Pianoforte—
Massenet: "Twilight."
Perilhou: "The Virgin at the Manger."
Poise: Song of Gilles.
Glazounow: Symphony No. 4, in E flat, op. 48.
(By request.)

The new work produced was D'Albert's overture to his opera, "The Improvisatore," first brought out in Berlin in February, 1902. With little melody of distinction or of charm, this composition is yet so delightfully rhythmical, so skilfully orchestrated, and so lively in spirit that its hearing was truly a pleasure. Its performance, indeed, pleased the audience so well that it would seem to be a wise plan to bring forward other overtures of the opéra comique order: some by Auber, two or three by Rossini. The overture to "Semiramide" would be interesting to hear from a fine orchestra, and that to Nicolai's "Merry Wives" has not been heard here in a long while.

Another excellent move of Mr. Gericke's is to repeat in the same season works that, on their first production, were enthusiastically received. At this concert, for instance, he played again Glazounow's fourth symphony, which was first brought out here only last October, and it is safe to say that at the second hearing the work sounded even more brilliant and charming, if not of intrinsically greater worth, than it did at its first. It is much to be wished that Mr. Gericke would adopt this plan oftener, particularly in connection with works that are at first difficult of comprehension, like the "Heldenleben," "Barbarossa," etc.

Of most consequence Saturday was the second performance here in its final arrangement of Mr. Loeffler's symphonic poem, "The Death of Tintagiles," after the drama by Maeterlinck, a composition that aroused tremendous enthusiasm in 1901. To appreciate the many beauties of this score of Mr. Loeffler's, its richness of picturesque suggestion, its flashes and gleams of lovely color, its tenderness, its passion and its climax of horribleness, no fervid admiration of Maeterlinck is needful; and yet it seems as though Mr. Loeffler's musical illustration of the drama must fully satisfy the most rabid devotees of the Belgian poet. Now that Maeterlinck himself, however is turning from the unreal to the real, abandoning "Dramas for Marionettes," for plays of flesh and blood, like "Monna Vanna," would it not be well for Mr. Loeffler to follow his illustrious example? Despite its musical beauties, now more clearly in evidence than ever before, "The Death of Tintagiles" made a much less profound impression last week than it did three years ago. At present a healthy interest in the doings of live human beings is pushing into outer darkness the curiosity men felt a few years ago concerning the movements and repeated ejaculations of the pale puppets of mystic symbolism. The orchestra played this composition grandly, as, indeed, it played the entire programme.

Mr. Gilibert, as always, entranced everybody by the exquisite quality of his art. Again it can only be said of him that now, since Victor Maurel has retired from the stage, there is no man singer before the public with so perfect a legato, so absolute a control of breath, such fine feeling in phrasing, so keen a feeling for tonal color, such admiral diction, and so remarkable power of projecting his meaning on the minds (and hearts) of his hearers, as Mr. Gilibert. On Saturday he was received with applause that threatened to turn the symphony concert into a song recital. France may be proud of him.

At this week's concert Mr. Ferrucio Busoni is to reappear in Boston, his former home. The programme will be as follows: Overture to "Les Barbares" (first time), Saint-Saëns; Concerto for pianoforte, in F minor, Henselt; Poème Symphonique, "Le Chasseur Maudit," Cæsar Franck; Symphony No. 3, in A minor (Scotch), Mendelssohn.

R. R. G.

ADVERTISER.
JANUARY 4, 1904.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Programme.

Overture. "Improvisatore".....D'Albert
Ralph's Air, from "The Fair Maid of Perth".....Bizet
"The Death of Tintagiles".....Loeffler
Songs with piano accompaniment.
Symphony No. 4, E flat, op. 48.....Glazounoff
Soloist, M. Charles Gilibert.

D'Albert's overture began with a couple of startling explosions and then settled down into a deliberate attempt to be insouciant and rollicking. Humor of this sort is not contagious, and one could listen unmoved to the manufactured hilarity of the overture. We fancy that the operatic works of D'Albert and of Rubenstein will not greatly trouble the next generation.

As if in line with this jollity that was not jolly, there came a doleful bacchanalian song by Bizet, finely given by M. Gilibert. But this song—"Quand la Flamme de l'Amour"—was a work of genius, since its contradiction of emotions was intentional and intensely pathetic. It is the picture of a man, hopelessly in love, disdained by her whom he idolizes, seeking merriment in drink.

It was one of the most powerful temperance sermons ever heard in Symphony Hall. The strange "tra-la-las," half dejected, half ferocious, were perfectly interpreted by M. Gilibert, although the song seemed to lie a trifle too low for the best vocal effect. The recalls were many and well deserved.

The songs with piano accompaniment were also finely given. It is remarkable to find so heavy a voice as that of M. Gilibert, so excellently used in pianissimo passages and in light runs; the man is an artist to the finger tips.

Massenet's "Twilight" did not seem to say very much, nor did we find Perilhon's "Virgin at the Manger" anything remarkable. Both seemed to be of that affected variety of Chanson that Grossmith used to parody so effectively. But the joyous song of Gilles, from Poise's opera, "Joli Gilles," was like a breath of pure country air.

"Here is the morning, the thrush is singing,"
A beautiful summer day 'tis bringing.
Here is the morning, the thrush is singing."

Simple words and simple mirth and joy of living! And these emotions M. Gilibert brought out so finely that the audience spent the ten minutes of intermission in trying to force an encore. But the laws of the symphonic Medes and Persians are immutable, and after half a dozen reappearances, M. Gilibert came out three times more, with many explanatory gestures. Finally the orchestra came back and the concert went on.

It was a delight to see Mr. Loeffler once more in his seat in the orchestra. He came to play the viol d'amour part in his symphonic poem, "The Death of Tintagiles." In this work the orchestral master has individualized the viol d'amour as Berlioz has made a personality out of the viola, in his "Childe Harold" symphony. If we once grant the school of morbidness and of extreme radicalism in progressions we must grant that M. Loeffler is a master.

Not Berlioz, not Richard Strauss, have done more with the orchestra in the matter of tone-colors, than this resident composer. And the representation of the two contending forces of Evil and Innocence, which is so prominent in this work, becomes more and more dignified with repeated hearing. Certain it is that Mr. Loeffler's compositions do not lose by familiaity.

The composer, who is known and appreciated by all Boston music-lovers, was called upon to bow his acknowledgements from the platform, at the end of the piece.

A touch of Russian symphony came at the end of the programme. We gladly concede to Russia many triumphs in the musical field. She may yet wrest the sceptre of tonal supremacy from Germany. May her victories of the future be confined to this field, where they help human progress. The work has been so recently played (last October) that we need only record the fact that a second hearing emphasizes the impressions of the first. It is a Muscovite Pastorale. Its second movement is a gem. It is a melodic work and proves that one need not leave tune in order to write advanced music.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Transcript
THURSDAY, JANUARY 7, 1904

Change in Symphony Programme

Owing to the late arrival of the Patricia of the Hamburg-American line, Mr. Busoni, the soloist announced for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week, will be unable to appear. Madame Lillian Blauvelt has kindly consented to take Mr. Busoni's place, and will sing an aria from Rossini's "Barber of Seville," and a group of songs with the piano.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 6, 1904.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Tenth Concert—Review by Philip Hale in the Boston Herald.

THE program of the tenth Symphony concert, Mr. Gericke conductor, given last night in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

Overture to the opera, The Improvisatore (first time).....D'Albert
Air, Quand la Flamme, from The Fair Maid of Perth.....Bizet
Symphonic poem, The Death of Tintagiles.....Loeffler
Songs—
Twilight .....Massenet
The Virgin at the Manger.....Perilhon
Song of Gilles, from Joli Gilles.....Poise
Symphony No. 4, in E flat (by request).....Glazounoff

The fury of the storm kept many at home. Seldom have there been so many vacant seats at a Symphony concert.

The Overture to D'Albert's opera "The Improvisatore" was played here for the first time. It has been performed at Symphony concerts in Chicago and Cincinnati. The music is purposely carnivalesque. It is ostensibly light and gay, but these qualities are superficial. The music is not shot through with merriment and recklessness. The themes of a sparkling overture should have distinction, otherwise the overture will not sparkle. Nor is there in this music the imperious reminder of popular chatter and turmoil. A would-be profound composer here would fain scintillate.

The first theme is effectively announced, but the second theme is comic opera, and not of the first class. The best part of the work is its orchestral dress, and the variegated costume covers a naturally phlegmatic body. Auber did this sort of thing much better. Some years ago D'Albert gave a memorable performance of Beethoven's G major Concerto at a Symphony concert—it was his second visit to Boston. The wonder is that a man who had such an uncommon gift of interpretation should itch like any young Frenchman for stage reputation. He has written seven operas within ten years. These operas have seen the footlights; they have been reviewed solemnly and at length, and they live—in music lexicons.

Glazounoff's symphony played last October gave many so much pleasure that they asked for a repetition. The music is melodious, fluent, brilliant, and not without elegance. There are symphonies which are said to be great and do not give pleasure. It is a good thing to have occasionally a symphony that has not this singular attribute of greatness. Mr. Loeffler's symphony poem was played for the fourth time; the second performance of the revised version.

The characteristics of this highly imaginative work have been discussed here more than once, and at length, and it is not necessary to catalogue again the many beauties. It is a unique composition, not on account of its subject, for Leon Dubois has written music for the same little tragedy for marionettes; not because of the viol d'amour, which was played in a masterly manner by the composer; but by reason of the invention and the treatment. The day has gone by when Maeterlinck can be dismissed contemptuously as a "decadent," especially by those who have never read his plays; and with that day has gone the idea that a composer who finds suggestion in the dramas must necessarily be "morbid." "The Death of Tintagiles" is no more morbid than death itself; and "decadent," in the true meaning of the word, may be applied to Marlowe, Shakespeare, Sir Thomas Browne, DeQuincey, Keats, Pater, Yeats—a highly respectable list, one that might be recommended by the most prudent professor of composition and rhetoric in a young ladies' seminary.

Mr. Loeffler has caught the spirit of various Maeterlinkian moods, and expressed them in peculiarly original music. He does not try to retell the tragedy in music; he puts into music his impressions of the story of the boy Tantagiles, his sisters, and their fearful and vain struggle against the old queen in the tower of the dark castle. His symbolism, as that of Maeterlinck, is human. Nor is it necessary to know the tragedy in order to be moved by the music. Such imaginative music is rare. While the composer is alive, it is characterized as odd, strange, and by some it is called "wonderful, no doubt, but unintelligible"; the composer at last dies; the next generation decides that he was a genius; it ridicules the dull ears that did not appreciate the power and beauty of his music, and it also neglects, or does not recognize, the imaginative of its own period.

Mr. Gilibert sang with rare skill. A comedian of the first order, he distinguished between the concert and the operatic stage, and did not overstep the boundary line. By his flawless diction, by vocal proficiency, by his knowledge of the value of tonal color, by personal authority and magnetism, he turned trifles into consummate works of art. The audience called and recalled him, but the traditions were respected, and Mr. Gilibert could only bow repeatedly his thanks.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CXV., NO. 8.

FRIDAY, JAN. 8, 1904.

MME. BLAUVELT SOLOIST.

Programme for Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra This Afternoon.

The programme of the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra this afternoon includes the overture to Saint-Saens' opera, "The Barbarians"; Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman," and Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony. The overture will be played here for the first time. When the opera is performed in Paris, the overture serves as a prologue and a reciter appears to tell how an invading host of Teutons swept the natives and the Roman legions before them, until at Orange, their chief fell in love with a vestal virgin, and he declares that Vesta punished the sacrilege. The action of the opera passes in the old amphitheatre of Orange, for which the first performance was planned, but Saint-Saens made reasonable objections and the production was at the Opera, Paris. Franck's symphonic poem is in illustration of the ballad by Buerger, which is familiar to English speaking persons through Sir Walter Scott's version. The composition was first played here by Theodore Thomas' orchestra, and it has been played here at a Symphony concert.

Mr. Busoni has been delayed, and Mme. Blauvelt will be the soloist. She will sing with the orchestra Rosina's cavatina from "The Barber of Seville" and with piano accompaniment these songs: Campra's "Charming Butterfly," Delibes' "Why?" and the bolero from "The Sicilian Vespers."

It is a pleasure to state that Mr. Gilibert, the eminent baritone, and Miss Sassoli, the harpist, will give a second concert in Jordan Hall on Saturday afternoon, Jan. 16. There will be a complete change of programme.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST, JANUARY 10, 1904

THE SYMPHONY

An Interesting Programme, With Mme. Lillian Blauvelt as the Soloist

At the Symphony rehearsal and concert for last week the soloist was to have been Busoni, the pianoforte virtuoso, but as had already been announced, that gentleman was delayed on the ocean and was unable to fulfil his engagement. Consequently Mme. Lillian Blauvelt was secured in Mr. Busoni's place. Otherwise the original programme was unchanged. It was as follows:

Overture to the opera, "The Barbarians" (first time) .....Saint-Saens
Aria, "Una Voce," from "The Barber of Seville" .....Rossini
Symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman" .....Cesar Franck
Songs with pianoforte (a) "Charmant Papillon" .....Campra
(b) Pourquoi" .....Delibes
(c) "Sicilian Vespers" .....Verdi
Symphony No. 8 in A minor (Scotch), op. 56. .....Mendelssohn

The novelty, as far as the orchestral portion of the programme was concerned, was the overture to Saint-Saens's opera, "The Barbarians," and played for the first time by the Boston organization. The opera is but a little over two years old and has never been given in this country, nor very many times in any other, for that matter. Originally there was a prologue, in which there was a reciter and orchestral accompaniment, but the music, without the words, has been adapted for a concert overture, and it was this which was heard last evening.

The overture is arranged from themes found in the score, and judging from them, it is difficult to understand how the opera could ever achieve much popularity. It is somewhat vague and nearly always uninteresting, which may, after all, not be so very inappropriate, for the period of the opera is 113 B. C., and treats of a people not given to romanticism.

Cesar Franck's "The Wild Huntsman" and Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony completed the work of the orchestra for the evening.

Mme. Blauvelt was in excellent voice and displayed its brilliancy and quality to good advantage in the cavatine from "The Barber of Saville." The lady sings with commendable accuracy and phrases with much taste. She was accompanied by the orchestra. Later she was heard in a group of three songs, "Charming Butterfly" of Campra, "Pourquoi" of Delibes and the bolero from Verdi's "Sicilian Vespers," and gave even greater satisfaction.

There will be no rehearsal or concert the present week.

BOSTON SUNDAY JOURNAL,
JANUARY 10, 1904.

MME. BLAUVELT SYMPHONY STAR

Saint-Saens' "Les Barbares" Overture Proves to Be Program's Novelty.

There are in the story of "Les Barbares," upon which Saint-Saens built his opera of that name, and the overture to which received its first Boston placing in the eleventh Symphony program, some points that recall the disgusting and debasing play, "The Conquerors," tolerated at the Hollis Street Theater a few seasons ago.

Nearly 2000 years separate the epochs of the actions, but in each an invading horde of Teutons has overwhelmed the defensive French and the Romans who in the early actions would aid them. In each a victorious commander is seized with base desire for a pure and beautiful woman of the country, and offers to stay his devastating hand if she will yield herself to him. In the modern play he is shown as brutal enough to attempt such possession by violence; but in Sardou's old-time story the vestal virgin, patriotic and also fascinated, consents to the sacrifice, the people condoning her sin with difficulty.

Festivities in City.

Festivities and solemn processions are seen in the city, the chief of the latter being one in which the international lovers are glorified, and one in which is borne the corpse of the French consul, who had been killed in action. The widow shrewdly makes the doubly-conquering commander admit his deed, and slays him with his own sword, which she had torn from her husband's dead body.

The overture is based upon themes and scenes presented in the opera, which furnish several distinct episodes. First, one of lugubrious woe, a minor strain, lamenting over the roll of muffled drums; then an agitated and excited one; then one quite plaintive and passive; then a rush and sweep into gaiety, and finally a grave and gloomy period, with heavy, counterpointing basses, and then the hurry, crash and decisiveness of the coda and finale. In the original production, which was at the Paris Opera in October, 1901, these episodes were connected by comments narrated by the tragedian, Delmas, but are now united by short trumpet recitatives.

Besides this overture, which might have been delivered more melodramatically, the orchestra played Franck's musical version of the old "Wild Huntsman" legend, recalling the impious Sabbath hunting of the wicked count and his profanation of the holy rites; his desertion by his comrades and the refusal of his horse to follow and of his horn to be wound; the curse visited upon him, and his aimless, endless flight across the dreading and hating world.

In A Minor.

The Symphony was Mendelsshon in A minor, usually called the "Scotch," because during that visit to Scotland which influenced him so much he felt the impressions and found the fancies which made so many of his pages beautiful and touching. In it one feels the sadness associated with the tragedy of Mary of Scotland's life and its fatal power over the careless and luckless Rizzio; one breathes the quietude of hill, lake and heathery stretch, and notes his quickening pulse and thrilling nerve in the rhythm of song and the spring of dance.

Mr. Busoni, whose approach was somewhere delayed, caused a change of soloist for the second time this season, and Mme. Blauvelt was happily on hand to fill out the program.

Sang "Una Voce."

The song "Una Voce poco Fa," the "Butterfly" air from Campra's century-old "Fetes Venitiennes," Delibes' "Pourquoi," and the bolero from Verdi's "Vepres Siciliennes." Mme. Blauvelt was gladly received and flatteringly heard, for she is ever a favorite. Her singing was, as usual, competent, self possessed, showy and "stylish." Yet it is singing which just falls short of perfect elegance and savors rather of study and determination to excel than of predisposition and spontaneity. Her execution has all the right to be called "agilita," but it lacks the elastic lightness of absolute "fioritura." Her closest approach to the true union of song and singer was in the bolero, although she gave the Cambra air sweetly, equably and with reserve.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 6, 1904.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Tenth Concert—Review by Philip Hale in the Boston Herald.

THE program of the tenth Symphony concert, Mr. Gerricke conductor, given last night in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

Overture to the opera, The Improvisatore (first time).....D'Albert
Air, Quand la Flamme, from The Fair Maid of Perth.....Bizet
Symphonic poem, The Death of Tintagiles.....Loeffler
Songs—
Twilight.....Massenet
The Virgin at the Manger.....Perilhou
Song of Gilles, from Jo'b Gi'b.....Poise
Symphony No. 4, in E flat (by request).....Glazounoff

The fury of the storm kept many at home. Seldom have there been so many vacant seats at a Symphony concert.

The Overture to D'Albert's opera "The Improvisatore" was played here for the first time. It has been performed at Symphony concerts in Chicago and Cincinnati. The music is purposely carnivalesque. It is ostensibly light and gay, but these qualities are superficial. The music is not shot through with merriment and recklessness. The themes of a sparkling overture should have distinction, otherwise the overture will not sparkle. Nor is there in this music the imperious reminder of popular chatter and turmoil. A would be profound composer here would fain scintillate.

The first theme is effectively announced, but the second theme is comic opera, and not of the first class. The best part of the work is its orchestral dress, and the variegated costume covers a naturally phlegmatic body. Auber did this sort of thing much better. Some years ago D'Albert gave a memorable performance of Beethoven's G major Concerto at a Symphony concert—it was his second visit to Boston. The wonder is that a man who had such an uncommon gift of interpretation should itch like any young Frenchman for stage reputation. He has written seven operas within ten years. These operas have seen the footlights; they have been reviewed solemnly and at length, and they live—in music lexicons.

Glazounoff's symphony played last October gave many so much pleasure that they asked for a repetition. The music is melodious, fluent, brilliant, and not without elegance. There are symphonies which are said to be great and do not give pleasure. It is a good thing to have occasionally a symphony that has not this singular attribute of greatness. Mr. Loeffler's symphony poem was played for the fourth time; the second performance of the revised version.

The characteristics of this highly imaginative work have been discussed here more than once, and at length, and it is not necessary to catalogue again the many beauties. It is a unique composition, not on account of its subject, for Leon Dubois has written music for the same little tragedy for marionettes; not because of the viol d'amour, which was played in a masterly manner by the composer; but by reason of the invention and the treatment. The day has gone by when Maeterlinck can be dismissed contemptuously as a "decadent," especially by those who have never read his plays; and with that day has gone the idea that a composer who finds suggestion in the dramas must necessarily be "morbid." "The Death of Tintagiles" is no more morbid than death itself; and "decadent," in the true meaning of the word, may be applied to Marlowe, Shakespeare, Sir Thomas Browne, DeQuincey, Keats, Pater, Yeats—a highly respectable list, one that might be recommended by the most prudent professor of composition and rhetoric in a young ladies' seminary.

Mr. Loeffler has caught the spirit of various Maeterlinkian moods, and expressed them in peculiarly original music. He does not try to retell the tragedy in music; he puts into music his impressions of the story of the boy Tantagiles, his sisters, and their fearful and vain struggle against the old queen in the tower of the dark castle. His symbolism, as that of Maeterlinck, is human. Nor is it necessary to know the tragedy in order to be moved by the music. Such imaginative music is rare. While the composer is alive, it is characterized as odd, strange, and by some it is called "wonderful, no doubt, but unintelligible"; the composer at last dies; the next generation decides that he was a genius; it ridicules the dull ears that did not appreciate the power and beauty of his music, and it also neglects, or does not recognize, the imaginative of its own period.

Mr. Gilibert sang with rare skill. A comedian of the first order, he distinguished between the concert and the operatic stage, and did not overstep the boundary line. By his flawless diction, by vocal proficiency, by his knowledge of the value of tonal color, by personal authority and magnetism, he turned trifles into consummate works of art. The audience called and recalled him, but the traditions were respected, and Mr. Gilibert could only bow repeatedly his thanks.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CXV., NO. 8.

FRIDAY, JAN. 8, 1904.

MME. BLAUVELT SOLOIST.

Programme for Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra This Afternoon.

The programme of the public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra this afternoon includes the overture to Saint-Saens' opera, "The Barbarians"; Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman," and Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony. The overture will be played here for the first time. When the opera is performed in Paris, the overture serves as a prologue and a reciter appears to tell how an invading host of Teutons swept the natives and the Roman legions before them, until at Orange, their chief fell in love with a vestal virgin, and he declares that Vesta punished the sacrilege. The action of the opera passes in the old amphitheatre of Orange, for which the first performance was planned, but Saint-Saens made reasonable objections and the production was at the Opera, Paris. Franck's symphonic poem is in illustration of the ballad by Buerger, which is familiar to English speaking persons through Sir Walter Scott's version. The composition was first played here by Theodore Thomas' orchestra, and it has been played here at a Symphony concert.

Mr. Busoni has been delayed, and Mme. Blauvelt will be the soloist. She will sing with the orchestra Rosina's cavatina from "The Barber of Seville," and with piano accompaniment these songs: Campra's "Charming Butterfly," Delibes' "Why?" and the bolero from "The Sicilian Vespers."

It is a pleasure to state that Mr. Gilibert, the eminent baritone, and Miss Sassoli, the harpist, will give a second concert in Jordan Hall on Saturday afternoon, Jan. 16. There will be a complete change of programme.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST, JANUARY 10, 1904

THE SYMPHONY

An Interesting Programme, With Mme. Lillian Blauvelt as the Soloist

At the Symphony rehearsal and concert for last week the soloist was to have been Busoni, the pianoforte virtuoso, but as had already been announced, that gentleman was delayed on the ocean and was unable to fulfil his engagement. Consequently Mme. Lillian Blauvelt was secured in Mr. Busoni's place. Otherwise the original programme was unchanged. It was as follows:

Overture to the opera, "The Barbarians" (first time).....Saint-Saens
Aria, "Una Voce," from "The Barber of Seville".....Rossini
Symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman".....Cesar Franck
Songs with pianoforte (a) "Charmant Papillon".....Campra
(b) Pourquoi".....Delibes
(c) "Sicilian Vespers".....Verdi
Symphony No. 3 in A minor (Scotch), op. 56.....Mendelssohn

The novelty, as far as the orchestral portion of the programme was concerned, was the overture to Saint-Saens's opera, "The Barbarians," and played for the first time by the Boston organization. The opera is but a little over two years old and has never been given in this country, nor very many times in any other, for that matter. Originally there was a prologue, in which there was a reciter and orchestral accompaniment, but the music, without the words, has been adapted for a concert overture, and it was this which was heard last evening.

The overture is arranged from themes found in the score, and judging from them, it is difficult to understand how the opera could ever achieve much popularity. It is somewhat vague and nearly always uninteresting, which may, after all, not be so very inappropriate, for the period of the opera is 113 B. C., and treats of a people not given to romanticism.

Cesar Franck's "The Wild Huntsman" and Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony completed the work of the orchestra for the evening.

Mme. Blauvelt was in excellent voice and displayed its brilliancy and quality to good advantage in the cavatine from "The Barber of Saville." The lady sings with commendable accuracy and phrases with much taste. She was accompanied by the orchestra. Later she was heard in a group of three songs, "Charming Butterfly" of Campra, "Pourquoi" of Delibes and the bolero from Verdi's "Sicilian Vespers," and gave even greater satisfaction.

There will be no rehearsal or concert the present week.

BOSTON SUNDAY JOURNAL—JANUARY 10, 1904.

MME. BLAUVELT SYMPHONY STAR

Saint-Saens' "Les Barbares" Overture Proves to Be Program's Novelty.

There are in the story of "Les Barbares," upon which Saint-Saens built his opera of that name, and the overture to which received its first Boston placing in the eleventh Symphony program, some points that recall the disgusting and debasing play, "The Conquerors," tolerated at the Hollis Street Theater a few seasons ago.

Nearly 2000 years separate the epochs of the actions, but in each an invading horde of Teutons has overwhelmed the defensive French and the Romans who in the early actions would aid them. In each a victorious commander is seized with base desire for a pure and beautiful woman of the country, and offers to stay his devastating hand if she will yield herself to him. In the modern play he is shown as brutal enough to attempt such possession by violence; but in Sardou's old-time story the vestal virgin, patriotic and also fascinated, consents to the sacrifice, the people condoning her sin with difficulty.

Festivities in City.

Festivities and solemn processions are seen in the city, the chief of the latter being one in which the international lovers are glorified, and one in which is borne the corpse of the French consul, who had been killed in action. The widow shrewdly makes the doubly-conquering commander admit his deed, and slays him with his own sword, which she had torn from her husband's dead body.

The overture is based upon themes and scenes presented in the opera, which furnish several distinct episodes. First, one of lugubrious woe, a minor strain, lamenting over the roll of muffled drums; then an agitated and excited one; then one quite plaintive and passive; then a rush and sweep into gaiety, and finally a grave and gloomy period, with heavy, counterpointing basses, and then the hurry, crash and decisiveness of the coda and finale. In the original production, which was at the Paris Opera in October, 1901, these episodes were connected by comments narrated by the tragedian, Delmas, but are now united by short trumpet recitatives.

Besides this overture, which might have been delivered more melodramatically, the orchestra played Franck's musical version of the old "Wild Huntsman" legend, recalling the impious Sabbath hunting of the wicked count and his profanation of the holy rites; his desertion by his comrades and the refusal of his horse to follow and of his horn to be wound; the curse visited upon him, and his aimless, endless flight across the dreading and hating world.

In A Minor.

The Symphony was Mendelsshon in A minor, usually called the "Scotch," because during that visit to Scotland which influenced him so much he felt the impressions and found the fancies which made so many of his pages beautiful and touching. In it one feels the sadness associated with the tragedy of Mary of Scotland's life and its fatal power over the careless and luckless Rizzio; one breathes the quietude of bay, lake and heathery stretch, and notes his quickening pulse and thrilling nerve in the rhythm of song and the spring of dance.

Mr. Busoni, whose approach was somewhere delayed, caused a change of soloist for the second time this season, and Mme. Blauvelt was happily on hand to fill out the program.

Sang "Una Voce."

The song "Una Voce Poco Fa," the "Butterfly" air from Campra's century-old "Fetes Venitiennes," Delibes' "Pourquoi," and the bolero from Verdi's "Vepres Siciliennes." Mme. Blauvelt was gladly received and flatteringly heard, for she is ever a favorite. Her singing was, as usual, competent, self possessed, showy and "stylish." Yet it is singing which just falls short of perfect elegance and savors rather of study and determination to excel than of predisposition and spontaneity. Her execution has all the right to be called "agilita," but it lacks the elastic lightness of absolute "fioritura." Her closest approach to the true union of song and singer was in the bolero, although she gave the Cambra air sweetly, equably and with reserve.

SUNDAY HERALD—BOSTON, JANUARY 10, 1904.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Saint-Saens Overture Given Here for First Time.

Music of "The Barbarians" Heard by Boston Music Lovers—Romantic Pieces by Franck and Mendelssohn Also on the Programme—Mme. Blauvelt the Soloist.

The programme of the 11th Symphony concert, Mr. Gericke conductor, given last night in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

Overture to "The Barbarians".....Saint-Saens
(First time.)
Rosina's cavatina from "The Barber of Seville".....Rossini
Symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman".....Franck
Songs, "Charming Butterfly".....Campra
"Why".....Delibes
Bolero from "The Sicilian Vespers".....Verdi
Symphony in A minor, "Scotch"...Mendelssohn

The overture to "The Barbarians" was played for the first time in Boston. It served originally as the prologue to the opera produced in Paris in 1901. After introductory music the stage curtains were drawn apart and the amphitheatre at Orange was disclosed. A Reciter, Delmas, the baritone, appeared and told how Germans invading Gaul before Christ's birth drove all before them; but Floria, the beautiful Vestal, found a way to stop them; and then the Goddess avenged in the blood of the conqueror the sacrilegious sacrifice of Floria's body. There was music in this scene. The curtains closed again, and there was orchestral music to the beginning of the first act. This prologue was arranged by the composer as a concert overture and played at a Colonne concert in Paris, Dec. 1, 1901. Theodore Thomas produced it in Chicago in 1902.

When he was nearly 60 years old Saint-Saens went back to Grecian and Roman legends for sources of musical inspiration. Cynical, or rather ironical, in his treatment of "Phryne," that glory of a very old and once highly esteemed profession, he was appropriately tragic in the music to "Deianira." Then came "The Barbarians," and the next year the music to "Parysatis," and now his "Helen of Troy" is ready for Monte Carlo. May he be as fortunate with the story of the face "that launched a thousand ships" as was Offenbach. But Saint-Saens is now in his 69th year, and his music was never distinguished for sensuous quality or passionate intensity. Perhaps it would be well for him to treat Helen, as Phryne, with courteous irony.

The first opera librettists chose tales and legends of Greece and Rome as well as stories from these mythologies; and for years their example was piously followed. The French musicians, as well as painters, have clung to the classics, and the influence of Latin and Greek literature is observed today even among the symbolists and their disciples, as well as among such neo-pagans as Marcel Schwob and Pierre Louys. Saint-Saens has tried the historical, the romantic lyric drama, and now he is frankly classical. He has always displayed classic qualities in his operas as well as in his symphonies, symphonic poems, chamber music: simplicity of line, effects of outlines, an avoidance of encumbering detail, discretion in expression. He has now reached the age, alas, if we may judge by the latest works that have been played here, when his facility of expression is far more marked than his invention. "And desire shall fail," said the Preacher King in Jerusalem. Saint-Saens, we fear, has reached the evil days when ideas fail.

His qualities of expression are again revealed in this overture, but the ideas are few and unimportant. Where is the potent suggestion of tragedy? Where is the picture of wild invaders and despairing folk? This music is as cold as an ancient, half-effaced fresco. Compare with this music of an invading barbaric host, the overture to Chabonier's "Gwendoline," an opera with a like subject, for in each an invading hero is captivated by the beauty of a woman. In Saint-Saens' music there is no rush, no fury. The passion is that of a chess player who believes in his own system of moves. Nor is this music superbly decorative. Let us hope that the thought of Helen of Troy has warmed his blood or at least inspired him to a song of amorous regret.

Cesar Franck's symphonic poem in illustration of Buerger's ballad "The Wild Huntsman" was played here for the third time. It grows in effect with each hearing, yet the opening episode of the Sunday scene and that of the chase still seem the more imaginative. The curse and the wild hunt are not so poignantly portrayed. Franck was first of all a mystic; his best and most characteristic music is that of contemplation not of action, and least of all demoniac action. He knew how to express admirably the voices complaining of the count's mad chase that brought the curse; for his compassion and love embraced the universe; but what had that pure soul to do with the Wild Huntsman and his hellish attendants? His imagination had to stoop to such a scene. He could no more have written the music for the Wolf's Glen in "Der Freischuetz" or the Evocation of the Nuns in "Robert the Devil," than he could have imagined the song of Charpentier's Louise to her lover, that song both of shy confession and womanly exultation, or the cafe scene in "La Boheme." For of Franck it might have been said: "He hath an angel," not "He hath a devil."

Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, like his overture, "Fingal's Cave," always gives a certain pleasure. Here we have revealed the talent of Mendelssohn, the talent of the landscapist in music. It is true that, although the composer visited Scotland, he still saw the land as from the top of Sinai. There is still the Jewish feeling that is so appropriate in the music to Racine's tragedy; and, if Mendelssohn had played a bagpipe, no doubt it would have sounded like a shofar. But there is, at all events, a landscape with atmosphere in this symphony; and there is the suggestion of ballads of the border, the thought of "old, unhappy, far-off things, and battles long ago." The scherzo is today the freshest of the movements, and that is the one most characteristically Scottish.

Mme. Blauvelt, who took at short notice the place of the tempest tossed and delayed Busoni, has a voice of fine quality, which is, however, without pronounced individuality, and makes no personal appeal. She sang fluently and with a certain degree of brilliance the familiar cavatina from "The Barber." Her production of low tones might be criticised, for the contrast in quality was strongly marked, and one thought of Wordsworth's line, "Two voices are there." This defect was naturally not so noticeable in the group of songs. The song by Campra she sang simply as a well trained singer. She did not suggest the melancholy of it all—the flight of years, the vanity of all things, the inevitable gray days and nights that follow a life of coquetry.

This song has a Watteau character; it has the same melancholy elegance, the same polished recognition of the inherent emptiness of desire. There was more of a personal note, more of emotional revelation in Delibes' song, but the bolero was again merely a study in bravura—and this bolero without orchestral accompaniment is like unto cold veal.

The euphony of the orchestra was as distinguished as ever, and the different compositions were read with the minute attention to detail and with the care for relative proportions that characterize Mr. Gericke as a conductor. Yet there was breadth, there was symphony, and in "The Wild Hutsman" there was the fitting romantic expression.

SUNDAY GLOBE—JANUARY 10, 1904

ELEVENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Owing to the prevailing epidemic of belatedness among railroad trains, Mr Busoni, who was announced as the soloist for the 11th concert in the Boston symphony's present season, was unable to appear, and Mme Lillian Blauvelt, who was opportunely in the vicinity, was the soloist in his place.

This was the Brooklyn singer's first Boston appearance since her recent successful concert tour in Great Britain, and must have left her without any doubt about her being in the house of her friends. In a very fetching fur-trimmed costume, with cocked hat to match, she made a pleasing picture against the background of somber-coated symphony players, and sang in a most dramatic manner the cavatina, "A Little Voice I Heard," from Rossini's "Barber of Seville."

Her vocal method seems to gain something with each hearing; and this time it is perhaps as much in the direction of coloratura as in any other one characteristic. While her delivery of the amusing lines of the wilful Rossini heroine was possibly better than the role has been sung in some grand opera seasons, it was in the fanciful "Why?" by Delibes and the more vivacious Verdi "Bolero," from the "Sicilian Vespers," that the most captivating phase of her undeniable art was reached.

Rarely has any American singer succeeded in so completely blending the sentiment and the melody.

The piano accompaniment to the "Butterfly" song by Campra, played by Mr Zach, proved to be too loud, and its judicious modulation in the two succeeding numbers made a great improvement.

The Mendelssohn "Scotch" symphony was played delightfully, as it always is by this admirably trained organization. There were in it no traces of either blurring or slurring. From the andante introduction, born, as the composer himself has written, during his visit to Holyrood palace in 1829, to the allegro "Gathering of the Clans" with its wild skirling of Highland airs at its close, it is full of majestic power. The pastoral quietness of the vales of "sweet Afton," and the fierce war marching of Ettrick and Teviotdale clansmen is in its vivid picturing, and the orchestral interpretation was richly deserving of the repeated "bravas" it received.

The only "first time" number of the program was the opening one—the overture to the Saint-Saens opera of "The Barbarians," which was originally produced at a Paris concert in 1901. The themes are taken from the opera, and there is no attempt in it to follow the classic form of the overture.

The opera dealing with the time of the invasion of Gaul by Cimbrians and Teutons, 113 B C, the orchestration follows the ancient forms to a marked degree, yet in a singularly melodious manner. It was an ideal initial number for a symphony program, and the great audience appreciated its beauty in no uncertain way.

The Cesar Franck "symphonic poem," called 'The Wild Huntsman," has been given but twice before in Boston, in 1898, and again in 1901, and its weirdness in this repetition was a savage contrast to the more harmonious charms of the other parts of the program.

The composition opens with the Sabbath chimes predominant, but this is soon disturbed by the sound of the wild hunter's sacrilegious horn. As far as it is possible the orchestration represents the conflict between the good and evil influences which seize the mad count, urging him to one or the other extreme, and ends in the suggestions of eternal punishment which such a scoffer is supposed to have visited upon him for his misdoing.

As in the other features of the program the players perfectly interpreted the conductor's reading, and the hearing was an instructive one, if not quite so popularly enjoyable as other parts prove to be.

There will be no public rehearsal or concert this week. The special features of the program for the 12th concert Saturday evening, Jan 23, will be a "first time" performance of Dubois' overture from "Frithof;" a 'first time" suite, "In Carnival Time," by Georg Schumann; Rubenstein's A minor symphony, and two arias, the soloist to be announced later.

SPRINGFIELD DAILY REPUBLICAN.
SATURDAY, JANUARY 9, 1904.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

Quite the most important and interesting musical event of the season will be the concert to be given Monday evening, the 18th, in Court Square theater by the Boston symphony orchestra. The tickets will be put on sale Monday, the 11th, at Taylor's music house, and every one in this city or in neighboring towns who is interested in good music should at once begin a little missionary work in order to make sure of a large audience. The case is something like this. There are a few hundred people who are keenly alive to musical interests and would sacrifice almost anything rather than miss such a concert as this. But of themselves they are not sufficiently numerous to give adequate patronage for so expensive an attraction. Then there are several thousand persons who, once there, would immensely enjoy such a concert, and who might be persuaded to go if the importance of the thing were personally brought home to them by some acquaintance. Otherwise, not having acquired the concert-going habit, many of them would not fully realize the fact of the concert until it is past.

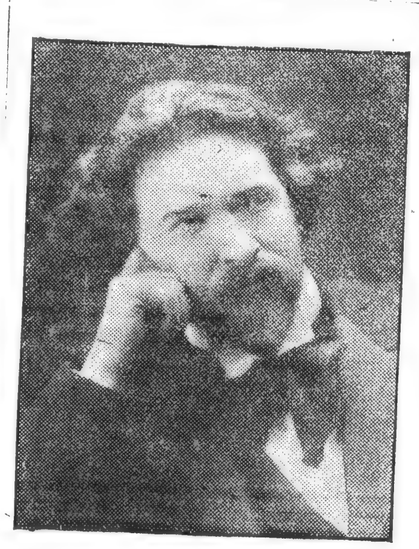
Neglect, rather than a negative spirit, is the reason why first-rate concerts so often draw but scattering audiences, and if the people who want to have an annual concert by the best orchestra in the country will go into a committee of the whole, and bring into action as many lines of influence as possible, the thing can be done. A very large and very enthusiastic audience was brought out last year by precisely this spirit, and there should be no relaxation of effort. This is the kind of missionary work that really counts. It will be remembered that for half a dozen years the city was without orchestral music, because of the failure of several concerts. The success of the experiment last year has made the managers believe that musical interest is growing here, and with a little zealous proselytizing during the coming week will insure a continuance of these superb concerts. The program has not yet been announced, but it is safe to say that it will be of the highest order, and there will be special interest in the first appearance here of the eminent Italian pianist, Mr Busoni, who is to play a concerto with the orchestra.

JANUARY 10, 1904.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Program for the Concert to be Given in Court Square Theater the 18th—The Italian Pianist, Busoni.

The tickets for the concert to be given Monday evening, the 18th, in Court Square theater by the Boston symphony orchestra, will be put on sale to-morrow morning at Taylor's music house, and there should be enough interest in this most notable event of the musical season to insure a crowded house. This will be the first concert given in this city since the resignation of Mr Kneisel and the filling of his place by Mr Arbos. Last year Mr Kneisel conducted the concert here, on account of Mr Gericke's illness. This time Mr Gericke will himself conduct, for the first time in this city in many years. The program is interesting in itself, and one in which Mr Gericke is likely to be at his best as an interpreter. The "Academic overture" by Brahms, with its effective use of German student songs, is a favorite concert piece, but is unfamiliar to the concert-going public here. The "Peer Gynt" suite, however, has been heard repeatedly at festivals, and always with delight. In piano transcription these imaginative and poetical fantasies upon Ibsen's great drama are the joy of all amateurs of music.



FERRUCCIO B. BUSONI.

The D major symphony by Beethoven, No 2, is one of the minor symphonies among the immortal nine, but any of them is worth a place in a program, and the selection of this is in one respect fortunate, in that it has been heard here less frequently than most of the others. The soloist will be the eminent Italian pianist, Ferruccio B. Busoni, who has never played in this city, and whose appearance will be looked forward to with the greatest interest. He will play this very brilliant and melodious F minor concerto by Henselt, which is one of the famous works of its genre, but has somehow been neglected on local programs, so that it is probably unfamiliar to most of those who are not specialists in piano music. The full program is as follows:—

Academic overture .....Brahms
Concerto in F minor .....Henselt
Sonata, "Purzyut" .....Grieg
Symphony in D, No 2 .....Beethoven

BOSTON TRAVELER, JANUARY 11, 1904.

THE SYMPHONY

Overture to the Opera "The Barbarians"...
Saint-Saens
(First time.)
Aria, "Una Voce," from "The Barber of Seville".....Rossini
Mme. Lillian Blauvelt.
Symphonic Poem, "The Wild Huntsman".....Cesar Franck
Songs with Pianoforte—
"Charmant Papillon".....Campra
"Pourquoi".....Delibes
"Sicilian Vespers".....Verdi
Mme. Lillian Blauvelt.
Symphony No. 3, in A minor. (Scotch.) op. 56.....Mendelssohn

Surely there was variety enough and to spare so far as the names of the composers who figured in the latest Symphony concert were concerned. On paper it looked like the promise of an evening of many moods and tenses; yet curiously enough there was a vein of sameness through all the works set forth. The beads were parti-colored, but the string was pretty nearly of one texture.

Take, for instance, Saint-Saens' overture to The Barbarians," his very recent opera. That it is the work of cool old age is patent enough; add to this Saint-Saens' ever-besetting lack of real power and emotional stress, and we have a musical picture of barbarians who would have welcomed silk hats and boutonnieres. The music is neat, melodious, beautifully scored and pleasing in every way. Had it been called "The Salonites" it would be accepted as, in a way, a work of genius.

Again, consider Cesar Franck's tone poem anent the blasphemous huntsman who was accursed most effectively for disturbing the Sunday morning devotions of the faithful. Beautiful as a portion of the work is, noble as is the religious sentiment it reveals, it falls short of greatness in that it fails to rise to the terror and weirdness of the ride of the condemned man. We are used to tremendous equine effects in music; Wagner, Belioz and Raff have given their respective horses such fiery gallops that the ambling of Franck's palfrey seems a bit lacking in interest. The work is broad and beautiful, at any rate, and it was played in an absolutely perfect way.

Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony is familiar—too familiar. We lose sight of its many beauties by an almost yearly repetition of its somewhat cloying melodiousness. And yet, who ever depicted Gaelic music as well? The exquisitely dainty scherzo, the tender love song andante, the paean of joy at the finale—all are examples of music at its most refined and charming point. Played once in ten years this symphony would have its hearers spell-bound.

Mme. Blauvelt sang with her accustomed purity and taste; yet the "Barber" aria made little real effect. We are spoiled along these lines by one consummately great Rosina. In the songs with piano she was much more successful, giving each with a clean-cut brilliancy of style that was good to hear.

[76]

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, JANUARY 11, 1904

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

Mr. Ferrucio Busoni being delayed by the weather, Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, at short notice, assumed the role of soloist at the eleventh symphony concert, held in Symphony Hall last Saturday evening. This was the programme:

Saint-Saëns: Overture to the opera "The Barbarians."
(First time.)
Rossini: Aria, "Una Voce," from "The Barber of Seville."
César Franck: Symphonic Poem, "The Wild Huntsman."
Songs with Pianoforte—
Campra: "Charmant Papillon."
Delibes: "Pourquoi."
Verdi: "Sicilian Vespers."
Mendelssohn: Symphony No. 3, in A minor. (Scotch.) Op. 56.

The concert opened with a new work by Saint-Saëns, the overture to his opera "Les Barbares," produced at the Opéra of Paris in October, 1901. The libretto, rehearsing the story of a horde of Teutonic barbarians who, in the first century of this era, invaded the Gallic town of Orange, setting forth their adventures of love and revenge, is vividly illustrated by the overture, which might well be called a symphonic poem. To judge from the music Saint-Saëns has imagined for this bloody tale, the inhabitants of Orange must have been a languorous and luxurious class of people, like unto those who lived in fair Capua or in Sybaris. And the "barbares!" They were, according to Saint-Saëns, barbarous in very truth, of the kind who would march against an enemy blowing on conch shells and bursting into warwhoops, trusting to subdue their foe by din rather than by prowess of fighting. The overture, in short, like all else Saint-Saëns has produced, is well written, with flowing and pleasant strains to suggest the invaded, with harsh and uncouth measures to typify the invaders. To find in it, however, a musical idea that has genuine value, would not be easy. The work was admirably played.

Of more moment than the overture, although it has been played here before, is César Franck's symphonic poem "Le Chasseur Maudit," in which the composer of "Les Béatitudes" attempts a musical picture of the Wild Huntsman, who, for love of the chase, neglected to care for his soul, even winding his horn of a Sunday morning, in defiance of the church bells; his horse refused to carry him, his horn to sound; till, at last, deserted by all his followers, the hunter became the hunted, and that by a pack of demons from hell; and they hunt him to this day, through darkness and through light.

Despite its many passages of singular beauty, in particular, its peaceful, religious beginning, "Le Chasseur Maudit" is not one of this great master's strongest works. César Franck, the mystic, who imagined music for a string quartet that uplifts and purifies the soul like a solemn high mass at the Cathedral of Amiens; who, in "The Beatitudes," found phrases worthy of the words of Christ; who, in the same work, depicted the sufferings of the Mater Dolorosa with accents of acutest woe; César Franck was not the man to portray the devil or any of his works. They were too foreign to his nature. Nor has he shown, in any composition performed here, the sympathy with the natural world, as Vincent d'Indy has done, that would enable him successfully to deal with a legend like the "Wild Huntsman." More interesting by far would it have been to revive his symphony, a work impossible to hear too often. The poem was beautifully played, far better than the Mendelssohn symphony, which received but a torpid performance. And yet this music of Mendelssohn's is hardly to be sniffed at; after what had come before, it seemed positively refreshing.

Mme. Blauvelt was unfortunate. With great lack of judgment, she chose to sing "Una Voce," a song effective only on the stage, with dramatic action and, furthermore, a song written for mezzo-soprano. A soprano attempting it must either dwell over much on tones unfavorable to her quality of voice, or else twist the melody out of all shape. Its accompaniment, too, was but languidly played. Still more unfortunate was Mme. Blauvelt with Verdi's brilliant bolero, which absolutely demands an orchestral accompaniment. She was, however, more successful in this piece, singing it glibly and smoothly, with an agreeable quality of voice.

This week there will be no symphony concert. The next programme, at which a soloist still unannounced will sing, is as follows: Overture to "Frithof" (first time), Dubois; Suite, "In Carnival Time" (first time), Schumann; Symphony in A minor, Rubinstein.

R. R. G.

DAILY ADVERTISER,

JANUARY 11, 1904.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Programme.

Overture to the Opera "The Barbarians"....Saint-Saens
(First time.)
Aria, "Una Voce," from "The Barber of Seville".....Rossini
Mme. Lillian Blauvelt.
Symphonic Poem, "The Wild Huntsman"....Caesar Franck
Songs with Pianoforte—
(a) "Charmant Papillon".....Campra
(b) "Pourquoi".....Delibes
(c) "Sicilian Vespers".....Verdi
Mme. Lillian Blauvelt.
Symphony No. 3, in A minor. (Scotch.) op. 56.....Mendelssohn

St. Saens is the best master of orchestration that the French have recently produced: but he is not a master of passion or emotional power. There is a lack of force in his very ingenious scores.

Better fifty bars of Bizet
Than a Cycle of St. Saens.

These barbarians seemed more gentle than the historian, Gibbons, has depicted them. They seemed addicted to hunting, and a few gentle fanfares spoke of this. The tender love-episodes were more frequently in the foreground. It was a musical representation of a species of Ingomar and Parthenia,—

Two flutes with but a single toot,
Two horns that blowed as one.

Mme. Blauvelt came as soloist, in answer to an emergency call. Busoni, who was to have played a Henselt concerto, is probably still engaged in sending contributions to the Atlantic, for his ship has not yet arrived.

It may not be fair to judge absolutely of the vocalist by a performance in response to such a sudden call. We found her work in "Una Voce" correct but uninspired--like an excellently acquired lesson.

Intonation was perfect, the runs and fioriture were clear, and while criticism was mute, so was enthusiasm.

Far better was the impression made in the subsequent songs with piano accompaniment (the latter admirably done by Mr. Zach), for in these there was a degree of abandon and brilliancy that won instantaneous recognition.

Mme. Blauvelt's work in the last 3 numbers, the quaint delicacy of old Campra, the tenderness of Delibes and the dash and brilliancy of the final Bolero, was superlatively good. Neither Sembrich, nor any other of the world-famous prime donne, could have excelled the interpretation given.

The enthusiasm following them was naturally more spontaneous than the set recalls after "Una Voce."

Cesar Franck's "Wild Huntsman" gains by repeated hearing. Yet it does not achieve the "diablerie" with which a Berlioz would have invested the subject. Among the wild rides in music, Wagner's Walkuere steeple chase, Raff's "Lenore" handicap, and Frau Holle sweepsteakes, St. Saens' Phaeton (in harness) and Berlioz's broncho ride to Hades, Franck's is the least exciting.

Of course the dissonances and the muted horn calls are there to picture evil in the conventional way, but the beauty of the work is in the calmer passages, particularly in those that suggest the Sabbath calm which the sacrilegious huntsman roughly broke.

The moral of the work is—don't go hunting on Sunday during church hours. The wicked count who did this was subsequently hunted by an entire brass band, assisted by kettle-drums, and had no end of fortissimo trouble.

We do not think the work one of Franck's strongest, although it is as famous as any of the good master's compositions. The performance was excellent.

Mr. Gericke and his men won another triumph in the Scotch Symphony, which closed the concert. It was one of the finest performances of the work which we have ever heard. And it is a work worth doing well, for, in spite of some commonplaces and conventionalities, it contains beauties that our greatest moderns could not equal with all their extra instruments and liberties.

The weak parts are the "storm" coda of the first movement, the saccharine adagio (suited to the susceptibilities of a boarding-school miss), and the hymn of thanksgiving at the end.

The noble parts are the development of the first movement and the beautiful use of clarinettes in deep register in the introduction of this movement; the splendid contrasts of the finale, and particularly that passage of clarinette, taken from the second theme, which pictures a loneliness which those who have walked through the Trossachs in the gloaming will readily understand.

The Scherzo is imperishable. Its chief theme, given by the clarinette, is the only instance of a German composer having achieved something really Gaelic. And its lilt and rollicking style is developed in a masterly manner, so that musician and non-musician may meet here upon common ground and both find much to admire.

All through the work Mendelssohn betrays partiality for the clarinettes, and these instruments were often in the foreground in this symphony and were played remarkably well.

There ought to be more great music built upon Scottish foundation. Russia and Scotland have mines of musical gold to be worked by the classical artificer. The former country is beginning to possess a race of composers who are using this valuable material, but Scotland has not yet had its musical Columbus.

The German composers have sensed the value of the Gaelic folk-repertoire, and Beethoven, Franz, Schumann, Bruch, Volkmann, and others have endeavored to build upon the foreign foundation. But only Mendelssohn has succeeded in any degree, and he chiefly because he lived in Scotland for a period,—however brief.

The true classical evolution of Scottish music must come from one to the manner born, from a native Scot. May Scotland yet find a musical son who having thorough equipment shall be imbued with Robbie Burns's aspiration,—

"That I, for puir auld Scotland's sake,
Some usefu' plan or buke might make,
Or sing a sang at least."

Louis C. Elson.

N.Y. Sun
Jan 9-04.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra programmes at Carnegie Hall next week will be:

Thursday Evening—D'Albert's overture to the opera "The Improvisatore" (first time at these concerts); Henselt's concerto in F minor, for pianoforte and orchestra, op. 16; Loeffler's "The Death of Tintagiles," symphonic poem after the drama of Maeterlinck (the viola d'amour played by the composer), and Beethoven's Symphony No. 8, in F major, op. 93. The soloist, Ferruccio B. Busoni, will be an important addition to this year's musical visitors from abroad.

Saturday Afternoon—Saint-Saëns's overture, "Les Barbares" (first time at these concerts); Brahms's concerto in D major, for violin, op 77; J. K. Paine's ballet music from the opera "Azara," three Moorish dances, and Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony No. 3, in A minor. The soloist is Miss Maud MacCarthy.

Interesting programmes are announced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for next week at Carnegie Hall, and it is to be hoped that no changes will be made before the concerts. Mr. Gericke will conduct, and Ferrucio Busoni, pianist, will at the Thursday concert reappear after a long absence, playing a seldom heard composition, the Henselt concerto.

Here are the two programmes:

THURSDAY EVENING, JANUARY 14.

Overture to the opera "The Improvisatore".....D'Albert
(First time at these concerts.)
Concerto in F minor, for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 16.....Henselt
Mr. Ferrucio Busoni.
"The Death of Tintagiles," symphonic poem, after the drama by Maeterlinck.....Loeffler
(The viole d'amour played by the composer.)
Symphony No. 8, in F major, Op. 93.....Beethoven

SATURDAY AFTERNOON, JAN. 16.

Overture, "Les Barbares"....Saint-Saens
(First time at these concerts.)
Concerto in D major, for violin, Op. 77.....Brahms
Miss Maud MacCarthy.
Ballet music from the opera "Azara": three Moorish dances.....Paine
Symphony No. 3, in A minor (Scotch).
Mendelssohn

Here is the programme for Thursday evening's Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall: Dalbert's Overture to "The Improvisatore" (first time at these concerts); Hensett's piano concerto in F minor, opus 16; Loeffler's symphonic poem, "The Death of Tintagiles" (viola d'amour played by the composer), and Beethoven's eighth symphony. Ferrucio B. Busoni, the Italian pianist, will be the soloist. At the Saturday afternoon concert the Boston orchestra will play Saint-Saens's overture, "Les Barbares" (first time at these concerts); Paine's ballet music from the opera "Azara," and Mendelssohn's Scotch symphony. The soloist, Miss Maud MacCarthy, will perform Brahms's D major violin concerto, opus 77. Special interest attaches to Mr. Paine's music. Mr. Paine is a Harvard professor, and Heinrich Conried has promised to give the opera "Azara" a hearing in the Metropolitan Opera House.

Loeffler is to play on the Viole d'Amour at the Boston Symphony's concert on Thursday evening his symphonia poem, after Maeterlinck, on "The Death of Tintagiles." Saint-Saen's "Barbares" is to be played for the first time at the Saturday afternoon concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra returns to New York this week and will give two concerts at Carnegie Hall, one on Thursday afternoon and another on Saturday afternoon.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to town again in the coming week and give its usual concerts at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At the first the programme will consist of D'Albert's overture to "The Improvisatore," Henselt's F minor piano concerto, Loeffler's "Death of Tintagiles" and Beethoven's eighth symphony. The soloist will be Ferrucio Busoni. At the matinée the programme will be Saint-Saëns's overture, "Les Barbares," Brahms's violin concerto, the ballet music of J. K. Paine's "Azara" and Mendelssohn's Scotch symphony. The soloist will be Maud McCarthy.

Das Bostoner Symphonieorchester giebt in dieser Woche wieder zwei Konzerte in Carnegie Hall. Außer der achten Symphonie von Beethoven wird das Orchester am Donnerstag Abend Loeffler's symphonische Dichtung „Der Tod des Tintagiles" und d'Albert's „Improvisator"-Ouverture spielen. Solist ist Herr Ferrucio Busoni, der seit vielen Jahren nicht mehr in Amerika gehört worden ist. Er wird das Henselt'sche Klavierkonzert vortragen. Am Samstag Nachmittag wird das Orchesterprogramm aus Mendelsohn's Schottischer Symphonie, „Saint-Saens" Ouverture zu den „Barbaren" und Paine's Balletmusik aus der Oper „Azara" bestehen. Als Solistin wird sich Fräulein Maud MacCarthy mit dem Brahms'schen Violinkonzert hören lassen. — Herr Walter Damrosch

---

N.Y. Herald
Jan 10 04.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has arranged interesting programmes for its concerts on next Thursday and Saturday afternoons at Carnegie Hall. On Thursday the list is composed of D'Albert's overture to the opera, "The Improvisatore" (first time at these concerts); Henselt's concerto in F minor, for pianoforte and orchestra, op. 16; Loeffler's "The Death of Tintagiles," symphonic poem, after the drama of Maurice Maeterlinck (the viole d'amour played by the composer); and Beethoven's symphony No. 8, in F major, op. 93. The soloist will be Ferruccio B. Busoni.

On Saturday afternoon the programme will be Saint-Saëns' overture, "Les Barbares" (first time at these concerts); Brahms' concerto in D major, for violin, op. 77; Paine's ballet music from the opera "Azara"; three Moorish dances, and Mendelssohn's symphony No. 3, in A minor (Scotch). Miss Maud MacCarthy will be the soloist.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to New York again this week and will give its two concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening at 8:15 and Saturday afternoon at 2:30. At the Thursday evening concert the soloist will be Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni, pianist, who has been absent from this country about nine years, during which time he has materially increased his name and fame as an artist of the first rank. At the second concert Miss Maud MacCarthy, a young violinist who appeared here last year, will play. The programmes will be as follows:

THURSDAY EVENING.

Overture to the opera, "The Improvisatore" D'Albert
(First time at these concerts.)
Concerto in F minor, for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 16.....Henselt
Mr. Busoni.
"The Death of Tintagiles," symphonic poem after the drama by Maurice Maeterlinck.....Loeffler
(The viole d'amour is played by the composer.)
Symphony No. 8 in F major, Op. 93...Beethoven

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

Overture, "Les Barbares".....Saint-Saens
(First time at these concerts.)
Concerto in D major for violin, Op. 77...Brahms
Miss MacCarthy.
Ballet Music from the opera "Azara":
Three Moorish Dances.....Paine
Symphony No. 3 in A minor (Scotch).....Mendelssohn

D'Albert's opera, "The Improvisatore," was produced at the Royal Opera House in Berlin in February, 1902, and is the sixth of his works for the stage. The music of the overture is said to be carnivalesque and brilliantly orchestrated. Mr. Loeffler's symphonic poem, "The Death of Tintagiles," was composed in 1897, and first performed in 1898. It was heard in New York. In its earliest form it required two obbligato violes d'amour. Mr. Loeffler has since remodeled his score, taking out one viole d'amour part and considerably lessening the importance of the other, so that it now may be considered a purely orchestral work. Maeterlinck's drama is a tragedy concerning a little boy, Tintagiles, his sisters Ygraine and Bellangère; the old and wise Aglovale, their friend, and the three handmaidens of the Queen. It has been said of Mr. Loeffler's music that it "depicts a struggle between two opposing forces—say, the Queen and her handmaidens on the one hand, and Tintagiles and Ygraine on the other; but it does not seek to follow out the drama scene by scene. "There is also the reminder of the storm and the wild night; there is the suggestion of Aglovale, old and scarred and wise and weary, without confidence in his sword; there is the plaintive voice of the timorous child; there are the terrifying steps in the corridor, the steps as of many, who do not walk as other beings, yet they draw near and whisper without the guarded door."

John. K. Paine, who wrote the opera "Azara," from which the ballet music is to be played, is professor of music at Harvard University and one of the foremost of American composers. He wrote both the text and music of "Azara," which was published in 1901. It has not yet been performed upon the stage, but portions of it have been given in concert form. The ballet music is to accompany dances of Moorish dancing girls; some of the themes are of Oriental character, and the instrumentation makes use of "Janizary music" in triangles, tambourines, and cymbals.

Ferruccio Benvenuto Busoni was born at Empoli, near Florence, Italy, April 1, 1866. His mother was a German, and gave him his first piano lessons. A pupil of W. A. Remy (Dr. Mayer) of Graz, he became, in 1882, a member of the famous Philharmonic Academy of Bologna, and was then known as a pianist of uncommon promise and a surprising improviser on given themes.

He had appeared as an infant phenomenon at Vienna in 1876. Dr. Hanslick wondered at the youthful Busoni. He praised his "genuine musical feeling and uncommon memory"; the boy's compositions were "short and good, and yet not so good that they excited the suspicion of a teacher's assistance." And the learned critic speculated wisely concerning Busoni's future.

Busoni then knew his years of wandering. At Leipsic he devoted himself chiefly to composition. In Finland he taught at the Conservatory of Helsingfors, and in that city he met and married the daughter of a sculptor. In 1890 the Rubenstein prize was awarded to Busoni, whose fame was thereby spread abroad. He taught for a time at the Moscow Conservatory; lived for a season in Boston; and then he returned to Europe and made Berlin his home, although as a virtuoso he is known and admired in all European cities.

Among his compositions, which are of the modern romantic school, are a symphonic poem for orchestra, an orchestral suite, overture for a comedy, two string quartets, a violin concerto, concert piece for piano, songs, piano pieces, and some remarkable transcriptions for the piano of organ pieces by Bach. An opera, the work of his earlier years, is still in manuscript. His edition of Bach's "Well-tempered Clavichord" is admirable both from a pedagogical and an aesthetic point of view.

Busoni is a pianist of commanding authority, a man of rare individuality.

[77]

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 13, 1904.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Eleventh Concert—Review by Philip Hale in the Boston Herald.

THE program of the eleventh symphony concert, Mr. Gericke conductor, given last night in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

Overture to The Barbarians (first time).....Saint-Saëns
Rosina's Cavatina, from The Barber of Seville.....Rossini
Symphonic poem, The Wild Huntsman.....Franck
Songs—
Charming Butterfly.....Campra
Why? .....Delibes
Bolero, from The Sicilian Vespers.....Verdi
Symphony in A minor, Scotch.....Mendelssohn

The overture to "The Barbarians" was played for the first time in Boston. It served originally as the prologue to the opera produced in Paris in 1901. After introductory music the stage curtains were drawn apart and the amphitheatre at Orange was disclosed. A Reciter, Delmas, the baritone, appeared and told how Germans invading Gaul before Christ's birth drove all before them; but Floria, the beautiful Vestal, found a way to stop them; and then the Goddess avenged in the blood of the conqueror the sacrilegious sacrifice of Floria's body. There was music in this scene. The curtains closed again, and there was orchestral music to the beginning of the first act. This prologue was arranged by the composer as a concert overture and played at a Colonne concert in Paris, December 1, 1901. Theodore Thomas produced it in Chicago in 1902.

When he was nearly sixty years old Saint-Saëns went back to Grecian and Roman legends for sources of musical inspiration. Cynical, or rather ironical, in his treatment of "Phryne," that glory of a very old and once highly esteemed profession, he was appropriately tragic in the music in "Deianira." Then came "The Barbarians," and the next year the music to "Parysatis," and now his "Helen of Troy" is ready for Monte Carlo. May he be as fortunate with the story of the face "that launched a thousand ships" as was Offenbach. But Saint-Saëns is now in his sixty-ninth year, and his music was never distinguished for sensuous quality or passionate intensity. Perhaps it would be well for him to treat Helen, as Phryne, with courteous irony.

The first opera librettists chose tales and legends of Greece and Rome as well as stories from these mythologies; and for years their example was piously followed. The French musicians, as well as painters, have clung to the classics, and the influence of Latin and Greek literature is observed today even among the symbolists and their disciples, as well as among such neo-pagans as Marcel Schwob and Pierre Louys. Saint-Saëns has tried the historical, the romantic lyric drama, and now he is frankly classical. He has always displayed classic qualities in his opera as well as in his symphonies, symphonic poems, chamber music; simplicity of line, effects of outlines, an avoidance of encumbering detail, discretion in expression. He has now reached the age, alas, if we may judge by the latest works that have been played here, when his facility of expression is far more marked than his invention. "And desire shall fail," said the Preacher, King in Jerusalem. Saint-Saëns, we fear, has reached the evil days when ideas fail.

His qualities of expression are again revealed in this overture, but the ideas are few and unimportant. Where is the potent suggestion of tragedy? Where is the picture of wild invaders and despairing folk? This music is as cold as an ancient, half effaced fresco. Compare with this music of an invading barbaric host the overture to Chabonier's "Gwendoline," an opera with a like subject, for in each an invading hero is captivated by the beauty of a woman. In Saint-Saëns' music there is no rush, no fury. The passion is that of a chess player who believes in his own system of moves. Nor is this music superbly decorative. Let us hope that the thought of Helen of Troy has warmed his blood or at least inspired him to a song of amorous regret.

César Franck's symphonic poem in illustration of Buerger's ballad "The Wild Huntsman" was played here for the third time. It grows in effect with each hearing, yet the opening episode of the Sunday scene and that of the chase still seem the more imaginative. The curse and the wild hunt are not so poignantly portrayed. Franck was first of all a mystic; his best and most characteristic music is that of contemplation, not of action, and least of all demoniac action. He knew how to express admirably the voices complaining of the count's mad chase that brought the curse; for his compassion and love embraced the universe; but what had that pure soul to do with the Wild Huntsman and his hellish attendants? His imagination had to stoop to such a scene. He could no more have written the music for the Wolf's Glen in "Der Freischuetz" or the Evocation of the Nuns in "Robert the Devil" than he could have imagined the song of Charpentier's Louise to her lover, that song both of shy confession and womanly exultation, or the safe scene in "La Bohême." For of Franck it might have been said: "He hath an angel," not "He hath a devil."

Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, like his overture "Fingal's Cave," always gives a certain pleasure. Here we have revealed the talent of Mendelssohn, the talent of the landscapist in music. It is true that, although the composer visited Scotland, he still saw the land as from the top of Sinai. There is still the Jewish feeling that is so appropriate in the music to Racine's tragedy, and, if Mendelssohn had played a bagpipe, no doubt it would have sounded like a shofar. But there is, at all events, a landscape with atmosphere in this symphony, and there is the suggestion of ballads of the border, the thought of "old, unhappy, far off things, and battles long ago." The scherzo is today the freshest of the movements, and that is the one most characteristically Scottish.

Madame Blauvelt, who took at short notice the place of the tempest tossed and delayed Busoni, has a voice of fine quality, which is, however, without pronounced individuality, and makes no personal appeal. She sang fluently and with a certain degree of brilliance the familiar Cavatina from "The Barber." Her production of low tones might be criticised, for the contrast in quality was strongly marked, and one thought of Wordsworth's line, "Two voices are there." This defect was naturally not so noticeable in the group of songs. The song by Campra she sang simply as a well trained singer. She did not suggest the melancholy of it all—the flight of years, the vanity of all things, the inevitable gray days and nights that follow a life of coquetry.

This song has a Watteau character; it has the same melancholy elegance, the same polished recognition of the inherent emptiness of desire. There was more of a personal note, more of emotional revelation in Delibes' song, but the bolero was again merely a study in bravura—and this bolero without orchestral accompaniment is like unto cold veal.

The euphony of the orchestra was as distinguished as ever, and the different compositions were read with the minute attention to detail and with the care for relative proportions that characterize Mr. Gericke as a conductor. Yet there was breadth, there was symphony, and in "The Wild Huntsman" there was the fitting romantic expression.

N. Y. Post Jan 11-04.

Mr. Ferrucio Busoni will be the soloist at Thursday evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. Henselt's F minor concerto will be his number, while the purely orchestral numbers will be D'Albert's "Improvisatore" overture (new), Loeffler's "The Death of "Tintagiles," and Beethoven's eighth symphony. At the Saturday afternoon concert there will be another novelty, the overture to Saint-Saëns's "Les Barbares," besides three Moorish Dances from Paine's opera "Azara" and Mendelssohn's Scotch symphony. The Brahms violin concerto will be played by Miss Maud MacCarthy.

N. Y. Tribune Jan 10-04.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the following programmes at Carnegie Hall this week. Thursday evening:

Overture to the opera, "The Improvisatore".....D'Albert
(First time at these concerts.)
Concerto in F minor, for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 16.....Henselt
"The Death of Tintagiles," symphonic poem after the drama by Maurice Maeterlinck.....Loeffler
(The viole d'amour is played by the composer.)
Symphony No. 8, in F major, Op. 93.....Beethoven
Soloist, Ferruccio B. Busoni.

Saturday afternoon:

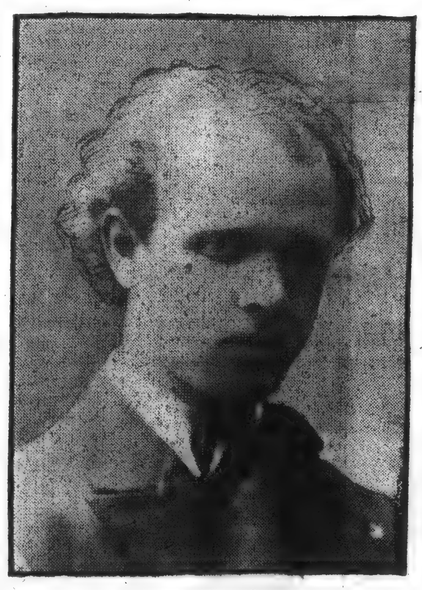
Overture, "Les Barbares".....Saint-Saëns
(First time at these concerts.)
Concerto in D major, for violin, Op. 77.....Brahms
Ballet music from the opera "Azara": Three Moorish dances.....Paine
Symphony No. 8, in A minor (Scotch).....Mendelssohn
Soloist, Miss Maud MacCarthy.

Ferruccio Benvenuto Busoni, who will play at the Boston Symphony concert on Thursday, was born at Empoli, near Florence, Italy, on April 1, 1866. His mother was a German, and gave him his first piano lessons. A pupil of W. A. Remy (Dr. Mayer), of Graz, he became in 1882 a member of the famous Philharmonic Academy of Bologna, and was then known as a pianist of uncommon promise and a surprising improviser on given themes. He had appeared as an infant phenomenon at Vienna in 1876. An infant phenomenon! How many youthful Paganinis are now in the humbler seats of the orchestra! How many successors to Adelina Patti are growing old in the opera chorus! Herod's Slaughter of the Innocents is as nothing to the sacrifice of children by their parents on the altars of ever burning greed or ambition. Dr. Hanslick wondered at the youthful Busoni. He praised his "genuine musical feeling and uncommon memory"; the boy's compositions were "short and good, and yet not so good that they excited the suspicion of a teacher's assistance." And the learned critic speculated wisely concerning Busoni's future.

Busoni then knew his years of wandering. At Leipsic he devoted himself chiefly to composition. In Finland he taught at the Conservatory of Helsingfors, and in this city he met and married the daughter of a sculptor. In 1890 the Rubinstein prize was awarded to Busoni, whose fame was thereby spread abroad. He taught for a time at the Moscow Conservatory; he lived for a season in Boston, and then he returned to Europe and made Berlin his home. Among his compositions, which are of the modern romantic school, are a symphonic poem for orchestra, an orchestral suite, overture for a comedy, two string quartets, a violin concerto, concert-piece for piano, songs, piano pieces and some transcriptions for the piano of organ pieces by Bach. An opera, the work of his earlier years, is still in manuscript. His edition of Bach's "Well-Tempered Clavichord" is admired both from a pedagogical and an æsthetic point of view.

Much has been written about Busoni. It would be easy to reprint pages of glowing and unusual eulogy pronounced in the last ten years by the critics of leading European cities. But the following excerpts from an article written by Marcel Rémy and published in "Le Guide Musical," of Brussels and Paris, on April 13, 1902, it may be, are something more than hysterical praise:

When Busoni takes his seat before the keyboard, remains there a moment in contemplation or as a dreamer before putting his evoking fingers on the sensitive keys, I am filled with a feeling of security. He is about to hurry his hearer into a whirlwind of passionate sensations! he will raise him, dazzled and breathless, to dizzy heights; but he is sure, such a master of himself, that one knows there will be no disagreeable shock, no disconcerting blow, no deception of any kind. No aspiration, no secret yearning awakened by him will be chilled or crushed. Our most subtle desires, supplied with wings by him, will not see their flight checked by a false manœuvre or any want of skill. He will come to our aid when we ourselves are deficient in spirit. For those who know only vaguely the soul of music he determines the precise emotional values; to those who stammer, he speaks clearly; he corrects those who think, influenced by arbitrary tradition, that they know; and to them that have already been moved he shows new phases which he has discovered by reason of his rare intelligence.



PABLO CASALS.
'Cellist who will play with the American Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday.

NORTH AMERICAN, PHILADELPHIA,

TUESDAY, JANUARY 12, 1904.

BOSTON SYMPHONY DELIGHTS HEARERS

Audience at the Academy Thrilled by Ballet Music of "Azara."

OTHER FINE NUMBERS

Three Moorish dances, from the ballet music of the opera "Azara" figured on the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert at the Academy of Music last evening.

A welcome novelty, this purely decorative music, with haunting, melodious themes, developed in rhythmic cadences that set the listeners' feet tap-tapping all through the house. It is characteristic and dramatically suggestive—with half-closed eyes one might fancy the stage all [illegible] with light and sensuous forms gracefully swaying to the intoxicating strains.

Professor Paine, composer of "Azara," is a Harvard University instructor in music. If his opera is as good throughout as this ballet music indicates it ought not to be necessary to send it to Germany for a first production, as is now contemplated.

Miss MacCarthy Won Favor.

Brahms' D major concerto for violin, with Maud MacCarthy as soloist, was agreeably played, with the fine singing quality beloved of unimpassioned souls—pure, sweet and clear, like fairy music borne from afar. Miss MacCarthy is capable and discreet, plays with flawless technique and pure tone, and never lapses into banality. Haydn's C minor symphony and the "Tannhauser" overture were respectively the opening and closing numbers of the programme.

At to-morrow evening's concert the musical novelty will be the overture to D'Albert's opera, "The Improvisatore." On this occasion also Ferruccio Busoni, an Italian pianist of high European repute, will make his first appearance here in Henselt's F minor concerto for pianoforte and orchestra.

[78]

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 13, 1904.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Eleventh Concert—Review by Philip Hale in the Boston Herald.

THE program of the eleventh symphony concert, Mr. Gericke conductor, given last night in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

Overture to The Barbarians (first time).....Saint-Saens
Rosina's Cavatina, from The Barber of Seville.....Rossini
Symphonic poem, The Wild Huntsman.....Franck
Songs—
Charming Butterfly.....Campra
Why?.....Delibes
Bolero, from The Sicilian Vespers.....Verdi
Symphony in A minor, Scotch.....Mendelssohn

The overture to "The Barbarians" was played for the first time in Boston. It served originally as the prologue to the opera produced in Paris in 1901. After introductory music the stage curtains were drawn apart and the amphitheatre at Orange was disclosed. A Reciter, Delmas, the baritone, appeared and told how Germans invading Gaul before Christ's birth drove all before them; but Floria, the beautiful Vestal, found a way to stop them; and then the Goddess avenged in the blood of the conqueror the sacrilegious sacrifice of Floria's body. There was music in this scene. The curtains closed again, and there was orchestral music to the beginning of the first act. This prologue was arranged by the composer as a concert overture and played at a Colonne concert in Paris, December 1, 1901. Theodore Thomas produced it in Chicago in 1902.

When he was nearly sixty years old Saint-Saëns went back to Grecian and Roman legends for sources of musical inspiration. Cynical, or rather ironical, in his treatment of "Phryne," that glory of a very old and once highly esteemed profession, he was appropriately tragic in the music in "Deianira." Then came "The Barbarians," and the next year the music to "Parysatis," and now his "Helen of Troy" is ready for Monte Carlo. May he be as fortunate with the story of the face "that launched a thousand ships" as was Offenbach. But Saint-Saëns is now in his sixty-ninth year, and his music was never distinguished for sensuous quality or passionate intensity. Perhaps it would be well for him to treat Helen, as Phryne, with courteous irony.

The first opera librettists chose tales and legends of Greece and Rome as well as stories from these mythologies; and for years their example was piously followed. The French musicians, as well as painters, have clung to the classics, and the influence of Latin and Greek literature is observed today even among the symbolists and their disciples, as well as among such neo-pagans as Marcel Schwob and Pierre Louys. Saint-Saëns has tried the historical, the romantic lyric drama, and now he is frankly classical. He has always displayed classic qualities in his opera as well as in his symphonies, symphonic poems, chamber music; simplicity of line, effects of outlines, an avoidance of encumbering detail, discretion in expression. He has now reached the age, alas, if we may judge by the latest works that have been played here, when his facility of expression is far more marked than his invention. "And desire shall fail," said the Preacher, King in Jerusalem. Saint-Saëns, we fear, has reached the evil days when ideas fail.

His qualities of expression are again revealed in this overture, but the ideas are few and unimportant. Where is the potent suggestion of tragedy? Where is the picture of wild invaders and despairing folk? This music is as cold as an ancient, half effaced fresco. Compare with this music of an invading barbaric host the overture to Chabonier's "Gwendoline," an opera with a like subject, for in each an invading hero is captivated by the beauty of a woman. In Saint-Saëns' music there is no rush, no fury. The passion is that of a chess player who believes in his own system of moves. Nor is this music superbly decorative. Let us hope that the thought of Helen of Troy has warmed his blood or at least inspired him to a song of amorous regret.

César Franck's symphonic poem, an illustration of Buerger's ballad "The Wild Huntsman" was played here for the third time. It grows in effect with each hearing, yet the opening episode of the Sunday scene and that of the chase still seem the more imaginative. The curse and the wild hunt are not so poignantly portrayed. Franck was first of all a mystic; his best and most characteristic music is that of contemplation, not of action, and least of all demoniac action. He knew how to express admirably the voices complaining of the count's mad chase that brought the curse; for his compassion and love embraced the universe; but what had that pure soul to do with the Wild Huntsman and his hellish attendants? His imagination had to stoop to such a scene. He could no more have written the music for the Wolf's Glen in "Der Freischuetz" or the Evocation of the Nuns in "Robert the Devil" than he could have imagined the song of Charpentier's Louise to her lover, that song both of shy confession and womanly exultation, or the safe scene in "La Bohême." For of Franck it might have been said: "He hath an angel," not "He hath a devil."

Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, like his overture "Fingal's Cave," always gives a certain pleasure. Here we have revealed the talent of Mendelssohn, the talent of the landscapist in music. It is true that, although the composer visited Scotland, he still saw the land as from the top of Sinai. There is still the Jewish feeling that is so appropriate in the music to Racine's tragedy, and, if Mendelssohn had played a bagpipe, no doubt it would have sounded like a shofar. But there is, at all events, a landscape with atmosphere in this symphony, and there is the suggestion of ballads of the border, the thought of "old, unhappy, far off things, and battles long ago." The scherzo is today the freshest of the movements, and that is the one most characteristically Scottish.

Madame Blauvelt, who took at short notice the place of the tempest tossed and delayed Busoni, has a voice of fine quality, which is, however, without pronounced individuality, and makes no personal appeal. She sang fluently and with a certain degree of brilliance the familiar Cavatina from "The Barber." Her production of low tones might be criticised, for the contrast in quality was strongly marked, and one thought of Wordsworth's line, "Two voices are there." This defect was naturally not so noticeable in the group of songs. The song by Campra she sang simply as a well trained singer. She did not suggest the melancholy of it all—the flight of years, the vanity of all things, the inevitable gray days and nights that follow a life of coquetry.

This song has a Watteau character; it has the same melancholy elegance, the same polished recognition of the inherent emptiness of desire. There was more of a personal note, more of emotional revelation in Delibes' song, but the bolero was again merely a study in bravura—and this bolero without orchestral accompaniment is like unto cold veal.

The euphony of the orchestra was as distinguished as ever, and the different compositions were read with the minute attention to detail and with the care for relative proportions that characterize Mr. Gericke as a conductor. Yet there was breadth, there was symphony, and in "The Wild Huntsman" there was the fitting romantic expression.

N. Y. Post Jan. 11-04.

Mr. Ferrucio Busoni will be the soloist at Thursday evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. Henselt's F minor concerto will be his number, while the purely orchestral numbers will be D'Albert's "Improvisatore" overture (new), Loeffler's "The Death of "Tintagiles," and Beethoven's eighth symphony. At the Saturday afternoon concert there will be another novelty, the overture to Saint-Saëns's "Les Barbares," besides three Moorish Dances from Paine's opera "Azara" and Mendelssohn's Scotch symphony. The Brahms violin concerto will be played by Miss Maud MacCarthy.

N. Y. Tribune
Jan. 10-04.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the following programmes at Carnegie Hall this week. Thursday evening:

Overture to the opera, "The Improvisatore"....D'Albert
(First time at these concerts.)
Concerto in F minor, for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 16.....Henselt
"The Death of Tintagiles," symphonic poem after the drama by Maurice Maeterlinck.....Loeffler
(The viole d'amour is played by the composer.)
Symphony No. 8, in F major, Op. 93.....Beethoven
Soloist, Ferruccio B. Busoni.

Saturday afternoon:

Overture, "Les Barbares".....Saint-Saëns
(First time at these concerts.)
Concerto in D major, for violin, Op. 77.....Brahms
Ballet music from the opera "Azara": Three Moorish dances.....Paine
Symphony No. 8, in A minor (Scotch).....Mendelssohn
Soloist, Miss Maud MacCarthy.

Ferruccio Benvenuto Busoni, who will play at the Boston Symphony concert on Thursday, was born at Empoli, near Florence, Italy, on April 1, 1866. His mother was a German, and gave him his first piano lessons. A pupil of W. A. Remy (Dr. Mayer), of Graz, he became in 1882 a member of the famous Philharmonic Academy of Bologna, and was then known as a pianist of uncommon promise and a surprising improviser on given themes. He had appeared as an infant phenomenon at Vienna in 1876. An infant phenomenon! How many youthful Paganinis are now in the humbler seats of the orchestra! How many successors to Adelina Patti are growing old in the opera chorus! Herod's Slaughter of the Innocents is as nothing to the sacrifice of children by their parents on the altars of ever burning greed or ambition. Dr. Hanslick wondered at the youthful Busoni. He praised his "genuine musical feeling and uncommon memory"; the boy's compositions were "short and good, and yet not so good that they excited the suspicion of a teacher's assistance." And the learned critic speculated wisely concerning Busoni's future.

Busoni then knew his years of wandering. At Leipsic he devoted himself chiefly to composition. In Finland he taught at the Conservatory of Helsingfors, and in this city he met and married the daughter of a sculptor. In 1890 the Rubinstein prize was awarded to Busoni, whose fame was thereby spread abroad. He taught for a time at the Moscow Conservatory; he lived for a season in Boston, and then he returned to Europe and made Berlin his home. Among his compositions, which are of the modern romantic school, are a symphonic poem for orchestra, an orchestral suite, overture for a comedy, two string quartets, a violin concerto, concertpiece for piano, songs, piano pieces and some transcriptions for the piano of organ pieces by Bach. An opera, the work of his earlier years, is still in manuscript. His edition of Bach's "Well-Tempered Clavichord" is admired both from a pedagogical and an æsthetic point of view.

Much has been written about Busoni. It would be easy to reprint pages of glowing and unusual eulogy pronounced in the last ten years by the critics of leading European cities. But the following excerpts from an article written by Marcel Rémy and published in "Le Guide Musical," of Brussels and Paris, on April 13, 1902, it may be, are something more than hysterical praise:

When Busoni takes his seat before the keyboard, remains there a moment in contemplation or as a dreamer before putting his evoking fingers on the sensitive keys, I am filled with a feeling of security. He is about to hurry his hearer into a whirlwind of passionate sensations! he will raise him, dazzled and breathless, to dizzy heights; but he is sure, such a master of himself, that one knows there will be no disagreeable shock, no disconcerting blow, no deception of any kind. No aspiration, no secret yearning awakened by him will be chilled or crushed. Our most subtle desires, supplied with wings by him, will not see their flight checked by a false manœuvre or any want of skill. He will come to our aid when we ourselves are deficient in spirit. For those who know only vaguely the soul of music he determines the precise emotional values; to those who stammer, he speaks clearly; he corrects those who think, influenced by arbitrary tradition, that they know; and to them that have already been moved he shows new phases which he has discovered by reason of his rare intelligence.

PABLO CASALS,
'Cellist who will play with the American Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday.

NORTH AMERICAN, PHILADELPHIA,
TUESDAY, JANUARY 12, 1904.

BOSTON SYMPHONY DELIGHTS HEARERS

Audience at the Academy Thrilled by Ballet Music of "Azara."

OTHER FINE NUMBERS

Three Moorish dances, from the ballet music of the opera "Azara" figured on the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert at the Academy of Music last evening.

A welcome novelty, this—purely decorative music, with haunting, melodious themes, developed in rhythmic cadences that set the listeners' feet tap-tapping all through the house. It is characteristic and dramatically suggestive—with half-closed eyes one might fancy the stage all ablaze with light and sensuous forms gracefully swaying to the intoxicating strains.

Professor Paine, composer of "Azara," is a Harvard University instructor in music. If his opera is as good throughout as this ballet music indicates it ought not to be necessary to send it to Germany for a first production, as is now contemplated.

Miss MacCarthy Won Favor.

Brahms' D major concerto for violin, with Maud MacCarthy as soloist, was agreeably played, with the fine singing quality beloved of unimpassioned souls—pure, sweet and clear, like fairy music borne from afar. Miss MacCarthy is capable and discreet, plays with flawless technique and pure tone, and never lapses into banality. Haydn's C minor symphony and the "Tannhauser" overture were respectively the opening and closing numbers of the programme.

At to-morrow evening's concert the musical novelty will be the overture to D'Albert's opera, "The Improvisatore." On this occasion also Ferruccio Busoni, an Italian pianist of high European repute, will make his first appearance here in Henselt's F minor concerto for pianoforte and orchestra.

[78]

SPRINGFIELD SUNDAY REPUBLICAN: JANUARY 10, 1904.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Program for the Concert to be Given in Court Square Theater the 18th—The Italian Pianist, Busoni.

The tickets for the concert to be given Monday evening, the 18th, in Court Square theater by the Boston symphony orchestra, will be put on sale to-morrow morning at Taylor's music house, and there should be enough interest in this most notable event of the musical season to insure a crowded house. This will be the first concert given in this city since the resignation of Mr Kneisel and the filling of his place by Mr Arbos. Last year Mr Kneisel conducted the concert here, on account of Mr Gericke's illness. This time Mr Gericke will himself conduct, for the first time in this city in many years. The program is interesting in itself, and one in which Mr Gericke is likely to be at his best as an interpreter. The "Academic overture" by Brahms, with its effective use of German student songs, is a favorite concert piece, but is unfamiliar to the concert-going public here. The "Peer Gynt" suite, however, has been heard repeatedly at festivals, and always with delight. In piano transcription these imaginative and poetical fantasies upon Ibsen's great drama are the joy of all amateurs of music.

FERRUCCIO B. BUSONI.

The D major symphony by Beethoven, No 2, is one of the minor symphonies among the immortal nine, but any of them is worth a place in a program, and the selection of this is in one respect fortunate, in that it has been heard here less frequently than most of the others. The soloist will be the eminent Italian pianist, Ferruccio B. Busoni, who has never played in this city, and whose appearance will be looked forward to with the greatest interest. He will play this very brilliant and melodious F minor concerto by Henselt, which is one of the famous works of its genre, but has somehow been neglected on local programs, so that it is probably unfamiliar to most of those who are not specialists in piano music. The full program is as follows:—

Academic overture .....Brahms
Concerto in F minor .....Henselt
Sonata, "Purzyni" .....Grieg
Symphony in D, No 2 .....Beethoven

PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER, JANUARY 12, 1904

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, gave the third in its current series of Monday evening concerts at the Academy of Music last evening. An effectively varied and extremely enjoyable program had been prepared for the occasion. It ranged from the blithe ingenuousness, from the sweet and graceful, if somewhat shallow, sentiment, and from the sparkling simplicity of Haydn's symphony in C minor, B. and H. No. 9, to the sweep and surge and romantic passion of the "Tannhauser" overture, and from the languorous, sensuous charms of Paine's "Moorish Dances" to the noble dignity of the great violin concerto composed by Brahms for Joseph Joachim; and all the demands it made upon its executants, whether in the way of technical skill, of intellectual apprehension or of emotional eloquence, were constantly, impressively and triumphantly satisfied. Miss Maud McCarthy, who was the soloist, scarcely possesses the power and breadth which are needed for a fully adequate interpretation of Brahms' splendid but exacting score. Yet she played with a surprising degree of force and brilliancy, and she exhibited a technical equipment which was easily equal to the by no means inconsiderable difficulties of the music. The very hearty applause which she elicited was well deserved. The Orchestra will be heard again at the Academy to-morrow evening, when the program will include d'Albert's "Improvisatore" overture, Cesar Franck's "Chasseur Maudit," the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven, the one with the favorite allegretto, and Henselt's concerto for the pianoforte in F minor, to be played by that distinguished artist, Ferruccio B. Busoni.

FERRUCCIO B. BUSONI.

PUBLIC LEDGER—PHILADELPHIA, JANUARY 12, 1904.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Third Monday Concert, With Maud MacCarthy as Soloist, Given.

The third of this season's series of Monday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Wilhelm Gericke, took place yesterday in the Academy of Music, when the following programme was presented:

Symphony in C minor.....Haydn
Violin Concerto in D major.....Brahms
Three Moorish Dances, Ballet from "Azara."
Paine
Overture, "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Soloist, Miss Maud McCarthy.

The Haydn symphony, with which the concert opened, is one of those delightful bits of the classic music that this splendid organization plays supremely well, and the performance of last evening was one of particular interest, in that it has been some time since we have heard any of the symphonies of this early "master in music." The C minor symphony is very short, opening with an allegro that is decidedly Mozartian in its characteristics, and rather lacking in the pure melody that we generally associate with Haydn, but it was interpreted with some spirit and is an interesting introduction to the andante which follows. This cantabile movement is little more than a theme with variations, but it was executed with exquisite daintiness, although it seems extraordinarily thin after the work of the more modern composers that we have been hearing so much of of late. It was not until the third movement, however, the fascinating and familiar minuette, that one really began to feel the spirit of Haydn, and this, with its beautiful solo for the first cello and the lovely pizzacati accompaniment of strings, was one of the most effective numbers of the whole evening. The last movement, essentially characteristic of the composer, was a perfect delight. It is a fine example of so-called "pure music," happy, melodic, spirited, and in this number the brilliant performance of the orchestra left little to be desired.

Another number for the orchestra that was not without interest was the ballet music from Paine's opera, "Azara," consisting of three Moorish dances. This had the charm that ballet music, played by a great band of this character, always has. While the three numbers which made up the group are devoid of any particular originality, the themes are sufficiently Oriental in character to be suggestive, and the orchestration is so rich in coloring that it made an agreeable diversion before the rendition of the familiar "Tannhauser" overture, with which the concert closed. This is a fine concert number, always satisfying, and proved one of the most interesting things in the evening's entertainment. Mr. Gericke interprets it in the more conventional manner of the early conductors, but the great body of strings is so rich and vivid in its effect that it was a delight to hear, and is one of the things that will always stand out in the memory.

The soloist of the evening was Maud MacCarthy, a youthful violinist, born in Ireland, although her parents were from New South Wales. She studied in England under Mr. Arbos, the present concertmeister of the orchestra, before he became associated with the Boston organization. She was heard in the wonderful Brahms D major concerto, an extraordinary romantic and stirring composition, which she has hardly the strength to carry with any great effect.

The violin part of the first movement is little more than an obligato to a very interesting groundwork of the orchestra. Indeed, it is a curious work, as the solo violin is not heard for many bars after the opening of the first movement until the soloist suddenly starts in with an elaborated cadenza, and afterward plays a sort of running and sentimental accompaniment to the whole. Miss MacCarthy's tone is small, and almost throughout the first movement she seemed hardly at ease until the exquisite interpolated second cadenza was reached, when she was heard at her best, playing this difficult passage with power and an extraordinary sweetness which was unusually effective. The adagio which followed is a work of real romance, and in this the young player was heard to better advantage, playing with greater ease, although she never at any time again exhibited the sentiment and romantic feeling that was suggested by her performance of the short passage in the preceding movement. In the difficult last movement she displayed no little technical ability, but her playing was small, and was done with a decided effort. She never at any time showed the assurance and authority which the greatness of the concerto demands.

PHILADELPHIA PRESS, JANUARY 12, 1904.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Fine Program Splendidly Rendered—Miss MacCarthy the Soloist.

At the Academy of Music last night "Papa" Haydn, as Mozart loved to call the kindly old gentleman, dominated the program of the third concert, first series, of the Boston Orchestra. The numbers read were pleasing in contrast and adequately met all demands on the score of old-fashioned propriety, modernity in academic adherence to form, and the antithesis to the foregoing in the free treatment of the romanticism of the closing numbers. The program was as follows:—

Haydn ..Symphony in C minor (B. & H., No. 9)
Brahms..Concerto in D major, for Violin, Opp. 7(
Paine,
Ballet Music from the opera "Azara;" Three Moorish Dances.
Wagner .....Overture to "Tannhauser"
Soloist,
Miss Maud MacCarthy.

It has been a long time since one has heard the serene music of Haydn, and in the symphony that Mr. Gericke read last night one had a typical example of the composer's creative mind, in his development of the sonata form that he received from Emanuel Bach. Indeed, Haydn must be considered as the father of the quartet and the symphony, and, in fact, the later symphonists have failed to carry the form beyond the full-orbed symmetry of the composer of the C minor.

Then, again, in the charming work that was given last evening Haydn's perception of the capacities of instrument, subtle distribution of parts, variety in treating themes and charmingly legitimate effects were obvious to the most superficial of music lovers. Not the least interesting of the movements was the trio of the minuetto, in which the new first cellist was given an opportunity to exploit his qualities as a master of the most difficult of all bow instruments, and it is needless to say that the young cellist acquitted himself with distinction.

Mr. Gericke is to be thanked for giving his audience an opportunity of hearing the beautiful "Moorish" dances, music that throbs with the voluptuous rhythms of the East. Mr. Paine has certainly caught the amorous spirit of the Orient and painted its varied expression with a full brush, in which the drawing is by no means obscured. The second dance, the pooo meno mosso, is particularly fetching in the languorous quality of its measures, to which an accent of tender pathos is given by the English horn in the introductory passages.

Miss MacCarthy undoubtedly possesses talent of a high order, but it must be confessed that the Brahms concerto is hardly her metier as yet. It is distinctly virile in quality and requires for its complete expression a technical equipment that represents complete mastery. This by no means implies that the young lady failed to impress her audience with the worth of her virtuosity, but if any sentiment is to be found in the devitalized emotionalism of Brahms the fair violinist failed to discover it. However, the message of the composition is no doubt the real thing to the Brahmsite, and one will leave the question to the elect for answer.

The ever-popular overture to "Tannhauser" was given with that fullness of expression that characterizes the work of the Boston Orchestra and brought to a close one of the most delightful of their many interesting concerts.

PHILADELPHIA RECORD, JANUARY 12, 1904.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Playing of a Young Violinist the Feature of the Evening.

Interest in the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening centred in the playing of a young Irish violinist, Miss Maud MacCarthy, who was heard in Brahms' Concerto in D Major, an exceedingly difficult piece of music written for Josef Joachim, and which even that famous violinist is said to have had difficulty in playing at its first performance in 1879. Miss MacCarthy's rendering showed her to have a technique which carried her over the difficulties with ease. Her tone, though at times lacking a little in volume (a minor fault due, doubtless, to her youth), was delightfully clear and true, so that it was a pleasure to listen to her playing. The other numbers on the program require little special mention. The symphony was Haydn's in C Minor. The ballet music from the opera "Azara," by John Knowles Paine, professor of music at Harvard University (the work itself has not yet been produced), has considerable orchestral coloring and is pleasing enough as light music, but contains nothing particularly original, a fact accentuated by the familiar Tannhauser overture with which the evening's entertainment concluded.

EVENING TELEGRAPH—PHILADELPHIA, JANUARY 12, 1904.

Boston Symphony Orchestra at Academy of Music.

An unusually meagre audience attended the third concert of the first series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening, a rather uninteresting programme and many theatrical rivals being doubtless the cause.

The only novelty on the programme was three Moorish Dances from the unpublished opera "Azara," by the American composer, John Knowles Paine, Professor of Music at Harvard University. These dances, which are a part of the ballet music of the opera, are thoroughly modern in character and orchestration, being sufficiently vague and formless to satisfy the demands of the most ultra modern, and in so far as the mind of a twentieth century American can create Oriental music, these dances are characteristic and original.

The real attraction of the evening was the appearance of the young Irish violiniste, Miss Maud MacCarthy, who, while not an entire stranger here, is not known to the general public.

Miss MacCarthy, who is not yet 20 years of age, was a pupil in London of Fernandez Arbos, the present concert master of the Boston Orchestra, and she delighted the audience almost as much by her charming personality as by her truly masterly playing of the Brahms D major concerto. Miss MacCarthy has not yet acquired sufficient power for orchestra work, but her tone is sweet and absolutely true and her technical ability beyond question. She played the difficult double-stopping arpeggios, harmonics, and florid running passages easily and accurately, and if the closing of the phrases was not always finished and distinct, the attack was strong and vigorous.

The other numbers on the programme were a Haydn C minor symphony, played with all the effervescence of spirit so essential to Haydn, and the "Tannhauser" overture. The work of the orchestra was, as always, exquisite in every detail.

The programme for the Wednesday concert will be D'Albert's overture to the opera "The Improvisatore"; Cesar Franck's Poeme Symphonique "Le Chasseur Mandit"; Beethoven's 8th symphony; and Hinselt's F minor concerto for piano, with Mr. Terruccio Busoni as soloist.

BALTIMORE HERALD, JANUARY 13, 1904.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Third Concert by the Well Known Orchestra Not Entirely Satisfactory.

In the third Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, which was given last night at the Lyric, the expectations aroused by the program were not fully satisfied, partly because a change in the soloist, and consequently in the program, was made, and partly because the rearing of the entire program was not entirely satisfactory. It is not often that the Boston organization has found it necessary to change the soloist, but upon this occasion M. Busoni, who was announced, did not arrive in the country in time, and Madame Antoinette Szumowska, pianist, replaced him.

Madame Szumowska is a pianist of much temperament and refinement, possessing technical qualifications of a high order and a fine conception of the romantic in music.

The orchestra was note perfect, and Mr. Gericke, the conductor, directed the notes, but omitted all interpretation and warmth.

In the symphony, Beethoven No. 8, Mr. Gericke showed to better advantage, and gave it a highly finished reading. It was in Loeffler's "The Death of Tintagiles" that the director exhibited the greatest amount of animation. The viole d'amour part was played by the composer.

BALTIMORE AMERICAN.

JANUARY 13, 1904.

BOSTON SYMPHONY DELIGHTED AUDIENCE

Mme. Antoinette Szumowska Appeared as Soloist, in Place of Ferruccio Busoni.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert for this season last evening at the Lyric under the direction of Wilhelm Gericke, its program consisting of:

Overture to the opera "The Barbarians." Saint-Saens
(First time in Baltimore.)
"The Death of Tintagiles," symphonic poem after the drama by Maurice Maeterlinck. Loeffler
(The viole d'amour played by the composer.)
Symphony No. 8, in F major, op. 93. Beethoven
I. Allegro vivace e con brio.
II. Allegretto scherzando.
III. Tempo di menuetto.
IV. Allegro vivace.

The soloist was to have been Ferruccio Busoni, but he did not arrive from Italy in time to take part in the concert, and Mme. Antoinette Szumowska was called to take his place at very short notice. She presented the beautiful A minor concerto by R. Schumann and gave it a most charming interpretation. The work is well known in Baltimore, having been played here formerly by Prof. Carl Faelten almost as many times as Mme. Auerbach had given Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto.

No work could have been chosen more suited to the liking of the audience. Its first movement is in free fantasia form, and the first chord suggests the opening of a box of fine jewels, the musical subjects fairly sparkling as they are turned hither and thither in musical light. No work better displays Schumann's peculiar and wonderful genius. The dainty charm of the intermezzo meme movement is practically matchless, while the rollicking allegro vivace finale sets a musical temperament thoroughly aflame. Madame Szumowska was recalled several times very enthusiastically, and there was evidently no regret that Schumann had been unavoidably substituted for Henselt.

In his program Mr. Gericke presented two novelties in the Saint-Saëns overture to the "Barbarians" and the symphonic poem by Mr. Loeffler, a composer member of the orchestra. The success of the latter work shows that it is not necessary for a composer to be dead in order to well received. Mr. Loeffler not only composed the fine work, but played the solo viole d'amour himself. The poem was suggested by the Maeterlinck drama for marionettes entitled "The Death of Tintagiles," and while it musically illustrates the drama it need not be interpreted by it, as it may stand for the perpetual struggle between [illegible] powerful ignorance, as the continuance of the most beautiful things of [illegible] they are gradually but certainly overpowered by the shadows of change, darkness and death.

One technical peculiarity of the poem is the very favorable treatment received by the beautiful but much neglected viola. Mr. Loeffler shares with Berlioz in his preference for this instrument, as the great French composer gave to the solo work of its Harold Symphony. Storm and stress prevails agony in the poem, and Mr. Gericke seemed to think it was to end his concert with Beethoven's ever beautiful Eighth Symphony, which, after the prevailing gloom of the evening, landed the listener safely back in the everlasting works of the classic period. Beethoven called the third his "Eroica symphony," while before he composed the fifth he called the seventh his "great symphony." If Beethoven had a pet symphony it was undoubtedly the [illegible] when he directed it he was [illegible] as a pet and never [illegible] Beethoven's own estimation of his work [illegible] pas. So years became so the [illegible] of the public [illegible] favorite.

PHILADELPHIA RECORD

JANUARY 14, 1904.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Ferruccio Busoni the Soloist of a Splendid Concert.

The program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert last evening at the Academy consisted in the main of just such music in the interpretation of which Mr. Gericke has few equals. To particularize, Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, which closed the concert, proved again, as it has many times in the past, to be exactly suited to the abilities of the orchestra as trained by its exacting, scholarly, but rather unemotional conductor. It is somewhat late in the day to emphasize such a familiar concert work as this so-called "little" or "metronomic" symphony as the feature of a program, and yet by its almost flawless rendition last evening it seemed quite to overshadow its musical associates. Its exquisite delicacy, its melodic richness and its high value as what is somewhat technically known as "pure music" were fittingly and utterly realized by Mr. Gericke's organization.

Despite the evident domination of Beethoven, however, the evening's feature as emphatically billed was Ferruccio Busoni, the noted Italian pianist. He played Henselt's tuneful but not especially inspired concerto in F minor, disclosing therein an expert technique and a peculiarly satisfying ease and fluency of style that largely compensated for a certain undefinable lack of temperament. Busoni will doubtless never be among the supreme masters of his chosen instrument, but his work will none the less be in the highest degree acceptable. The two other numbers on the program were D'Albert's overture to the opera "The Improvisatore," a bright, carnivalesque affair, and Caesar Francke's magnificent tone picture (symphonic poem, to be exact), "Le Chasseur Maudit." There was at times an unmistakable and characteristic lack of freedom about the rendition of this noble work, but on the whole it was very worthily played.

THE SUN, BALTIMORE.

JANUARY 13, 1904.

EIGHTH SYMPHONY THRILLS

Feature Of The Boston Orchestra's Performance.

The important feature of the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at the Lyric was the playing of Beethoven's eighth symphony. This is not one of the most famous of the nine, but whether because of the very feverish music which preceded the symphony or because of the extraordinary performance it has rarely sounded more impressive.

Possibly both reasons counted. The early part of the concert was certainly unclassical, possibly over-modern, and Mr. Gericke, when he reached the symphony, seemed to breathe a fresher, healthier air. In any case he gave a reading of the symphony which was admirable. It erred, perhaps, on the side of not being as serious as it might have been, but the Eighth is not one of the tragic or, perhaps, even heroic symphonies.

The men were entirely in sympathy with the conductor and there resulted such a spirited and unanimous performance as is exceptional even with this organization.

It seemed a strange thing in the history of the Boston Orchestra that the management should be compelled to announce a substitute soloist. Such slips are very rare, but Mr. Busoni, the eminent pianist, had not arrived from Europe and Mme. Szumowska took his place at very short notice.

It was a disappointment not to hear the Italian-German pianist. At one time he was a resident in America, but not until his return to Europe did he come into his present fame as one of the world's great artists.

Mme. Szumowska substituted the Schumann piano concerto for the Henselt concerto and gave considerable pleasure by her playing. She plays with a great deal of charm, but last night there were many passages which seemed blurred and which failed to give the impression which the composer and doubtless the pianist intended.

The first selection of the program was the overture to Saint-Saëns' "Les Barbares." This was a delightful novelty and one which will well repay repetition. The opera, which was produced in Paris two years ago, was not a notable success, but the overture contains much that is very interesting. At no time this year have the strings of the orchestra sounded so well as in this selection. It also afforded the new concert-master, Mr. Arbos, a brief but exquisite solo. A home product filled up the remainder of the program—Loeffler's symphonic poem, "The Death of Tintagiles." Mr. Loeffler has for years, until the present season, sat at the first desk among the first violins. Some of his compositions have been heard before in Baltimore, but none has been so impressive as the symphonic poem given last night.

It is based upon the drama of the Flemish dramatist, Maurice Maeterlinck. Ten years ago this writer was spoken of as the Belgian Shakespeare, but he did not touch a popular chord until within the past year, when his "Monna Vanna" set the world talking. His earlier works, doubtless, have a rarer literary quality, but they have not touched the popular fancy.

So it is with Mr. Loeffler's musical version of his little play. There are many passages which will appeal strongly to the cultivated musician, but, as a whole, the work does not make the impression that its excellent workmanship and unusual imaginative qualities should gain for it.

Mr. Loeffler is a very refined and thoughtful musician. There are moments of great beauty in his symphonic poem, but at times the attention flags and it is difficult to determine just what the passage signifies in connection with the dramatic story. The solo part for viole d'amour was played by the composer. The work was received with many marks of approval.

Doubtless Mr. Gericke has reasons for putting the symphony at the close of the program, but as no amount of remonstrance apparently will cause him to change its position it would satisfy the curiosity of a large number of subscribers if he would reveal why he sticks to this method of arranging a concert.

The complete program follows:

Saint-Saëns—Overture to the opera "The Barbarians."
(First time in Baltimore.)
Schumann—Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra.
Loeffler—"The Death of Tintagiles," symphonic poem after the drama by Maurice Maeterlinck.
(The viole d'amour is played by the composer.)
Beethoven—Symphony No. 8, in F Major, Op. 93.
I. Allegro vivace e con brio.
II. Allegretto scherzando.
III. Tempo di menuetto.
IV. Allegro vivace.

T. S. B.

Another Fine Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

The recitals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have long since become so fixed a feature in New York's musical life that a large and appreciative audience is always assured. The recital last night at Carnegie Hall proved no exception to this rule. To comment upon the finished work of the orchestra itself would be but to repeat oft sung praises.

Mr. Gericke conducted last night, as usual. Following a familiar precedent, the orchestra offered comparatively few selections, but these, for their unusual length, occupied rather more than the time generally allotted for these concerts. Two decided novelties were offered last night.

The soloist, Mr. Ferruccio Benvenuto Busoni, made his debut as a star. He played Henselt's concerto in F minor for pianoforte and orchestra, and was enthusiastically received, at the end refusing repeated encores. The enthusiasm at the close of the concerto recalled the scenes of enthusiasm at the Paderewski recitals.

D'Albert's overture to the opera, "The Improvisatore," was also heard for the first time at these concerts. Another selection especially well received was Charles Martin Loeffler's "The Death of Tintagiles," a symphonic poem after a drama by Maurice Maeterlinck.

The viol d'amore was played by the composer, arousing particular enthusiasm. The concert closed with the rendition of Beethoven's Symphony No. 8 in F major.

PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER

JANUARY 14, 1904

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Is Heard in a Very Enjoyable Program

The concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening as the third in its current second series was one of the most enjoyable that the season has thus far produced. It may be said of D'Albert's overture of "The Improvisatore," which was played for the first time in this city, that the only disappointing thing about it is its brevity. It is not a severe or dignified composition. It neither scales any great heights of intelligence nor sounds and profound depth of emotion; but it is so bright and gay and melodious and compact, it is so rich in striking phrases and effective contrasts, it makes such a strong appeal to the ear and to the spiprits that its performance was a real delight. If the whole opera to which it is the prelude is as good as that it is to be hoped that some enterprising manager may give the public an opportunity of hearing it.

The other two orchestral numbers were Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Le Chasseur Maudit," and the eighth symphony of Beethoven. Franck's music is frankly descriptive, and the description is so long drawn out that while it is not devoid of interest and impressiveness, and while it exhibits an extraordinary ingenuity in the selection, use and combination of the instruments, it ends by becoming rather tiresome. A bad hunter who has been accursed, and who, while the sweet church bells are sounding on the peaceful Sabbath morn, is hastening to the doom which is the appropriate reward for his impiety, ought, at the pace he travels, arrive at his destination in less than a quarter of an hour. There is really not sufficient material in his experience to sustain or justify the extent to which it has been developed. However, it served to illustrate the virtuosity of the orchestra, which was strikingly and successfully displayed. It is unnecessary to do more than mention the eighth symphony. Enough to say that it was, as always, an unalloyed delight, and that it was interpreted with an exquisite delicacy of appreciation and refinement of performance.

The assisting artist was Mr. Feruccio B. Busoni, the pianist, who was heard in the F minor concerto of Henselt. Busoni is a remarkably fine player. He combines power and sweetness to an entirely exceptional degree, and one does not know which to admire most about his work—the grace and eloquence and suavity of his cantabile passages or the power of his fortissimo chords. He gave a rendering of Henselt concerto which was full of emotional expressiveness and an intellectual power, and which produced a deeply favorable impression. Mr. Busoni was several times recalled, and the audience would have liked an encore, but as this is against the rules it was not granted. But the applause did not cease until the removal of the piano indicated the futility of its demand.

Subscribers and patrons of these concerts are asked to remember that the next Monday evening concert will take place on Friday evening, February 19. The date of the fourth concert of the second series is Wednesday evening, February 17.

N. Y. Sun
Jan 15-04.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra won its everlasting golden spurs by drawing a full house of 2,500 souls at Carnegie Hall last night in direct opposition to the greater 4,000 absorbed by the greater attraction at the opera. Let our cousins German take notice that 6,500 men, women and children listened to music reverently in New York on this one day.

Conductor Wilhelm Gericke transposed his programme, for the benefit of those benighted souls that thought to be in the two places at the most interesting times. The orchestra's performance of Beethoven's "kleine" symphony No. 8 calls for no new thoughts on the orchestra's classic standards of performance. The "Death of Tintagiles" once more showed poor Loeffler's head grown hairless with tone poem evolution, and earned more hearty applause for his solo part on the viole d'amour. The D'Albert overture to "Improvisatore" had much less of improvisation than the dear old Hans Andersen's musical tale that furnished the book of D'Albert's recent opera.

Busoni, the pianist, returned after twice seven years, is said to be a man who knows a lot of things. He knows his place, for one thing, and in the Henselt piano concerto he played with exactly the flawlessness and soullessness that the composer, in so many words, called for. The second movemnet alone showed a full grown individuality that might make Busoni himself persona grata to the multitude. We are not relegating a Carnegie Hall-size man to the Carnegie Lyceum, below stairs. For, as already shown, neither Busoni nor the orchestra had to take to a cyclone cellar on "Parsifal" night. They are both bomb-proof, though physically the stoop-shouldered pianist did not lock it.

With bearded Gericke and a bearded First Violin, it was a case of bearding too many lions in one den for the piano soloist to wear hair all around his face. But there is evidently a preponderating inheritance of the German mother in this noteworthy Italian from Berlin. He can teach many things about the pale ivories of art.

PUBLIC LEDGER—PHILADELPHIA.

JANUARY 14, 1904.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Third Wednesday Concert Given, with Ferruccio Busoni as Soloist

The third of this season's series of Wednesday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Wilhelm Gericke, took place yesterday in the Academy of Music, when the following was presented:

Overture, "Improvisatore".....D'Albert
Piano Concerto in F minor.....Henselt
"Le Chasseur Maudit".....Cesar Franck
Symphony in F major (No. 8).....Beethoven

The chief interest of the entertainment centered in the first appearance here of Ferruccio Benvenuto Busoni, an Italian pianist, a player of some Continental experience, but who, except for a year spent in Boston, is practically a stranger to America. It was especially interesting to hear him, on account of the fact that one so rarely meets with a pianist from Italy, the land of song. In these days, when there are so many concert pianists constantly being introduced to the public, nothing but a very distinguished player, indeed, can rouse a symphony audience to much enthusiasm, and it may be said at once that Busoni's playing proved an unqualified delight. He has absolute command of his instrument, playing with great authority and exhibiting a firm, vigorous touch, that was very stirring in the more brilliant passages of the concerto, but most important of all his playing is marked by great suavity and gentleness and real "velvety" softness. The first movement of the Henselt concerto, which is rarely heard in these days, although it was a favorite number in the repertory of most of the players of a generation or so ago, is extraordinarily disappointing. It is rather noisy, and impresses one as quite commonplace, viewed in the light of the more modern composers, and while it offers a fine opportunity to the pianist in some splendid passages, where the melody is played in octaves with running arpeggios, it is nevertheless without special melodic charm. It was not until the lovely larghetto movement was reached that one really felt the compelling beauty of the work and the exquisite fineness of its interpretation by Mr. Busoni. It is a delicious melodious romance, with a lovely string accompaniment, full of dainty passages. The last movement, with its waltz theme, proved one of the most brilliant things that has been heard in some time, and, coming after the sentiment exhibited by the player in the second movement, its brilliant interpretation will remain in the memory for a long time.

The first number on the programme was the d'Albert overture to the opera "The Improvisatore," a charming festival composition, with its suggestion of carnival happiness and love, full of real melody and sprightliness. It was finely rendered by the orchestra, which is heard to such great advantage in this sort of thing. The Franck composition, which followed the concerto, is an interesting example of modern programme music, in which the ride of the accursed huntsman is depicted with all the coloring of the French school. It is not particularly melodious, and proved uneffective until the strange notes of the tuba announced that the curse was about to fall, when, with queer shimmering violin passages, the approach of evil was indicated, and from this time on the interest in the composition grew. A more accentuated rhythm in its interpretation than it received last evening might make it more agreeable as a concert number.

The concert closed with a rendition of the essentially happy Beethoven eighth symphony, played with the absolute precision and daintiness of interpretation for which this great band is so famous. The first movement is always a disappointment, as, with the exception of a few opening bars and the closing passages of the movement, there is a great deal of entirely classic "form," which is rather tiresome, but nothing more lovely can be imagined than the beautiful allegretto (there is no slow movement in this work), which was most beautifully played. The familiar minuetto also roused the small audience to some enthusiasm. This symphony ends in a perfect burst of song, and the allegro vivace was played with great spirit. Mr. Gericke never gives an unusual rhythmic accent to Beethoven, and there are parts of the eighth symphony that one might wish to have a little more highly colored than as he presents them; but so happy is the composition that it almost may be said to play itself, and last evening it formed a fitting ending to one of the most enjoyable concerts of the season. Attention is called to the fact that the next concert of the first series will be on Friday instead of Monday evening, the date being February 19.

[80]

PHILADELPHIA PRESS,
JANUARY 14, 1904.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

An Interesting Work by Cesar Franck—Busoni a Great Pianist.

The third concert, second series, of the Boston Orchestra, given at the Academy of Music last night, was a rich feast indeed. But the occasion would have counted for distinction even if the program had been confined to the remarkable work of a pianist of rare ability, Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni, and the superb orchestral interpretation of Cesar Franck's tone poem.

The numbers read were as follows:—

D'Albert .....
Overture to the Opera, "The Improvisatore" (First time at these concerts.)
Henselt .....
Concerto in F minor, for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 16
Cesar Franck .....
Poeme Symphonique, "Le Chasseur Maudit"
Beethoven .....
Symphony No. 8, in F major, Op. 93
Soloist:
Mr. Ferruccio B. Busoni.

As for the overture to "The Improvisatore," D'Albert again proves that while he is great as an interpreter he fails to shine with much luster as a composer. The work is brilliantly orchestrated, but the melodic thought is poor. Unfortunately, the taking character of the skillful orchestration is apt to blind the judgment of the careless in appraising the true value of the work.

Franck's symphonic poem, "Le Chasseur Maudit," is based on Burger's ballad, "The Wild Huntsman." The composer has given a most poetic setting of the legend in his graphic painting of the various episodes. The orchestra was impressive in translating Mr. Gericke's reading. Especially fine was the superb tone of the 'celli in the religious melody and most dramatic the tuba's commanding voice in the curse announcement, the finale culminating in a frenetic outburst of demoniac intensity, the unhappy end of the doomed man, and admirably worked out by the orchestra.

While the impression left by the average peripatetic virtuoso rarely goes beyond the concert hour one must enter an exception to the general rule after hearing the gifted Italian, who scored a great success last night in his interpretation of the Henselt concerto—a success based upon rare judgment and refined taste as an artist, and solidity of technique as an executant. Then what easy command of his resources, power in the expression of passion and tenderness in those delicate gradations of tone that can only be feelingly expressed by the poet-musician. In his interpretation of the beautiful concerto his temperament, technique, and tone made possible a result that was beyond the bounds of criticism. While the great pianist was satisfying in his rendering of all three movements, yet one must dwell on the singular beauty of the largetto that seemed to expand like a bud to the full-blown rose under the magic of the pianist's all-compelling art. Yes, Mr. Busoni is a great artist, and well deserved the hearty applause that awaited the final crash of chords of the allegro agitato.

In the interpretation of the symphony Mr. Gericke gave one of his characteristic Beethoven readings, and brought the concert to a happy close.

The February concert of the first series will be given on Friday instead of Monday evening. There will be no change in the date of the Wednesday evening concert.

N.Y. Tribune
Jan 15-04

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

After an absence from America of nearly a decade Ferruccio B. Busoni took part in the third evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night. His choice of Henselt's somewhat antiquated concerto in F minor caused something akin to consternation among those who had learned during his American sojourn to admire his sterling musicianship and his radicalism; but possibly he wanted to break a lance in behalf of a composer whose merits would probably have wider recognition now had he not lived at the period and amid surroundings which were foreign in every respect to his nature and his ideals, but whose principal products exercised a hypnotic influence which has not yet worn off, though half a hundred years have passed away. Henselt, though a composer of the Chopin period, had real nobility of character, and to it he gave expression in its music. There are empty pages in his concerto, but there are also manliness and honesty, and these qualities may have attracted Mr. Busoni, who is essentially a virile player to whom all affectation is anathema. He displayed these qualities last night, and the old concerto put on a frank, open-hearted, dignified mien which was inspiriting and invigorating. The melodies were sung with a full, round tone, the passage work sounded like an integral factor in the music, not like rapid, irridescent froth; the accents spoke with no uncertain voice, the rhythms were clean cut, precise, symmetrical, and the whole work crisp, sonorous, manly, convincing. It was pianoforte of the large style which has been missed in our concert rooms thus far this season, and, indeed, for a discouragingly long period.

The other numbers of Mr. Gericke's programme were the overture to Eugen d'Albert's opera, "Der Improvisator," Mr. Loeffler's musical transcription of Maeterlinck's "Death of Tintagiles" and Beethoven's Eighth Symphony. All the music was played by Mr. Gericke's men with exquisite finish, spontaneity and euphony. The overture, which had its first hearing in New-York, seemed scarcely worth the lovely care bestowed upon it, for it is small in thought and shallow in expression. Mr. Loeffler's symphonic poem, in which the composer played the part assigned to the viola d'amore, has been heard here before. Originally it employed two viole d'amore, and the wholly original tone color which the exotic instrument lent to the music was quite as striking as the mood evoked by his strange harmonies and the unusual progression of intervals out of which he constructs his principal theme It is moody music, singularly beautiful and singularly moving. Here Mr. Gericke's devotion and the fine skill of the orchestra were well applied, and the work made a profound impression.

NORTH AMERICAN,
PHILADELPHIA,
JANUARY 14, 1904.

NEW PIANIST APPEARS WITH BOSTON PLAYERS

Busoni Achieves Triumph Before an Academy Audience.

A FRIVOLOUS OVERTURE

This Part of D'Albert's "Improvisator" Given Here for First Time.

At the Academy of Music last evening the Boston Orchestra played for the first time here the overture to D'Albert's opera, "The Improvisator," produced originally at Berlin early in 1902.

The music is light and frivolous, designedly gay and fantastic, like the laughter and jollity of a crowd at a carnival. With his rare skill in orchestration, D'Albert has devised many graceful and picturesque variants from conventional thematic development.

The melody fairly flashes from instrument to instrument, as though this sort of agility might compensate for lack of sincerity and true musical inspiration.

It doesn't; the final impression is of diffuse, commonplace themes, developed in the course of the day's work, and not by the light of a sacred fire.

A New Solo Pianist.

The Henselt F minor concerto, which figured conspicuously on the programme, introduced a solo pianist new to this public in Ferruccia B. Busoni, a young Italian with leonine locks and bearded like the pard.

He proved to be a past master in pianoforte technique, assured, self-reliant and capable. His is the virtuosity of digital acrobatics, the calm serenity of artistic conviction that impresses powerfully by dynamic effort.

Henselt's concerto—especially the brilliant and soulful first movement—has been a favorite concert piece for more than half a century. Traditions cluster around it—its interpretations are as variant and many-hued as the temperamental quality of humanity.

Triumph for Busoni.

Busoni's rendering of the work is that of the scholar under stress, not that of the artist inspired by a splendid musical composition. His brilliant playing was rewarded by three recalls, and—rara avis—repeated taps of applause from the Gericke baton.

The other numbers were Caesar Franck's symphonic poem, in which the legend of the huntsman accursed is musically rehearsed, and the eighth Beethoven symphony—played with infectious gaiety and refreshing abandon by the big band.

N.Y. Herald
Jan 15-04

Boston Symphony Players Heard.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall last night, attracted one of the largest concert audiences of the season and gave a programme that was highly interesting. It served also to reintroduce Ferruccio Busoni, the Italian pianist. In effect Mr. Busoni is a stranger to local concert goers, although he was heard here fourteen years ago, also at a Boston Orchestra affair.

Mr. Gericke's list contained two numbers new to concerts, namely, the overture to D'Albert's opera "The Improvisator" and Charles Martin Loeffler's "The Death of Tintagiles," a symphonic poem after a curious drama by Maurice Maeterlinck. Added to these were the Henselt concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in F minor, opus 16, and Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, in F major.

A word of comment is deserved by both the new numbers. The D'Albert overture has the spirit of carnival about which revolve the incidents of drama it precedes. It is gay, bouyant, dainty, full of fun. Played as it was last night the audience found it irresistible and gave to it the most spontaneous applause of the evening. Mr. Loeffler's composition, like his other writings of this kind, is more interesting in its details than it is as a whole. It is a pleasing mosaic of indefinite pattern. No attempt apparently had been made to follow closely the text, which printed in the programme occupied some ten pages, and it was difficult, moreover, to find any but a very vague tone picture of the weird atmosphere of the drama or of its attempted tragic climax. Of course, the orchestra read it like the other numbers, superbly.

It may be that with another concerto Mr. Busoni would have been given a more demonstrated reception, but it cannot be said that the audience seemed roused to more than generous applause. One reason for this may be found in the fact that the appeal made by his playing was purely an intellectual one. It was bold, clean, incisive, but it neither warmed the blood nor stirred the fancy. Technique, there was a plenty, and all the graces of an accomplished ensemble player; little more. Mr. Busoni was at his best in the second movement, although the last one he brilliantly interpreted.

Staats Zeitung
Jan 15-04.

Das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester.

Das Bostoner Symphonieorchester gab gestern Abend sein fünftes Konzert der Saison in Carnegie Hall vor einem überaus zahlreichen Publikum. Die ersten beiden Programmnummern boten Werke lebender Komponisten dar, die andern beiden nicht. D'Albert's Ouvertüre zu seiner Oper „Der Improvisator" machte den Anfang. Was ist aus den Hoffnungen geworden, die d'Albert einst mit seinem Opus 1 erweckte, und die dann mit seinem ersten Clavierkonzert (in H-dur) neue Nahrung erhielten? Diese „Improvisator"-Ouverture läßt sich nur noch als Kapellmeistermusik moderner Art bezeichnen, ja sie fällt sogar in's Banale. Insofern, daß sie Einem Gelegenheit gab, den Mangel an Fortschritt bei diesem komponirenden Claviervirtuosen zu erkennen, war die Bekanntschaft dankenswerth.

Darnach kam Ch. M. Loeffler's symphonische Dichtung „Der Tod des Tintagiles" — nach Maeterlinck's Marionetten-Drama an die Reihe. Man hat dieses Werk schon vor etwa fünf Jahren von dem Bostoner Orchester zu hören bekommen, und wie damals erhielt es auch gestern sehr starken und andauernden Beifall vom Publikum. Immerhin mag gefragt werden, ob dieser Beifall ebenso stark gewesen sein würde, wenn der Komponist nicht selbst dabeigewesen und das Viola d'amour-Solo ganz wundervoll gespielt hätte. Es ist nämlich nicht ganz leicht, sich bei dem musikalischen Stimmungsbilde, das Loeffler entrollt, fortwährend die Maeterlinck'sche Puppentragödie vor Augen zu halten, und selbst die glühendsten Verehrer der Programmmusik müssen einräumen, daß ein allzu starker, durch das beigegebene Programm ausgeübter Zwang der Komposition schädlich wird. Gewiß ist, daß auch ein anderes Programm zu dieser Musik erfunden werden könnte, ohne der Wirkung Eintrag zu thun. Wohl ist der Mangel an scharfem Umriß in der Komposition gerade charakteristisch zutreffend für den Maeterlinck'schen Vorwurf, aber ohne Hinweis auf den kleinen Tietagiles gehört, würde die Musik ihre Macht womöglich noch ungehinderter entfalten. Fesselnd durch das Colorit, und förmlich faszinirend durch seltsame Kombinationen, ist diese symphonische Dichtung von Loeffler, aber sie steht doch an Kraft und Spartanietät der Erfindung hinter jenen beiden Tondichtungen zurück, die er uns im letzten Winter hören ließ. Ein wahres Wunderwerk ist auch im „Tintagiles" die Instrumentation; und zwar ist sie individuell, ohne irgend welches merkbares Anlehnen an Wagner oder Strauß.

Das Orchester spielte diese beiden Werke, wie später die achte Beethoven'sche Symphonie, mit Virtuosität und Delikatesse. Das Allegretto der Symphonie nahm Herr Gericke glücklicher Weise nicht zu langsam, wie es manchmal von Dirigenten beliebt wird, die auf Originalität mehr als auf Pietät erpicht sind. Dagegen hätte Herr Gericke das Menuett ganz wohl etwas behäbiger nehmen können.

Der Solist des Abends war Ferruccio Busoni, der während seiner zehnjährigen Abwesenheit von Amerika seine Zeit offenbar gut anzuwenden verstanden hat. Er war ein vorzüglicher Pianist, als er damals fortging, er kommt nun aber zurück als einer der ersten seines Faches. Es that wohl, endlich einmal einen Spieler von männlicher Kraft und zielbewußter Energie da sitzen zu sehen, wo sich so manche hysterische Damen abgearbeitet haben.

Busoni's Technik ist von absoluter Zuverlässigkeit und einem förmlich natürlichen Fluß. Er verfügt über außerordentlich feine Produktionen der Schattirung und beweist überall einen gereiften, ja überlegenen Geschmack. Das Einzige, das man bemängeln kann, ist eine gewisse Kühle des Tons wie des Ausdrucks. Indessen, die Abwesenheit aller Sentimentalität hatte auch ihr Wohlthätiges. Herr Busoni spielte das altmodische und ziemlich leere, aber sehr schwierige Henselt'sche Concert. Er wurde vom Publikum sehr gefeiert.

N.Y. World
Jan 15-04

BUSONI'S MANLY PLAYING.

Pianist Appears with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

An interesting programme interestingly played and introducing a still more interesting pianist was heard at the Boston Symphony concert last night at Carnegie Hall. The pianist was Ferruccio Benvenuto Busoni, who though born in Italy lived in this country for some time; but he had absented himself from us for about a decade, so that his appearance last night had all the novelty of a first hearing. Busoni is an intellectual artist who seems to weigh sentiment more lightly than he does brains. He has surety, agility and breadth; his playing is manly, and above all is it musicianly. He was enthusiastically applauded.

An orchestral novelty began the evening's music. It was D'Albert's overture to "The Improvisatore," which was bright with borrowed brilliancy, the composer laboring under the disadvantage of knowing the music of too many other composers and having too good and too reflective a memory.

N.Y. Evg. Post
Jan 15-04.

Busoni and the Boston Orchestra.

During the first two months of the present musical season the violinists were more in evidence than the pianists. But now there is to be a change. Last night Mr. Busoni played with Mr. Gericke and his Boston band at Carnegie Hall, and at the next Philharmonic concert (on January 29, 30) another of Europe's favorite pianists, Mr. Reisenauer, will make his début. Mr. Ferruccio Busoni belongs to a rare class of musicians—the class of Italian pianists. The Italians have for several centuries been so busy writing operas and rearing artists to sing them that they have had little time to spare for the realm of instrumental music. The fact that Mr. Busoni's mother is a German may have had something to do with his devoting himself to the piano and making his home in the Mutterland during the last ten years. Previous to that he had led a roving life, dwelling for a time in Vienna, Bologna, Leipsic, Helsingfors, Moscow, Boston, New York. He appears to have finally found Berlin the most congenial abode.

Mr. Busoni was a good pianist before he left this city, nearly a decade ago. He is now one of the greatest among the living. Recent English journals reported his having a success—both artistic and financial—such as no other pianist except Paderewski has enjoyed in late years. He is noted for his skill in making Bach sound as modern and as fascinating as Chopin; he also does wonders with Liszt and other modern masters. For his reappearance last night he chose Adolf Henselt's F minor concerto, thereby agreeably varying the repertory and leaving the usual pianistic ruts. Hans von Bülow once referred to this concerto as being "viel zu wenig geschätzt (decidedly underestimated). It is not deep, but it is always entertaining in the piano part, while even the orchestra has some exquisite interludes. Although it did not afford Mr. Busoni a wide range of emotional expression, it revealed his growth as a pianist since he left us for Europe in a striking manner. There was strength as well as grace in his playing, and his touch varied with the character of the music. The larghetto was as soothing and beautiful as the two allegros were brilliant. He was much applauded and recalled again and again.

The opening piece for the orchestra was the overture to D'Albert's opera "The Improvasitore," which, without being original, is a pleasing, spirited piece; Mr. Gericke and his men played it very well. Beethoven's eighth symphony was at the other end of the programme. It was preceded by Loeffler's "The Death of Tintagiles," which had been played before at these concerts. It is a beautifully colored score, but vague and amateurish in conception, and melodically so commonplace that one breathes a sigh of relief when it is over. The composer played the viola d'amore (for the sake of which the piece was obviously written) with much skill, and he was repeatedly recalled at the end.

"DEATH OF TINTAGILES" PLAYED

Loeffler's Music Deeply Impresses the Boston Orchestra's Audience.

"Parsifal" may come and "Parsifal" may go, but the Boston Symphony Orchestra goes on forever—drawing audiences that fill Carnegie Hall. So although the Metropolitan Opera House was crowded last night a throng heard the concert Mr. Gericke and his orchestra were giving further uptown, assisted by Ferruccio B. Busoni, pianist.

It was an interesting programme. Opening with D'Albert's effective overture to the opera, "The Improvisatore," it offered Loeffler's symphonic poem, "The Death of Tintagiles"; Henselt's piano concerto in F minor, opus 16, with Busoni at the piano, and Beethoven's ever-beautiful "Eighth Symphony." Most noteworthy was the Loeffler number. This remarkable work was performed here by the Boston orchestra several years ago and made a strong impression. On repetition it strengthens the feeling that the composer stands in the foremost rank of modern tone-poets, not only in subtlety and imagination, but in the technical accomplishments of his art and in orchestral cleverness. In "La Mort de Tintagiles" Mr. Loeffler does not attempt to give expression to Maeterlinck's work in detail. He merely depicts the essential elements of the tragedy—the shivering fear of death, the relentless fate that seizes the child, Tintagiles, and the pitiful appeal of the boy. These ideas he clothes in a musical language exceedingly vivid and forceful—music that at times rises to heights of beauty.

Busoni was heard here thirteen years ago, and those who heard him then say his playing has improved in many respects. But he still comes far from satisfying all the requirements of modern piano art. His technique is brilliant and his muscle well developed, but his touch is hard and brittle and his attack on the keyboard comes at times dangerously near brutality.

The orchestra played with wonderful precision and beauty of tone.

[81]

N.Y. Times Jan 15-04

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Its Third Evening Concert in Carnegie Hall.

C. M. Loeffler's "Death of Tintagiles" Played — Ferruccio B. Busoni, Pianist, as Soloist.

The third evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given at Carnegie Hall last evening, had a number of uncommonly interesting features that held the attention of the very large and very musical audience that always attends these concerts. There were a new overture by Eugen d'Albert, the pianist of genius who, like other pianists of genius, would gain the more lasting fame of a composer, and, like them, has made more or less vain and impotent attempts to gain it; the elaborate symphonic poem, "The Death of Tintagiles," by Charles Martin Loeffler, whose fine and original talent has been strikingly displayed several times in New York of late, and Beethoven's eighth symphony. The concert further brought again before this public Ferruccio B. Busoni, a pianist, who since his last appearance here nine years ago has greatly increased his fame by his European performances.

D'Albert's overture belongs to an opera, "The Improvisatore," that was produced two years ago. It is intended to foreshadow the carnival spirit, in which the opera opens, and the composer has attempted to make his music brilliant, sparkling, gay. He knows the modern idiom of the orchestra intimately, and has found rich and charming color in which to present his ideas. He has tried also for rhythmic piquancy. But his ideas seem singularly shallow and commonplace and lacking in individual or truly characteristic expressiveness, and his strongly marked rhythms become exasperatingly monotonous.

The overture, however, "sounds"; its first impression is effective, but only briefly so, and it appears before the end is reached as a fruitless and labored attempt to make brilliancy out of ideas that are not brilliant. How far it is from the carnival spirit that animates Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture! And yet Berlioz was a man of only mediocre musical inventiveness.

Mr. Loeffler's symphonic poem was listened to with the deepest attention. Boston Symphony audiences have had opportunities of late to become initiated into his individual modes of expression, to come into closer sympathy with his music, which at first is repellant to many. This symphonic poem was played some three years ago in New York; his "Nights in the Ukraine" was heard the season before, and last year two more symphonic poems of his composition were played. A few weeks ago new songs of his aroused mingled emotions in a very intelligent audience.

It is not likely that "The Death of Tintagiles" won unqualified acceptance last evening, though the composer, who took part in his work, playing in a very beautiful manner the viola d'amore, was several times warmly recalled. It has much that seizes the imagination and touches the heart, that subtly suggests and fixes moods, that implies the strange, uneasy foreboding, the nameless terror, the darkling tragedy that are the essence of Maeterlinck's little drama.

Mr. Loeffler has not, apparently, intended his music to follow closely the progress of the drama, nor to illustrate its successive scenes. Yet appreciation of it is vastly enhanced by the previous reading of the excerpts, setting forth the most striking moments of the experience of Tintagiles and his sister, Ygraine, that were printed in the programme book. It is long, elaborate, and very free in form; its themes are original and plastic in their outline, showing the strange departures from accepted tonalities that listeners know well in Mr. Loeffler's works. A sort of Loeffler tonality, a Loeffler scale, so to speak, runs through it.

There is a rare skill in the thematic treatment and the development, though they follow no rules. Yet it was not easy to escape the impression that there is at least one section of the work in which the touch is uncertain, the intention of the composer seen as through a glass, darkly. Whether that is his fault or his listeners, it may take further hearing, further study to make certain.

At all events, the piece as a whole is of high imaginative power, of close spiritual kinship to Maeterlinck's fancy. Mr. Loeffler's orchestration is exceedingly beautiful, transparent, delicately glowing with half tints, subtly colored, showing recondite command of all the timbres of the orchestra. The strange, wire-drawn sweetness of the viola d'amore is used with singularly acute feeling for its value.

Mr. Busoni played Henselt's concerto in F minor—a not very intelligible choice for an artist of his rank and power to exploit at his reappearance before this public. It is very difficult, very brilliant, and very seldom played, and probably these were the qualities that recommended it to Mr. Busoni. But it is old fashioned and faded, and its musical value is not great. Mr. Busoni surely does not wish to present himself wholly or chiefly as a technician; his playing even of this concerto was enough to forestall any such notion.

It was the playing of a great artist, large and free in its utterance, authoritative in style, full of warmth, and the finer appreciation of the finer side of music so far as what he played last night permitted. Nine years ago Mr. Busoni left us the impression of excessive muscularity, of hardness, of coldness. His muscularity has become perfectly modulated and commanded strength, finding expression in a tone of rich, unctuous roundness and bigness, and a power of execution that knows no flagging. His hardness and coldness have been melted into warmth and brilliancy.

His technique is dexterious and one to conquer all difficulties—though it could not be said to have been quite impeccable in his performance last evening. His rhythmic power is well developed. His disdain of personal display was evident from beginning to end. And it seemed, so far as his playing at this concert was able to show, that Mr. Busoni comes back as a pianist of large artistic stature, whose further disclosures will be welcome.

The playing of Beethoven's eighth symphony, the great "little" symphony, was of supreme and satisfying beauty; one of the most delightful performances that Mr. Gericke has achieved. It had balance, repose, tonal quality, breadth, finish. Its tempos were right and true—unless the "Tempo di Menuetto" were taken a trifle faster than usual, as if in protest against the followers of Wagner in their exaggeration of his idea of a slow tempo for the movement.

N.Y. Sun Jan 15-04.

THE ORCHESTRA OF BOSTON.

MR. GERICKE AND HIS GENTLEMEN COME AGAIN.

A Programme of Pleasing Music With One Spot of Sombre Color—New Overture by d'Albert—Ferruccio Busoni Reappears After a Long Absence.

All the familiar manifestations of public pleasure were in evidence at the third evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last night at Carnegie Hall. The programme was one of cheerful simplicity, except in a single number, which injected into the scheme the sombre note of contemporaneous pessimism and French decadence.

The list comprised D'Albert's overture to his opera, "The Improvisatore"; the limpid old Henselt piano concerto in F minor, Charles Martin Loeffler's symphonic poem, "The Death of Tintagiles," with the composer—to borrow the jargon of the song reciters—at the voile d'amour, and Beethoven's eighth symphony. The pianist was Ferrucio Busoni

Beethoven's little eighth may be dismissed with a nod and a smile. It is not problem music. It is just sheer old fashioned melody and harmony, and it trips along with ingenuous beauty like a pretty girl on her way to matins. No composition could be better adapted to the comfortable methods of good Mr. Gericke, nor to the sweet and vibrant tone of the Boston orchestra. Let the record, then, stand that the symphony was charmingly performed and that Mr. Gericke's reading disturbed no cherished memories and upset no beloved ideals.

Charles Martin Loeffler, the blond musical Verlaine of Boston, is a natural sympathizer with the dramatic literature of Maurice Maeterlinck. His "Death of Tintagiles" we have heard before. It was produced here by the Boston orchestra on Feb. 21, 1901, and made something of a stir in the peaceful waters. Maeterlinck's tragedy, on which the music is founded, tells the direful story of the murder of a little boy at the instance of a wicked Queen, his grandmother, who fears that he will ascend the throne on reaching his majority.

His sister Ygraine desperately, but vainly, strives to break through the door behind which he is slain. Mr. Loeffler wisely avoids trying to go into descriptive details, but contents himself with a swirling allegro, depicting the pursuit of the Queen's hired assassins, and a plaintive andante setting forth the unhappiness of the poor little boy and his helpless sister.

The only bit of realism in the thing is Ygraine's vain beating on the door. Why she did not break it down is hard to tell, for the composer had to employ a bass drum forte to show how hard she smote. According to the drama all she carried was a lamp. But perhaps it was made of bronze.

A struggle and a crash, a climax of agony and a shuddering silence, these are what the composer has undertaken to set before us in a composition blending the orchestral splendors of Strauss with the harmonic miseries of that composer and Charbrier. The thing is well made, and it is orchestrated with a gorgeous palette. The viole d'amour whimpers for the little boy. It is all very, very sad and discouraging. Mr. Loeffler ought to try to cheer up, but we fear the worst is yet to come. He played the viole d'amour very touchingly. The audience was much moved to loud and boisterous applause.

Mr. d'Albert's overture deals with that part of his opera relating to the carnival season. It is a lightsome and gleeful conceit, absolutely without profundity of thought—for none is attempted—simple in musical diction, and instrumented with excellent skill. It is of the same family as Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture, but it is a weak sister. D'Albert is not a genial inventor of melodies, and in this essay the poverty of his fancy stands revealed in all its rags. Alackaday! A gentleman who wishes to be a German, though he was born a French-Scotchman, has a hard time a-courting his muses and his wives.

Mr. Busoni's choice of the Henselt concerto as the medium for his reintroduction to this public after such a long absence betrayed a gentle artistic modesty. The inner brotherhood would naturally have expected him to lay bare the accumulation of his years in a philosophic analysis of Brahms or a passionate proclamation of Tschaikowsky, in the stead of which he comes mincing before us with the lilting puerilities of the innocuous Henselt.

Since he left us Mr. Busoni has gained greatly in gentleness of touch and variety of color, yet the end is not yet. He still, at times, shows the wrist of steel and the resulting tone of glacial coldness. This was much in evidence last night in the first movement. In the third movement the pianist indulged in some characteristic bits of rhythm entirely at variance with the printed page. "O tempo rubato! O mores!" as Cicero would have said had he been talking about a citharist.

In the second movement Mr. Busoni was at his best, for there he disclosed his accumulation to warm tints and his newest developments of velvet touch. His reading of the concerto—but is it possible to give a reading of old father Henselt?

Comm. Advertiser N.Y. Jan 15-04.

Mr. Loeffler's symphonic poem, "The Death of Tintagiles," has entered deservedly into the repertory of the Boston orchestra. Between them, Mr. Paur and Mr. Gericke have played it eight or ten times in six years, and last evening at Carnegie Hall it appeared for the second time on a New York programme of the band. As heretofore, the audience listened with intense interest. The conductor caught the mood of the music, far as it is from Mr. Gericke's normal vein, and the orchestra seemed to miss no one of the endless details of the instrumentation. At the end conductor, band, and composer, who played the viole d'amour, were heartily and repeatedly applauded. By every outward sign the tone-poem seemed to make more impression than it did at its first performance here.

In one respect at least Mr. Loeffler's music gains at every repetition—in the beauty, subtlety and individuality of the instrumentation. Mr. Loeffler's sense of the tonal values of the different instruments and groups of instruments is singularly keen. He seems to have a practised instinct for the peculiar potency of each. He combines them with full technical mastery and with remarkable variety, subtlety and transparency. No American composer, it may not be too much to say, can weave an instrumental web of such shaded, pliant, persuasive, and varied coloring. And this coloring is all his own. It is nearest in kin to the instrumentation of the younger composers of the school of Franck and Chabrier. So far as we know them none of them has suspassed Mr. Loeffler in this instrumental mastery.

On the other hand, repetition heightens the sense of vagueness that "The Death of Tintagiles" left when it was first heard here. True, the music would impart only the mood of Mæterlink's play behind it. But, somehow, it seems seldom quite to attain that. There is a sweeping allegro, a plaintive andante, a moving close. Yet the whole leaves the impression that the composer is groping for melodic ideas, failing quite to seize them, and taking refuge in strange progressions, uncanny harmonies, and subtle instrumentation, to gain the mood he would impart. And with all the skill and imagination behind them, these never quite compel the listener.

D'Albert's overture to his newest opera, "Der Improvisatore," which was played for the first time here, has not even individual and many-colored instrumentation to commend it. There is not a musical idea in it, and the instrumentation repeats the commonplaces of a score of "carnival" overtures. The virtuosity of the orchestra went to waste upon it. For compensation, in Beethoven's eighth symphony, it had the fullest play. There was not a flaw in Mr. Gericke's reading or in the band's responsiveness to it. And what an unconscious protest it all was against the present fashion of show allegros and the present worship of orchestral muscularity rather than orchestral finesse!

Mr. Busoni, who has not played in New York for nine years, chose Henselt's piano concerto in F minor for his return. Antiquated as it is, it has a measure of dignity and it suits Mr. Busoni's style. His technical mastery of his instrument is as complete and as modest as ever. Nine years of wandering about Europe as a virtuoso have not given him a single affectation. The showiest of display passages sound, as he plays them, as though they were an integral part of the whole composition. He still keeps his notable clarity and precision. But he has, so to say, the vices of his virtues. Polished as his playing is, it seems dry, and at moments even hard and brittle. It wants warmth and feeling. It proceeds too obviously from the intellect, too little from the imagination.

Mail & Express Jany 15-04

GOOD MUSIC BY BOSTON PLAYERS

Mr. Gericke and His Orchestra Keep a Carnegie Hall Audience Interested—"Parsifal" Again.

One novelty and a change in the order of the programme marked last night's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Carnegie Hall—Mr. Gericke is as indefatigable in finding new music as in rearranging concert lists already printed. The new work was Eugen d'Albert's overture to his opera, "Der Improvisator;" the change made was to put Charles M. Loeffler's symphonic poem "The Death of Tintagiles" ahead of the Henselt piano concerto in F minor; the remaining number was Beethoven's eighth symphony. Mr. Ferruccio Busoni was the soloist.

When d'Albert (whom certain English critics provoke to anger by printing his name as it was before he turned German, "Mr. MacAlbert") wrote his opera "The Improvisatore" for the Berlin stage he borrowed freely, it is said, from Andersen and Victor Hugo. Renaissance Padua was the scene of the plot and there were disguises and the usual machinery of historical drama. The production at the Berlin Royal Opera, on February 26, 1902, was not a success, and critics recalled his earlier works, "Kain," "Die Abreise" and others, as better worth while. Not daunted, however, the composer-pianist brought forward his seventh opera, "Tiefland," at Prague as recently as November 15, 1903.

The overture to "Der Improvisator" aims at setting forth the carnival spirit, since it was at this season that Count Arco, ready to besiege Padua, desisted, in order not to disturb the pleasure of the populace; instead, he entered the town disguised as an improvisatore. The music is ingenious, bright, charming, well scored, vivacious, everything, indeed, but originally melodious. D'Albert is another example of a great pianist that insists on turning his attention to composition.

Mr. Loeffler's "Death of Tintagiles," after the pathetic little drama of Maeterlinck, has been played here before, and it will be welcome again. It stands well the test of "programme music," for it needs no printed story to make it intelligible or to set its beauty before the hearers. The melodic ideas are in Mr. Loeffler's strange idiom, but they are vital and enthralling, despite the formless and restless manner of the composition of which they are the structural elements. There is untellable tenderness in the melancholy of this music, and it has foreboding shadows in its coloring. Unexpected as are the harmonic transitions, they justify and explain themselves. The work becomes clearer at every hearing. And the scoring, the blending and contrasting of orchestral hues is simply masterly.

Mr. Loeffler himself played the obligato for viola d'amore last night, and the golden tone of that instrument figured with singular fitness in the total effect. The audience was enthusiastic over the composer and his work.

Mr. Busoni, who last appeared here nine years ago, has become one of the noted pianists of the day in Europe. His brilliant digital skill and his hard, clear touch have their way with the average hearer for a time, but his is not a style to enjoy for long. Such sharp, malicious, crushing strokes as his fingers inflicted on the keys last night cannot be called musical.

The Henselt concerto, with its "early German" mannerisms, and its commonplace sentimentalities, has gone out of vogue pretty completely, but it will bear revival occasionally, and Mr. Busoni was well fitted for the task.

Mr. Gericke and the Boston men played delightfully all of last night's music; who else could do justice to Mr. Loeffler's difficult and exquisitely adjusted score? And the Beethoven symphony, with its gay humor, went with just the elastic tread it needed. Such performances give agreeable memories; some day Mr. Gericke will be the hero of a worshipful tradition as a reader of the milder moods of Beethoven.

[82]

NEW YORK DAILY NEWS.

JANUARY 15, 1904.

BUSONI CONCERT A GENUINE TREAT

BRILLIANT WORK OF PIANIST AT THIRD OFFERING OF BOSTON SYMPHONY.

BIG AUDIENCE AT CARNEGIE

Beautiful Recital of Loeffler's Symphonic Poem, the Score Remodeled and Improved by Composer.

Ferruccio Benvenuto Busoni, pianist, made his reappearance in this metropolis last night, after an absence of ten years, and gave an exhibition of virtuosity that had not been equaled here in several seasons. This happened at the third concert of the Winter by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given in Carnegie Hall. Despite the fact that last evening was "Parsifal" night at the opera there was a large audience present to hear the concert, and it enjoyed a musical treat such as Mr. Gericke's Boston players may always be depended upon to give.

The arrangement of the programme was altered slightly from the published announcements, to accommodate the soloist. As played it was: Overture to the Opera, "The Improvisatore," by Eugene Francis Charles d'Albert; "The Death of Tintagiles," a symphonic poem after the drama by Maurice Maeterlinck, by Charles Martin Loeffler; concerto in F minor, for pianoforte and orchestra, by Adolf Henselt; and symphony in F major, No. 8, by Ludwig von Beethoven.

A Gay Carnival.

Of these things, the overture to d'Albert's opera was played for the first time at these concerts, and Mr. Loeffler's symphonic poem was comparatively new. The music of the overture is that of a gay carvival. It is written in a more or less orthodox form and contains no startling innovation of any kind. Last night's audience heard it with pleasure. The opera, "The Improvisatore," is the sixth written by d'Albert and it had its first performance at the Royal Opera, Berlin, on February 26, 1902.

Mr. Loeffler's symphonic poem, "The Death of Tintagiles,' which was composed in 1897, was written originally for orchestra and two violes d'amour obligato. It was performed here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra a season or two later, if memory serves aright, the two violes d'amour being played by Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Loeffler. Since then the composer has remodelled the score, taking out the second viole d'amour part, lessening the importance of the part taken by the other and changing materially the whole instrumentation, so that it may now be considered as a purely orchestral work.

Depicts Struggle.

The programme book tells us that "from a poetico-dramatic point of view the music may be taken as depicting a struggle between two opposing forces; but it does not seek to follow out scene by scene," Maeterlinck's curious, "symbolistic" drama.

The impression gained from hearing the piece in its revised form was that it had been improved. At any rate, a second hearing made it seem more interesting, more musicianly. It contains some clever and beautiful orchestration, and hints at genuine inspiration. Mr. Loeffler has struck into an original path for himself in his work of translating into music some of the literature of the most modern of the moderns, several of whom have been called "decadents."

The audience last night was immensely pleased with the symphonic poem, and the composer, who is a member of the orchestra and who played the viole d'amour part, was called out several times to bow to the plaudits of approval.

A Show Piece.

Mr. Busoni elected to make his reappearance here with Henselt's concerto in F minor, a show piece that has been something of a favorite with visiting virtuosi ever since Gottschalk and William Mason introduced it here piecemeal at concerts of the Philharmonic Society away back in 1857 and 1858.

He played it brilliantly, exhibiting a truly marvellous technical proficiency. But that he is as great an artist as he is a virtuoso, that he can convey the emotions of the great magicians in music, it will require other work to show. He probably got out of the piece all there was in it, and, of course, he had the brilliant accompaniment of a virtuoso orchestra. Yet the whole performance had the clear cold glitter of a tour de force, a remarkable display of a wonderful skill. There was nothing in it to call for any such rhapsodies of hysterical praise as some of the critics of the leading European cities have been writing about Busoni since he left us ten years ago.

Many Recalls.

After the concerto the pianist was recalled half a dozen times. The audience would gladly have heard him again had not Mr. Gericke's iron rule against encores been in force. It is a very wise rule.

As Mr. Busoni is to be heard here several times before the Winter ends, in concert and recital, a few facts about him may not be uninteresting. He was born near Florence, Italy, on April 1, 1866. His mother, who was a German, gave him his first piano lessons. He afterward studied with W. A. Remy, of Graz, and Goldmark, of Vienna. He appeared as an infant phenomenon when nine years old, at Vienna, and gave concerts in Italy. In 1882 he became an associate of the Philharmonic Academy of Bologna after due examination.

He lived at Leipsic for a while, but in 1888 he was appointed a teacher at the Conservatory of Helingfors, where he married. In 1890 he won the Rubinstein prize and was appointed a professor at the Moscow Conservatory. He came to America in 1891, and made his home in Boston until the Autumn of 1893, when he moved to this city. In 1894 he went to Berlin, where his home still is.

Symphonic Poem.

Among his compositions are a symphonic poem for orchestra, an orchestral suite, two string quartettes, a violin concerto and many piano pieces. He has made pianoforte transcriptions of pieces by Bach and has edited a new issue of Bach's "Well-tempered Clavichord."

Beethoven's eighth symphony, with which the concert ended, was made to sing its bright, cheerful, happy, humorous message charmingly by Mr. Gericke and his players, and the listeners dispersed in a joyous frame of mind. Throughout the concert the work of the orchestra, it is needless to say, was just about as nearly perfect as any human performance can be. Yet one cannot help wishing that Wilhelm Gericke would sometimes throw a little of his dignity into passion and fire his players with a more vigorous spirit.

NEW OVERTURE BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Saint-Saens' Music Played Here for the First Time at Yesterday's Concert.

IS HEARD IN CARNEGIE HALL

Miss Maud MacCarthy the Violin Soloist and Her Performance Was of a High Order.

In Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, before the usual large audience of cultivated listeners, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third matinee concert of the season.

The programme, while less of a triumph for Mr. Gericke's powers of selection than some others he has presented this winter, was on the whole a good one, with some points of decided strength. The list was headed with the overture to Saint-Saëns' opera, "The Barbarians," it included Brahms' concerto in D major for violin, opus 77, and the ballet music from James K. Paine's opera, "Azara," and closed with Mendelssohn's "Scotch Symphony." Miss Maud MacCarthy was the soloist.

The Saint-Saëns overture has not before been heard here. It is from one of the composer's most recent works, and is written in his most developed style, following not at all the overture form, but presenting at random the themes of the opera. Its principal charm is one of instrumental color—the melodies at a first hearing making small appeal in their own right.

Similar comment is appropriate for Dr. Paine's ballet music. The character of the three dances which make up this episode is confessedly Oriental, and to that end the rythmical elements of the score are decidedly ingenious. But beyond mere prettiness of rhythm and novelty of orchestration the dances seem to have nothing of real value.

Miss MacCarthy's bravery in attacking the Brahms concerto, "Against the Violin," as some one has called it, would have won admiration alone; but she earned higher praise. She possesses no great elegance of style, nor bigness of tone, yet her playing for all that has delightful qualities. It is straightforward, sincere, thoroughly musical and highly intelligent.

She rose nobly to the technical demands of the work—especially to those of the last movement—she sang the sustained passages in a charming "still, small voice," and she never wavered from the pitch.

The orchestra read the symphony breezily.

MORNING TELEGRAPH,

JANUARY 15, 1904.

MAETERLINCK IN MUSICAL THEME

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Is Well Patronized Because —— It Is of Boston Origin.

IT OWNS A COMPOSER ALSO

Ferruccio Busoni Returns from Europe Much Improved in Technique.

By GUSTAV KOBBÉ.

There was the usual large audience at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Wilhelm Gericke conductor, in Carnegie Hall last night. People who could not be hired to attend a concert by the Philharmonic, or the Damrosch orchestras, because they are New York organizations, flock to the Boston Symphony.

Simply because it hails from Boston?

Possibly. But, at the same time, this orchestra is one of the finest in the world. The conductor's tenure of office is not dependent upon the players, and is long enough for him to impress his individuality upon them. There are frequent rehearsals, and the players belong only to this one organization. The Boston Symphony is that desirable thing, a "permanent orchestra."

Orchestra Owns a Composer.

The orchestra has a composer among its players. It owns him. He is Charles Martin Loeffler, and hardly a season passes without one or more of his compositions figuring on its programmes. There is even a mild Loeffler cult in Boston, the city of cults.

This composer affects the Verlaine school of French poetry, and the product of the Belgian symbolist, Maeterlinck. The latter's short but gruesome drama, "The Death of Tintagiles," the weird tragedy of a doomed princeling, formed the subject of a symphonic poem by Loeffler which was played last night.

Maeterlinck in Music.

In it the drama is not analyzed musically scene by scene. Rather it depicts the struggle between the two opposing forces of the tragedy. We have the cruel Queen and her handmaids typifying evil on the one hand; on the other, the timorous, plaintive-voiced child and his faithful sister, Ygraine.

MR. FERRUCCIO BUSONI.

The composition is an interesting piece of programme music to those who are familiar with the drama. Without that knowledge it would be more or less puzzling. It is scored for full modern orchestra with, however, the old-fashioned viole d'amour introduced as a solo instrument. It was played last night by the composer.

Busoni Heard Again.

Ferruccio Busoni was heard in the Honsell piano concerto. This virtuoso returns to us considerably more of an artist than when he was here before. Indeed, his growth in his art has been such that he might well have selected a more important work than the pretty, but rather old-fashioned concerto by Henselt for his reappearance.

He played it, however, with complete technical facility. Indeed, his rendering of it was flawless, and his tone, especially in the slow movement, was beautiful. If criticism is to be passed on his interpretation, it was too precise. More of the Chopin rubato—and the composition is Chopinesque enough to admit of this—would have made it more poetic.

The overture to D'Abert's "Improvisatore" and Beethoven's eighth symphony completed the programme.

[83]

N.Y. Tribune Jan 17-04

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It was not until Mr. Gericke got back to something like his own first principles in the programme of the third afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday that the music became as completely enjoyable as the concerts of the Boston organization usually are. The return was made in the second part, when Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony was played. Before it the audience listened to the overture to Saint-Saëns's lyric tragedy, "Les Barbares"; Brahms's violin concerto, played by Miss Maud MacCarthy, and three Moorish dances from Professor J. K. Paine's opera "Azara." The overture made no deep impression: in fact, it scarcely rippled the surface of popular interest. The story of the opera for which it was designed as an introduction is gloomily tragic: it deals with murderous passions, aroused by the clash between half-savage Teutonism and Roman civilization. Mr. Philip Hale, the fascinating annotator of the Boston Orchestra's programme, gives us to understand that the overture was originally a sort of melodramatic prologue in which a rhapsode of the old order tells how three thousand Germans, rushing through Gaul, drove before them into the woods the folk of the country and Roman legions powerless to resist. Only Floria, the beautiful vestal, knew how to stop them at Orleans: but Vesta found a way of avenging in the blood of the conqueror the outrage offered to the gods. Floria is a vestal virgin who gives herself as a sacrifice to the leader of the barbarian invaders; but Livie, the wife of one of the Roman consuls killed in the battle by the leader Marcomir, plunges her husband's sword through his breast. Strains sinister and threatening, songs fiercely exultant, savage lust and high patriotism might have been raised to color such a tale; but Saint-Saëns did not give them voice. There was some muttering in the orchestral depths, the clangor of muted trumpets cut through the orchestral fabric at times, but the stern and bloody spirit of the story was not bodied forth in the music nor more than hinted at. A master hand marshalled the themes, trained skill wrapped them in interesting harmonic and orchestral integument, but impressiveness and beauty of thought and presentation were missing.

Miss MacCarthy played the Mendelssohn concerto and the slow movement of the Saint-Saëns concerto in B minor at a Philharmonic Concert last season, and the entire concerto of Saint-Saëns, besides a Beethoven sonata, at a recital in Mendelssohn Hall a year ago. She invited gentle interest by her unmistakable gifts then, though failing to convince her critical listeners that she had reached the full artistic stature expected of a participant in such concerts as those of the Philharmonic and Boston bands. Yesterday she submitted herself to a still severer test. Brahms's concerto is not pabulum for artistic adolescence, but strong meat for strong men. Many of its technical difficulties were bravely attacked and put to rout by Miss MacCarthy, and there were moments of neat charm in her performance of the slow movement; but the serenely exalted proclamation which permeates the work as a whole was left unuttered. But she received an extremely kind reception from the audience.

Professor Paine's friends made a strong appeal to Mr. Conried last fall to have the opera "Azara," for which he wrote both words and music, included in the repertory of the Metropolitan Opera House this season. The effort failed for reasons with which the artistic merit of the work probably had nothing to do. The ballet music played yesterday did not enable the audience to judge whether much or little had been lost by the omission of the opera from the current list. Mr. Paine's muse is not one of merry mood; she is of sterner stuff and her natural footgear is the cothurnus, which is ill adapted to tripping measures. There were suggestions of the languid Oriental color so successfully applied by Rubinstein in his "Feramors" ballet in Mr. Paine's dances, but the learned composer seemed afraid to follow a simple, melodious way, and no sooner announced a pretty tune than he began to enmesh it in intricate treatment. Yet the dances brightened the scheme of the concert.

N.Y. Tribune

BALLET MUSIC FROM "AZARA"

Interesting Feature of Boston Symphony Orchestra Programme.

The most interesting orchestral work on the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon was the ballet music from Professor John K. Paine's opera, "Azara."

It consisted of three Moorish dances—graceful compositions, full of melody and characterized by much that is dainty and piquant. Mr. Gericke conducted them admirably, and they were received with every evidence of favor by the audience. The overture to Saint-Saens' "Les Barbares" and Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony were the other orchestral selections.

Maud MacCarthy, who came over here some years ago as a protege of Mme. Melba, and who since has been studying with Arbos, the new violin leader of the orchestra, played Brahms' violin concerto (op. 77). To a soloist who simply thinks of popular success this is a thankless composition. It is full of difficulties which are not, however, apparent to the average concertgoer, so that the player received but scant credit for what has been overcome in the mere technical rendering of it.

Barring two slips on high notes, Miss MacCarthy compassed the work technically, and played it, especially in the adagio, with a feeling for its deeper meaning that is surprising in one so young.

N.Y. Times
Jany 17-04

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Two New Pieces at Its Afternoon Concert in Carnegie Hall.

Saint-Saen's Overture, "Les Barbares," and Prof. Paine's Ballet Music—Miss MacCarthy Soloist.

The concert given yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which it brought to a close its January visit to New York, was not one of its most satisfactory offerings. The programme presented two compositions new to this city, neither of which proved to be worth the pains and time devoted to it, and a young solo violinist, Miss Maud MacCarthy, who, with her evident sincerity and ambition, does not yet stand upon an artistic level that ought to give her access to these concerts.

The first of the new pieces was Saint Säens's overture to "Les Barbares," one of a series of operas and lyric dramas based upon classical and mythological subjects, to which in his old age he has been devoting his attention. This one was composed for production in the restored Roman amphitheatre at Orange in France—a drama dealing with a supposed attack of the Germans upon this very amphitheatre. The music of the overture was afterward rearranged for production in Paris as a concert piece.

It is not one of Saint Saëns's notable contributions to dramatic music. It has little tragic power, suggests little of the clash of armed men and the fierce passions of barbarous warfare, or of the love of the Teutonic leader for the vestal virgin. It is without distinction or musical inventiveness; it is written skillfully, fluently, but without the trace of strong inspiration; it has little even of the richness and variety of orchestral color with which well schooled young composers of the present day are wont to conceal their lack of ideas.

The other composition played for the first time here was the ballet music in Prof. J. K. Paine's opera "Azara." There has been much interest in this opera on the part of friends of American music and admirers of the dean of American composers. A numerously signed petition has been presented to Mr. Conried asking him to perform it at the Metropolitan Opera House. A few concert performances of parts of the music have been given, but the work is practically still unknown.

With all deference to Prof. Paine, and with remembrance of much noble and notable music that he has created, it must be said that this ballet music is in no way likely to enhance his repute. Such music is not expected to be, indeed must not be, deep or even poignantly expressive. But it must be alive with the movement of the dance, it must beguile the listener with charming melodies and seductive rhythms; it must glow and blaze with color. If its themes are light, they must at least have distinction. Now, none of these things can be said of Prof. Paine's music except with much reserve.

It is Oriental in its intention—"Moorish Dances" the three pieces are called. They conform in a certain way to the conventional Oriental formulas that Western musicians follow when they wish to interpret the East in music; but there is very little that is convincing about their Orientalism; they have little of the feverish intensity and the languor, the seizing rhythmic accent. Nor do they justify themselves through brilliancy of orchestral coloring. They are well written and not more.

Miss MacCarthy made a considerably better impression than she did at a rather unfortunate appearance here about a year ago with the Philharmonic Society. She undertook one of the most arduous tasks that a violinist can set before himself today—the performance of Brahams's nobly beautiful and profoundly felt violin concerto. It requires not only the most accomplished technical powers of all sorts, but the ripest feeling and clearest insight and the broadest view. Miss MacCarthy is still a very young lady, and it is by no means a disparagement of her present powers or the possibilities that are before her to say that she failed to compass this great work in her performance of it.

The technical side of it she achieved with a measure of success quite unexpected to those who heard her last year, with a nervous energy and strength that do not seem to belong to that slender physique, with a fluency and an accuracy that were rarely failing; and yet, as it seemed, with the air of coming close all the time to the limit of her capabilities. There was intelligence in her idea of the work, but there was little breadth or dignity or deep feeling for the musical beauty of the composition. Her tone, while ample in volume, is not of sensuous beauty or great charm. Her performance was in so far remarkable as being that of a young girl; but it was not one of the artistic value that the audience of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York expects to hear.

The concert was ended with Mendelssohn's picturesque Scotch symphony—a work that is appearing seldom upon concert programmes nowadays; the fact that Mr. Gericke's repetition of it was the second that has been heard in New York this Winter is rather in the nature of a curious coincidence than an indication of a public demand for Mendelssohn's orchestral compositions. It has many elements that can please and delight even to-day, though its formal primness seems old fashioned, especially in a symphony so frankly intended as a reproduction of the atmosphere, the romance, and spirit of Scotland. But it is good to renew acquaintance with a work so charming as this still is.

N.Y. Sun
Jan 17-04,

MAUD M'CARTHY PLAYS WITH THE BRAHMS CONCERTO.

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Third Afternoon Concert—New Music by Saint-Saens and Paine—Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony Cheers but Does Not Inebriate

The third afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was attended by a goodly audience at Carnegie Hall yesterday, was a cheerful and temperate entertainment, pleasant as a 5 o'clock tea and as little likely to tax the emotional centres. The programme consisted of Saint-Säens's overture to his opera "Les Barbares," the Brahms violin concerto, the three Moorish dances from John K. Paine's opera, "Azara," and Mendelssohn's Scotch symphony. The solo performer was Miss Maud McCarthy, the Irish violinist.

M. Saint-Saëns's "Les Barbares" was produced at the Grand Opera, Paris, on Oct. 23, 1901. The opera was written to celebrate the antiquity of the town of Orange, and deals with the invasion of Gaul by the Cimbrians and Teutons in the year 113 B. C. It seems altogether likely that the distinguished French composer did not enter upon his task with overwhelming enthusiasm. At any rate, his overture seems to have been produced by the dim blaze of the midnight oil and with much persuasion of the three-nibbed pen. It is said to be built on themes from the opera, and these are just stirred up for a time with a long spoon and then allowed to simmer. The result is a sort of indescribable potage. As a soup before an operatic dinner, it does not promise well for the rest of the menu.

It would be a great joy to enter a record this morning that the ballet music of Prof. Paine cast a blighting shadow on the overture of the composer of "Ascanio" and other lyric morsels, but this is the temple of truth, and, at the risk of blame for more discouragement to the native composer, the facts must appear. Even if Prof. Paine were a German or a Russian or even a Bohemian with an unpronounceable name, it would still be true that, while ballets may be danced to his music, it does not dance of itself.

It merely sidles. Prof. Paine is a scholar and a professor in Harvard University. He writes these things in his music. Indeed such a terpsichorean sedative could have been compounded only by a doctor of music.

Miss Maud McCarthy is a pupil of E. Fernandez-Arbos, the principal violinist of the Boston Orchestra. Hence those bowings. She has played here before with less technic and temerity. Her performance of the first movement of the Brahms concerto yesterday showed clearly that she had made progress in tone and in command of the finger board. But that is about as far as commendation may safely venture.

It is not imperative that people should play the Brahms concerto. Nothing is easier than to avoid it. A very imposing musical Pooh-Bah it is and loftily does it refuse, like the versatile personage in Gilbert's libretto, to say, "How de do, little girl, how de do?" It conferred only a bowing acquaintance on Miss McCarthy. Indeed, in the end it treated her vengefully, for, like the indignant worm mentioned with so much pathos by Claude Melnotte, when trampled upon it turns and stings.

In the last movement it was pretty and petty playing that Miss McCarthy offered for public consideration, but it was received with vociferous gratitude long drawn out. The performer departed from observation flushed with the joy of crepitant acclamation.

Mendelssohn's Scotch symphony is seldom heard in these days of speculative music. It is a sweet and joyous work, with a scherzo which must make any heart glad that so much unadulterated good nature, such outdoor happiness and "sunburnt mirth" is to be found in music of unquestionable respectability. Such music is sometimes wholesome as an antidote; like tea, it cheers but does not inebriate. The orchestra played it impeccably and Mr. Gericke conducted contentedly.

N.Y. Press
Jan 17-04.

SYMPHONY'S LIGHTER VEIN.

Boston Orchestra, in Matinee, Offers a Clever Girl Violinist.

Not infrequent it happens that the matinees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are not as interesting as its evening concerts. This was the case yesterday, when this wonderfully drilled band of musicians gave its third matinee of the season in Carnegie Hall. Saint-Saens's overture to the opera "The Barbarians" did not approach in interest the Loeffler tone poem of last Thursday night. Mendelssohn's Scotch symphony can hardly bear comparison with Beethoven's eighth. Paine's ballet music, from the opera "Azara," is less effective than D'Albert's overture to "The Improvisatore," and although Brahms's violin concerto in D major is infinitely superior to Henselt's piano concerto in F minor, Miss Maud MacCarthy is not mature enough in thought and feeling to give it a satisfying interpretation, and consequently gave less pleasure than Thursday night's soloist, Ferruccio B. Busoni.

Does Mr. Gericke, perhaps, offer his afternoon audiences lighter fare in view of the many women and children from Brooklyn and the suburbs who attend these concerts? However, it is always a pleasure to listen with your mere ear to the Boston Orchestra. What a beautiful tone those strings can produce! How amazing is the technique of the wood-wind!

Brahms's beautiful concerto as played by that master violinist, Hugo Heerman, is too well remembered in New York to give much pleasure when taken in hand by so young a woman as Miss MacCarthy. The slender and graceful little Irish violinist has apparently improved her technical equipment since she was heard here last. Her tone is clear and sonorous, her intonation excellent, and her work clean cut throughout. Miss MacCarthy has a facile and reliable left hand, and her right arm is free and energetic. There is vigor and dash in her playing, and it is quite without affectation; but at the same time one looks in vain for the slightest suggestion of feeling. As colorless this playing as the singing of a boy soprano. Under the circumstances it seems as ridiculous for Miss MacCarthy to attempt to interpret the Brahms concerto as it would be for one of the boys in the choir of Calvary Church to sing the same composer's "Immer leiser wird mein Schlummer."

Some interest attaches to the opera "Azara," by John Knowles Paine, for Mr. Paine is professor of music in Harvard University, and there has been a movement on foot to persuade the Herr Director in the Metropolitan Opera House to give it a hearing. Of course Harvard has been loud in its cheers of approval for this work. That is as it should be. Now it may well be "Azara" is a work of genius. But it must be said the three Moorish Dances played yesterday do not show any marked originality or inspiration. Pretty music it is, and characteristic in its Oriental coloring. But Nikodé has written much which is far more effective and clever.

The Saint-Saens overture, which was played for the first time at these concerts, is also of no great consequences, and suffers from the prevailing lack of invention. What would some of the latter-day composers do without Wagner to lean upon? Mendelssohn's third symphony cannot give as much pleasure as it used to, even when played with the beauty of execution the Boston orchestra gives it. The sweetness of this melodious German seems affected and shallow.

NEW OVERTURE BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Saint-Saens' Music Played Here for the First Time at Yesterday's Concert.

IS HEARD IN CARNEGIE HALL

Miss Maud MacCarthy the Violin Soloist and Her Performance Was of a High Order.

In Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, before the usual large audience of cultivated listeners, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third matinee concert of the season.

The programme, while less of a triumph for Mr. Gericke's powers of selection than some others he has presented this winter, was on the whole a good one, with some points of decided strength. The list was headed with the overture to Saint-Saëns' opera, "The Barbarians," it included Brahms' concerto in D major for violin, opus 77, and the ballet music from James K. Paine's opera, "Azara," and closed with Mendelssohn's "Scotch Symphony." Miss Maud MacCarthy was the soloist.

The Saint-Saëns overture has not before been heard here. It is from one of the composer's most recent works, and is written in his most developed style, following not at all the overture form, but presenting at random the themes of the opera. Its principal charm is one of instrumental color—the melodies at a first hearing making small appeal in their own right.

Similar comment is appropriate for Dr. Paine's ballet music. The character of the three dances which make up this episode is confessedly Oriental, and to that end the rythmical elements of the score are decidedly ingenious. But beyond mere prettiness of rhythm and novelty of orchestration the dances seem to have nothing of real value.

Miss MacCarthy's bravery in attacking the Brahms concerto, "Against the Violin," as some one has called it, would have won admiration alone; but she earned higher praise. She possesses no great elegance of style, nor bigness of tone, yet her playing for all that has delightful qualities. It is straightforward, sincere, thoroughly musical and highly intelligent.

She rose nobly to the technical demands of the work—especially to those of the last movement—she sang the sustained passages in a charming "still, small voice," and she never wavered from the pitch.

The orchestra read the symphony breezily.

Staats Zeitung
Jan 17-04

Das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester.

Das sechste Konzert des Bostoner Symphonieorchesters fand gestern Nachmittag in Carnegie Hall statt. Das unvortheilhafte Wetter hatte zwar den Besuch nicht stark beeinträchtigt, aber es schien sich hemmend auf die Beifallsluft des Publikums zu legen. Oder war das Programm daran schuld, daß keine rechte kunstfreudige Stimmung aufkommen wollte?

Die Ouvertüre zu den „Barbaren", von Saint-Saëns, die das Konzert eröffnete, ist ein zwar merkwürdiges, aber herzlich uninteressantes Stück Musikmacherei. Berechnet für das offene Amphitheater in Orange, wurde die Oper dennoch an der Pariser Großen Oper aufgeführt, und die Ouvertüre wurde besonders für diesen Zweck zugestutzt. Sie scheint aus lauter Anläufen zu bestehen, aber zum kühnen Abspringen kommt es nirgends. Es ist ein höchst unerquickliches Ding, und das Publikum wußte offenbar nicht, was es daraus machen sollte.

Dagegen erzielten die Balletsätze aus der Oper „Azara" von John Knowles Paine wenigstens einen succes d'estime. Gut gearbeitete Kapellmeistermusik könnte man sie nennen, wenn Herr Paine nicht Professor wäre; so mag sie also als akademische Professorenmusik passiren. Alles mögliche Andere wird ein gelehrter Professor der Musik eher fertig bringen, als die Teufeleien eines exotischen Ballets glaubhaft musikalisch zu illustriren. Paine hat zwar französische Muster benutzt, — Instrumentationseinfälle aus Bizet's „L'Arlesienne"-Suite schimmern durch, — und um die Erfindung besonderer Klangkombinationen hat er sich eifrig bemüht, aber Terpsichore hatte ihn nicht inspirirt, als er diese Ballettmusik schrieb.

Die letzte und umfangreichste Orchesternummer war Mendelssohn's Schottische Symphonie. Etwas recht zahm, aber sehr glatt vom Orchester gespielt, befriedigte sie von allen Programm-Nummern am meisten.

Ueber die Solistin, Fräulein Maud MacCarthy, kann man sich kurz fassen. Die junge Dame geigte im vorigen Winter hier in einem Konzert der Philharmonischen Gesellschaft und wurde als viel zu leicht befunden. Damals wurde an dieser Stelle gesagt, daß sie zwar Talent habe, aber auf dessen Entfaltung noch warten müsse, bis sie an solchem Platze in die Virtuosen-Konkurrenz eintreten könne. Heute kann dem hinzugefügt werden, daß sie allerdings in dem verflossenen Jahre Fortschritte gemacht hat, aber noch immer einen weiten Weg bis zur Erreichung voller Künstlerschaft zu gehen hat. Sie spielte gestern mit mehr Ruhe und Sicherheit, aber ohne irgend welche künstlerische Freiheit und persönliche Besonderheit des Vortrags. Nun, und die Konzerte des Bostoner Symphonieorchesters sind doch eigentlich nicht dazu da, um Aspiranten Gelegenheit zu geben, von ihren technischen Fortschritten Kunde zu geben. Fräulein MacCarthy spielte gestern das Brahms'sche Concert, während sie im vorigen Jahre das Mendelssohn'sche gespielt hatte.

[84]

NEW YORK TIMES.
JANUARY 17. 1904.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Two New Pieces at Its Afternoon Concert in Carnegie Hall.

Saint-Saen's Overture, "Les Barbares," and Prof. Paine's Ballet Music—Miss MacCarthy Soloist.

The concert given yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which it brought to a close its January visit to New York, was not one of its most satisfactory offerings. The programme presented two compositions new to this city, neither of which proved to be worth the pains and time devoted to it, and a young solo violinist, Miss Maud MacCarthy, who, with her evident sincerity and ambition, does not yet stand upon an artistic level that ought to give her access to these concerts.

The first of the new pieces was Saint Säens's overture to "Les Barbares," one of a series of operas and lyric dramas based upon classical and mythological subjects, to which in his old age he has been devoting his attention. This one was composed for production in the restored Roman amphitheatre at Orange in France—a drama dealing with a supposed attack of the Germans upon this very amphitheatre. The music of the overture was afterward rearranged for production in Paris as a concert piece.

It is not one of Saint Saëns's notable contributions to dramatic music. It has little tragic power, suggests little of the clash of armed men and the fierce passions of barbarous warfare, or of the love of the Teutonic leader for the vestal virgin. It is without distinction or musical inventiveness; it is written skillfully, fluently, but without the trace of strong inspiration; it has little even of the richness and variety of orchestral color with which well schooled young composers of the present day are wont to conceal their lack of ideas.

The other composition played for the first time here was the ballet music in Prof. J. K. Paine's opera "Azara." There has been much interest in this opera on the part of friends of American music and admirers of the dean of American composers. A numerously signed petition has been presented to Mr. Conried asking him to perform it at the Metropolitan Opera House. A few concert performances of parts of the music have been given, but the work is practically still unknown.

With all deference to Prof. Paine, and with remembrance of much noble and notable music that he has created, it must be said that this ballet music is in no way likely to enhance his repute. Such music is not expected to be, indeed must not be, deep or even poignantly expressive. But it must be alive with the movement of the dance, it must beguile the listener with charming melodies and seductive rhythms; it must glow and blaze with color. If its themes are light, they must at least have distinction. Now, none of these things can be said of Prof. Paine's music except with much reserve.

It is Oriental in its intention—"Moorish Dances" the three pieces are called. They conform in a certain way to the conventional Oriental formulas that Western musicians follow when they wish to interpret the East in music; but there is very little that is convincing about their Orientalism; they have little of the feverish intensity and the languor, the seizing rhythmic accent. Nor do they justify themselves through brilliancy of orchestral coloring. They are well written and not more.

Miss MacCarthy made a considerably better impression than she did at a rather unfortunate appearance here about a year ago with the Philharmonic Society. She undertook one of the most arduous tasks that a violinist can set before himself today—the performance of Brahams's nobly beautiful and profoundly felt violin concerto. It requires not only the most accomplished technical powers of all sorts, but the ripest feeling and clearest insight and the broadest view. Miss MacCarthy is still a very young lady, and it is by no means a disparagement of her present powers or the possibilities that are before her to say that she failed to compass this great work in her performance of it.

The technical side of it she achieved with a measure of success quite unexpected to those who heard her last year, with a nervous energy and strength that do not seem to belong to that slender physique, with a fluency and an accuracy that were rarely failing; and yet, as it seemed, with the air of coming close all the time to the limit of her capabilities. There was intelligence in her idea of the work, but there was little breadth or dignity or deep feeling for the musical beauty of the composition. Her tone, while ample in volume, is not of sensuous beauty or great charm. Her performance was in so far remarkable as being that of a young girl; but it was not one of the artistic value that the audience of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York expects to hear.

The concert was ended with Mendelssohn's picturesque Scotch symphony—a work that is appearing seldom upon concert programmes nowadays; the fact that Mr. Gericke's repetition of it was the second that has been heard in New York this Winter is rather in the nature of a curious coincidence than an indication of a public demand for Mendelssohn's orchestral compositions. It has many elements that can please and delight even to-day, though its formal primness seems old fashioned, especially in a symphony so frankly intended as a reproduction of the atmosphere, the romance, and spirit of Scotland. But it is good to renew acquaintance with a work so charming as this still is.

DAILY TRIBUNE.
JANUARY 17. 1904.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It was not until Mr. Gericke got back to something like his own first principles in the programme of the third afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday that the music became as completely enjoyable as the concerts of the Boston organization usually are. The return was made in the second part, when Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony was played. Before it the audience listened to the overture to Saint-Saëns's lyric tragedy, "Les Barbares"; Brahms's violin concerto, played by Miss Maud MacCarthy, and three Moorish dances from Professor J. K. Paine's opera "Azara." The overture made no deep impression; in fact, it scarcely ripp'ed the surface of popular interest. The story of the opera for which it was designed as an introduction is gloomily tragic; it deals with murderous passions, aroused by the clash between half-savage Teutonism and Roman civilization. Mr. Philip Hale, the fascinating annotator of the Boston Orchestra's programme, gives us to understand that the overture was originally a sort of melodramatic prologue in which a rhapsode of the old order tells how three thousand Germans, rushing through Gaul, drove before them into the woods the folk of the country and Roman legions powerless to resist. Only Floria, the beautiful vestal, knew how to stop them at Orleans; but Vesta found a way of avenging in the blood of the conqueror the outrage offered to the gods. Floria is a vestal virgin who gives herself as a sacrifice to the leader of the barbarian invaders; but Livie, the wife of one of the Roman consuls killed in the battle by the leader Marcomir, plunges her husband's sword through his breast. Strains sinister and threatening, songs fiercely exultant, savage lust and high patriotism might have been raised to color such a tale; but Saint-Saëns did not give them voice. There was some muttering in the orchestral depths, the clangor of muted trumpets cut through the orchestral fabric at times, but the stern and bloody spirit of the story was not bodied forth in the music nor more than hinted at. A master hand marshalled the themes, trained skill wrapped them in interesting harmonic and orchestral integument, but impressiveness and beauty of thought and presentation were missing.

Miss MacCarthy played the Mendelssohn concerto and the slow movement of the Saint-Saëns concerto in B minor at a Philharmonic Concert last season, and the entire concerto of Saint-Saëns, besides a Beethoven sonato, at a recital in Mendelssohn Hall a year ago. She invited gentle interest by her unmistakable gifts then, though failing to convince her critical listeners that she had reached the full artistic stature expected of a participant in such concerts as those of the Philharmonic and Boston bands. Yesterday she submitted herself to a still severer test. Brahms's concerto is not pabulum for artistic adolescence, but strong meat for strong men. Many of its technical difficulties were bravely attacked and put to rout by Miss MacCarthy, and there were moments of neat charm in her performanee of the slow movement; but the serenely exalted proclamation which permeates the work as a whole was left unuttered. But she received an extremely kind reception from the audience.

Professor Paine's friends made a strong appeal to Mr. Conried last fall to have the opera "Azara," for which he wrote both words and music, included in the repertory of the Metropolitan Opera House this season. The effort failed for reasons with which the artistic merit of the work probably had nothing to do. The ballet music played yesterday did not enable the audience to judge whether much or little had been lost by the omission of the opera from the current list. Mr. Paine's muse is not one of merry mood; she is of sterner stuff and her natural footgear is the cothurnus, which is ill adapted to tripping measures. There were suggestions of the languid Oriental color so successfully applied by Rubinstein in his "Feramors" ballet in Mr. Paine's dances, but the learned composer seemed afraid to follow a simple, melodious way, and no sooner announced a pretty tune than he began to enmesh it in intricate treatment. Yet the dances brightened the scheme of the concert.

N.Y. Post
June 18-04

Saint-Saens, Brahms, Paine, and Mendelssohn.

The four composers mentioned in the headline divided the honors between themselves at Saturday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Saint-Saëns was represented by his overture to "The Barbarians," a lyric tragedy by Sardou and Gheusi, which was produced at the Grand Opéra in Paris, in 1901, having been originally composed for the Théâtre Antique at Orange, where the scene is placed in the year 113 B. C., during the invasion of Gaul by the Cimbrians and Teutons. The plot, which suggests "Monna Vanna," has, to judge by this overture, inspired the composer with some admirable music, which, however, would naturally gain much by being heard with scenic concomitants. Every bar of this music is an intellectual treat. The structure is free and natural, unfettered by ideas of symmetry; the harmonies are often novel and weird enough to please the neo-Russians; and the orchestral colors are of a rich, warm quality that Berlioz never dreamed of. Truly, Saint-Saëns is the most interesting of France's composers. He wrote this opera at the age when Wagner began his "Parsifal"; he is now sixty-nine, and to judge by this specimen of his latest art, for which we must thank Mr. Gericke, he is good for many other things of beauty. Was not Haydn sixty-seven and sixty-nine years old, respectively, when he finished his best two works, "The Creation" and "The Seasons"?

An unpleasant contrast to this sensuous and emotional music was afforded by the next number, the Brahms violin concerto, which Miss Maud MacCarthy undertook to play. It was sad to see one so young and fair wedded to such a decrepit, senile composition, the dullest Machwerk that Brahms ever perpetrated. Philip Hale cites a prominent Leipsic critic who, when this concerto was first played by Joachim (to whom it is dedicated), wrote that even that great violinist too evidently had great difficulty in playing it. For a girl of twenty it is as unsuitable as football, though for different reasons. Miss MacCarthy needs good advisers.

A year or two ago, when Mr. Gericke played the ballet music from Professor Paine's opera in Boston, and in the almost equally remote borough of Brooklyn, there was much disappointment because he did not include it in his Carnegie Hall programmes. He has now atoned for that omission, and on Saturday we had an opportunity to hear these excerpts from "Azara"—the Moorish dances which form the last scene but one in the opera. Heretofore Professor Paine has seemed preëminently a composer of symphonic and tragic predilections; these operatic selections show him in a lighter mood. They are not so highly spiced with Orientalisms as some of the works of Rubinstein and Goldmark, but the same can be said of the music of the Andalusian flower maidens in "Parsifal," which is purely Wagnerian. Professor Paine has made some use of the Oriental intervals, most effectively in the allegretto animato, but, on the whole, he relies more on broad, sensuous melody, and on the rich orchestral colors he has at his command. His Ballet Music was warmly applauded, and it is pleasant to think that Mr. Conried has "Azara" under consideration for next season. But what will some of the clergymen say to this new manifestation of national depravity—a Harvard professor writing Moorish ballet music?

For his last number Mr. Gericke had Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, a sadly antiquated composition as a whole, and full of pilferings from Beethoven. How much more interesting it would have been to hear one of Rubinstein's neglected symphonies—the "Dramatic," the "Ocean," or the "Russian"! Musical taste has undergone a great change since Mendelssohn's symphony made its first appearance. The Paris programme which included it was also adorned with a "concertino for trombone, played by Frederick Belche, first trombone of the King of Prussia." This was in 1844; in 1845 the New York Philharmonic Orchestra played it, in conjunction with arias by Rossini and Mercadante, a harp solo, and a fantasia on one of Halévy's operas. In Boston it was played a year later, in company with compositions by Lindpainter, Donizetti, Reissiger, Coppola. In those days Mendelssohn must have seemed a giant.

Springfield Republican
Jan. 22-04

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A Fine Concert in Foot Guard Hall, Hartford—Appearance of the New Violoncellist, Rudolf Krasselt.

From Our Special Reporter.

HARTFORD, Ct., Tuesday, January 19.

The second of the three concerts to be given in Hartford this season took place last evening in Foot Guard hall, and was no less successful than its predecessor. It may be recalled that when the sudden death of a prominent supporter of these concerts made it difficult for the teachers' guild to keep up its practice of engaging the orchestra, the well-known music dealer Mr Gallup courageously stepped into the breach, and offered to guarantee and finance a series of three concerts. The result has fully justified his action. The season sale was large, and there is a considerable demand for tickets to the separate concerts, so that while the orchestra costs much more than most people realize the expenses will be fully met, with something to spare. Springfield might well be stirred to emulation of the sister city down the river, and the growing interest in orchestral music would seem to justify some enlargement of the plans for next year in your city.

The concert to-night was in some respects not unlike the one given last evening in your city, but it was more brilliantly played. Whether this was due to the conductor or the players, or whether, as seems more probable, it was the result of the superior acoustic properties of Foot Guard hall as compared with Court Square theater, it would be hard to say, but the difference was rather noticeable. There was nothing to-night, it is true, quite so brilliant and effective as Mr Busoni's rendering of the Henselt concerto in Springfield, but the orchestral numbers were appreciably more sonorous and more animated. It is seldom that one can hear so smooth, so gay, and so brilliant a performance of Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, which was to-night the closing number, and even though coming at the end of a long program, held the attention of the audience closely. The other orchestral numbers were Weber's lovely "Euryanthe" overture, which gave a chance for some delightful solo playing by various members of the band of virtuosi, and "Moorish Dances" from Prof J. K. Paine's unperformed grand opera "Azara." This music is melodious, well orchestrated, and not lacking in eastern color. Like the other selections, it was excellently played.

There were to-night two soloists, George Ensworth, a baritone from Boston, and Rudolph Krasselt, the newly-imported 'cello virtuoso of the orchestra, who played the well-known concerto in A minor by Saint-Saens. This is one of the best and most pleasing of the few standard concertos for violoncello and piano, and the dainty allegretto is really a gem. There is comparatively little mere virtuoso display in this concerto, and most of it is quite in the best and most expressive idiom of the instrument. Mr Krasselt plays well—for a young man of his years uncommonly well. His tone is warm and pure, and he never forces it unpleasantly, while his scales and other technical passages showed a well-developed though by no means remarkable left hand. The recitativo passages, which call for a high degree of taste and discretion, were as a rule given in a broad and satisfying way, and the cantilene of the allegretto was sweet and graceful. Mr Krasselt is a promising player and with experience he will no doubt make for himself a distinguished place. Mr Ensworth sang for his first number Massenet's well-known aria, "Vision fugitive" from "Herodiade." At his second appearance he gave two fine songs by Strauss, "Heimliche Aufforderung," and "Morgen," and Tschaikowsky's "Pilgrim's Song." His voice has some nasal notes and suffers from excess of vibrato, but has a good fundamental quality, and he sings with taste and feeling. The first of the Strauss songs was particularly good. The accompaniments were played in an unusually artistic manner, and one would be glad to know where the credit should go. Was it Mrs Tapper of Boston who played?

BOSTON HERALD-
JANUARY 22, 1904.

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

Orchestra Will Play Svendsen's Symphony No. 2 at Today's Public Rehearsal.

The programme of the 12th public rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra at Symphony Hall this afternoon is not the one announced a fortnight ago. The concerto this week will begin with Svendsen's symphony in B flat major, No. 2, which has not been played here for many years. It was published in 1877, the year the more familiar "Carnival at Paris" was published, and it was performed for the first time at a Gewandhaus concert at Leipsic that year. The Leipsic critics insisted that it was too Scandinavian; extreme "nationality" in music was not then fashionable.

Volkmann's Serenade No. 3 in D minor will be the second piece, and Mr. Krasselt will play the solo violoncello part, first played here by Louis Lubeck with Theodore Thomas' orchestra. The piece, with its contrasted moods of gloom and gayety and its antiphonal passages for 'cello and strings, is familiar here. Messrs. Giese, Hekking and Schroeder have in their turn been the solo 'cellists at Symphony concerts. "In Carnival Time," a suite by Georg Schumann of Berlin, will be played here for the first time. It was produced by Mr. Nikisch at Berlin, Feb. 20, 1899. The suite is in three movements. The first, in waltz tempo, portrays a ball room scene, and, from a short programme furnished by the composer, it seems there is an attempt to characterize sundry couples. The second movement is in the form of an old-fashioned gavotte, danced for the amusement of the crowd. The finale bears the sub-title, "Humoreske," and pictures the confusion at its height. The final piece is the overture to "Der Freischnetz."

[85]

Boston Topics
Jany 21-04

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra has been in town again flirting with our ears. The regular trips of this wonderful band are like so many doses of aural Spring medicine: they clean away many clogging memories of bad orchestral performances and put us in the way we should go, so that when the other orchestras play at us we will not depart from it. At the Thursday's concert Ferruccio Benvenuto Busoni played that much-abused instrument, the piano. There was a time—a decade or so ago—when this pianist lived here, but since then he has thought better of life and has played abroad. Busoni is not a pianist of the Boston Common or Gardner variety. He has what so many other depressors of the ivory have—fleet fingers and obedient wrists; but these qualities alone do not make an artist, and Busoni is an artist. He has intellect, temperament and manliness. Why he chose the sweet-voiced Henselt F minor Concerto to reintroduce himself I do not know, but I suspect that it was to display a side of his playing nature that will not be aired much when he is heard in recital. The slow movement is very lovely, and if we were not such unsentimental wretches we would applaud its popular tunefulness. The programme boasted a novelty: D'Albert's overture to his opera, "The Improvisator," which is brilliant but not very original. There is one bit in it that Sousa needs hear but once and the temperature of brass band wind-jammers will rise, while John Philip will buy another acre of Washington real estate with the royalties of a new march. To return to our beans, the Boston Orchestra also played Beethoven's gem of a symphony in F and Loeffler's symphonic poem, "The Death of Tintagiles." This work has had one hearing here and at that time set the Philistines a-roaring. Evidently Loeffler wanted to let them roar again. It is one of the most beautiful works for the orchestra that it has ever been my pleasure to hear; and it is as subtle as it is beautiful. What do you hear, my lord? Moods, moods, moods! But compare them with the Maeterlinck drama that underlies this composition and you will find corresponding moods there. Is this not great art, to be able to suggest by way of the ear what the dramatist does by way of the eye? And this Loeffler does, taking advantage of the poetic indefiniteness of music to frame his images even more subtly than does he who deals with words, each one of which has a dictionary equivalent. Loeffler's orchestration is superb, and the solo use of the viole d'amour—played by the composer—convinces anyone that a viola need not necessarily spell monotony to the ear. Now that he has retired from the grind of orchestral playing, this composer should put his modesty behind him and let us hear more of his compositions in public. He has lived among us so long that we like to consider him an American and his work the work of an American composer. We are much in need of compositions like his. They help establish our musical self-respect as a race.

At the Boston matinée Miss Maud MacCarthy played Brahms's violin concerto much better than I thought she could play it, and much worse than it has been played here within a year. She is a protégée of Nellie Trill Melba and is a pupil of Arbos, who is now the concertmaster of the Boston Orchestra. She has more regard for pitch than has her teacher, but she does not trill half so ravishingly as does her patron. Between the two she is a trim, slim girl who looks young and plays better than she did last year. I have often sympathized with these young artists who are "discovered" by musical tuft hunters. It must keep them awake at night to plan how they can possibly live up to the expectations of the rich folks who are fathering and mothering them financially, and even socially. If Miss MacCarthy were left alone for a few years until her tone loses some of its blondness, and until she realizes that a work like the Brahms concerto needs to be understood as well as memorized, it probably would be much better for her. But she is put before big audiences with celebrated orchestras to play her accompaniments. She plays very well—no one will deny that—but her playing is not the playing of a great artist; and the Brahms concerto has been played here recently by at least one great artist.

At this concert, too, Mr. Gericke offered some novelties to our ears. There was, for instance, Saint-Saëns's overture to "Les Barbares," which is about as cleverly empty and moodless a piece of writing as ever I have heard. The composer is actually swamped by his fertility of expression so that he expresses even when he has nothing to express. He has been pretty careful, however, in this overture to avoid any tunefulness, which is surprisingly strange for Saint-Saëns. Then there were three Moorish dances from Paine's opera, "Azara." The Harvard professor is not born to be a writer of ballet music, if we are to judge by these samples. They sound in part as though they were composed by a Délibes with Bostonized locomotor ataxia. Neatly scored and decently short, they might sound much better in their opera scene with a luxuriant ballet to divert the ears from the music. The concert concluded with Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony. I am about tired of being told that this is beautiful music. Of course it is beautiful; it is too morally beautiful to be true. It smirks. It sounds like the sort of music you could haggle and drive a bargain with if you had persistence enough. Of the big, brutal honesty of things there is no suggestion. I cannot imagine this music offending anybody, but I confess being sick of its simpering melodic honesty and shortness of purpose; and I still believe in a day of forgiveness for music critics.

BOSTON [illegible] DAY POST,
JANUARY 24, 1904

12TH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Orchestral Numbers by Svendsen, Volkmann, G. Schumann and Weber

There was no soloist at the 12th Symphony concert of last evening, the programme presenting the following orchestral numbers:

Symphony No. 2, op. 15.....Svendsen
Serenade No. 3, D minor, op. 69.....Volkmann
Suite "In Carnival Time," op. 22.....G. Schumann
Overture to "Der Freischutz".....Weber

The first two numbers were resurrected from the archives of the orchestra, for Svendsen's symphony has not been heard at these concerts for 20 years, and Volkmann's serenade has remained quiescent for 10 seasons or so.

The symphony proved to be one that was well worth a revival. It is finely written, the thematic material being very melodic and interesting. The andante is less of a symphonic nature than the other movements, but is of the sort to please many, and the intermezzo proved most enjoyable. The symphony as a whole was well received and to most of the audience it was as much of a novelty as if it had been written only recently instead of nearly 20 years ago. It should be given again in the near future.

Volkmann's serenade for 'cello obligato and string orchestra is of the melancholy sort, although an interesting work. The composer had a hard struggle most of his life and his misfortunes were probably reflected in his music, even in such as the serenade heard last evening. The work was superbly played, the feature being the obligato played by Mr. Krasselt, which, no doubt, was largely responsible for the enthusiastic applause which the work received.

Then followed a novelty, given for the first time in America: the orchestral suite, "In Carnival Time," by George Schumann, who is probably not related to a more famous composer of the same name.

George Schumann, about 38 years old, is living in Berlin, where he is director of the "Singacademie." He has written many things in large and small forms, two or three of which have been played at previous Symphony concerts. His "Carnival" suite is brilliantly scored and cleverly written, being in three sections. The second, in gavotte form, is the best, and would make an effective excerpt for a "pop concert." The suite, as a whole, made a fairly good impression, but the audience failed to enthuse excepting after the gavotte movement.

The familiar "Freischutz" overture brought the ending to a concert that to many was as enjoyable as any of the season thus far, one-half of which is now a matter of musical history. The 13th rehearsal and concert this coming week will present a programme that includes Rubinstein's A minor symphony, a new symphonic poem by Kaun, the "Bartered Bride" overture by Smetana, and George Proctor will play the Liszt E-flat concerto.

SOCIETY PEOPLE HEAR SYMPHONY

Friday's downpour and general unpleasantness notwithstanding, there was a large and brilliant attendance at the Symphony rehearsal, every seat in the hall being filled. The fact that there was no soloist evidently had little power to keep people away, and the programme was unanimously voted a delightful one. Among those so fortunate as to be present were Mrs. S. V. R. Crosby, Mrs. Kenneth Haughton, Miss Susan Amory, Miss Estelle H. Kimball, Mrs. John B. Osborn, Miss Jane Waldron, Miss Martha Waldron, Mrs. Frederick B. Carpenter, Miss Madeline Davis, Mrs. Hall Curtis, Mrs. William A. Burnham, Mr. and Mrs. Albert F. Bigelow, Mrs. Frederick R. Sears, Sr., Mrs. Frank Peabody, Jr., Mrs. Thomas W. Lawson, with two of her daughters, Mrs. Fred Richardson, Miss Alice Gardiner, Miss Mollie Sargent, Mrs. Boylston Beale, Mrs. Bryce J. Allan, Miss Catherine Thayer, Mrs. Eben D. Jordan, Miss Dorothy Jordan, Miss Barbara Higginson, Miss Sarah Lawrence, Miss Rachel Brooks, Miss Harriet Curtis, Miss Priscilla Stackpole, Mrs. Washington G. Benedict, Miss May Kenney, Mrs. William Lindsey of London, Miss May L. Greenleaf, Mrs. George Shattuck, Mrs. James B. Forsyth, Miss Eleanor Sohier, Miss Alice Sohier, Miss Susan Wainwright, Miss Mary Parkman, Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Miss Edith Stackpole, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore Gooding, Mrs. I. Harris Metcalf, Mrs. William P. Fay and her daughter, Miss Katherine Fay, Miss Hannah Stevenson, Mrs. John L. Gardner, Miss Olivia Thorndike and Mrs. Curtis Guild, Jr., who had with her her sister, Miss Mollie Johnson.

[illegible] HERALD,
JANUARY 24, 1904.

TWELFTH SYMPHONY NIGHT.

Georg Schumann's New Work Is on the Programme.

It Is "In Carnival Time," but It Is Not Very Festive or Rollicking—An Unfamiliar Symphony by Svendsen—Some Novelties of the Symphony Season.

The programme of the 12th Symphony concert, Mr. Gericke conductor, in Symphony Hall last night, was as follows:

Symphony No. 2, B-flat major, op. 15..Svendsen
Serenade No. 3 in D minor, op. 69...Volkmann
"In Carnival Time," suite op. 22.....
(First time.) Georg Schumann
Overture to "Der Freischuetz".....Weber

The symphony, by Svendsen is little known here; it was produced by Mr. Henschel in 1884. The suite by Schumann was played for the first time.

Mr. Gericke has brought out this season an entr'acte from Bruneau's "Messidor," a symphony by Glazounoff, D'Indy's "La Foret Enchantee," Dohnanyi's symphony in D minor, Tschaikowsky's "The Voyvode," Elgar's variations on an original theme, the overtures to d'Albert's "Improvisatore" and Saint-Saens' "Barbarians," Raff's overture, "Ein Feste Burg," was played here for the first time at these concerts—and why? It was well worth while to produce the symphony by Glazounoff and the pieces by Bruneau and D'Indy. The symphony gave so many pleasure that it was repeated, an unusual occurrence in the history of these concerts.

To some, perhaps to many, the posthumous symphonic poem by Tschaikowsky, and the overtures seemed inferior works, and some have asked "Why are such pieces played?" The answer is a simple one: it is a good thing to hear at least once the poorer works of leading composers; it is a part of one's musical education to be acquainted with the weakness as well as the strength of a composer; it is not only a good thing, it is necessary to know what contemporary musicians, as Saint-Saens, Elgar D'Albert, Georg Schumann, Dohnanyi, are doing.

The overture to "The Improvisatore" had been played in Chicago and in Cincinnati before we heard it. The overture to "The Barbarians" had been played in Chicago before we found out for ourselves that it was barren of ideas. Our novelties come late. "The Dream of Gerontius" has already been performed in Germany and in Australia, at New York and at Chicago. Elgar's "Variations" were over four years old, and they had been performed in many European cities before we all learned from personal acquaintance that they are a curious mixture of originality and commonplace, nobility and rank sentimentalism, abyssmal dulness and extreme brilliance.

Masterpieces are not written every week and delivered promptly in a neatly tied parcel on Saturday night. It is too much to expect or to demand that each new composition should be an imperishable thing of beauty. What miracles of dulness may be found in the complete works of Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann!

Nor should true masterpieces be given so often that they become too familiar and run the risk of sharing the fate of Aristides. Suppose all the better symphonies of Beethoven were given each season, or that Cesar Franck's symphony, or Schubert's "Unfinished," or the second by Brahms, or the fifth by Tschaikowsky, was performed once a month during a season, would they not lose through such familiarity?

When 24 concerts are given in a season, there must inevitably be performances of works of the second rank. There are times when a novel by Mortimer Collins will give more pleasure than a novel by Balzac. An audience is not always prepared to associate with masterpieces The symphony by Glazounoff produced this season is not a great work, but it is full of color, it has life, it is brilliant. The overture by d'Albert as a picture of the carnival is not to be named in the same breath with Berlioz's overture; but d'Albert is alive, he is a musician of parts, and the public of Boston should know what he has been doing of late. When 20 new pieces are brought out it is doubtful whether one hearer out of ten would care to hear a dozen of these pieces a second time; but has he not a right to ask for reasonable ground for his opinion? He cannot justly condemn or avoid the thing unheard.

Last night the symphony was new to nine-tenths of the audience, and probably no one was acquainted with the suite by Schumann. When the symphony was heard for the first time in Leipsic, there was much talk about its "national" character.

Music that is first of all "national" seldom, if ever, lives a long life outside its parish. The nationality of an individual enters into the expression of his thought, and into his thought itself, but his emotions must be of universal interest; he may be a Swede or a Bulgarian, an American or a Russian, but he must be, first of all, intensely human. The nationality must not be worn as a plausible garment. George Moore said in a bilious moment—and he is often bilious—that the reader of Thomas Hardy's novels is invited "to assist at a sheep-shearing scene, or at a harvest supper, because these scenes are not to be found in the works of George Eliot, because the reader is supposed to be interested in such things, because Mr. Hardy is anxious to show how jolly country he is." The reproach, unjust as applied to Hardy, might be brought against certain composers.

Svendsen's symphony is not unduly national. The good and substantial things in it may be enjoyed by the music lover of any country. The weak pages are not weak because they are "national"; they must seem weak to any Scandinavian composer or experienced listener. The first movement is still fresh and individual. Its frankness is engaging. In this pessimistic period the charge of "gloom" that was brought against the symphony as a whole when it first appeared seems preposterous. The second movement is often sentimental, and the simplicity of the song becomes affectation; the artlessness is suspicious. It is the weakest portion of the symphony. The intermezzo will always win the applause of the audience at large. A Scandinavian masquerades as Mendelssohn and pipes a scherzo near a mist-enshrouded burial mound. The finale has more of what we are accustomed to call Norwegian color; this color is here raw; there are none of the delicate nuances of Grieg. And when the symphony has been played, and after listening to other music, the hearer leaves the hall, the one impression made by the symphony is that made by the first movement.

Schumann's "In Carnival Time" was produced by Mr. Nikisch at a Philharmonic concert in Berlin, Feb. 20, 1903. The work is in three movements and it is scored for full orchestra. The composer furnished his own programme for the Berlin concert, but the argument is not printed in the score. The first movement portrays ballroom scenes. The prevailing tempo is that of a waltz, but there are several relieving episodes in which various characters are introduced. The music of the general gayety suggests that many of the dancers wear rubber boots. There is little lightness, there is no esprit. There is no snappy drawn characterization of couples. Here and there an episode is not without a graceful orchestral touch; but how far we are from the dash and brilliance of French pieces of like nature. The second movement is in gavotte form. The gavotte here is not the original peasants' dance; it has the pomp and ceremony of the court. This movement is by far the most characteristic of the three. The repetition of the chief motive by the brass, however, is out of character, and suggests a late ball of an outer boulevard. The third movement bears for a sub-title the word "Humoreske"; and here there might be a discussion of humor as it is understood by the Germans, with digressions concerning Tile Eulenspiegel's pranks, Jean Paul Richter, and the Munich comic papers. The humor of this particular movement is not unlike that of a railroad accident. The music has little or no distinction, and there is not even delirious can-can jollity.

The revival of Volkmann's episodic serenade gave Mr. Krasselt the opportunity to display a fine tone and much taste. The work itself seems singularly old-fashioned. Hungarian strains are mingled with echoes from a synagogue. Yet every now and then there is a passage that makes one regret the bitterly melancholy life of the composer, who more than once seemed to be on the point of catching and holding Fame.

SYMPHONY HALL was filled, as usual, for the rehearsal Friday afternoon. In the crowd of well-gowned women were especially noted Mrs. William Burnham, Mrs. Charles Fry, Mrs. James Jackson, Mrs. Curtis Guild, Jr., and Miss Molly Johnson, Mrs. William P. Fay and Miss Katherine Fay, Mrs. Kenneth Horton and Miss Susan Amory, Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Mrs. George B. Shattuck, Mrs. F. R. Sears, Sr., Mrs. S. V. R. Crosby and Mrs. Boylston Beal, Mrs. Frank Peabody, Jr., Miss Rachel Brooks, the latest fiancee, with Miss Harriot Curtis, Mrs. J. L. Gardner, Mrs. Eben D. Jordan and Miss Dorothy Jordan, Mrs. Dudley Fay and Miss Alice Fay, Mrs. Hall Curtis, Mrs. Frederick Richardson, Mrs. Frederick Lowell, Mrs. Albert F. Bigelow, Miss Katherine Thayer, Miss Hannah Stevenson, Miss Emily Bacon and Miss Aleid Schenck, Miss Alice Perry with Miss Elizabeth Shattuck, Miss Edith Stackpole, Miss Priscilla Stackpole with Mrs. Bryce Allan, Miss Susie Howe, Miss Eleanor and Miss Alice Sohier, Miss May Greenleaf, Miss Barbara Higginson, Mrs. J. B. Osborn, Mrs. F. B. Carpenter, Miss Estelle Kimball, Miss Sarah Lawrence, Miss Alice Gardiner, Miss Susan Wainwright, Miss Mary Parkman, Miss Molly Sargent, Miss Madeleine Davis, Miss May Kenney, Mrs. J. B. Forsyth, Mrs. Washington Benedict, Miss Jane and Miss Martha Waldron, Miss Oliva Thorndike and Mrs. Theodore Gooding. Mr. George Proctor will be the soloist this week.

Mr. Rudolf Krasselt, who played the solo of the Volkman Serenade Friday afternoon and last night so beautifully, is to be one of the artists at Mrs. Field's subscription musicale at the Somerset tomorrow morning. Miss Laura Hawkins is to be the accompanist.

[86]

Boston Topics
Jany 1-04

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra has been in town again flirting with our ears. The regular trips of this wonderful band are like so many doses of aural Spring medicine: they clean away many clogging memories of bad orchestral performances and put us in the way we should go, so that when the other orchestras play at us we will not depart from it. At the Thursday's concert Ferruccio Benvenuto Busoni played that much-abused instrument, the piano. There was a time—a decade or so ago—when this pianist lived here, but since then he has thought better of life and has stayed abroad. Busoni is not a pianist of the Boston Common or Gardner variety. He has what so many other depressors of the ivory have—fleet fingers and obedient wrists; but these qualities alone do not make an artist, and Busoni is an artist. He has intellect, temperament and manliness. Why he chose the sweet-voiced [illegible] F minor Concerto to reintroduce himself I do not know, but I suspect that it was to display a side of his playing nature that will not be aired much when he is heard in recital. The slow movement is very lovely, and if we were not such unsentimental creatures we would applaud its popular tunefulness. The programme boasted a novelty: D'Albert's overture to his opera, "The Improvisator," which is brilliant but not very original. There is nothing but in it that Sousa needs hear but once and the temperature of brass band wind-jammers will rise, while John Philip will buy another acre of Washington real estate with the royalties of a new march. To return to our beans, the Boston Orchestra also played Beethoven's gem of a symphony in F and Loeffler's symphonic poem, "The Death of Tintagiles." This work has had one hearing only, and at that time set the Philistines a-roaring. Evidently Mr. Gericke wanted to let them roar again. It is one of the most beautiful works for the orchestra that it has ever been my pleasure to hear, and it is as subtle as it is beautiful. What do you hear, my dear? Moods, moods, moods! But compare them with the Maeterlinck drama that underlies this composition and you will find corresponding moods there. Is this not great art, to be able to suggest to the ear what the dramatist does by way of the eye? Mr. Loeffler does, taking advantage of the poetic indefiniteness to frame his images even more subtly than does he with words, each one of which has a dictionary equivalent. His orchestration is superb, and the solo use of the [illegible] played by the composer convinces anyone that a violin necessarily spell monotony to the ear. Now that from the grind of orchestral playing, this composer has modestly stepped behind him and let us hear more of his compositions in public. He has lived among us so long that we like to consider him an American and his work the work of an American composer. We are much in need of compositions like his. They help establish our musical self-respect as a race.

At the Boston matinée Miss Maud MacCarthy played Brahms's violin concerto much better than I thought she could play it, and much better than it has been played here within a year. She is a pupil of Nellie Tri[illegible]elba and is a pupil of Arbos, who is now the concert master of the Boston Orchestra. She has more regard for tradition than has her teacher, but she does not trill half so ravishingly as Melba. Between the two she is a trim, slim girl who looks younger and better than she did last year. I have often sympathized with these young artists who are "discovered" by musical [illegible]. It must keep them awake at night to plan how they can possibly live up to the expectations of the rich folks who are [illegible] and mothering them financially, and even socially. If Miss MacCarthy were left alone for a few years until her tone loses some of its hardness, and until she realizes that a work like the Brahms concerto needs to be understood as well as memorized, it would be much better for her. But she is put before big audiences with celebrated orchestras to play her accompaniments. She does very well [illegible] one will deny that—but her playing is not [illegible] of a great artist; and the Brahms concerto has been played recently by at least one great artist.

At the concert, too, Mr. Gericke offered some novelties to our ears. One was for instance, Saint-Saëns's overture to "Les Barbares," which is about as cleverly empty and moodless a piece of music as ever I have heard. The composer is actually swamped by his facility of expression so that he expresses even when he has nothing to express. He has been pretty careful, however, in this respect to avoid any tunefulness, which is surprisingly strange for Saint-Saëns. Then there were three Moorish dances from Paine's "Azara." The Harvard professor is not born to be a writer of music, if we are to judge by these samples. They sound as though they were composed by a Délibes with Bostonized ears. Neatly scored and decently short, they might serve for [illegible] in their opera scene with a luxuriant ballet to illustrate the music. The concert concluded with Mendelssohn's Fourth Symphony. I am about tired of being told that this is [illegible] music. Of course it is beautiful; it is too morally beautiful to be true. It smirks. It sounds like the sort of music you could [illegible] and drive a bargain with if you had persistence enough. There is no big, brutal honesty of things there is no suggestion. I cannot [illegible] this music offending anybody, but I confess being sick of its [illegible]ering melodic honesty and shortness of purpose; and I shall [illegible]ove in a day for forgiveness for music critics.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST,
JANUARY 24, 1904

12TH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Orchestral Numbers by Svendsen Volkmann, G. Schumann and Weber

There was no soloist at the 12th Symphony concert of last evening, the programme presenting the following orchestral numbers:

Symphony No. 2, op. 15.....Svendsen
Serenade No. 3, D minor, op. 69.....Volkmann
Suite "In Carnival Time," op. 22..G. Schumann
Overture to "Der Freischutz".....Weber

The first two numbers were resurrected from the archives of the orchestra, for Svendsen's symphony has not been heard at these concerts for 20 years, and Volkmann's serenade has remained quiescent for 10 seasons or so.

The symphony proved to be one that was well worth a revival. It is finely written, the thematic material being very melodic and interesting. The andante is less of a symphonic nature than the other movements, but is of the sort to please many, and the intermezzo proved most enjoyable. The symphony as a whole was well received and to most of the audience it was as much of a novelty as if it had been written only recently instead of nearly 30 years ago. It should be given again in the near future.

Volkmann's serenade for 'cello obligato and string orchestra is of the melancholy sort, although an interesting work. The composer had a hard struggle most of his life and his misfortunes were probably reflected in his music, even in such as the serenade heard last evening. The work was superbly played, the feature being the obligato played by Mr. Krasselt, which, no doubt, was largely responsible for the enthusiastic applause which the work received.

Then followed a novelty, given for the first time in America: the orchestral suite, "In Carnival Time," by George Schumann, who is probably not related to a more famous composer of the same name.

George Schumann, about 38 years old, is living in Berlin, where he is director of the "Singacademie." He has written many things in large and small forms, two or three of which have been played at previous Symphony concerts. His "Carnival" suite is brilliantly scored and cleverly written, being in three sections. The second, in gavotte form, is the best, and would make an effective excerpt for a "pop" concert." The suite, as a whole, made a fairly good impression, but the audience failed to enthuse excepting after the gavotte movement.

The familiar "Freischutz" overture brought the ending to a concert that to many was as enjoyable as any of the season thus far, one-half of which is now a matter of musical history. The 13th rehearsal and concert this coming week will present a programme that includes Rubinstein's A minor symphony, a new symphonic poem by Kaun, the "Bartered Bride" overture by Smetana, and George Proctor will play the Liszt E-flat concerto.

SOCIETY PEOPLE HEAR SYMPHONY

Friday's downpour and general unpleasantness notwithstanding, there was a large and brilliant attendance at the Symphony rehearsal, every seat in the hall being filled. The fact that there was no soloist evidently had little power to keep people away, and the programme was unanimously voted a delightful one. Among those so fortunate as to be present were Mrs. S. V. R. Crosby, Mrs. Kenneth Haughton, Miss Susan Amory, Miss Estelle H. Kimball, Mrs. John B. Osborn, Miss Jane Waldron, Miss Martha Waldron, Mrs. Frederick B. Carpenter, Miss Madeline Davis, Mrs. Hall Curtis, Mrs. William A. Burnham, Mr. and Mrs. Albert F. Bigelow, Mrs. Frederick R. Sears, Sr., Mrs. Frank Peabody, Jr., Mrs. Thomas W. Lawson, with two of her daughters, Mrs. Fred Richardson, Miss Alice Gardiner, Miss Mollie Sargent, Mrs. Boylston Beale, Mrs. Bryce J. Allan, Miss Catherine Thayer, Mrs. Eben D. Jordan, Miss Dorothy Jordan, Miss Barbara Higginson, Miss Sarah Lawrence, Miss Rachel Brooks, Miss Harriet Curtis, Miss Priscilla Stackpole, Mrs. Washington G. Benedict, Miss May Kenney, Mrs. William Lindsey of London, Miss May L. Greenleaf, Mrs. George Shattuck, Mrs. James B. Forsyth, Miss Eleanor Sohier, Miss Alice Sohier, Miss Susan Wainwright, Miss Mary Parkman, Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Miss Edith Stackpole, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore Gooding, Mrs. I. Harris Metcalf, Mrs. William P. Fay and her daughter, Miss Katherine Fay, Miss Hannah Stevenson, Mrs. John L. Gardner, Miss Olivia Thorndike and Mrs. Curtis Guild, Jr., who had with her her sister, Miss Mollie Johnson.

SUNDAY HERALD
JANUARY 24, 1904.

TWELFTH SYMPHONY NIGHT.

Georg Schumann's New Work Is on the Programme.

It Is "In Carnival Time," but It Is Not Very Festive or Rollicking—An Unfamiliar Symphony by Svendsen—Some Novelties of the Symphony Season.

The programme of the 12th Symphony concert, Mr. Gericke conductor, in Symphony Hall last night, was as follows:

Symphony No. 2, B-flat major, op. 15..Svendsen
Serenade No. 3 in D minor, op. 69...Volkmann
"In Carnival Time," suite op. 22.....
Georg Schumann
(First time.)
Overture to "Der Freischuerz".....Weber

The symphony, by Svendsen is little known here; it was produced by Mr. Henschel in 1884. The suite by Schumann was played for the first time.

Mr. Gericke has brought out this season an entr'acte from Bruneau's "Messidor," a symphony by Glazounoff, D'Indy's "La Foret Enchantee," Dohnanyi's symphony in D minor, Tschaikowsky's "The Voyvode," Elgar's variations on an original theme, the overtures to d'Albert's "Improvisatore" and Saint-Saens' "Barbarians." Raff's overture, "Ein Feste Burg," was played here for the first time at these concerts—and why? It was well worth while to produce the symphony by Glazounoff and the pieces by Bruneau and D'Indy. The symphony gave so many pleasure that it was repeated, an unusual occurrence in the history of these concerts.

To some, perhaps to many, the posthumous symphonic poem by Tschaikowsky, and the overtures seemed inferior works, and some have asked "Why are such pieces played?" The answer is a simple one: It is a good thing to hear at least once the poorer works of leading composers; it is a part of one's musical education to be acquainted with the weakness as well as the strength of a composer; it is not only a good thing, it is necessary to know what contemporary musicians, as Saint-Saens, Elgar D'Albert, Georg Schumann, Dohnanyi, are doing.

The overture to "The Improvisatore" had been played in Chicago and in Cincinnati before we heard it. The overture to "The Barbarians" had been played in Chicago before we found out for ourselves that it was barren of ideas. Our novelties come late. "The Dream of Gerontius" has already been performed in Germany and in Australia, at New York and at Chicago. Elgar's "Variations" were over four years old, and they had been performed in many European cities before we all learned from personal acquaintance that they are a curious mixture of originality and commonplace, nobility and rank sentimentalism, abyssmal dulness and extreme brilliance.

Masterpieces are not written every week and delivered promptly in a neatly tied parcel on Saturday night. It is too much to expect or to demand that each new composition should be an imperishable thing of beauty. What miracles of dulness may be found in the complete works of Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann!

Nor should true masterpieces be given so often that they become too familiar and run the risk of sharing the fate of Aristides. Suppose all the better symphonies of Beethoven were given each season, or that Cesar Franck's symphony, or Schubert's "Unfinished," or the second by Brahms, or the fifth by Tschaikowsky, was performed once a month during a season, would they not lose through such familiarity?

When 24 concerts are given in a season, there must inevitably be performances of works of the second rank. There are times when a novel by Mortimer Collins will give more pleasure than a novel by Balzac. An audience is not always prepared to associate with masterpieces The symphony by Glazounoff produced this season is not a great work, but it is full of color, it has life, it is brilliant. The overture by D'Albert as a picture of the carnival is not to be named in the same breath with Berlioz's overture; but d'Albert is alive, he is a musician of parts, and the public of Boston should know what he has been doing of late. When 20 new pieces are brought out it is doubtful whether one hearer out of ten would care to hear a dozen of these pieces a second time; but has he not a right to ask for reasonable ground for his opinion? He cannot justly condemn or avoid the thing unheard.

Last night the symphony was new to nine-tenths of the audience, and probably no one was acquainted with the suite by Schumann. When the symphony was heard for the first time in Leipsic, there was much talk about its "national" character.

Music that is first of all "national" seldom, if ever, lives a long life outside its parish. The nationality of an individual enters into the expression of his thought, and into his thought itself, but his emotions must be of universal interest; he may be a Swede or a Bulgarian, an American or a Russian, but he must be, first of all, intensely human. The nationality must not be worn as a plausible garment. George Moore said in a bilious moment—and he is often bilious—that the reader of Thomas Hardy's novels is invited "to assist at a sheep-shearing scene, or at a harvest supper, because these scenes are not to be found in the works of George Eliot, because the reader is supposed to be interested in such things, because Mr. Hardy is anxious to show how jolly country he is." The reproach, unjust as applied to Hardy, might be brought against certain composers.

Svendsen's symphony is not unduly national. The good and substantial things in it may be enjoyed by the music lover of any country. The weak pages are not weak because they are "national"; they must seem weak to any Scandinavian composer or experienced listener. The first movement is still fresh and individual. Its frankness is engaging. In this pessimistic period the charge of "gloom" that was brought against the symphony as a whole when it first appeared seems preposterous. The second movement is often sentimental, and the simplicity of the song becomes affectation; the artlessness is suspicious. It is the weakest portion of the symphony. The intermezzo will always win the applause of the audience at large. A Scandinavian masquerades as Mendelssohn and pipes a scherzo near a mist-enshrouded burial mound. The finale has more of what we are accustomed to call Norwegian color; this color is here raw; there are none of the delicate nuances of Grieg. And when the symphony has been played, and after listening to other music, the hearer leaves the hall, the one impression made by the symphony is that made by the first movement.

Schumann's "In Carnival Time" was produced by Mr. Nikisch at a Philharmonic concert in Berlin, Feb. 20, 1899. The work is in three movements and it is scored for full orchestra. The composer furnished his own programme for the Berlin concert, but the argument is not printed in the score. The first movement portrays ballroom scenes. The prevailing tempo is that of a waltz, but there are several relieving episodes, in which various characters are introduced. The music of the general gayety suggests that many of the dancers wear rubber boots. There is little lightness; there is no esprit. There is no sharply drawn characterization of couples. Here and there an episode is not without a graceful orchestral touch; but how far we are from the dash and brilliance of French pieces of like nature. The second movement is in gavotte form. The gavotte here is not the original peasants' dance; it has the pomp and ceremony of the court. This movement is by far the most characteristic of the three. The repetition of the chief motive by the brass, however, is out of character, and suggests a late ball of an outer boulevard. The third movement bears for a sub-title the word "Humoreske"; and here there might be a discussion of humor as it is understood by the Germans, with digressions concerning Tile Eulenspiegel's pranks, Jean Paul Richter, and the Munich comic papers. The humor of this particular movement is not unlike that of a railroad accident. The music has little or no distinction, and there is not even delirious can-can jollity.

The revival of Volkmann's episodic serenade gave Mr. Krasselt the opportunity to display a fine tone and much taste. The work itself seems singularly old-fashioned. Hungarian strains are mingled with echoes from a synagogue. Yet every now and then there is a passage that makes one regret the bitterly melancholy life of the composer, who more than once seemed to be on the point of catching and holding Fame.

SYMPHONY HALL was filled, as usual, for the rehearsal Friday afternoon. In the crowd of well-gowned women were especially noted Mrs. William Burnham, Mrs. Charles Fry, Mrs. James Jackson, Mrs. Curtis Guild, Jr., and Miss Molly Johnson, Mrs. William P. Fay and Miss Katherine Fay, Mrs. Kenneth Horton and Miss Susan Amory, Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Mrs. George B. Shattuck, Mrs. F. R. Sears, Sr., Mrs. S. V. R. Crosby and Mrs. Boylston Beal, Mrs. Frank Peabody, Jr., Miss Rachel Brooks, the latest fiancee, with Miss Harriot Curtis, Mrs. J. L. Gardner, Mrs. Eben D. Jordan and Miss Dorothy Jordan, Mrs. Dudley Fay and Miss Alice Fay, Mrs. Hall Curtis, Mrs. Frederick Richardson, Mrs. Frederick Lowell, Mrs. Albert F. Bigelow, Miss Katherine Thayer, Miss Hannah Stevenson, Miss Emily Bacon and Miss Aleid Schenck, Miss Alice Perry with Miss Elizabeth Shattuck, Miss Edith Stackpole, Miss Priscilla Stackpole with Mrs. Bryce Allan, Miss Susie Howe, Miss Eleanor and Miss Alice Sohier, Miss May Greenleaf, Miss Barbara Higginson, Mrs. J. B. Osborn, Mrs. F. B. Carpenter, Miss Estelle Kimball, Miss Sarah Lawrence, Miss Alice Gardiner, Miss Susan Wainwright, Miss Mary Parkman, Miss Molly Sargent, Miss Madeleine Davis, Miss May Kenney, Mrs. J. B. Forsyth, Mrs. Washington Benedict, Miss Jane and Miss Martha Waldron, Miss Oliva Thorndike and Mrs. Theodore Gooding. Mr. George Proctor will be the soloist this week.

Mr. Rudolf Krasselt, who played the solo of the Volkman Serenade Friday afternoon and last night so beautifully, is to be one of the artists at Mrs. Field's subscription musicale at the Somerset tomorrow morning. Miss Laura Hawkins is to be the accompanist.

[86]

SUNDAY GLOBE—JANUARY 24, 1904.

TWELFTH SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

Last week's Symphony program contained one novelty, George Schumann's "In Carnival Time," a suite for orchestra, given for the first time here. Mr Rudolf Krassett played the principal cello part in Volkmann's serenade in D minor, the opening concert selection was the Svendsen B flat major symphony, which has not been heard here in a score of years, and the Weber overture to "Der Freischutz" closed the program. Mr Svendsen's work sounds rather old-fashioned as a whole and only in part is it specially interesting. The second movement, which opens in a mournful mode, has some pleasing thematic movements and series of measured in staccato for the first violins, which are admirably scored, and in this instance gave this contingent a chance to show beautiful unanimity in its performance. In the third part the varying figures are of a simple, spirited nature, melodic and skilfully introduced for the different instruments, and the final movement is built up of rather vigorous themes which form a good contrast to the preceding part of the work. The prevailing tone of the composition is somber, and this idea was effectively suggested by the orchestra.

Mr Krasselt played the solo part for cello in the Volkmann serenade with a tenderness and sweetness of tone which made his work one of the features of the program. In fact, the frequent strong combinations in this piece were given with beautiful accord and harmony and were about as close to perfection as one can expect to hear.

The Schumann "Carnival," which was performed here for the first time, is a thoroughly typical and enjoyable illustration of its title, jolly, full of waltz rhythms and quaint musical dialogues, and contains melodic material enough to supply a score for a light opera. It was interpreted in a delightful vein. The numerous episodes divided among the instruments brought out some queer combinations, and in the revel, in which all did good work, special praise is uncalled for. In the second part, an old-time gavotte, the clarinet, cello and bassoon parts were specially amusing to hear by this orchestra, for one or two of the themes were of the so-called "catchy" style of writing and sounded quite familiar. A very taking close in the second movement was the unison of the harp and triangle. In the last movement one could not help smiling at the musical revelry, which was charmingly set forth by Mr Gericke's men.

The "Der Freischutz" overture, with its weird suggestion of the power of an evil spirit, made a good contrast to the humors of the "Carnival," and the interpretation was in the proper spirit and satisfactory withal.

Mr George Proctor will be the soloist this week, playing the Liszt piano concerto in E flat. The remaining numbers of the program will be Rubinstein's A minor symphony, Kaun's symphonic poem, "Minnehaha," and Smetana's overture, "The Bartered Bride."

"The Boston Symphony orchestra," says a leading New York contemporary, "has been in town again flirting with our ears. The regular trips of this wonderful band are like so many doses of aural spring medicine; they clean away many clogging memories of bad orchestral performances and put us in the way we should go, so that when the other orchestras play at us we will not depart from it."

SPRINGFIELD SUNDAY REPUBLICAN: JANUARY 24, 1904

Music and the Theater.

The editor of the Holyoke Rundschau attended the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Court Square theater Monday evening, and takes the event as the text for some suggestion. After justly characterizing it as "a lovely oasis" in the "desolate waste of American musical 'farce," he goes on to say:—

It is indeed noteworthy that among the many hearers the Teutons of the whole region round about were noticeable by their numbers. It would have been a lesson for our "knownothings" to note that in spite of the high price of admission most of the German visitors to these concerts belong to the working classes. It furnishes food for thought for one to see these German operatives, their wives and daughters, listening with intense interest and delight to the noble chords of Beethoven's second symphony. And there stands forth Senator Lodge, one of the nation's leaders, speaking bravely concerning the "ignorance of the immigrants."

Is it not a pity that a prosperous and intelligent city like Springfield has so little to offer intelligent and music-loving people like these? A German city of the same importance would present far superior opportunities for the enjoyment not only of good concerts, but of opera and drama. It may frankly be admitted that the German taste in public entertainment is solider and better than ours, and it seems to be the case that the standard of our amusements deteriorates year by year. Showy, frothy and meretricious is the theatrical entertainment upon which the greater part of the public is nurtured, and the class of people who in Germany would buy cheap tickets to a symphony concert, here patronize the vaudeville or the debased form of entertainment which combines the worst elements of music and of drama.

It is sometimes urged in behalf of the debased theater that it is not so very bad, and that it supplies the needs of a large class of people who would otherwise not go at all. It is not so certain that going at all is a necessity, but this is a question by itself. The pity of it is that these seductive shows which appeal to the very human weakness for glitter and excitement absorb so large a part of the current amusement fund that people of moderate means but more elevated tastes are deprived of what an intelligent community should have opportunity to enjoy. The standard theater is high priced; the standard concert is high priced. There ought to be, and there might be if things were ordered aright, good plays and good orchestral concerts furnished regularly through the season at prices fitted to the needs of the workingman. It is along this line that philanthropists of means ought to work. What Mr Carnegie has done for libraries needs to be done for the public entertainments upon which so many millions are now being wasted because managers cater to the lowest taste instead of trying to find the highest.

An excellent example of what private generosity can do in this field is given by Mr Higginson's support of the Boston symphony orchestra. But for his help no such magnificent organization could have been established, yet Boston does not feel in the least pauperized, and the orchestra now pays its own expenses. With his aid it has built up its own public. Now could not something of the same sort in a smaller way be done in a flourishing smaller town? It is true that Springfield could not support a permanent orchestra or an independent theater. But supposing that in a group of cities like Springfield, Hartford, New Haven, Pittsfield, Holyoke and Northampton, with corresponding groups in other parts of the country, a fund could be raised to guarantee a season of high-class music and of drama of an elevating sort. It would not, as a rule, be necessary to spend money on bricks and mortar or go through the preliminary flourishes of an "independent theater." All that would be necessary would be to guarantee a set number of engagements and make good the deficit—a deficit which it might be hoped would diminish from year to year, but which at any rate would represent a legitimate and useful outlay for public education. At the present time the theaters collectively do more harm than good, and there is no sign of self-cure. In an article in the last Bibliotheca Sacra President C. F. Thwing makes severe charge that "at the 'present time the American people are 'devotees of pleasure hitherto unknown." The theater seizes upon this weak point and by catering to the love of spectacle, the innocent craving for glitter and display, the less innocent craving for more sensual excitements, constantly lowers taste to a more hopeless level. The stage represents an enormous industry as compared with a generation ago; no one pretends that it holds so high a place, and as for concerts the testimony comes from all circles that the vaudeville, the melodrama, and the musical farce have blighted serious music except in the large cities, where the concert-going public though relatively small is large in the aggregate. It is a serious problem, and those who have the welfare of the country at heart need to consider how the amusements of the people may be made a wholesome influence instead of a mere dissipation.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, JANUARY 25, 1904

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

This was the programme of the twelfth symphony concert, which Mr. Gericke gave last Saturday evening in Symphony Hall:

Svendsen: Symphony No. 2, in B-flat major, op. 15.
Volkmann: Serenade No. 3, in D minor, op. 69. Mr. Rudolf Krasselt, Solo Violoncello.
Schumann: Suite for full Orchestra, "In Carnival Time," op. 22. (First time.)
Weber: Overture to the Opera "Der Freischuetz."

It is to be deplored that the weather on Saturday was sufficiently untoward to keep many people at home, for the twelfth symphony concert was of a remarkably attractive nature. In addition to the constantly brilliant playing of the orchestra and the pleasant character of the music presented, Mr. Gericke's innovation of placing the symphony first on the programme is one that will tend toward the greater contentment of very many persons, if not, indeed, of the entire audience. In these days, when people are so distinctly in favor of short concerts that a brief enough programme is rarely found, it is comfortable to discover the final number of a programme to be a work so well known that one may leave the hall before it, if he chooses, without feeling that the best part of the evening may be lost. Overtures like those to "Der Freischütz" and "The Bartered Bride" are surely admirable compositions to end a concert with. Many listeners, furthermore, are in far better receptive mood for a great work of consequence, like a symphony, at eight o'clock in the evening than at nine or a quarter after.

The Svendsen symphony having been heard here only once before, and then in 1884, on Saturday it came to the audience practically as a new work. That this composition should have been so pointedly neglected these nineteen years seems odd, for it is a musical production full of charm; spontaneous, always natural, melodious, and with a wide variety of delightful rhythms. Strongest in the first movement, the sentiment (bred in the bone of Scandinavians and North Germans) of the andante is speedily relieved by the piquant gayety of the intermezzo, while the whole ends with an exhilarating exuberance of high spirits. It all sounds well, too; the orchestration is always that of a master.

Far less interesting was the suite "In Carnival Time," by Georg Schumann, now conductor of the Berlin Singacademie, although Mr. Arthur Nikisch approved of the composition sufficiently to play it at a Berlin Philharmonic Concert in 1899. Through this suite the composer attempts to suggest a carnival ball, which begins gently, as balls do, waxes gay, is interrupted by the performance of a stately gavotte, and then once more resumes its hilarious course to the pitch of becoming an orgy. From a disinclination, however, to a frank use of dance rhythms, which are absolutely necessary when one is trying to sketch a ball scene, Mr. Schumann has failed to make his festivity in the least festal. He has, on the contrary, made such liberal use of the "full" orchestra at his command that the composition suggests far less a carnival rout than the sacking of Rome by the Goths and Vandals; in the din one positively can fancy the shrieks of the dead and wounded. Even the none too graceful gavotte is thundered forth by the entire orchestra, including trombones and tuba. There are, of course, in the length and breadth of the piece hints and intimations of a merry disposition, some episodes, indeed, being charming. On the whole, however, the work shows little that is musically valuable and small feeling for the subject in hand. It is curious, too, that with the great orchestra called for there should be so little orchestral color. As is the case with many works which must be produced if we are to know what is going on in the world of music, one performance of "In Carnival Time" will probably answer every purpose.

Between the symphony and the suite came Volkmann's third serenade, a composition of stern, austere beauty that might more fittingly be called anything else than a serenade, as we commonly conceive the term. Mr. Krasselt played the solo part very beautifully. With strong, sweet tone he interpreted feelingly the doleful measures that fell to the violoncello, and withal refrained from making his instrument whine. The entire concert, as has already been said, was characterized by splendid playing.

Mr. George Proctor is to appear at Saturday's concert. This will be the programme: Symphony in A minor, Rubinstein; corcerto for pianoforte in E-flat, Liszt; symphonic poem, "Minnehaha," Kaun (first time); overture to "The Bartered Bride," Smetana.

R. R. G.

SPRINGFIELD SUNDAY REPUBLICAN JANUARY 31, 1904.

A recent reference in these columns to what has been the general impression in the musical world, that the Boston symphony orchestra has become practically self-supporting, leads Maj H. L. Higginson, by whose public-spirited munificence the orchestra was founded, to say that this is so far from being the case that there is usually a deficit, and that this year the deficit will be large. It is likely that special adverse conditions, especially the visit of Richard Strauss, who is to conduct a series of concerts in Boston, have hurt the subscription for the present season, but the fact remains that this superb organization, which is the pride of the whole country, is in need of more substantial support, and the smaller cities of New England should do their share by providing good audiences for such concerts as can be given outside of Boston. It is good to know that the enthusiasm displayed in this city at the recent symphony concert has given the management of the orchestra so favorable an impression of our town that they would like to arrange for a series of concerts here, such as Providence and Hartford enjoy. This is by all means the proper thing to do, and many minor musical projects may profitably be postponed to concentrate attention on this important matter. Here is the best orchestra in the United States and one of the best in the world, and the population of Springfield and the neighboring towns is large enough and cultivated enough to sustain a series of three or even four concerts in the course of a year without difficulty if the thing is vigorously pushed. Let the musicians and music lovers of the city take the matter in hand.

Nearly every seat was occupied for the rehearsal Friday afternoon, when Mr. Proctor was the soloist. Some of those there were Mrs. James Jackson, Mrs. George C. Lee, Jr., Mrs. F. L. Higginson, Miss Juliet and Miss Barbara Higginson, Mrs. George B. Shattuck, Mrs. William P. Fay, Mrs. Dudley Fay and Miss Alice Fay, Mrs. John L. Thorndike, Mrs. J. L. Gardner, Mrs. T. C. Thacher, Mrs. Matthew Luce, Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Miss Rosamond Saltonstall, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Grew, Mr. and Mrs. George A. Draper, Mr. and Mrs. Albert F. Bigelow, Mrs. DeFord Bigelow, Mrs. Arthur Blake, Mrs. John Lavalle and Miss Molly Johnson, Mrs. Oliver Ames, 2d, Mrs. Henry S. Howe and Miss Susan Howe, Mrs. Frank Peabody, Jr., and Miss Rosamond Peabody; Mr. Robert Jordan with Miss Dorothy Jordan, Miss Alice West and Miss Priscilla Stackpole, three of the debutantes, who were further represented by Miss Alice Sohier, Miss Dorothea Bigelow, Miss Alice Gardiner, Miss Marian Lewis and Miss Marian Ladd; Mrs. Frank Crowninshield, Mrs. George Littleton, Miss Edith Stackpole, Miss Grace Dabney, Miss Mary Sargent, Miss Mary Vaughan, Miss Rachel Brooks, Mrs. Frederick E. Lowell, Miss Mabel Warren, Miss Nathalie Matthews, Miss Belle Hunt, Miss Katherine Foote, Miss Elizabeth Crafts, Miss Emily Severance, Miss Helen Almy, Miss Miriam Coffin, Miss Rosamond Allen, Miss Elizabeth Tyson, Miss Eleanor Hyde, Miss Emily Bacon and Miss Alcid Schenck, Miss Harriott Curtis, Mrs. F. B. Carpenter, Miss Ethel Stone and Miss Jane Waldron. Miss Olive Mead will be the soloist this week.

[87]

DAILY ADVERTISER.

JANUARY, 25 1904.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Symphony No. 2, in B flat major, op. 15 .....Svendsen
Serenade No. X in D minor, op. 69.....Volkmann
(Mr. Rudolph Krasselt, Solo Violoncello)
Suite for full Orchestra, "In Carnival Time," op 22.....Schumann
(First time)
Overture to the Opera "Der Freischuetz"..Weber

An entirely orchestral concert. We generally like these purely instrumental concerts best and feel that our great orchestra should be able to charm without the aid of an operatic prima donna or a marvellous virtuoso; but on this occasion none of the ideas presented seemed to reach high-water mark. The Svendsen symphony proved to be a well-constructed work, but by no means as individual as much of the music of this northern composer.

The present writer recalls a visit to Svendsen, in Copenhagen, when that composer seemed more enthusiastic about his "Zorahayde" than any other of his compositions. He spoke at that time of a visit that he had made to America, and hoped some day to turn his impressions of Niagara into music, but this he has never accomplished.

At one of these meetings Svendsen showed the reviewer a baton that was one of the earliest ever waved. One may remember that conducting with a baton is a very modern proceeding. The conductorial stick was not used prior to 1801. Weber was one of the very earliest of the great conductors to employ it, and he used a baton in Dresden in 1817.

This baton, with Weber's autograph upon it, is in the possession of Svendsen. It is a long stick, inlaid with ivory, and with a handle like a policeman's billy.

We return unwillingly to the Svendsen symphony. It is not a great work. It shows the skill of the trained composer, and each climax is worked up with consummate care, but it is not inspired or inspiring. The Scherzo—or rather "Intermezzo"—is the most popular part of it.

This movement reminds somewhat of Mendelssohn in his Scotch Symphony, but it is less spontaneous than that masterpiece. The finale alternates between joviality and despair. The two last movements are the best part of the work. The horn-playing and the oboe work in the second movement were worthy of record. Altogether a good and shapely, but not a phenomenal symphony.

Although there was no soloist, strictly speaking, upon the programme, the Volkmann Serenade had a violoncello obbligato that gave abundant opportunities to Mr. Krasselt to show what a fine artist he is. The Serenade is largely the soliloquy of a very unhappy 'cello, with some brighter episodes in which the rest of the orchestra endeavor to cheer up the despondent instrument.

Mr. Krasselt played superbly and won a very emphatic ovation at the close of the piece. Our orchestra has evidently gained a strong artist in this young man. Some of the praise must also be extended to the orchestral violoncellos, for they gave some unison passages with wonderful fervor and ensemble.

Georg Schumann in his carnival scenes has not approached the treatment of the same subject by the greater Schumann, nor has he equalled the dance effects of Berlioz, or Weber, or Tschaikowsky.

One found in the work neither the grace and delicacy of a fashionable ball-room, on the one hand, nor the frank license of the Bal Bullier or a Montmartre festivity, upon the other. Parts of the work seemed close to the line of prosaic vulgarity.

The picture should have been better or worse than that to make an artistic success. The brigands in the finale of Berlioz's "Childe Harold" symphony are much more effective than a crowd of "bourgeoisie" dissipating could ever be.

The Gavotte (second movement) was very dainty, however, at the first, and in the true spirit of this dance, which is far removed from its peasant origin, but it was finally thundered out on the trombones as if the band were playing for a set of deaf dancers. In the finale there was a theme which would do finely for a topical song in "King Dodo," but was a little removed from the atmosphere of a symphony concert. One could sing some sentiment like to its inspiring notes, suggesting the Howard Athenaeum rather than Symphony Hall. There were plenty of bold, modern orchestral effects; rapid passages on muted horn, furious phrases on the kettledrums, etc., all well executed.

"You never miss the lager till the barrel has run dry"

"The Freischuetz" overture ended the concert with more dignity. It was in the main well played, although that little parody of the last two notes of Agathe's melody, first given upon the flutes and then scoffed at by the brass, might have been emphasized much more to advantage. But the general interpretation of the works of this programme was better than their artistic contents, always excepting the final number.

Louis C. Elson.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST, JANUARY 31, 1904

13TH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Orchestral Numbers by Rubinstein, Kaun and Smetana; Also Liszt's Pianoforte Concerto in E Flat Presented Last Evening at Symphony Hall

The programme of the 13th Symphony concert last evening included the following numbers:

Symphony No. 6, Op. 111.....Rubinstein
Concerto for pianoforte in E flat.....Liszt
Symphonic Poem, "Minnehaha".....Kaun
Overture to "The Bartered Bride"....Smetana
George Proctor was the soloist.

This programme was somewhat a reversal of the usual order of things, for the symphony came first instead of last, the overture ending the concert.

The Rubinstein symphony was the composer's sixth and last, in A minor, Op. 111, written in 1896 for one of the Gewandhaus concerts at Leipsic. Previous to last evening the symphony has had only one performance in this city, being at aconcert under Mr. Gericke's direction Nov. 12, 1887. So the work was absolutely new to a large portion of the audience.

It is in the customary four movements and fairly strict in form. The themes are many and interesting, but the development is commonplace; there is little that rises above routine composition, and the symphony shows both the strength and weakness of Rubinstein as a composer. He was possessed of amazing fertility in thematic material, but he constructed his works in a slipshod manner as if he wanted to begin a new composition before a previous one was finished. The third movement was the most pleasing portion of the symphony heard last evening, and the general performance was excellent.

Hugo Kaun's symphony poem, "Minnehaha," Op. 43, No. 1, was heard in this city for the first time. The composer, although born in Berlin and living there at the present time, was a resident of Milwaukee, Wis., from 1887 to 1901, and it was during this time that he became interested in the "Hiawatha" poem.

Two symphony poems were the result of his reading of Longfellow's familiar story, and they are entitled "Minnehaha" and "Hiawatha." Theodore Thomas was the first to perform them, which he did at a Chicago symphony concert early in 1903.

"Minnehaha" is suggested by Canto 20, which describes the famine. The music is supposed to portray the dreary winter, the mad rush of Hiawatha through the forest to obtain food and the finding on his return that Minnehaha has died, as described by the poet. Whether or not Mr. Kaun has adequately pictured the text in music must be determined by the individual listener, according to his mood. The music suggests the imaginative faculty to a great degree and the instrumental coloring is exceedingly interesting and ingenious. It may not be a work of colossal genius, but on a first hearing the impressions were exceedingly favorable. It is as good, certainly, as any of the various "Hiawatha" musical creations heard here thus far, if not better, and that the audience was pleased was shown by the loud applause that the work received. This is the first of Mr. Kaun's works in larger forms to be heard here and it is hoped that an opportunity will be given in the near future of hearing others.

Between the symphony and the "Minnehaha" music the Liszt concerto in E flat was played by Mr. George Proctor.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JAN 31, 1904.

The 13th Symphony program introduced Mr George Proctor as soloist in Liszt's E-flat major concerto for piano and orchestra. Hugo Kaun's symphonic poem, "Minnehaha," was played for the first time here, and Rubinstein's sixth symphony and the overture to Smetana's opera, "The Bartered Bride," completed the selections. Mr Proctor's interpretation of the concerto was admirable as a whole, although he was lacking in physical power in several fortissimo passages to cope with the orchestra, a fault not confined to this young artist by any means. His finger work in the lighter portions of the concerto was characterized by a smoothness of execution which displayed his technique in a favorable light, and although his pace in the third and fourth movements was rather moderate when compared with some of the more experienced pianists who have played the Liszt work at these concerts, yet his speed was not halting, and the rapid passages were given with generally brilliant effect.

The beautiful and unique scherzo, with its odd triangle accompaniment, was splendidly interpreted, the marked daintiness of touch and clarity of tone indicating that in compositions of a sentimental and blithesome nature Mr Proctor should find his greates successes. The finale, which calls for almost lightning speed and phenomenal finger power, was less pleasing, an indistinctness in playing showing in the dashing, crashing double octave runs and chords. Possibly caution in performance caused some lack of contrasting color in his work, but his playing throughout was commendable and his auditors were quite liberal in applause at the close of his interpretation.

Kaun's "Minnehaha" music, based upon "The Famine" in Longfellow's poem of "Hiawatha," is in four parts and tells the musical story with considerable skill. There is nothing very harsh in the combinations of instruments, and the so-called "mournful atmosphere" of the original is preserved continuously by clever treatment of the different themes, all of which are sad in character. The wood winds, which are very prominent, performed their parts in beautiful and suggestive harmony, the dramatic crescendo in the third part was given in perfect unison, and the closing passages, by all the contingents, were sung with exquisite effect. The piece is a delightful descriptive morceau and the performance was in the best vein of the orchestra.

In the Rubinstein symphony, which opened the program, the orchestral work seemed flawless, for the men were fresh and evidently in a sympathetic mood. The jolly, grotesque third movement went with a vim and brilliancy of execution that were fairly inspiring, all the breaks being attacked with clock-like precision. In the last part the various suggestions of the folk-songs of Russia were effectively introduced, the themes being well balanced by the ever-changing background of the accompanying instruments. The Smetana overture calls for nothing more than general commendation, there being little in it which presents more than ephemeral difficulties for Mr Gericke's men.

Miss Olive Mead will be the soloist this week, playing Beethoven's violin concerto. The other numbers comprise the overture "Fritjhof," Dubois and Brahms' fourth symphony.

The Providence Journal.

Published by the Providence Journal Co.
Nos. 209 and 213 Westminster St.
PROVIDENCE, R. I.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1904.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Fine Programme and a Crowded House Last Night.

The second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night in Infantry Hall. There was another record-breaking attendance, every seat being sold, while the limited number of admission tickets offered was quickly taken by music-lovers who were contented to stand in order to hear the excellent programme provided by Conductor Gericke. Signor Campanari was unable, on account of illness, to fill the position of soloist, for which he had been engaged, but any momentary disappointment that might have been felt on account of this accident was soon dispelled by the very artistic singing of M. Charles Gilibert of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who appeared in his place. The programme was as follows:

Overture, "The Bartered Bride"....Smetana
Aria, "Quand la Flamme de l'Amour"...Biset
Symphonic Poem, "The Wild Huntsman"....Cesar Franck
Songs with piano—
(a) "Le Crepuscule".....Massenet
(b) "La Vierge a la Creche,".....Perlhou
(c) Song of Gilles from "Joli Gilles"....Polse
Symphony, "Harold in Italy,".....Berlioz

This was an unusually fresh and interesting programme, the preponderance of French composers on the list being due to the fact that M. Gilibert, called upon to substitute at the last moment, naturally chose vocal selections which he had recently sung with the orchestra elsewhere. The opening overture presented a composer whose name is all too infrequently seen on our concert programmes, though his music is coming to be more generally known and appreciated. Semetana, who died 20 years ago at the age of 60, was the most representative of Bohemian composers, but it is practically only since his death that his music has been heard outside his own country. Bohemian he was in his choice of subjects and his free use of national airs as subject matter for composition; as a musician he was hedged in by no narrow bounds. He was a master in all forms of composition, and his work is distinguished by a marked originality no less than by the skill with which he handled all the tools of the musician's trade. This overture to his most popular comic opera is about as brilliant and tuneful a thing of its kind as we often hear.

The other two orchestral numbers afforded an interesting contrast between the methods of two great—perhaps the two greatest—French composers. Neither one was here represented by a piece written in his most characteristic style. Franck is at his best in religious music, or at least in that which is of a sacred or mystical character. The "symphonic poem" is somewhat out of his range. Berlioz, on the contrary, was one of the first to develop this form of composition. A consummate master of orchestral technic and coloring, he could paint musical pictures that throb with life and suggestiveness. "Harold in Italy" is really a work in this form, but a legend like that of "The Wild Huntsman" would have appealed more strongly to Berlioz's taste and genius. Both these compositions, however, were welcome not only as being rather out of the common rut but also for their intrinsic merit. It only remains to say that the orchestra played superbly throughout the whole evening, and to note the fact that the long and important viola solo in Berlioz's symphony was played with beautiful tone and elegant finish by Mr. A. Feris, the new first viola of the orchestra.

M. Charles Gilibert has not been heard here before, but he made a fine impression last night by his remarkably artistic singing. His voice is not all phenomenal, but his method is superb, his diction beautifully clear, and his whole performance infused with musicianly taste and well-ordered sentiment. An artist well worth hearing again.

The success of the two concerts given this season has been greater than was expected, and there is no danger that the public-spirited guarantors will have to make good any financial losses. The committee in charge of the concerts is to be congratulated upon the success it has had in arousing popular interest and appreciation of these unequalled musical entertainments, and it is hoped that the enthusiasm that has been awakened will last over into another year and suffice to carry out a larger series of concerts.

SUNDAY HERALD.

Published Every Sunday in the Year—Vol. CXV., No. 31.

SUNDAY, JAN. 31, 1904.

THIRTEENTH SYMPHONY NIGHT

A Symphonic Poem Written by Kaun Is the Novelty.

It Is Not "Hiawatha," but "Minnehaha"—A Symphony in A Minor by Rubinstein Is Disinterred—Mr. Proctor and Liszt's Concerto No. 1—Overture of Smetana.

The programme of the 13th Symphony concert, Mr. Gericke conductor, given last night at Symphony Hall, was as follows:

Symphony in A minor, No. 6.....Rubinstein
Concerto in E flat major, No. 1.....Liszt
Symphonic poem, "Minnehaha".....Kaun
(First time.)
Overture to "The Sold Bride".....Smetana

Mr. Gericke produced Rubinstein's symphony here in A minor in 1887, and since then it has been allowed to rest peacefully on the shelf. No doubt the composer took some pains with the work, for it was composed for that august tribunal, the Gewand Haus Society of Leipsic, and it was first played in Leipsic under the direction of the composer in 1886.

The editor of the programme book of these Symphony concerts compiled a list of works by Rubinstein that have been performed here since 1870 at concerts of the leading local societies and at concerts given here by Theodore Thomas. It is a formidable list, and it shows again how quickly the modernity of a composer passes, unless his foothold is mortised in granite, to use a phrase of Walt Whitman. There was a time when the talk was about Rubenstein; his larger works were in fashion; his chamber music was played continually; his songs were in the mouth of every singer. Today he is known in concert halls chiefly by his piano concerto in D minor; once in a while the "Ocean" symphony (first version) is performed and every one speaks approvingly of the first movement. His songs are seldom sung—the more the pity—and his "Thou Art Like Unto a Flower" is known to church congregations by association with the incongruous words "Jerusalem the golden."

This symphony is like many other works of Rubinstein; there is a promising start, there are ideas, and then the music is as though the composer had sketched hurriedly a movement or two, and, waxing impatient, with fresh thoughts for another composition, had completed the work in hand perfunctorily and with an Olympian indifference. His orchestration is almost always dry and scratchy; at times it suggests sandpaper, and it grates on the nerves. The symphony in A minor is no exception; one misses the vivifying breath of imagination. The themes themselves are of slight interest, and after the first movement the composer himself seems to have lost all affection for his task. No performance, however careful and admirable, as was that of last night, could breathe into this dead body the breath of life.

When Mr. Proctor appeared for the first time at a Symphony concert he was fresh from study at Vienna. He chose a brazen-faced, musk-scented thing, a concerto by Eduard Schuett. The pianist then had the hard, brittle, unemotional touch that distinguishes so many fresh from a certain school in the Austrian city, and his style was flamboyant and bumptious. In recitals soon after he played as though he had not taken the time for preparation. But of late years he has pondered, apparently, the value of tone and rhythm, especially tone. Last season he played pieces of inconsiderable importance in a truly artistic manner. He sang and did not pound the melody; he was emotional and imaginative, so far as the character of the pieces permitted. Last night he played one of the great concertos in the literature of the piano, a superb, defiant piece that is still fresh and heroic, with sentiment that still seems genuine, a piece that any pianist may well be proud to play. In his performance he showed many admirable qualities. First of all, even in the most virile passages, he did not force tone; and those who heard Liszt in his puissant years all agree that the great pianist's tone, even in the frenzy of bravura, was always beautiful. Mr. Proctor played with a fine rhythmic feeling, with a keen appreciation of the value of the phrase. Perhaps there were moments when the hearer would have liked an exhibition of more demoniacal spirit, a revelation of the virtuoso exulting in his strength; but, on the whole, the performance was interesting, musical and highly creditable to the player.

Hugo Kaun, whose name appeared for the first time on these programmes, is a Berliner who sojourned for a time at Milwaukee, and is now busied again in the city of weiss beer. The argument printed in the score of "Minnehaha" tells us that he was inspired by Longfellow's poem and by "the glorious oil painting by the American artist, Dodge, depicting the death of Minnehaha." We have never seen this painting, but something in our heart tells us that the modern school would not be enthusiastic over it; that it would be dismissed with the pictorial representations by an Englishman of a railway station and the Derby day, and with the statue of the dreaming Iolanthe in butter that awakened the wonder and the approval of thousands at the Philadelphia exposition in 1876. Still we may be wrong, we may be wrong. "Oil painting": It reminds us of Artemus Ward's definition of sardeens: "Little fishes biled in ile." M. Kaun's symbolic poem—it has a companion piece "Hiawatha"—is pleasant music without any particular originality of thought or treatment. The instrumentation is sonorous, but there is not one poignant phrase, not one dramatic stroke. The poem is the work of a cultivated musician of routine.

Smetana's delightful overture brought the close. It is to be hoped that the opera will yet be included in the repertory of the Metropolitan Opera House; a translation into English has been made by Mr. Meltzer, but the opera is not yet in rehearsal, although there was promise earlier in the season of a production.

[88]

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1904

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

For the thirteenth symphony concert (Saturday, Jan. 30) Mr. Gericke arranged the following programme, Mr. George Proctor appearing as soloist:

Rubinstein: Symphony No. 6, in A minor, Op. 111.
Liszt: Concerto No. 1, in E-flat major, for Pianoforte and Orchestra.
Hugo Kaun: Symphonic Poem, "Minnehaha," Op. 43, No. 1. (First time.)
Smetana: Overture to the Opera "The Sold Bride."

According to information set down in the programme-book, Rubinstein wrote the symphony in A minor for the Society of the Gewandhaus concerts in Leipsic, which august body produced the work in 1886, the composer conducting. Despite the lustre of this occasion, however, and the favor it found at Hamburg and Paris, as well as at Leipsic, the conductors, Theodore Thomas, Seidl and Damrosch in this country, all declared the symphony not worth playing. Mr. Van der Stucken, therefore, on producing the composition at a New York concert, in 1887, was highly commended for his daring. Even his own orchestra he had to contend against, for many of the players were opposed to a performance of the symphony, "one impudent fellow actually" having "to be expelled from the orchestra."

Our Boston musicians are evidently less recalcitrant than those of New York. On Saturday, at all events, the full complement of players seemed to be present, and no spirit of discord was noticeable. Were they not so well-behaved, though, perhaps they would have liked to deport themselves after the New York manner, for they played the symphony perfunctorily, with little zeal. This attitude is not astonishing. Surely a more uninteresting work than the A minor symphony has never been brought out at a symphony concert, with the tumultuous uproar of its beginning, its poverty of ideas, its harsh, strident orchestration, and its total lack of grace, charm, or strength. It has not been heard in Boston since its single performance in 1887; heaven grant it be not heard again for another sixteen years. The wonder of it is that the composer of some exquisite pianoforte pieces and of at least half a dozen perfect songs could bring himself to allow the public performance of such rubbish as this symphony.

The novelty of Saturday evening was a symphonic poem, "Minnehaha," by Hugo Kaun, a Berlin composer and conductor who once left his home for a sojourn of several years in Milwaukee. There, and in the forests of northern Wisconsin, he wrote this symphonic poem, inspired, as he says by Longfellow's "The Song of Hiawatha," and by "the glorious oil painting by the American artist, Dodge, depicting the death of Minnehaha (Laughing Water)." In the orchestral result there is no very vivid suggestion of the terrible desolation of winter in Northern wilds, with its frozen lakes, its forests of gaunt, naked trees, the awful crushing silence of its death-like solitude. Nor all the dull despair of Minnehaha and Hiawatha's frantic grief dramatically portrayed. The visit to the forests, evidently, and strong feeling moved Mr. Kaun less powerfully than did Longfellow's poem and the artist's oil painting. He has, none the less, written a piece of music that is melodious, well made and sonorously orchestrated; in short, very pleasant to hear.

To turn to the solo part of the concert, Mr. Proctor did himself a grave injustice in choosing to play the Liszt concerto, which work was written by as cunning a hand at arranging concert effects as Sardou is at devising striking scenes for the stage. Frankly romantic, put together in a masterly way, based on musical ideas valuable in themselves, by turns delightful and dramatic, the E-flat concerto of Liszt is yet planned for effect, and to be effective in performance it must be swept along by a pianist of passionate temperament and of an overwhelming technique—a pianist who can make his tone glisten and sparkle, and who also can make it thunder and rage. For such a work Mr. Proctor has not sufficient physical strength. He cannot make his chords crash and his passages rip out above the orchestra. And it is greatly to his artistic credit that he did not try to increase his strength by pounding; his tone remained always beautiful. In compositions of a more lyrical character, as in the "Moonlight" sonata and the C minor concerto of Beethoven, Mr. Proctor has shown himself an artist of parts, a master of strong, beautiful tone, who makes his melodies sing, who phrases with elegant taste, and who has the rare gift of imagination. The Liszt concerto he played as though it belonged to his own especial genre, attempting no feats of virtuosity, but presenting Liszt's ideas with genuine appreciation of their innate worth. The result was a performance excellent in itself, and different from any other ever heard here, but as unlike the real thing as Mme. Sembrich's performance of Isolde would be if she were so ill-advised as to essay the role. But Mme. Sembrich would never be so injudicious.

Mr. Proctor was warmly applauded, being recalled three times. At the end of the concert came the most brilliant orchestral playing of the evening, that of the charming overture to Smetana's "Sold Bride."

At the next concert, of which this is to be the programme, Miss Olive Mead will appear: Overture to "Fritjhof," Dubois (first time); concerto for violin, Beethoven; Symphony No. 4, in E minor, Brahms.

R. R. G.

DAILY ADVERTISER,

FEBRUARY 1, 1904.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Rubinstein—Symphony No. 6, in A minor, op. III.
Liszt Concerto No. 1, in E flat major, for pianoforte and orchestra.
Mr. George Proctor, Soloist.
Hugo Kaun—Symphonic Poem, "Minnehaha," op. 43, No. 1. (First time.)
Smetana—Overture to the opera "The Sold Bride."

For once the concert began with the symphony, as if Mr. Gericke wanted to have this task over as soon as possible. It was interesting to hear this Rubinstein work, if only on account of the diverse opinions expressed regarding it. It is bold from the outset, beginning with an augmented fifth chord that does not suggest any particular tonality. But the demon of development seizes upon the composer early in the work and stays by him until the end. It is spasmodic and vehement at times. Rubinstein is a most unequal composer in almost all of his orchestral compositions. The old rhyme can be modified for him,—

When he is good he is very, very good,
And when he is bad he is—conventional.

Of course there is skill in his weaving and intertwining of figures, but of the inspiration of the first movement of the "Ocean" symphony there is not a trace. It is manufactured music. The faults are most pronounced in the second and third movements; opening movement and the finale being much more striking in treatment and in contents. The finale, in fact, has moments of great beauty, possibly because the composer has built upon the sure foundation of the Russian folk-song. But what is beautiful is not Rubinstein's, and even these points are marred by prolixity, by long-continued sequences, by extreme development. What the future may do with Rubinstein's works is problematical, but that he will be outstripped by Tschaikowsky seems certain; the latter was far more self-critical.

The symphony was to the advantage of Mr. George Proctor, who followed with Liszt's rhapsodical concerto. Even a respectable presentation of Liszt's fiery thoughts would have sounded well after the artificialities of the symphony, and the pianist gave more than this.

Mr. Proctor is certainly improving as a concert-pianist. There was a time, not so long ago, when it was impossible for him to interpret so free and dashing a work satisfactorily; yet on this occasion he made a success.

Not that he gave the abandon that Liszt demands, or brought out the wild Magyar element of the concerto; there was some water in the Tokay, that weakened the flavor; but the surety and clearness, the brilliant octave and choral playing (wrist and forearm action) and the careful attention to ensemble, were sufficient to win him a number of hearty recalls at the conclusion of the work.

We found Kaun's "Minnehaha" very beautiful, a presentation of the best type of modern music. The composer gives the pathetic picture of the Famine and the death of the heroine without pulling the harmonic structure down about his ears, and yet he portrays passion and deep emotion quite as graphically as those who think that Sorrow can only be painted by 25 consecutive fifths.

The catastrophe was full of power and the wailing (it may have been accidental coincidence) seemed to call out the name—"Minnehaha! Minnehaha!"

The final funeral march, too, was full of dignity and pathos, the pizzicato figure on the deep strings,—almost amounting to a "basso ostinato,"—being very impressive. The performance was exquisite, and Mr. Gericke was recalled to bow his acknowledgments at its close.

Smetana was a genius and we are always glad to listen to his works. What a fugue (or rather fugato) the overture of "The Sold Bride" begins with! Musical amateurs imagine that the fugue is always a dry-as-dust composition, all skill and no emotion. To such we can say that Mendelssohn in the overture to "Elijah" pictures an agitated, famished multitude by this form, that Mozart gave the most chattering and light-hearted sketch by a fugate in his "Magic Flute" overture, and that here Smetana gives a most exciting touch by the same means.

The folk-song character of this overture makes us long for the entire opera. We understand that it is impossible for the New York opera company to give us "Parsifal" in Boston this spring, but they might at least let us have a representation of Smetana's master-work.

Louis C. Elson.

DAILY ADVERTISER,

FEBRUARY 1, 1904.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

PROGRAMME.

Rubinstein—Symphony No. 6, in A minor, op. III.
Liszt Concerto No. 1, in E flat major, for pianoforte and orchestra.
Mr. George Proctor, Soloist.
Hugo Kaun—Symphonic Poem, "Minnehaha," op. 43, No. 1. (First time.)
Smetana—Overture to the opera "The Sold Bride."

For once the concert began with the symphony, as if Mr. Gericke wanted to have this task over as soon as possible. It was interesting to hear this Rubinstein work, if only on account of the diverse opinions expressed regarding it. It is bold from the outset, beginning with an augmented fifth chord that does not suggest any particular tonality. But the demon of development seizes upon the composer early in the work and stays by him until the end. It is spasmodic and vehement at times. Rubinstein is a most unequal composer in almost all of his orchestral compositions. The old rhyme can be modified for him,—

When he is good he is very, very good,
And when he is bad he is—conventional.

Of course there is skill in his weaving and intertwining of figures, but of the inspiration of the first movement of the "Ocean" symphony there is not a trace. It is manufactured music. The faults are most pronounced in the second and third movements; opening movement and the finale being much more striking in treatment and in contents. The finale, in fact, has moments of great beauty, possibly because the composer has built upon the sure foundation of the Russian folk-song. But what is beautiful is not Rubinstein's, and even these points are marred by prolixity, by long-continued sequences, by extreme development. What the future may do with Rubinstein's works is problematical, but that he will be outstripped by Tschaikowsky seems certain; the latter was far more self-critical.

The symphony was to the advantage of Mr. George Proctor, who followed with Liszt's rhapsodical concerto. Even a respectable presentation of Liszt's fiery thoughts would have sounded well after the artificialities of the symphony, and the pianist gave more than this.

Mr. Proctor is certainly improving as a concert-pianist. There was a time, not so long ago, when it was impossible for him to interpret so free and dashing a work satisfactorily; yet on this occasion he made a success.

Not that he gave the abandon that Liszt demands, or brought out the wild Magyar element of the concerto; there was some water in the Tokay, that weakened the flavor; but the surety and clearness, the brilliant octave and choral playing (wrist and forearm action) and the careful attention to ensemble, were sufficient to win him a number of hearty recalls at the conclusion of the work.

We found Kaun's "Minnehaha" very beautiful, a presentation of the best type of modern music. The composer gives the pathetic picture of the Famine and the death of the heroine without pulling the harmonic structure down about his ears, and yet he portrays passion and deep emotion quite as graphically as those who think that Sorrow can only be painted by 25 consecutive fifths.

The catastrophe was full of power and the wailing (it may have been accidental coincidence) seemed to call out the name—"Minnehaha! Minnehaha!"

The final funeral march, too, was full of dignity and pathos, the pizzicato figure on the deep strings,—almost amounting to a "basso ostinato,"—being very impressive. The performance was exquisite, and Mr. Gericke was recalled to bow his acknowledgments at its close.

Smetana was a genius and we are always glad to listen to his works. What a fugue (or rather fugato) the overture of "The Sold Bride" begins with! Musical amateurs imagine that the fugue is always a dry-as-dust composition, all skill and no emotion. To such we can say that Mendelssohn in the overture to "Elijah" pictures an agitated, famished multitude by this form, that Mozart gave the most chattering and light-hearted sketch by a fugate in his "Magic Flute" overture, and that here Smetana gives a most exciting touch by the same means.

The folk-song character of this overture makes us long for the entire opera. We understand that it is impossible for the New York opera company to give us "Parsifal" in Boston this spring, but they might at least let us have a representation of Smetana's master-work.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Transcript

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1904

Symphony Orchestra in Providence

After seventeen years of indifferent success, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has at last found a cordial welcome in Providence. Last season its concerts in the Rhode Island capital were abandoned because of lack of support. This year thirty ladies and gentlemen guaranteed the expenses for two concerts—the last of which was held last night—and at both every seat was sold and many stood up. This was the more notable last night because Campanari, who was to be the soloist, became ill at the eleventh hour and the management was forced to provide a substitute. Charles Gilbert was procured and repeated his Boston success.

President Faunce of Brown University was the initiator of the movement to guarantee two concerts, and the success warrants the expectation that there will be at least four concerts next year. Through a working committee, of which Frederick Roy Martin of the Providence Journal has been chairman and Albert Steinert secretary, the guarantors have not only packed the hall and paid the orchestra, but have also laid aside the nucleus of a guarantee for next year's concert. The guarantors have been: Mrs. George H. Corliss, Hans Schneider, John W. Danielson, J. DeF. Danielson, Richard S. Howland, Frederick Roy Martin, William L. Hodgman, Albert Steinert, John Shepard, Jr., Moses B. I. Goddard, Charles Morris Smith, Jr., Robert I. Gammell, Herbert F. Hinckley, Arthur H. Watson, Howard O. Sturges, William Gammell, George W. Parks, Mrs. Gustav Radeke, President W. H. P. Faunce, Mrs. Daniel Beckwith, Miss Mary B. Child, Miss Isabelle Nichols, Miss Alice Dorrance, Mrs. Henry G. Russell, Miss Ella R. Matteson, Mrs. Stephen O. Metcalf, Mrs. John Nicholas Brown, I. Gifford Ladd, Mrs. Frank A. Sayles and the Misses Sharpe.

There has been a direct and urgent appeal to the music-lovers of Providence to support these concerts, partly as a matter of pride; the hour of beginning has been set ahead to 8.15 in order to prevent interference with the dinner hour, which is invariably later in Providence than in Boston; the prices of seats have been materially lowered and the guarantors have asked to have something to say about the soloists and the programme.

[89]

SUNDAY HERALD-
FEBRUARY 7, 1904.

DUBOIS OVERTURE HEARD IN BOSTON

"Frithjof" Given by Symphony Orchestra—First Time Here—Miss Olive Mead Plays Beethoven's Violin Concerto.

A BRAHMS SYMPHONY FOR CLOSING NUMBER

Harold Bauer Gives His Closing Piano Recital for This Season with a Programme of Selections from Schumann.

The 14th concert of the Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, was given last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Overture, "Frithjof".....Dubois
(First time.)
Concerto for violin.....Beethoven
Symphony in E minor, No. 4.....Brahms

Dubois' overture, which was produced at Paris in 1880, would not bring a blusn to the cheek of any high officer of a conservatory. There is nothing in it that is radical or revolutionary; there is not the slightest suspicion of treason toward the traditions; there is no dallying with corrupt chords, there is no companionship with dissipated progressiveness. No susceptible pupil will be led astray by hearing a performance of it or by reading furtively the score.

This is as it should be. It would be a pity if Theodore Dubois, director of the Paris conservatory, should be taunted in his highly respectable old age with a musical sin of his middle years. Dubois can look his professors and pupils in the eye and say with the calmness of conscious rectitude: "Gentlemen, I have never been musically bold or individual or imaginative."

The answer to any sceptic concerning the inherent worth of the overture would probably be this: "It is well made; it is clear and logical and sane." The overture is condemned by the answer.

For Dubois chose a romantic subject and wrote an argument as well as music. He chose episodes from the "Frithjof" Saga. Frithjof and Ingeborg love each other, but the maiden's brother will not hear of the marriage. Frithjof is sent away, and Ingeborg laments and is forced to marry old King Ring. Frithjof returns, goes to the temple of Balder, and there, seeing the bracelet he gave Ingeborg on the arm of the god's stature, he tries to wrench it away, and by so doing fires the temple. The subsequent proceedings of Frithjof and Ingeborg interested the composer no more.

The overture is "well made." What is meant by this? The admirers of such overtures would say: "This music has form; it follows safely the approved traditions. There is an introduction with typical motives. The themes in the main body of the overture are clearly exposed and they are skilfully developed. There is no attempt to be pictorial. The coda may well be taken to portray the burning of the temple, but here, as everywhere, expression is moderate and regulated." And so on and so on.

This is all true. But consider a moment the saga itself, which smells of forest and sea. The lovers and their enemies are under a wild northern sky. There are elemental emotions. There is barbaric rage which defies the gods as well as men. Is there any of the spirit of the saga in this music? The music of Dubois is sleek. The love passages might be at Meudon of a Sunday afternoon. Is the first theme expressive of "Frithjof in exile" or expressive of any strong emotion? Nowhere is there a fiery burst; and the bass drum and cymbals used after the finale formula of old-fashioned Italian opera do not console us.

It is a good thing to hear occasionally such music, for it reminds us of the great advance made in France during the last 20 years by the men of the younger school. France produced Berlioz, who was of the romantic movement that swept Europe. After his great orchestral works were produced the musicians of talent looked for years only toward the stage for glory. It is to Dubois' credit that he tried for fame in the concert hall; it is not his fault if he is without imagination.

Miss Olive Mead played last night for the fourth time at these concerts. Her first appearance was in January, 1898. Each appearance has marked her progress in technical proficiency. Her performance of Beethoven's concerto may be considered, perhaps, as a mark of graduation which should be rewarded with a diploma; and it is a pleasure to add that in this concerto she showed a fuller tone and a broader and warmer style than in preceding years.

Her performance was creditable to her in many ways. It would be untrue and injurious to her to say that her interpretation was the full expression of the contents of the work. Her limitations in this respect are temperamental and spiritual rather than mechanical. Many play this concerto; the interpreters of it may be counted on the fingers. Miss Mead was heartily applauded.

The symphony by Brahms, the least striking of the four, brought the close. At the concert this week Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote," a set of variations on a fantastic knightly theme, with introduction and finale, will be performed for the first time in this city.

THERE was the usual fine audience for the Symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon. Miss Olive Mead, the soloist, wore white Liberty silk, with numerous tucks and ecru lace. Some there were Mrs. James Lowell Putnam, Mrs. William A. Burnham and her sister-in-law, Mrs. Charles Fry, Mrs. James Jackson, Mrs. Frank Peabody, Jr., and Miss Rosamond Peabody, Mrs. John L. Thorndike and Miss Olivia Thorndike, Miss Maude MacCarthy, the young violinist, who played with the orchestra several weeks ago; Mrs. William P. Fay, Mrs. Charles Head and Miss Margaret Head, Mrs. Neal Rantoul and her sister, Miss Rosamond Saltonstall; Mrs. Frederick Richardson, with Miss Lena Stevenson, Mrs. Eben Draper, Miss Emily Bacon and Miss Aleid Schenck, Mrs. J. L. Gardner, Mrs. Gericke, Mrs. John Lavalle and Miss Molly Johnson, Miss Priscilla Stackpole, with Miss Susan Thayer, Miss Anna Thayer, Mrs. J. Montgomery Sears and Miss Elizabeth Crafts, Mrs. Matthew Luce, Sr., Mrs. George B. Shattuck, Miss Alice and Miss Rosamond Fay, Miss Rachel Brooks, Miss Juliet and Miss Barbara Higginson, Mrs. John Lowell, Sr., Mrs. George M. Littleton and Miss Rosamond Porter, Miss Helen Apthorp, Miss Marion Wigglesworth, Miss Nathalie Matthews, Miss Alice Sohier, Miss Mea Bowditch and Miss Alice Perry, Miss Jane Waldron, Mrs. F. B. Carpenter, Mrs. Stephen Williams, Miss Esther Hallowell and Miss Eleanor Ames.

SUNDAY GLOBE-
FEBRUARY 7, 1904.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The program for the 14th Symphony recital and concert had for a novelty the overture, "Frithjof," by Theodore Dubois. Miss Olive Mead was the soloist in Beethoven's D major concerto for the violin and Brahms' fourth symphony completed the selections. In the "Frithjof" overture Dubois uses motifs, in the Wagnerian manner, to express emotions, the more tender one, called "Ingeborg," being given to the clarinet, the others to combinations of instruments, with the chief dramatic episodes vigorously illustrated by the drums, double basses and the heavier instrument, each one being allotted themes as well as ensemble work.

The overture tells the story of Frithjof's love for Ingeborg, an Icelandic saga, his disappointment, anger and exile; the maiden's lamentations, her lover's return, his rage at finding her married and his setting Balder's temple on fire. It will be seen that in illustrating these incidents the score should necessarily be chiefly in a vigorous vein, and it is. Dubois has treated his subject with considerable skill and without a superabundant use of dissonant phrases and modulations. The thematic melodies are not disjointed affairs, but developed harmonies, as a rule, and some of the motifs are beautifully expressive of the daintier sentiments. There is a skilful contrast between the gentle "Frithjof" theme in the first part and the same motif in fortissimo at the close, and throughout the morceau each musical type of expression is handled with excellent effect.

The orchestra performed the work splendidly. The cellos sang the opening phrases very sweetly, the clarinet gave its theme equally well, the "wrath" motif was as vigorous and as fortissimo as could be desired, and the woodwinds repeated the phrases of the lighter string contingents smoothly and in perfect unison. The complicated climax was a musical storm, indeed, yet not in a hurly-burly sense, for Mr Gericke's control of his men prevented a chaotic finale.

The yourg American violinist, Olive Mead, has already proved herself an artist of great ability, and her performance of the Beethoven concerto showed her marked improvement in interpreting works of the larger style. Her bowing was excellent, although lacking in breadth by reason of a lack of physical strength, her fingering was nearly flawless, and the difficult runs, double stoppings, chord and arpeggios were executed with an ease and celerity which indicated a technical mastery of the instrument. All the figuratures were played with pleasing daintiness and grace, her cadenza work calling for special commendation, and her audience gave undoubted marks of appreciation by recalling the young artist several times at the close of her performance.

The support by the orchestra was of the usual high standard. The Brahms symphony received admirable treatment, of course, the third movement, possibly, calling for special mention.

This week's program will comprise the overture to Cherubini's opera, "Anacreon"; Richard Strauss' symphonic poem, "Don Quixote," first time here, and Beethoven's seventh symphony.

SUNDAY POST,
FEBRUARY 7, 1904

AT THE SYMPHONY

Fourteenth Concert Given Last Evening at Symphony Hall, With Olive Mead, Violinist, as the Soloist

The programme of the 14th Symphony concert last evening included the following numbers:

Overture "Frithjof".....Dubois
Concerto for violin.....Beethoven
Symphony No. 4, in E minor.....Brahms

This to many was a programme of interest, but one that does not call for extended comment for the violin concerto and the symphony are familiar favorites with the music public, and only the overture was a novelty.

Theodore Dubois, director of the Paris Conservatory, has written much both in large and small forms. His organ pieces are familiar, and of his other works the "Seven Last Words" and "Paradise Lost" have been given here. The "Frithjof" overture, although over 20 years old, received its first performance in this city last evening. It is a refined, pleasing sort of work, effectively scored, but one not especially important of its kind. It was admirably given, but failed to make much of an impression.

After the overture was heard the Beethoven violin concerto, played by Olive Mead, who has appeared somewhat frequently at these concerts within recent years. The concerto is a familiar standby; most of the great violinists that have visited Boston have played it, and many others have attempted it with varying degrees of success.

Miss Mead is, at present, hardly to be included among the greatest of living violinists, probably she will never be in that exclusive and limited circle, but for all that she is one who can be heard with evident pleasure.

None of the violinists heard as soloists at these concerts this season have been up to the standard of artistic excellence noticed in many that have appeared in former seasons, and if lesser lights are to be the rule Miss Mead is decidedly to be preferred to many others that could be named. She has a pleasing tone, is always accurate in intonation, her technical proficiency is such that intricate passages are invariably clear, and her interpretations are logical and artistic, if not such as to work up an audience to an abnormal state of enthusiasm. Miss Mead gave an excellent and enjoyable performance of the concerto, her efforts were loudly applauded and she was several times recalled.

Brahms's fourth symphony was the closing number. It is justly admired by all, even by those who can see but little in the majority of his works. The performance was especially fine. The programme for this week's rehearsal and concert includes Beethoven's seventh symphony, the "Anacreon" overture by Cherubini, and Richard Strauss's symphoric poem "Don Quixote" (given for the first time here) No soloist is announced.

SOCIETY ATTENDS SYMPHONY

Friday's splendid weather, coupled with a most excellent programme, insured a large and brilliant audience at the Symphony rehearsal. Miss Olive Mead, who was simply and daintily clad in white liberty and lace, was the soloist, and came in for much appreciation. A few of the many present were Mrs. John Lowell, Sr., Mrs. John L. Gardner, Mrs. William Gericke, Mrs. Stephen Williams, Mrs. George B. Shattuck, Miss Nathalie Matthews, Mrs. George Littleton, Miss Hortense Porter, Miss Rosamond Porter, Miss Rosamond Saltonstall, Mrs. Matthew Luce, Miss Dorothy Jordan, Mrs. Fred Richardson, Miss Lena Stevenson, Mrs. Eben Draper, Mrs. James Jackson, Miss Aleid Schenck, Miss Bacon, Miss Mea Bowditch, Miss Alice Perry, Mrs. Thomas W. Lawson, Miss Lawson, Miss Helen Apthorp, Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Miss Rachel Brooks, Miss Jane Waldron, Mrs. I. Harris Metcalf, Miss Alice Fay, Mrs. John Lavalle, Miss Mollie Johnson, Miss Elizabeth Crafts, Mrs. J. Montgomery Sears, Mrs. Charles Head, Miss Margaret Head, Miss Juliet Higginson, Miss Barbara Higginson, Mrs. William P. Fay, Miss Marion Wigglesworth, Miss Anna Thayer, Miss Rosamond Peabody, Mrs. Francis Peabody, Miss Priscilla Stackpole, Miss Susan Thayer, Miss Esther Hallowell, Mrs. Fred B. Carpenter, Mrs. John L. Thorndike, Miss Olivia Thorndike and Mrs. James Lowell Putnam.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1904.

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

At the fourteenth Symphony Concert, which took place Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, Mr. Gericke had the assistance of Miss Olive Mead, violinist. This was the programme:

Dubois: Overture, "Frithjof." (First time.)
Beethoven: Concerto for Violin, in D major, Op. 61.
Brahms: Symphony No. 4, in E minor, Op. 98.

The fourteenth Symphony Concert is an occasion of which little can be said, for of the novelty of the evening the less that is said the better, and of the other works there is nothing to say that has not already been said by some ten or twenty times. Since the overture by Dubois, however, cannot be passed by in silence, one may suggest that it is but a feeble illustration of the famous old saga that tells, in stirring way, the loves and woes of the heroic Frithjof and the queen Ingeborg. It begins charmingly, even poetically. It ends magniloquently. Between the beginning and the end it is dull.

From quite different reasons, there is also nothing to say about the Brahms symphony, the wonderful beauties of which have been descanted on time and time again. Its performance, though, is another matter. Mr. Gericke, of course, has long been famous for his sympathy with and understanding of Brahms, yet it seems a long while since the massive strength and the idyllic grace of this Brahms symphony have been presented in so masterly a way as they were on Saturday. The entire performance was a triumph of noble conducting and of splendid orchestral playing.

The symphony was not happily placed on the programme, for it followed the Beethoven violin concerto, a symphony, and a beautiful one, in itself. Indeed, so vast a work as this concerto might well be allowed to pass for a symphony, and be accompanied by pieces of a smaller scale, like overtures and suites. Miss Mead played the solo part with beautiful tone, notably pure intonation and general musical intelligence. She has not, of course, the breadth of style or the warmth of temperament that are necessary for an exhaustive performance of a work of this calibre. Miss Mead was heartily applauded, being recalled quite four times.

Next Saturday there wil be no soloist. This will be the programme: Overture to "Anacreon," Cherubini; symphonic poem, "Don Quixote," Richard Strauss (first time); symphony No. 7, in A major, Beethoven.

R. R. G.

DAILY ADVERTISER,
FEBRUARY 8, 1904.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Dubois—Overture, "Frithjof (first time).
Beethoven—Concerto for violin, in D major, op. 61.
Soloist, Miss Olive Mead.
Brahms—Symphony No. 4, in E minor, op. 98.

We doubt whether any French composer can give a good musical portrayal of a Viking; that subject belongs to the German composer by inheritance. Frithjof, the Viking, as he appeared in Dubois' overture, was a Norseman in kid-gloves (No. 11s), a suave, polite, melodic sea-rover who occasionally grew loud-voiced upon the trombones. The work however ended in chromatics and excitement, as if Frithjof had become quite angry. Compare this work with Bruch's masterpiece on the same topic and its weakness becomes apparent. It s good music "per se," but does not picture its subject.

One might have thought that the Beethoven concerto for violin would have made amends, but it failed to do so. If anyone will recall the way in which Ysaye used to play this concerto they will have some idea of the irresistible might of the first movement and the genial abandon of the finale.

We do not demand that a talented young lady should achieve such an interpretation, but we do not care to hear this masterpiece in the guise of a carefully prepared lesson. It is not wise to allow young misses to interpret tremendous masterworks in our symphonly concerts. The Beethoven Concerto was genteely and elegantly played. There was no flaw of execution; the intonation was beyond censure; the cadenzas were fine displays of technique.

Miss Mead was recalled three times after the finale. She would have been much greater in a lesser work. Then came the fourth symphony of Brahms. The symphonies of this master lose nothing by repeated hearing. Familiarity reveals ever new beauties, and the four works in this form promise to be a strong bulwark against the formlessness which many modern composers hold to be a necessity.

There is a surety of touch in the work that ought to compel recognition even from the "extreme left" of musical radicalism. The development of the two-noted figure,—an iambic,—through the first movement, is the acme of ingenuity. But it is the second movement, with its beautiful horn figure, its strange effects of harmonization, that is the most attractive to the reviewer.

The scale in which the beginning is written is an unusual one, the scale of G with the F natural and the E flatted; an odd combination of major and minor effects. The horns played well here, but less so in the finale. There have been a few lapses in this department lately.

The third movement with its audacious skips from the garret to the cellar, was interpreted with much dash and fire. In the finale Brahms has taken a leaf from the Beethoven book and uses variations which are nothing less than finely constructed developments,—"Durchfuehrungssaetze."

A word of praise must be spoken for the excellent flute playing in this. The interpretation was a fine one, for which Mr. Gericke deserves unstinted commendation. For once it may be recorded that there was no exodus during the last two movements. It is possible that the Boston public is beginning to realize that Brahms is not so black as he has been painted.

Louis C. Elson.

[90]

BOSTON HERALD-
FEBRUARY 12, 1904.

THE FIRST TIME IN BOSTON.

Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote" Will Be Produced at Rehearsal of Symphony Orchestra Today.

The 15th public rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra, this afternoon, Mr. Gericke conductor, is one of extraordinary interest, for Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote" will be produced for the first time in Boston. This remarkable composition has been played in Chicago, but we know of no other performance in this country.

"Don Quixote" is a series of fantastical variations on "a theme of a knightly character." A solo violoncello is typical of Don Quixote throughout the piece and Sancho Panza is typified by a solo viola.

The introduction portrays Don Quixote reading books of chivalry, dreaming of the ideal maiden to be rescued and of all manner of adventures. He goes mad. Then follows the announcement of Don Quixote's and Sancho Panza's themes.

Nearly a Dozen Variations In the Theme of "Don Quixote."

The variations are as follows: (1) The two set out on their adventures, and Don Quixote fights the windmills; (2) He charges the sheep and thus gains a mighty victory over the army of Alifanfaron—a remarkable example of instrumentation, with a chorus of "Ba-a-a-a!" in the muted brass, while the strings portray the dust cloud, and there is a pastoral melody in the wood wind; (3) Dialogue and dispute of the knight and his squire concerning the comparative worth of the ideal and the real; (4) The adventure with the Penitents, who attacked by Don Quixote as robbers, beat him soundly; (5) The knight keeps vigil and meditates on the charms of Dulcinea; (6) Sancho tries to persuade his master that a country wench is his adorable Dulcinea; (7) Knight and squire, blindfolded, sit on a wooden horse and believe they are flying through the air in a furious gale. Here the wind machine is used; (8) The journey in the enchanted bark; the upsetting, and the prayer of thanksgiving when the two, dripping, reach the bank; (9) The fight with two monks, who to the knight are evil magicians; (10) Don Quixote, defeated by his friend disguised as the Knight of the Silver Moon, goes home determined to be a shepherd. The finale portrays the death of Don Quixote. The 'cello speaks his last words: he sees clearly his illusions and is willing to die.

Great Pains Have Been Taken In Preparation of This Work.

Great pains have been taken in the preparation of this work, which has excited hot discussion, and the performance has been anticipated eagerly. The other pieces, at this concert will be Cherubini's overture to "Anacreon" and Beethoven's symphony No. 7.

There will be no Symphony concerts next week. The programme of the concerts for Feb. 26-27 will include Mozart's symphony in E flat; Akimenko's "Lyric Poem" (first time); Chabrier's overture to "Gwendoline." Mrs. Schumann-Heink will sing Andromache's scene from Bruch's "Achilles," and two songs by Brahms with viola and piano accompaniment.

PHILADELPHIA PRESS,
FEBRUARY 20, 1904.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

A Calm Program Rendered in Mr. Gericke's Well-known Manner.

The stirring up of musical sensibilities by the very modern music of "Don Quixote" had hardly subsided before the fourth concert, first series, of the Boston Orchestra, demanded attention at the Academy of Music last night; and no matter how severe the shock of Wednesday evening ample balm was found in the excellent program that was admirably rendered last night and read as follows—

Cherubini ....Overture to the opera "Anacreon"
Brahms ..Symphony in E minor, No. 4, Op. 98
Saint-Saens ..Concerto in A minor, for violoncello and orchestra, Op. 33.
Georg Schumann..."In Carnival Time," suite for full orchestra, Op. 22.
Soloist, Mr. Rudolf Krasselt.

The extremely dull and uninteresting Cherubini number made a fitting prelude to the colorless symphony, a work, however, that is rich in suggestiveness, and engenders the conviction that had Brahms worked out his musical salvation along the lines that so strongly appealed to Schumann, when he glorified Brahms in the famous article "The New Path," the monotony of the last of the three B's great works would have been relieved by exuberant fertility of invention and something like thoroughly poetic romanticism, rather than that insistent appeal to grammar and self conscious reservation of sentiment that strangles spontaneity

But last night the admirers of pedantry had their way, and Mr Gericke read the symphony with full justness to the exacting formalities of cold classicism. After all, it is a question of temperament, this admiration for Brahms, but some do not rise sufficiently early to understand the "communication of pure morning joy," and who prefer music that possesses some quality of unrestrained warmth.

It was a relief to turn to the well-known cello concerto, and Mr. Krasselt, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, gave a fine rendering, hardly an interpretation, of the extremely difficult composition. When it is remembered that Saint-Saens wrote the work for Joseph Holman, the pupil of Servais, some notion may be formed of the technical requirements called for. The young cellist acquitted himself superbly on the score of technique. He has perfect repose and awakens a tone singularly pure and round, but not large. His treatment of the instrument is not sufficiently virile. Doubtless as years go by Mr. Krasselt will instill in his manner that decidedly masculine quality that is essential in the making of a great master of the great instrument.

"In Carnival Time" with its brilliant allegro, the alternating delicacy and robustiveness of the andantino marcato and the jollity and devil-may-care presto brought the concert to a close.

SUNDAY HERALD.
Published Every Sunday in the Year—Vol. CXV., No. 45.
SUNDAY, FEB. 14, 1904.

"DON QUIXOTE" AT SYMPHONY

R. Strauss' Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character Are Very Fantastic and Make the Hero a Fool.

INJUSTICE TO FAMOUS GENTLEMAN OF FICTION

Composer Essays to Make Him Into a Laughing Stock, When in Reality He Was a Pathetic and Noble Character.

The 15th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, was given last night in Symphony Hall. The programme was as follows:

Overture to "Anacreon".....Cherubini
"Don Quixote," fantastical variations on a theme of knightly character, Op. 35 (first time).....R. Strauss Symphony in A major No. 7.....Beethoven

Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote," composed in 1897, was played last night for the first time in Boston. So far as we can learn, the performance was the second in the United States. The first was at Chicago in 1899. The performance last night had been prepared with infinite care. It was read with sympathy and imaginative intelligence, as well as with the utmost technical authority, and it was played brilliantly. Mr. Krasselt was the solo 'cellist and Mr. Zach played the solo viola. There was hearty applause, and conductor and soloists were obliged to bow in acknowledgment.

Formidable Task of Putting "Don Quixote" to Music.

This music is exceedingly, enormously ingenious. Ingenuity is the distinguishing feature of the composition; but ingenuity is not the chief characteristic of the purest and the noblest art. The task undertaken by Strauss was formidable if not impossible: to typify Don Quixote and Sancho Panza by solo instruments and to portray them as plunged into all manner of orchestral adventures. The most striking sections of the work are those in which Strauss portrays moods, as the introduction in which there is a psycho-musical representation of the giving way of intellect; the passage in the third variation where Don Quixote speaks nobly of the ideal; the finale in which Don Quixote realizes the utter vanity of his illusions and gives up the ghost. In these instances music is employed legitimately and reasonably; and in these Strauss rises to his greatest height, in this particular work, as an imaginative composer.

His musical representation of conversation between Knight and Squire is for the most part tedious. And it may here be said that any exhibition of mere ingenuity, mere cleverness if it be prolonged for too long a time, is necessarily boresome, and the hearer or the spectator yearns for something simple, something truly beautiful or impressive.

The variations attempt to portray in music certain adventures told in Cervantes' romance. There is no mistaking the Knight's attack on the sheep. The imitation of the baa-ing flock is surprisingly realistic; but the heaven is tempted to cry out with Agesilaus who, when asked to praise a fellow who imitated a nightingale, answered: "I have heard the nightingale itself." So, too, there is no doubt in the seventh variation that there is a mighty wind abroad; yet who without a programme explanation would associate this variation with the Knight and Squire, blindfolded, on the wooden horse?

Much of this music is for a panorama, and it is a pity that it does not accompany a panorama as it moves, or comment on entertaining views thrown on a screen. How is the Knight of the White Moon to be identified? Would any one without jogging of his elbow see windmills in the first variation? These are not captious objections. The composer made his variations; he supplied mottoes for them in the transcription for the piano; he accepted without protest the elaborately explanatory programme books for the Strauss festival in London, at which he was present. He wrote panorama music. Unfortunately, he neglected to provide the panorama itself, with the wind machine and other extra instruments for his swollen orchestra.

Mistake of Quixote as Fool Instead of as a Gentleman.

If the work is to be taken seriously—and fantastical persons are often the most serious of human beings—witness "Don Quixote"—there are aesthetic objections to Strauss' scheme. The variations for the most part are concerned with the ridiculous adventures of the Knight, with the grotesque pages that appeal to young readers, who see in "Don Quixote" merely an amusing book, just as children read "Gulliver's Travels" for the sake of surprise and consequent laughter, and miss the terrible irony. Don Quixote is the noblest gentleman in all fiction. Yet he is portrayed by Strauss to excite laughter.

Laughter is the lowest, cheapest expression of the superiority of him that laughs over the one laughed at. A man is guilty of awkwardness; he is foolish in speech, he outs a silly figure at an ill-timed moment; he falls at the risk of bodily injury. There is laughter. He that laughs exults in his mental superiority or in his own inability to be ridiculous. Laughter is not necessarily the same thing as joy; there is a laugh that is kindly, just as the most common form of laughter is satanic.

No music in which the laugh of implied superiority is the leading motive can be beautiful or noble. It is merely ingenious, clever, diabolically clever; yet induces yawning; it does not brook frequent repetition.

It is fairer perhaps to consider "Don Quixote" as a colossal joke. The music no more lessens the grandeur and taints the sweetness of Don Quixote's character than did the impersonation of the Knight of the Sorrowful Countenance by Mr. Barnabee, when DeKoven's operetta was produced here 15 years ago. If Don Quixote could hear this music, he would regard it as another one of his illusions.

We are warm admirers of the uncommon talent of Richard Strauss. His "Don Juan," "Death and Apotheosis," "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and "A Hero's Life" are great and unusual works, which may pass him to posterity as a genius. We regret, therefore, the more that he wrote "Don Quixote," especially as it is the only one of his more important works that is for the most part ineffective and dull.

The overture to "Anacreon" never sounded so superbly classic and so modern; the allegretto of Beethoven never seemed so human and so spiritual in its sublime melancholy.

In spite of there being no soloist for the Symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon, almost every seat was filled. Among those there were Miss Anna Thayer, who received many congratulations upon her recent engagement; Mme. Wiehe and her husband, M. Berenyi; Mrs. James Lawrence, Mr. T. P. Beal, Mrs. Frank Peabody, Jr., and Miss Rosamond Peabody, Mrs. W. P. Fay, Mrs. Neal Rantoul and Miss Rosamond Saltonstall, Mrs. Jordan and Miss Dorothy Jordan, Mrs. Frederick Richardson and Miss Mary Sargent, Miss Alice Sohier, Miss Susan Thayer, Mrs. Gardner, Miss Clara and Miss Edith Rotch, Mrs. George B. Shattuck, Miss Estelle Kimball, Mrs. John B. Osborn, Miss Susan Howe and Miss Eleanor Hyde, Miss Elizabeth Crafts, Mrs. James W. Kenney and Miss Kenney, Mrs. James B. Fersyth, Miss Anna Berry, Mrs. Bryce Allan, Mrs. George M. Cushing and her sister, Miss Littleton; Mrs. Robert Grant, Mrs. John Lowell, Sr., Miss Mary Greenleaf, Miss Rosamond Allen, Mr. and Mrs. James R. Poor, Miss Marion Ladd, Miss Marion Lewis, Miss Hilda Williams, Miss Annie Manning, Miss Nathalie Matthews and Mrs. W. L. Humphrey. This week there will be no concert. Next week Mme. Schumann-Heink will be the soloist.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1904

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

This was the programme of last Saturday's symphony concert, the fifteenth of the season:

Cherubini: Overture to the Opera "Anacreon."
Richard Strauss: "Don Quixote." (Introduction, Theme with Variations, and Finale.) Fantastic variations on a theme of knightly character, Op. 35. (First time.)
Violoncello solo by Mr. Rudolf Krasselt.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 7, in A major, Op. 92.

The matter of most moment connected with this concert was, of course, the first performance in Boston of Richard Strauss's composition, "Don Quixote." Although played here the other night for the first time, the work is not new, having been produced as early as 1898 at Cologne, and less than a year later at Chicago. It precedes, therefore, "Ein Heldenleben," which we already know here, so far as acquaintance is consonant with a solitary hearing.

Admirers of the tremendous conception of the "Heldenleben" and of the dramatic power displayed in "Tod und Verklärung" must needs be disappointed in "Don Quixote." The subject is lofty, according to the opinion of the world for three hundred years or so, and therefore, worthy of the same elevated treatment that Strauss has applied to his other orchestral poems, both earlier and later. In the case of "Don Quixote," however, Strauss has apparently seen only the man's crazed, grotesque side. Quite forgetful that Cervantes's creation was always, despite his eccentricities, "a very parfait gentle knigte," Strauss has made of him a ridiculous, pitiful buffoon. He first depicts a scene of violent madness, more suggestive of Bedlam than of the Spaniard's disordered condition, then proceeds to set everybody a-laughing at a series of farcical happenings more like the adventures of Carrie Nation at Harvard and at Yale than those of the chivalrous Don. That the madhouse episode sounds genuinely, horribly maniacal, that the tilt with the sheep is portrayed with an amazing orchestral ventriloquism of bleats and baas, that the high wind seems authentically gusty, goes without saying. In this composition, as in all his others, Strauss has contrived strange effects that will be curiously analyzed by all students of clever and brilliant instrumentation. The ingenuity of the musician, too, demands admiration. Not the minutest detail has escaped him that possibly could serve to make more vivid the picture of Don Quixote's experiences. All these details, however, are somewhat in vain unless each listener is furnished with a carefully prepared table of the variations, for, with all his skill and cunning, Strauss has not been able so plainly to indicate, to give an example, a windmill in motion, that it could be recognized unless the auditor's elbow were jogged. The themes representing Don Quixote and Sancho Panza, furthermore, are not strongly individualized. The one is not essentially noble and knightly, the other is not sharply in contrast. Strauss, in short, has misconceived the character of the Spanish hero, seeing a clown where there was a nobleman. He has also obstructed the march of his genius by overwhelming impedimenta of petty detail. Only one passage, in the middle of the work, reaches the plane of grandeur on which Strauss, more constantly than any living composer of music, abides. Now that we have heard the "Don Quixote," for which opportunity all thanks, why may we not have again "Tod und Verklärung," "Ein Heldenleben," or "Zarathustra," that we may not forget the quality of the real Richard Strauss?

In comparison with this musical burlesque, the "Anacreon" overture, played with a dazzling brilliancy, sounded more intrinsically noble than ever before. And never have the rhythms of the first Beethoven movement seemed more enchanting, the very poetry of motion. Nor did Beethoven's exquisite sense of tonal color suffer in juxtaposition with the flaunting daubs and splashes from Strauss's orchestral palette. The concert was admirably arranged; each composition displayed its own actual worth.

There will be no symphony concert this week. On Feb. 27 Mrs. Schumann-Heink will sing, and this is to be the programme:

Mozart: Symphony in E-flat major (B. & H., No 3).
Max Bruch: Andromache's Aria, from "Achilles."
Th. Akimenko: Lyric Poem. (First time.)
Brahms: Two Songs with Viola and Piano accompaniment.
Emil Chabrier: Overture to "Gwendoline."

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, FEB 14, 1904.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The program for the 15th symphony rehearsal and concert contained an interesting feature in Richard Strauss' fantastic "variations on a theme of knightly character," entitled "Don Quixote." The other selections were the overture to Cherubini's opera, "Anacreon," and the great A major symphony by Beethoven. "Don Quixote" was finished about seven years ago and since then it has been the subject for wordy warfare, not only abroad, but in this country, where the piece was performed about five years ago in Chicago under the direction of Theodore Thomas. Dr Strauss has attracted so much attention by his masterly skill as a composer that the announced performance here of the much-discussed work aroused new curiosity in his musical "problem"; and doubtless since this curiosity has been satisfied, opinions pro and con, will now be in order. Earlier in the week, in Chickering hall, Mr Lang gave a puzzling composition by Debussey, repeating the work on the same evening to better enable the auditors to grasp the musical significance of three "Nocturnes"; but it will take more than one repetition of the Strauss poem for the majority of people to decide whether it is real music or mainly a conglomeration of sounds—a kind of musical satire or joke.

The work is strictly unconventional, effects are produced in the strangest musical fashion, many of them are seemingly without precedent in their odd instrumentation, and yet, with the subject, Don Quixote, in mind, this fantastic treatment undoubtedly illustrates the theme in a vivid manner. Cervantes certainly keeps one guessing what new and visionary emotion will awaken in the lean knight, and Dr Strauss' composition produces a similar effect.

There are about a dozen variations on the knightly theme, beginning with the mad don dreaming of adventures in the field of chivalry and closing with his peaceful death. Don Quixote is typified by the solo cello; the love theme is suggested by the violin, the viola representing the Sancho Panza theme. In the mass of orchestral chaos there is interspersed writing graceful, original and noble in invention, beautiful examples of musical art in coherent form, and harmonies which are enchanting, but, unfortunately, brief.

Mr Krasselt played the chief cello part, the Don Quixote theme, with splendid expression, and Mr Zack and Mr Arbos gave the viola and violin solos in a sympathetic manner. The orchestra evidently was faithful in illustrating Mr Gericke's ideas regarding the interpretation of the immensely difficult work; but further than that it would be difficult to judge after a single hearing of one of the most perplexing descriptive pieces ever performed here. The finale, the don's death, is wonderfully expressed and here the almost unrivaled ensemble playing of the orchestra was shown in perfection. The work afforded plenty of amusement for the players as well as auditors, the former when not busy, scanning the spectators with half-puzzled expressions as if to ask "what do you think of it?"

The Anacreon overture was performed admirably and the Beethoven symphony, especially the charming second movement, was given in the usual faultless style.

The orchestra will be away from Boston this week. The program announced for Feb 26 and 27 includes Mozart's symphony in E flat, Akimenko's "Lyric Poem" (first time), Chabrier's overture to "Gwendoline." Mme Schumann-Heink will sing Andromache's scene from Bruch's "Achiles" and two songs by Brahms with viola and piano accompaniment.

PUBLIC LEDGER-
FEBRUARY 20, 1904.

The fourth concert of the first series of those being given here this winter by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Wilhelm Gericke, took place yesterday evening in the Academy of Music, the chief interest of the occasion being the appearance of Rudolf Krasselt, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, as soloist of the evening. He played the familiar Saint-Saens concerto, the orchestra being heard in Cherubini's "Anacreon" overture, Brahms E minor symphony and a festive composition by Georg Schumann, called "In Carnival Time."

[91]

DAILY ADVERTISER,

FEBRUARY 15, 1904.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Programme.

Overture to the Opera "Anacreon"....Cherubini
"Don Quixote." (Introduction, Theme with variations, and finale.) Fantastic variations on a theme of Knightly character, op. 35.....Richard Strauss
Violoncello solo (First time)....Rudolph Krasselt
Symphony No. 7, in A major, op. 92...Beethoven

It was the first performance in Boston of a great work about which there is much discussion. It is well known that our great orchestral conductor is not in deep sympathy with the extreme modern school; all the more credit to him, therefore, that he takes such great care that it shall be perfectly presented. We doubt whether Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote" has ever been so well performed (technically) anywhere, or whether this harmonic jungle will ever be traversed with more surety. The amount of work entailed by the performance may be faintly judged of when one is told that there were almost a dozen extra rehearsals on this single composition.

Was it as a sly presentation of his own views in the matter that Mr. Gericke gave Cherubini's lofty "Anacreon" overture before, and Beethoven's 7th symphony after this radical work? It reminded the auditor that one school does not abolish another, that even Strauss has not dimmed the glory of the classics. And old Cherubini sounded as majestic as ever, forming a stately introduction to the "melee" that followed.

"Don Quixote" is one of the recent innovations in the variation form. D'Indy made an experiment in this field by giving a set of variations in reversed order, the theme coming last; Huber made a set on a series of paintings by Boecklin; Elgar served up a number of his friends and acquaintances in variation sauce; and here comes a greater composer than any of them and gives us Don Quixote and Sancho Panza in a set of variation-adventures. Decidedly the modern composer is endeavoring to treat the variation-form by new processes.

In these variations Strauss has followed the thought of Berlioz, who caused the viola to become a definite character (Childe Harold), and has caused two instruments to become dramatis personae,—the violoncello being the fantastic Don and the viola his humble esquire. One can at once pay tribute to Mr. Krasselt and to Mr. Zach, who played the obbligati with splendid effect and were applauded to the echo at the end of the work.

As to the composition itself one may well pause and become timid in rendering a verdict. Here is the chief master of the modern orchestra, a man who is the greatest tone-colorist that the world has ever possessed, giving a mixture of hideous and beautiful, of quassia and champagne, in a manner that must be called intensely graphic but not at all enjoyable. Is art to be enjoyed? That seems to be the question of the present.

Strauss answers in the negative. With such a complex work it must be demanded of every auditor that he sit up nights and study the score minutely before he ventures to attend the first performance. Let no man accuse the modern music of lack of intellectuality; it is as complexly intellectual as Grell's Mass in 16 real parts, but it requires a wholly different species of mental exertion on the part of the auditor from that demanded by Bach or Palestrina.

The matter becomes the more perplexing when one remembers that Strauss is not forced to this extreme ugliness by lack of ideas, as Bruckner may have been, for he has composed serenely beautiful works in the most classical forms, before he swept into this modern chaos.

Once upon a time there was a school of composition which indulged in every complexity of progression, which experimented with all possible abstrusities, which did not care how ugly its music sounded so that it was terrifically ingenious. The Flemish school has passed away, yet its composers may be regarded as the plowmen who made the harvest of Bach and the later giants possible. Perhaps the present school of mighty experimenters in tonal ugliness will also leave a good legacy. Some day an orchestral composer will come who will weld the melodic beauty of a bizet upon the wonderful tone-coloring and graphicality of Strauss, and a new school of instrumental music will arise. Strauss himself might head this school if he would. Music is not a fixed and unchanging Art.

The pure contrapuntal school became monody with the beginning of opera; Bach altered the entire face of musical modulation; Beethoven led into a completely new domain; Wagner evolved a style utterly at variance with all that had preceded; we are probably upon the verge of another marked change and these volcanic throes but herald the birth of the orchestral school of the 20th century.

There might have been more humor in the interpretation of the work. The bleating of the sheep was a startling touch of realism, but Dr. Strauss will emphasize it more when he gives the work here next month. The journey through the air is one of the phenomena of the composition. The introduction of the wind-machine is amazingly exciting. It sounds like a piccolo that has suddenly gone crazy. Yet it remained in tune with the music. Berlioz and Wagner introduced bells into the orchestra; Tschaikowsky added cannon ("1812"); Strauss adds this revolving wheel with its fierce glissando effects; the composer of the future has only Whitfield torpedoes to add to his list of instruments.

Touches of much beauty and grace appeared occasionally, like plums in a pudding. Among these the counterpoint of the bassoons, in the 9th variation, and the twisted modulations of the first theme, typifying Don Quixote's false reasoning, and the clear presentation of ideas at the close, portraying the return of sanity, may be mentioned. At the end of the thorny journey, Mr. Gericke was called to the stand to bow to the applause of the audience; he pointed to his orchestra; let both conductor and men share in the gratitude of the public for the most technically perfect performance of this most trying work.

Then came Beethoven's 7th symphony. The first movement was spoiled for us by the wild orgie we had passed through, but by the time that the Allegretto came we were normal again, and the solemn iteration of dactyl and spondee, and that tenderly consoling Trio, brought us back to sanity. Mr. Gericke's reading of this second movement was altogether great. He avoided the mawkishness that Beethoven feared here, and gave a most effective interpretation of this gem of slow movements. The symphony is replete with powerful organ-points; there is one in the first movement, another in the Trio of the Scherzo, and the most powerful of all in the coda of the finale. All three were properly emphasized and the entire work left the best possible impression. Spite of all the added effects of concussion, spite of all the phantasmagoria of latter-day music, we need not take Beethoven off his pedestal just yet.

Louis C. Elson.

PHILADELPHIA RECORD,

FEBRUARY 18, 1904.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote" the Striking Novelty.

When Conductor Gericke raised his baton as a signal that Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote" was about to be played at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert, last evening in the Academy of Music, there was an instant flutter of program books. The audience from then on until the conclusion of this strange novelty presented a curious and decidedly ultra-modern spectacle. With both eyes glued to the ever-welcome descriptive notes of Philip Hale and both ears primed to receive each significant dissonance or harmony of the composer, the sight to an inflexible musician of the old school must have been eminently disconcerting. "No more music for its own noble sake but mere orchestral trickery" may easily be conceived as the substance of his complaint. And yet the Strauss work is but the consistent development of the underlying idea of Beethoven's classical Pastoral Symphony.

"Don Quixote" was given for the first time in this city last evening. It was only written in 1897 and first played in America by Thomas' Chicago Orchestra in 1899. Contrary to a quite general impression, it is not a symphonic poem, but is described by Strauss himself as "Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character." To the word fantastic in this instance no exception can surely be taken. "Don Quixote" is program music carried to its extremest limits. Numerous adventures of the Knight of La Mancha and his faithful servant are musically, although rather disjointedly, pictured in a way that is simply amazing. An extraordinary arrangement of the strings and united brasses produces with startling vividness the noise of flock of sheep; for the imaginary ride through the air, a novel instrument known as a "wind-machine," is used, and there are numerous other instances of phenomenal objective music. But after all, what is the "Don Quixote" work but a veritable orchestral "stunt" by the greatest living master of orchestration?

Countless beauties, it of course possesses, marvels of counterpoint and exquisite melodic and harmonic virtues, but in the end the aim of the composer does not seem exalted. It is all too definite, and concrete, too much analogous to the coloratura work of an expert soprana. What the composer strove to do there is no doubt he has accomplished with marvelous facility, but at a great sacrifice of the spiritual and subjective, which seem such essential elements of the highest music. Surely a philosophical theme such as "Also Sprach Zarathustra" is one far worthier of his genius.

Smeitau's overture to "The Bartered Bride." Beethoven's Seventh Symphony and Lalo's Spanish Symphony with T. Adamowski, violinist, as the very admirable soloist made up the remainder of the concert. The work of the orchestra was characteristically fine, especially in the Strauss number.

PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER,

FEBRUARY 20, 1904

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Presents an Interesting Program

Although the weather was so inclement there was a large and brilliant audience at the Academy of Music last evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fourth concert in its first series for the current season.

The leading feature of the program was the Fourth Symphony of Brahms, in E minor, Op. 98. This is perhaps less generally popular than either the lyrical Second or the elegiac Third of the same composer, but it is a beautiful work, elevated in sentiment, admirable in construction, deeply imaginative in conception and rich in lovely thoughts, and it was rendered under Mr. Gericke's keenly sympathetic and intelligently appreciative direction in a manner which disclosed its full significance and gave to every little detail its proper place in the general scheme. It is hard to discriminate when the whole standard of attainment was so high, but it did seem as though Mr. Gericke was in especially close rapport with the delightful andante and certainly the poetic spirit and the melodious charm of that enchanting movement could hardly have been more adequately or more eloquently expressed.

The other orchestral numbers were the brilliant "Anacreon" overture of Cherubini, which was given with an incomparable elan, and a suite by George Schumann entitled "In Carnival Time," which, without being of any great importance, is highly colored, ingeniously contrived and distinctly effective. The soloist was Mr. Rudolf Krasselt, the first 'cello player of the orchestra, who, in a vigorous and finished performance of Saint-Saens' A minor concerto for the instrument named, showed a good tone, ample technique and plenty of artistic intelligence. There are all kinds of difficulties in this music, but they were readily surmounted, and the hearty applause which Mr. Krasselt received was well deserved.

The next of these concerts and the last for the season will take place on Monday evening, March 14.

PHILADELPHIA PRESS,

FEBRUARY 18, 1904.

"DON QUIXOTE" IN MUSIC

Strauss' Famous Work Interpreted by the Boston Orchestra.

The fourth concert, second series, of the Boston Orchestra, given at the Academy of Music last night, was a notable event in music annals, as Philadelphia was given an opportunity of hearing a remarkable work by a remarkable man, the famous and much-talked of "Don Quixote," by Richard Strauss. Of course there were other interesting numbers on the program, which in detail was as follows:—

Smetana .....
Overture to the Opera, "The Sold Bride"
Lalo—Spanish Symphony for Violin and Orchestra, in D minor, Op. 21.
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Scherzando: Allegro molto.
III. Andante.
IV. Rondo: Allegro.
Richard Strauss, "Don Quixote" (Introduction Theme with Variations and Finale): Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character. Op. 35.
(Violoncello Solo, Mr. Krasselt.)
(First time.)
Beethoven—
Symphony in A major, No. 7, Op. 92.
I. Poco sostenuto ed allegro vivace.
II. Allegretto.
III. Scherzoie Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro con brio.
Soloist .....Mr. T. Adamowski.

Smettana's brilliant overture was effectively rendered, and Mr. Adamowski, who is an old friend, brought to bear the full force of his satisfying virtuosity in his interpretation of the florid Lalo number. The Beethoven symphony was read in Mr. Gericke's usual dignified and elegant manner, but the focal center of attraction was the Strauss tone poem.

The varied experiences of that delightful old gentleman whose brain had become disordered by constant and indiscriminate reading of romances of chivalry, but, withal, full of Spanish honor and enthusiasm, gentle and dignified, trusted by his friends and loved by his dependents, is the subject of Richard Strauss' masterpiece "Don Quixote." And a more complex series of episodes for an equally complex composer to treat as a music-novel could hardly be imagined. But Strauss has been successful in reciting through the medium of tone a colorful and graphic story.

Seldom has the great work appeared on European programs, and Theodore Thomas gave it for the first time in America in Chicago in January, 1899, within a year of its first performance in Germany. Last week, in Boston, it received a second reading at the hands of Mr. Gericke, and Philadelphia enjoys the distinction of being third on the list.

There are many reasons why conductors approach "Don Quixote" with a feeling akin to insecurity. Even a casual study of the score reveals difficulties that can only be compassed by an orchestra made up of performers of the highest possible executive ability, even though directed by a conductor whose musical insight and imaginative powers are of the highest type. Consequently few leaders are willing to assume the responsibility of an undertaking that might result in consequences quite as disastrous as befel the doughty Don in his battle with the windmills.

